"Holy Spirit." Indivisible Holiness is almost synonymous with Godhead. speaking... say—"speak" implies the act of utterance; "say" refers to that which is uttered. Here, "say" means a spiritual and believing confession of Him. Jesus—Not an abstract doctrine, but the historical, living God-man (Romans, 10. 9). accursed—as the Jews and Gentiles treated Him (Galatians, 3. 13). Cf. "to curse Christ" in the heathen Piny's letter (Ep. 10. 97). The spiritual man feels Him to be the Source of all blessings (Ephesians, 1. 3); and to be severed from Him is to be accursed (Romans, 9. 3). Lord—acknowledging himself as His servant (Isaiah, 26. 13). "Lord" is the LXX. translation for the incommunicable Hebrew name JEHOVAH. 4. diversities of gifts—i.e., varieties of spiritual endowments peculiar to the several members of the church; cf. "dividing to every man severally" (v. 11). same Spirit—the Holy Trinity appears here: the Holy Spirit in this verse; Christ in v. 5; and the Father in v. 6. The terms "gifts," "administrations," and "operations," respectively correspond to the Divine Threes. The Spirit is treated of in v. 7, &c.; the Lord, in v. 12, &c.; God, in v. 25. Cf. Ephesians, 4. 4-6. 5. 6. "Gifts" (v. 4), "administrations" the various functions and services performed by those having the gifts (cf. v. 28), and "operations" (the actual effects resulting from both the former, through the universally operative power of the one Father who is "above all, through all, and in us all"), form an ascending climax. [HENDERSON, Inspiration.] same Lord—whom the Spirit glorifies by these ministrations. [BENGEI.] 6. operations—(cf. v. 10.) same God...worketh—by His Spirit working (v. 11). all in all—of them (the "gifts") in all the persons (who possess them). 7. But—Though all the gifts flow from the one God, Lord, and Spirit, the "manifestation" by which the Spirit acts (as He is hidden in Himself), varies in each individual, to every man—to each of the members of the church generally. to profit withal—with a view to the profit of the whole body. 8-10. Three classes of gifts are distinguished by a distinct Greek word for "another" (in distinct class), marking the three several genera; allo marks the species, hetero the genera (cf. Greek, ch. 15. 39-41). I. Gifts of intellect, viz., (1.) wisdom, (2.) knowledge. II. Gifts dependent on a special faith, viz., that of miracles (Matthew, 17. 20; (1.) Healings, (2.) workings of miracles, (3.) prophecy of future events, (4.) discerning of Spirits, or the divinely-given faculty of distinguishing between those really inspired, and those who pretended to inspiration. III. Gifts referring to the tongues. (1.) Divers kinds of tongues, (2.) interpretation of tongues. The catalogue in v. 28 is not meant strictly to harmonise with the one here, though there are some particulars in which they correspond. The three genera are summarily referred to by single instances of each in ch. 13. 8. The first genus refers more to believers; the second, to unbelievers. by...by—The first in Greek is, "By means of" or "through the operation of"; the second is, "according to" the disposing of (cf. v. 11); the third is, "in," i.e., under the influence of (so the Greek, Matthew, 22. 43; Luke, 2. 27). word of wisdom—the ready utterance of (for imparting to others, Ephesians, 6. 19) wisdom, viz., new revelations of the Divine wisdom in redemption, as contrasted with human philosophy (ch. 1. 24; 2. 6, 7; Ephesians, 1. 8; 3. 10; Colossians, 2. 3). word of knowledge—ready utterance supernaturally imparted of truths ALREADY REVEALED (in this it is distinguished from "the word of wisdom," which related to NEW revelations). Cf. ch. 14. 6, where "revelation" (answering to "wisdom" here) is distinguished from "knowledge." [HENDERSON.] Wisdom or revelation belonged to the "propheeta"; knowledge, to the "teachers." Wisdom penetrates deeper than knowledge. Knowledge relates to things that are to be done. Wisdom, to things eternal;

hence, wisdom is not, like knowledge, said to "pass away" (ch. 13. 8). [BENGEI.] 9. faith—not of doctrines, but of miracles: confidence in God, by the impulse of His Spirit, that He would enable them to perform any required miracle (cf. ch. 13. 2; Mark, 11. 23; James, 5. 16). Its nature, or principle, is the same as that of saving faith, viz., reliance on God; the producing cause, also, is the same, viz., a power altogether supernatural (Ephesians, 1. 19, 20). But the objects of faith differ respectively. Hence, we see, saving faith does not save by its intrinsic merit, but by the merits of Him who is the object of it. healing—Greek plural, "healings" referring to different kinds of disease which need different kinds of healing (Matthew, 10. 1). 10. working of miracles—As "healings" are miracles, these here meant must refer to miracles of special and extraordinary power (so the Greek for "miracles" means; e.g., healings might be effected by human skill in course of time; but the raising of the dead, the infliction of death by a word, the innocuous use of poisons, &c., are miracles of special power. Cf. Mark, 6. 5; Acts, 10. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100). [HENDERSON.] It depends on "faith" (v. 9; Romans, 12. 6). The prophets ranked next to the apostles (v. 28; Ephesians, 3. 5; 4. 11). As prophecy is part of the whole scheme of redemption, an inspired insight into the obscurer parts of the existing Scriptures, was the necessary preparation for the miraculous foresight of the future. discerning of spirits—discerning between the operation of God's Spirit, and the evil spirit, or unaided human spirit (ch. 14. 29; cf. 1 Timothy, 4. 1; 1 John, 4. 1). kinds of tongues—the power of speaking various languages; also a spiritual language unknown to man, uttered in ecstasy (ch. 14. 2-12). This is marked as a distinct genus in the Greek. "To another and a different class." interpretation of tongues—(ch. 14. 13, 26, 27.) 11. as he will—(v. 18; Hebrews, 2. 4.) 12, 13. Unity, not unvarying uniformity, is the law of God in the world of grace, as in that of nature. As the many members of the body compose an organic whole, and none can be dispensed with as needless, so those variously gifted by the Spirit, compose a spiritual organic whole, the body of Christ, into which all are baptized by the one Spirit. of that one body—Most of the oldest MSS. omit "one," so also is Christ—i.e., the whole Christ, the head and body. So Psalm 18. 50, "His anointed (Messiah or Christ), David (the antitypical David) and His seed." by... Spirit... baptized—lit., "in;" in virtue of; through. The designed effect of baptism, which is realized when not frustrated by the unfaithfulness of man. Gentiles—lit., Greeks, all made to drink into one Spirit—The oldest MSS. read, "Made to drink of one Spirit," omitting "into" (John, 7. 37). There is an indirect allusion to the Lord's supper, as there is a direct allusion to baptism in the beginning of the verse. So the "Spirit, the water, and the blood" (1 John, 5. 6), similarly combine the two outward signs with the inward things signified, the Spirit's grace. are...have been—rather as Greek, "were...were." (The past tense.) 14. Translate, "For the body also." The analogy of the body, not consisting exclusively of one, but of many members, illustrates the mutual dependence of the various members in the one body, the church. The well-known fable of the belly and the other members, spoken by Menenius Agrippa, to the seceding commons (Livy, 2. 32), was probably before St. Paul's mind, stored as it was with classical literature. 15. The humbler members ought not to despise themselves, or to be despised by others more noble (v. 21, 22). foot... hand—The humble speaks of the more honourable member which most nearly resembles of; so the "ear" of the "eye" the nobler and more commanding member, Numbers, 10, 31) (v. 16). As in each compares himself with those whom he approaches nearest in gifts, not those far superior. The Hand and Hand represent men of active life; the ear and eye, those of contemplative life. 17. Superior as eye is, it would not do if it were the sole member the exclusion of the rest. 18. now—as the case really every one—each severally. 19. where were the body which, by its very idea, "hath many members" (E. 14). [ALFORD.] 20. now—as the case really is: contrast to the supposition (v. 19; cf. v. 18). many members—mutually dependent. 21. The higher cannot separate with the lower members. 22. more feeble—more susceptible of injury; e.g., the brain, the belly, the eye. Their very feebleness, so far from doing away with the need for them, calls forth our greater care for their preservation, as being felt "necessary." 23. less curable—"We think" the feet and the belly "less curable," though not really so in the nature of things. bestow . . . honour—putting shoes on (Margin) feet, and clothes to cover the belly. unseemly parts are secret parts: the poorest, though unclad in the rest of the body, cover these. 24. tempered . . . together as the principle of mutual compensation: to that which lacked—to the deficient part [ALFORD.] 25. no schism (cf. v. 21)—no disunion: referring to "divisions" noticed, ch. 11, 18. care one for another as, in behalf of one another. 26. And—Accordingly, suffer with it—"When a thorn enters the heel, the body feels it, and is concerned: the back bends, the belly and thighs contract themselves, the hands are forward and draw out the thorn, the head stoops, the eyes regard the affected member with intense care." (CHRYSTOSTOM.) rejoice with it—"When the head is crowned, the whole man feels honoured, the mouth expresses, and the eyes look, gladness." (CHRYSTOSTOM.) 27. members in particular—i.e., several members of it. Each church is in miniature the whole aggregate of churches is collectively a body of Christ" (cf. ch. 3, 16); and its individual members are members, every one in his assigned place. 28. set . . . in the church—as he has "set the members in the body" (v. 18). first apostles—above even prophets. Not merely the Twelve, but others are called, e.g., Barnabas, &c. (Romans, 16, 7). teachers not taught, for the most part, truths already revealed; means, the prophets made new revelations, and make all their prophesying under the Spirit's influence. As the teachers had the "word of knowledge," the prophets "the word of wisdom" (v. 8). Under teachers are included "evangelists and pastors," *sees—lit., "powers" (v. 10): ranked below "teachers," the function of teaching is more edifying, though dazzling than working miracles. helps, governments—lower and higher departments of "ministrations" (v. 5; as instances of the former, deacons whose chief it was to help in the relief of the poor, and in tizing and preaching, subordinate to higher ministrations. Acts, 6, 1-10; 8, 5-17; also, others who helped with time and means, in the Lord's cause (cf. ch. 13, 3; members, 11, 17). The Americans similarly use "helpers" "helpers." And as instances of the latter, presbyters or bishops, whose office it was to govern the church (1 Timothy, 5, 17; Hebrews, 13, 17, 24). These are, though no ordinary and permanent, were specially endowed with the Spirit for their care, whence they are here classified with other functions of an inspired character. Government (lit. guides the helm of affairs), as being occupied with external goods, notwithstanding the outward status it gives, is led by the Spirit with the lower functions. Cf. that giveth (answering to "helps")—*he that ruleth" vermin to "governments") (Romans, 12, 8). Trans-lit., "Helpings, governings." [ALFORD, &c.] diversi- ties of tongues—(v. 10). "Diverse kinds of tongues." 29. Are all?—Surely not. 31. covet earnestly—Greek, "emulously desire." Not in the spirit of discontented "coveting." The Spirit "divides to every man severally as He will" (v. 1); but this does not prevent men earnestly seeking, by prayer and watchfulness, and cultivation of their faculties, the greatest gifts. BEMA explains, "Hold in the highest estimation," which accords with the distinction in his view (ch. 14, 1) between "follow after charity—scarcely esteem spiritual gifts" also with (v. 11, 18) the sovereign will with which the Spirit distributes the gifts, precluding individuals from desiring gifts not vouchsafed to them. But see the note, ch. 14, 1. the best gifts—Most of the oldest MSS. read, "the greatest gifts," and yet—Greek, "and moreover." Besides recommending your zealous desire for the greatest gifts, I am about to show you a something still more excellent (lit., "a way most way-like"), to desire, "the way of love" (cf. ch. 14, 1). This love or "charity," includes both "faith" and "hope" (ch. 13, 7), and bears the same fruits (ch. 13) as the ordinary and permanent fruits of the Spirit (Galatians, 5, 22-24). Thus, "long suffering," cf. v. 4; "faith," v. 7; "joy," v. 6; "meekness," v. 5; "goodness," v. 5; "gentleness," v. 4 (the Greek is the same for "is kind"). It is the work of the Holy Spirit, and consists in love to God, on account of God's love in Christ to us, and as a consequence, love to man, especially to the brethren in Christ (Romans, 5, 5; 15, 30). This is more to be desired than gifts (Luke, 10, 30).

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1-13. CHARITY OR LOVE SUPERIOR TO ALL GIFTS. The New Testament emblem of love, as the 45th Psalm (see its title) and Canticles in the Old Testament. 1. tongues—from these he ascends to "prophecy" (v. 2); then, to "faith"; then, to benevolent and self-sacrificing deeds: a climax. He does not except even himself, and so passes from addressing them ("unto you," ch. 12, 31) to putting the case in his own person, "Though I," &c. speak with the tongues—with the eloquence which was so much admired at Corinth (e.g., Apollon, Acts, 18, 24; cf. ch. 1, 12; 3, 21, 22), and with the command of various languages, which some at Corinth abused to purposes of mere ostentation (ch. 14, 2, &c.). of angels—higher than "men," and therefore, it is to be supposed, speaking a more exalted language, charity—the principle of the ordinary and more important gifts of the Spirit, as contrasted with the extraordinary gifts (ch. 12), *sound—tinkling—sound without soul or feeling; such are "tongues" without charity, cymbal—Two kinds are noticed (Psalm 150, 5), the loud or clear, and the high sounding one: hand cymbals and finger cymbals, or castagnets. The sound is sharp and piercing. 2. mysteries—(Romans, 11, 25; 16, 25.) Mysteries refer to the deep counsels of God heretofore secret, but now revealed to His saints. Knowledge, to truths long known. faith. . . remove mountains—(Matthew, 17, 20; 21, 21.) The practical power of the will elevated by faith (NEANDER): confidence in God that the miraculous result will surely follow the exercise of the will at the secret impulse of His Spirit. Without "love" prophecy, knowledge, and faith, are not what they seem (cf. ch. 5, 1, 2; Matthew, 7, 22; James, 2, 41, cf. v. 5), and so fall of the heavenly reward (Matthew, 6, 2). Thus St. Paul, who teaches justification by faith only (Romans, 3, 4, 5; Galatians, 2, 16; 3, 7-14), is shown to agree with St. James, who teaches (James, 2, 24) "by works" (i.e., by love, which is the "spirit" of faith, James, 2, 26) a man is justified, and not by faith only." 3. bestow . . . goods. . . poor—lit., dole out in food all my goods; one of the highest functions of the "helps" (ch. 12, 28). give . . . body to be burned—lit., to such a degree as that I should be burned. As the three youths did (Daniel, 3, 28), "yielded their bodies" (cf. 2 Corinthians, 12, 15). These are most noble exemplifications of love*

In giving and in suffering. Yet they may be without love: in which case the "goods" and "body" are given, but not the soul, which is the sphere of love. Without the soul God rejects all else, and so rejects the man, who is therefore "profited" nothing (Matthew, 16, 26; Luke, 9, 23-25). Men will fight for Christianity, and die for Christianity, but not live in its spirit, which is love. 4. Suffereth long—under provocations of zeal from others. The negative side of love is kind—the positive side. Extending good to others. Cf. with love's features here those of the "wisdom from above" (James, 3, 17). 5. Savieth—The Greek includes also jealous, vaunteth not—in words, even of gifts which it really possesses: an indirect rebuke of those at Corinth who used the gift of tongues for mere display. not puffed up—with party zeal, as some at Corinth were (ch. 4, 6). 5. not...unseemly—is not unbecoming, or inattentive to civility and propriety. thinketh as evil—imputeth not evil [ALFORD]; lit., "the evil" which actually is there (Proverbs, 10, 12; 1 Peter, 4, 8). Love makes allowances for the faults of others, and is ready to put on them a charitable construction. Love, so far from devising evil against another, excuses "the evil" which another inflicts on her (ESTES); doth not meditate upon evil inflicted by another (BESON); and in doubtful cases, takes the more charitable view. [GROSS.] 6. rejoiceth in the truth—rather, "rejoiceth with the truth." Exults not at the perpetration of iniquity (unrighteousness) by others (cf. Genesis, 9, 22, 23), but rejoices when the truth rejoices: sympathises with it in its triumphs (2 John, 4). See the opposite (2 Timothy, 3, 8). "Resist the truth." So "the truth" and "unrighteousness" are contrasted (Romans, 2, 8). "The truth" is the gospel truth, the inseparable ally of love (Ephesians, 4, 15; 3 John, 12). The false charity which compromises "the truth" by glossing over "iniquity" or unrighteousness is thus tacitly condemned (Proverbs, 17, 16). 7. Beareth all things—without speaking of what it has to bear. The same Greek verb as in ch. 9, 12. It endures without desisting to the world personal distress. Lit., said of holding fast like a watertight vessel: so the charitable man contains himself in silence from giving vent to what selfishness would prompt under personal hardship, believeth all things—unconsciously believes all that is not palpably false, all that it can with a good conscience believe to the credit of another. Cf. James, 3, 17, "easy to be entreated," Greek, easily persuaded, hopeth—what is good of another, even when others have ceased to hope, endureth—perseveres in a patient and loving spirit. 8. never faileth—never is to be out of use: it always holds its place. shall fail...vanish away—The same Greek verb is used for both; and that different from the Greek verb for "faileth." Translate, "Shall be done away with," i.e., shall be dispensed with at the Lord's coming, being superseded by their more perfect heavenly analogues; for instance, knowledge by intuition. Of "tongues," which are still more temporary, the verb is "shall cease." A primary fulfilment of St. Paul's statement took place when the church attained its maturity; then "tongues" entirely "ceased," and "prophecies" and "knowledge," so far as they were supernatural gifts of the Spirit, were superseded as no longer required when the ordinary preaching of the word, and the scriptures of the New Testament collected together, had become established institutions. 9, 10. in part—partially and imperfectly. Cf. a similar contrast to the "perfect man," "the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ" (Ephesians, 4, 11-13), that which is in part—fragmentary, and isolated. 11. When...a child—(ch. 3, 1; 14, 20). I speak—alluding to "tongues," understood—or, "had the sentiments of." Alluding to "prophecy." I thought—Greek, "reasoned" or "judged," alluding to "knowledge," when I became...I put away—rather, "now that I am become a man,

I have done away with the things of the child." 12. now—in our present state. see—an appropriate expression, in connection with the "prophecy" or seers (1 Samuel, 9, 9). through a glass—i.e., in a mirror: the reflection seeming to the eye to be behind the mirror, so that we see it through the mirror. Ancient mirrors were made of polished brass or other metals. The contrast is between the inadequate knowledge of an object gained by seeing it reflected in a dim mirror (such as ancient mirrors were), compared with the perfect idea we have of it by seeing itself directly, darkly—lit., in enigma. As a "mirror" conveys an image to the eye, so an "enigma" to the ear. But neither "eye nor ear" can fully represent (though the believer's soul gets a small revelation now of) "the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him" (ch. 2, 9). St. Paul alludes to Numbers, 12, 8. "not in dark speeches"; LXX., "not in enigmas." Compared with the visions and dreams vouchsafed to other prophets, God's communications with Moses were "not in enigmas." But compared with the intuitive and direct vision of God hereafter, even the revealed word now is "a dark discourse," or a shadowing forth by enigma of God's reflected likeness. Cf. 2 Peter, 1, 19, where the "light" or candle in a dark place stands in contrast with the "day" dawning. God's word is called a glass or mirror also in 2 Corinthians, 3, 18. then—"when that which is perfect is come" (v. 10). face to face—not merely "mouth to mouth" (Numbers, 12, 8). Genesis, 32, 30, was a type (John, 1, 50, 51). knew...known—rather as Greek, "fully know...fully known." Now we are known by, rather than know, God (ch. 8, 3; Galatians, 4, 9). 13. And now—translate, "But now." "In this present state." [HENDERSON.] Or, "now" does not express time, but opposition, as in ch. 5, 11. "the case being so" (GROSS); whereas it is the case that the three gifts, "prophecy," "tongues," and "knowledge" (cited as specimens of the whole class of gifts) "fail" (v. 8), there abide permanently only these three—faith, hope, charity. In one sense faith and hope shall be done away, faith being superseded by sight, and hope by actual fruition (Romans, 8, 24; 2 Corinthians, 5, 7); and charity, or love, alone never faileth (v. 8). But in another sense, "faith and hope," as well as "charity," ABIDE, viz., after the extraordinary gifts have ceased: for those three are necessary and sufficient for salvation at all times, whereas the extraordinary gifts are not at all so: cf. the use of "abide," ch. 3, 14. Charity, or love, is connected specially with the Holy Spirit, who is the bond of the loving union between the brethren (Romans, 15, 30; Colossians, 1, 8). Faith is towards God. Hope is in behalf of ourselves. Charity is love to God creating in us love towards our neighbour. In an unbeliever there is more or less of the three opposites—unbelief, despair, hatred. Even hereafter faith in the sense of trust in God "abideth," also "hope," in relation to ever new joys in prospect, and at the anticipation of ever-increasing blessedness, sure never to be disappointed. But love alone in every sense "abideth"; it is therefore "the greatest" of the three, as also because it presupposes "faith," which without "love" and its consequent "works" is dead (Galatians, 6, 6; James, 2, 17, 20. but—rather, "and"; as there is not so strong opposition between charity and the other two, faith and hope which like it also "abide."

CHAPTER XIV.

Ver. 1-25. SUPERIORITY OF PROPHECY OVER TONGUES. 1. Follow after charity—as your first and chief aim, seeing that it is "the greatest" (ch. 12, 13), and desire—translate, "Yet (as a secondary aim) desire zealously (Note, ch. 12, 31) spiritual gifts;" but rather—"but chiefly that ye may prophesy" (speaks and exhorts under inspiration) (Proverbs, 29, 18; Acts, 13, 1; 1 Thessalonians, 5, 20), whether as to future events, i.e., strict prophecy, or explaining obscure parts of scripture, especially the prophetic scriptures, or illustrating and setting forth questions of Christian doctrine and practice. Our modern preaching is the successor of prophecy, but without the inspiration. Desire zealously this (prophecy) more than any other spiritual gift; or in preference to "tongues" (v. 2, &c.). [BENGL.] 2. speaketh... unto God—who alone understands all languages. no man understandeth—generally speaking; the few who have the gift of interpreting tongues are the exception. in the spirit—as opposed to "the understanding" (v. 14). mysteries—unintelligible to the hearers, exciting their wonder, rather than instructing them. Corinth, being a mart resorted to by merchants from Asia, Africa, and Europe, would give scope amidst its mixed population for the exercise of the gift of tongues; but its legitimate use was in an audience understanding the tongue of the speaker, not, as the Corinthians abused it, in mere display. 3. But—on the other hand, edification—of which the two principal species given are "exhortation" to remove sluggishness, "comfort" or consolation to remove sadness. [BENGL.] Omit "to." 4. edifieth himself—as he understands the meaning of what the particular "tongue" expresses; but "the church," i.e., the congregation, does not. 5. Translate, "Now I wish you all to speak with tongues (so far as I from thus speaking through having any objection to tongues), but rather in ORDER THAT (as my ulterior and higher wish for you) ye should prophesy." Tongues must therefore mean languages, not ecstatic unintelligible rhapsodies (as NEANDER fancied: for Paul could never "wish" for the latter in their behalf. greater—because more useful, except he interpret—the unknown tongue which he speaks, "that the church may receive edifying" (building up). 6. Translate, "But now," seeing there is no edification without interpretation. revelation... prophesying—corresponding one to the other; "revelation" being the supernatural unveiling of divine truths to man, "prophesying" the enunciation to men of such revelations. So "knowledge" corresponds to "doctrine," which is the gift of teaching to others our knowledge. As the former pair refers to specially revealed mysteries, so the latter pair refers to the general obvious truths of salvation, brought from the common storehouse of believers. 7. Translate, "And things without life giving sound, whether pipe or harp, yet (notwithstanding their giving sound) if they give not a distinction in the tones (i.e., notes) how, &c.? what is piped or harped—i.e., what tune is played on the pipe or harp. 8. Translate, "For if also: an additional step in the argument, uncertain sound—having no definite meaning; whereas it ought to be so marked that one succession of notes on the trumpet should summon the soldiers to attack; another, to retreat; another, to some other evolution. 9. So... ye—who have life, as opposed to "things without life" (v. 7), by the tongue—the language which ye speak in. ye shall speak—ye will be speaking into the air, i.e., in vain (ch. 9, 26). 10. it may be—i.e., perhaps, speaking by conjecture. "It may chance" (ch. 13, 37). so many—as may be enumerated by investigators of such matters. Cf. "so much," used generally for a definite number left undefined, Acts. 5, 8; also 2 Samuel, 12, 8. kinds of voices—kinds of articulate speech, without signification—without articulate voice (i.e., distinct meaning). None is without its own voice, or mode of speech, distinct from the rest. 11. Therefore—seeing that none is without meaning, a barbarian—a foreigner (Acts, 28, 2). Not in the deprecatory sense as the term is now used, but one speaking a foreign language. 12. zealous—emulously desirous. spiritual gifts—lit., "spirits"; i.e., emanations from the one Spirit. see that ye may excel to—translate, "Seek them, that ye may abound in them to the edifying," &c. 13. Explain,

"Let him who speaketh with a tongue [unknown] in his prayer (or, when praying) strive that he may interpret." [ALFORD.] This explanation of "pray" is needed by its logical connection with "pray in an unknown tongue" (v. 14). Though his words be unintelligible to his hearers, let him in them pray that he may obtain the gift of interpreting, which will make them "edifying" to "the church" (v. 12). 14. spirit—my higher being, the passive object of the Holy Spirit's operations, and the instrument of prayer in the unknown tongue, distinguished from the "understanding," the active instrument of thought and reasoning; which in this case must be "unfruitful" in edifying others, since the vehicle of expression is unintelligible to them. On the distinction of soul or mind and spirit, see Ephesians, 4, 23; Hebrews, 4, 12. 15. What is it then?—What is my determination thereupon? and—rather as Greek, "but" I will not only pray with my spirit, which (v. 14) might leave the understanding unedified, but with the understanding also. [ALFORD & ELLICOTT.] pray with the understanding also—and, by inference, I will keep silence altogether if I cannot pray with the understanding (so as to make myself understood by others). A present warning, mutatis mutandis, against the Roman and Greek practice of keeping liturgies in dead languages, which long since have become unintelligible to the masses; though their forefathers spoke them at a time when those liturgies were framed for general use. 16. Else... thou—He changes from the first person, as he had just expressed his own resolution, "I will pray with the understanding," whatever "thou" doest. bless—the highest kind of prayer. occupieth the room of the unlearned—one who, whatever other gifts he may possess, yet, as wanting the gift of interpretation, is reduced by the speaking in an unknown tongue to the position of one unlearned, or "a private person." say Amen—Prayer is not a vicarious duty done by others for us; as in Rome's liturgies and masses. We must join with the leader of the prayers and praises of the congregation, and say aloud our responsive "Amen" in assent, as was the usage of the Jewish (Deuteronomy, 27, 15, 26; Nehemiah, 8, 6) and Christian primitive churches. [JUSTIN MART. Apol. 2, 97.] 17. giveth thanks—The prayers of the synagogue were called "eulogies," because to each prayer was joined a thanksgiving. Hence the prayers of the Christian church also were called blessings and giving of thanks. This illustrates Colossians, 4, 2; 1 Thessalonians, 5, 17, 18. So the Kaddish and Kedusha, the synagogue formulae of "hallowing" the Divine "name" and of prayer for the "coming of God's kingdom," answer to the Church's Lord's prayer, repeated often, and made the foundation on which the other prayers are built. [TERTULLIAN de Oratione.] 18. tongues—The oldest MSS. have the singular, "in a tongue [foreign]." 19. I had rather—the Greek verb more literally expresses this meaning, "I wish to speak five words with my understanding (rather) than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue;" even the two thousandth part of ten thousand. The Greek for "I would rather," would be a different verb. St. Paul would NOT wish at all to speak ten thousand words in an unknown tongue." 20. Brethren—an appellation calculated to conciliate their favourable reception of his exhortation. children in understanding—as preference of gifts abused to non-edification would make you (cf. ch. 3, 1; Matthew, 10, 16; Romans, 16, 19; Ephesians, 4, 14). The Greek for "understanding" expresses the will of one's spirit, Romans, 8, 6 (it is not found elsewhere); as the "heart" is the will of the "soul." The same Greek is used for "minded" in Romans, 8, 6. men—full-grown. Be child-like, not childish. 21. In the law—as the whole Old Testament is called, being all of it the law of God. Cf. the citation of the Psalmist, as the "law," John, 10, 34. Here the quotation is from Isaiah, 28, 11, 12, where God virtually saith of Israel, This people hear me not, though I speak to them in the language which they are familiar with; I will therefore speak to them in other tongues, namely, those of the foes whom I will send against them; but even then they will not hearken to me: which St. Paul thus applies, Ye see that it is a penalty to be associated with men of a strange tongue, yet ye impose this on the church [GROTIUS]: they who speak in foreign tongues are like "children" just "weaned from the milk" (Isaiah, 28, 9), "with stammering lips" speaking unintelligibly to the hearers, appearing ridiculous (Isaiah, 28, 14), or as babbling drunkards (Acts, 2, 13), or madmen (v. 23). 22. Thus from Isaiah it appears, reasons St. Paul, that "tongues" (unknown and uninterpreted) are not a sign mainly intended for believers (though at the conversion of Cornelius and the Gentiles with him, tongues were vouchsafed to him and them to confirm their faith), but mainly to be a condemnation to those, the majority, who, like Israel in Isaiah's day, reject the sign and the accompanying message. Cf. "yet... will they not hear me," v. 21. "Sign" is often used for a condemnatory sign (Ezekiel, 4, 3, 4; Matthew, 12, 39-42). Since they will not understand, they shall not understand. prophesying... not for them that believe not, but... believe—i.e., prophesying has no effect on them that are radically and obstinately like Israel (Isaiah, 28, 11, 12), unbelievers, but on them that are either in receptivity or in fact believers: it makes believers of those not wilfully unbelievers (v. 24, 25; Romans, 10, 17), and spiritually nourishes those that already believe. 23. whole... all... tongues—The more there are assembled, and the more that speak in unknown tongues, the more will the impression be conveyed to strangers "coming in" from curiosity ("unbelievers"), or even from a better motive ("unlearned"), that the whole body of worshippers is a mob of fanatical "madmen" and that "the church is like the company of builders of Babel after the confusion of tongues, or like the cause tried between two deaf men before a deaf judge, celebrated in the Greek epigram." (GROTIUS) unlearned—having some degree of faith, but not gifts. [BENCKE.] 24. all—one by one (v. 31). prophesy—speak the truth by the Spirit intelligibly, and not in unintelligible tongues. one—"any one." Here singular: implying that this effect, viz., conviction by all, would be produced on any one whatsoever, who might happen to enter. In v. 23 the plural is used: "unlearned or unbelievers," implying that however many there might be, not one would profit by the tongues; yea, their being many would confirm them in rejecting the sign, as many unbelieving men together strengthen one another in unbelief: individuals are more easily won. [BENCKE.] convicted—convicted in conscience; said of the "one that believeth not" (John, 16, 8, 9). judges—his secret character is opened out. "is searched into." [ALFORD.] Said of the "one unlearned" (cf. ch. 2, 15). 25. And thus—Omitted in the oldest MSS., and versions. secrets of his heart made manifest—He sees his own inner character opened out by the sword of the Spirit (Hebrews, 4, 14; James, 1, 23), by the word of God, in the hand of him who prophesieth. Cf. the same effect produced on Nebuchadnezzar, Daniel, 2, 30, end of the verse, 46, 47. No argument is stronger for the truth of religion than its manifestation of men to themselves in their true character. Hence hearers even now often think the preacher must have aimed his sermon particularly at them. and so—convicted at last, judged, and manifested to himself. Cf. the effect on the woman of Samaria produced by Jesus' unfolding of her character to herself, John, 4, 19, 29. and report—to his friends at home, as the woman of Samaria did. Rather, as the Greek is, "He will worship God announcing," i.e., openly avowing then and there, "that God is in you of a truth," and by implication that the God who is in you is of a truth the God.

26-40. RULES FOR THE EXERCISE OF GIFTS IN THE CONGREGATION. 26. How is it then?—rather, "What then is the true rule to be observed as to the use of gifts?" Cf. v. 15, where the same Greek occurs, a doctrine—to impart and set forth to the congregation. a psalm—extemporary, inspired by the Spirit, as that of Mary, Zechariah, Simeon, and Anna (Luke, 1, and 2), a tongue... a revelation—The oldest MSS. transpose the order: "revelation... tongue;" "interpretation" properly following "tongue" (v. 13). Let all things be done unto edifying—The general rule under which this particular case falls: an answer to the question at the beginning of this verse. Each is bound to obey the ordinances of his church not adverse to Scripture. See Article XXXIV, Church of England Prayer Book. 27. let it be by two—at each time, in one assembly: not more than two or three might speak with tongues at each meeting, by course—in turns. let one interpret—one who has the gift of interpreting tongues; and not more than one. 28. let him—the speaker in unknown tongues, speak to himself, and to God—(cf. v. 2, 4)—privately, and not in the hearing of others. 29. two or three—at one meeting (he does not add "at the most," as in v. 27, lest he should seem to "quench prophesying," the most edifying of gifts), and these "one by one," in turns (v. 27, "by course," and v. 31). St. Paul gives here similar rules to the prophets, as previously to those speaking in unknown tongues. Judge—by their power of "discerning spirits" (ch. 12, 10), whether the person prophesying was really speaking under the influence of the Spirit (cf. ch. 12, 3; 1 John, 4, 1-3). 30. If any thing—translate, "But if any thing," one that sitteth by—a hearer. let the first hold his peace—let him who heretofore spoke, and who came to the assembly hitherto with a previous ordinariness (in those times) revelation from God (v. 20), give place to him who at the assembly is moved to prophesy by a sudden revelation from the Spirit. 31. For ye may—rather, "For ye can (if ye will) all prophesy one by one," giving way to one another. The "for" justifies the precept (v. 30, "let the first hold his peace." 32. And—Following up the assertion in v. 31, "Ye can (if ye will) prophesy one by one," i.e., restrain yourselves from speaking all together; "and the spirits of the prophets," i.e., their own spirits, acted on by the Holy Spirit, are not so hurried away by His influence, as to cease to be under their own control; they can if they will hear others, and not demand that they alone should be heard uttering communications from God. 33. In all the churches of the saints God is a God of peace; let Him not among you be supposed to be a God of confusion. [ALFORD.] Cf. the same argument, ch. 11, 16. LACHMANN, &c., put a full stop at "peace," and connect the following words thus: "As in all churches of the saints, let your women keep silence in your churches." 34. (1 Timothy, 2, 11, 12.) For women to speak in public would be an act of independence, as if they were not subject to their husbands (cf. ch. 11, 3; Ephesians, 5, 22; Titus, 2, 5; 1 Peter, 3, 1). For "under obedience," translate, "in subjection" or "submission," as the Greek is translated (Ephesians, 5, 21, 22, 24). the law—a term applied to the whole Old Testament; here, Genesis, 3, 16. 35. Anticipation of an objection. Women may say, "But if we do not understand some thing, may we not 'ask' a question publicly so as to 'learn'?" Nay, replies St. Paul, if you want information, 'ask' not in public, but 'at home'; ask not other men, but 'your own particular (so the Greek) husbands,' shame—indecorous. 36. What!—Greek, "Or." Are you about to obey me? Or, if you set up your judgment above that of other churches, I wish to know, do you pretend that your church is the first church FROM which the gospel word came, that u should give the law to all others? Or are you the ly persons unto whom it has come? 37. prophet- e species. spiritual—the genus:spiritually endowed. e followers of Apollos prided themselves as "spirital" (ch. 3. 1-3; cf. Galatians, 6. 1). Here one capable discerning spirits is specially meant. things that I its ... commandments of the Lord—a direct assertion inspiration. St. Paul's words as an apostle are rist's words. St. Paul appeals not merely to one or o, but to a body of men, for the reality of three facts out which no body of men could possibly be mistaken. (1.) That his having converted them was not e to mere eloquence, but to the "demonstration of s Spirit and of power;" (2.) that part of this demon- stration consisted in the communication of miraculous wer, which they were then exercising so generally to require to be corrected in the irregular employ- ment of it; (3.) that among these miraculous gifts was a which enabled the "prophet" or "spiritual person" decide whether St. Paul's epistle was scripture or not, s could not have written so, unless the facts were riously true; for he takes them for granted, as con- siously known by the whole body of men whom he ad- esses. [HINDS on Inspiration.] 38. if any man be sasant—wilfully; not wishing to recognise these diances and my apostolic authority in enjoining sm. let him be ignorant—I leave him to his ignorance: will be at his own peril; I feel it waste of words to ask any thing further to convince him. An argu- ment likely to have weight with the Corinthians, who mired "knowledge" so much. 39. covet—earnestly sire. Stronger than "forbid not": marking how ach higher he esteemed "prophecy" than "tongues." s. Let, &c.—The oldest MSS. read, "But let," &c. s its verse is connected with v. 39. "But (whilst desir- g prophecy, and not forbidding tongues) let all things g done decently," &c. "Church government is the st security for Christian liberty" (J. NEWTON) s. v. 23, 26-33).

CHAPTER XV.

Ver. 1-58. THE RESURRECTION PROVED AGAINST E DENIERS OF IT AT CORINTH. Christ's resurrec- ion rests on the evidence of many eye-witnesses, in- duding St. Paul himself, and is the great fact preached the ground-work of the gospel: they who deny the surrection in general, must deny that of Christ, and s consequence of the latter will be, that Christian saching and faith are vain. 1. Moreover—"Now," LFORD & ELLICOTT.] I declare—lit. "I make known"— implies some degree of reproach that it should be w necessary to make it known to them afresh, owing some of them "not having the knowledge of God" 34). Cf. Galatians, 1. 11. wherein ye stand—wherein ow take your stand. This is your present actual ivilage, if ye suffer not yourselves to fall from your gh standing. 2. ye are saved—rather, "ye are being ved." If ye keep in memory what I preached unto you— e critics, BENGE, &c., prefer connecting the words s, "I declare unto you the gospel (v. 1) in what words eached it unto you." St. Paul reminds them, or her, makes known to them, as if anew, not only the t of the gospel, but also with what words, and by at arguments, he preached it to them. Trans- e in that case, "If ye hold it fast." I prefer arrang- s as English Version. "By which ye are saved, if ye id fast (in memory and personal appropriation) with at speech I preached it unto you." unless—which is possible, your faith is vain, in resting on Christ's surrection as an objective reality. 3. I delivered to you—A short creed, or summary of articles of th, was probably even then existing; and a profes- ion in accordance with it was required of candidates : baptism (Acts, 8. 37). first of all—lit., "among the e most points" (Hebrews, 6. 2). The atonement is, in Paul's view, of primary importance. which I ... received—from Christ Himself by special revelation (of. ch. 11. 23). died for our sins—i.e., to atone FOR them: for taking away our sins (1 John, 3. 5; cf. Gala- tians, 1. 4): "gave Himself for our sins" (Isaiah, 53. 6; 2 Corinthians, 5. 16; Titus, 2. 14). The "for" here, does not, as in some passages, imply vicarious substitution, but "in behalf of" (Hebrews, 6. 3; 1 Peter, 2. 24). It does not, however, mean merely "on account of," which is expressed by a different Greek word (Romans, 4. 25) (though in English Version translated similarly "for"), according to the Scriptures—which "cannot be broken." St. Paul puts the testimony of Scripture above that of those who saw the Lord after His resurrec- tion. [BENGE.] So our Lord quotes Isaiah, 63. 12, in Luke, 23. 37; cf. Psalm 22. 16, &c.; Daniel, 9. 26. 4. buried... rose again—His burial is more closely con- nected with His resurrection than His death. At the moment of His death, the power of His inextinguish- able life exerted itself (Matthew, 27. 52). The grave was to Him not the destined receptacle of corruption, but an apartment fitted for entering into life (Acts, 2. 26-29). [BENGE.] rose again—Greek, "hath risen": the state thus begun, and its consequences, still continue. 5. seen of Cephas—Peter (Luke, 24. 34). the twelve—The round number for "the eleven" (Luke, 24. 33, 36): "The twelve" was their ordinary appellation, even when their number was not full. However, very possibly Matthias was present (Acts, 1. 22, 23). Some of the oldest MSS. and versions read, "the eleven": but the best on the whole, "the twelve." 6. five hundred—This appearance was probably on the mountain (Thabor, according to tradition,) in Galilee, when his most solemn and public appearance, according to His special promise, was vouchsafed (Matthew, 26. 32; 27. 7, 10, 16). He "appointed" this place, as one remote from Jerusalem, so that believers might assemble there more freely and securely. ALFORD's theory of Jerusalem being the scene, is improbable; as such a multitude of believers could not, with any safety, have met in one place in the metropolis, after his crucifixion there. The number of disciples (Acts, 1. 15) at Jerusalem shortly after, was one hundred and twenty, though in Galilee and elsewhere not being reck- oned. Andronicus and Junius were, perhaps, of the number (Romans, 16. 7): they are said to be "among the apostles" (who all were witnesses of the resurrec- tion, Acts, 1. 22). remain unto this present—and, there- fore, may be sifted thoroughly to ascertain the trust- worthiness of their testimony. fallen asleep—in the sure hope of awaking at the resurrection (Acts, 7. 60). 7. seen of James—the less, the brother of our Lord (Galatians, 1. 19). The Gospel according to the He- brews, quoted by Jerome (Catalogus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, p. 170 D.), records that "James swore he would not eat bread from the hour that he drank the cup of the Lord, till he should see Him ris- ing again from the dead." all the apostles—the term here includes many others besides "the twelve" already enumerated (v. 5): perhaps the seventy disci- ples (Luke, 10.). [CHRYSTOM.] 8. one born out of due time—Greek, "the one abortively born": the abor- tion in the family of the apostles. As a child born before the due time is puny, and though born alive, yet not of the proper size, and scarcely worthy of the name of man, so "I am the least of the apostles," scarcely meet to be called an apostle: a supernumerary taken into the college of apostles out of regular course, not led to Christ by long instruction, like a natural birth, but by a sudden power, as those prematurely born. [GROTIUS.] Cf. the similar image from child-birth, and by the same spiritual power, the resurrection of Christ (1 Peter, 1. 3). "Begotten again by the resurrection of Jesus." Jesus' appearance to Paul, on the way to Damas- cus, is the one here referred to. 9. least—The name, "Paulus," in Latin, means least. I preached the church—Though God has forgiven him, Paul can hardly forgive himself at the remembrance of his past sin. 10. by...grace...and His grace—The repetition implies the prominence which God's grace had in his mind, as the sole cause of his marvellous conversion and subsequent labours. Though "not meet to be called an apostle," grace has given him, in Christ, the meekness needed for the office. Translate as the Greek. "His grace which was (showed) towards me." what I am—occupying the honourable office of an apostle. Contrast with this the self-sufficient prayer of another Pharisee (Luke, 18. 11), but I laboured—by God's grace (Philippians, 2. 16). than they all—than any of the apostles (v. 7). grace of God...with me—cf. "the Lord working with them (Mark, 16. 20). The oldest MSS. omit "which was." The "not I, but grace," implies, that though the human will concurred with God when brought by His Spirit into conformity with His will, yet "grace" so preponderated in the work, that His own co-operation is regarded as nothing, and grace as virtually the sole agent. (Cf. ch. 3. 9; Matthew, 10. 20; 2 Corinthians, 6. 1; Philippians, 2. 12, 13.) 11. whether it were I or they—the apostles who "laboured more abundantly" (v. 10) in preaching, such was the substance of our preaching, viz., the truths stated in v. 2, 4. 12. If—Seeing that it is an admitted fact that Christ is announced by us eye-witnesses as having risen from the dead, how is it that some of you deny that which is a necessary consequence of Christ's resurrection, viz., the general resurrection? some—Gentile reasoners (Acts, 17. 32; 26. 8) who would not believe it, because they did not see "how" it could be (v. 35, 36). 13. If there be no general resurrection, which is the consequent, then there can have been no resurrection of Christ, which is the antecedent. The head and the members of the body stand on the same footing: what does not hold good of them, does not hold good either of Him: His resurrection and theirs are inseparably joined (cf. v. 20-22; John, 14. 19). 14. your faith...vain—(v. 11.) The Greek for "vain" here is, empty, unreal: in v. 17, on the other hand, it is, without use, frustrated. The principal argument of the first preachers in support of Christianity, was that God had raised Christ from the dead (Acts, 1. 22; 2. 32; 4. 10, 33; 13. 37; Romans, 1. 4). If this fact were false, the faith built on it must be false too. 15. testified of God—i.e., concerning God. The rendering of others is, "against God" (Fulgente, ESTIUS, GROTIUS): the Greek proposition with this genitive implies, not direct antagonism (as the accusative would mean), but indirect, to the dishonour of God. English Version is probably better. If so be—as they assert. It is not right to tell untrue stories, though they are told, and seem for the glory of God (Job, 13. 7). 16. The repetition implies the unanswerable force of the argument. 17. vain—Ye are, by the very fact (supposing the case to be as the sceptics maintained), frustrated of all which "your faith" appropriates: Ye are still under the everlasting condemnation of your sins (even in the disembodied state which is here referred to), from which Christ's resurrection is our justification (Romans, 4. 25): "saved by His life" (Romans, 5. 10). 18. fallen asleep in Christ—in communion with Christ as His members. "In Christ's case, the term used is death, to assure us of the reality of His suffering; in our case, sleep, to give us consolation: In His case, His resurrection having actually taken place, St. Paul shrinks not from the term death: in our's, the resurrection being still only a matter of hope, he uses the term falling asleep" (Photius, Quaestiones Amphilocheae, 197. perished—their souls are lost; they are in misery in the unseen world. 19. If our hopes in Christ were limited to this life only, we should be, of all men, most to be pitied, viz., because, whilst others live unmolested, we are exposed to every trial and persecution, and after all, are doomed to bitter disappointment in our most cherished hope; for all our hope of salvation, even of the soul (not merely of the body), hangs on the resurrection of Christ, without which His death would be of no avail to us (Ephesians, 1. 19, 20; 1 Peter, 1. 3). The heathen are "without hope" (Ephesians, 2. 12; 1 Thessalonians, 4. 13). We should be even worse, for we should be also without present enjoyment (ch. 4. 9, 20. now—as the case really is, and become—Omitted in the oldest MSS. the first fruits—the earnest or pledge, that the whole resurrection harvest will follow, so that our faith is not vain, nor our hope limited to this life. The time of writing this epistle was probably about the Passover (ch. 5. 7); the day after the Passover Sabbath, was that for offering the first-fruits (Leviticus, 23. 10, 11), and the same was the day of Christ's resurrection: whence appears the appropriateness of the image,—21. by man...by man—The first fruits are of the same nature as the rest of the harvest; so Christ, the bringer of life, is of the same nature as the race of men to whom he brings it; just as Adam, the bringer of death, was of the same nature as the men on whom he brought it, 22. in Adam all—In union of nature with Adam, as representative head of mankind in their fall, in Christ...all—in union of nature with Christ, the representative head of mankind in their recovery. The life brought in by Christ, is co-extensive with the death brought in by Adam. 23. But each in his own order—rather, rank: the Greek is not in the abstract, but concrete; image from troops, "each in his own regiment." Though all shall rise again, let not any think all shall be saved; nay, each shall have his proper place, Christ first (Colossians, 1. 18), and after Him the body who die in Christ (1 Thessalonians, 4. 16), in a separate band from the ungodly, and then "the end," i.e., the resurrection of the rest of the dead. Christian churches, ministers, and individuals, seem about to be judged first "at His coming" (Matthew, 25. 1-50); then "all the nations" (Matthew, 25. 31-46). Christ's own flock shall share His glory "at His coming," which is not to be confounded with "the end," or general judgment (Revelation, 20. 4-6, 11-15). The latter is not in this chapter specially discussed, but only the first resurrection, etc., that of the saints; not even the judgment of Christian hollow professors (Matthew, 25. 1-30) at His coming, is handled, but only the glory of them "that are Christ's," who alone in the highest sense "obtain the resurrection from the dead" (Luke, 14. 14; 20. 35, 36; Philippians, 3. 11, see note). The second coming of Christ is not a mere point of time, but a period beginning with the resurrection of the just at His appearing, and ending with the general judgment. The ground of the universal resurrection, is the union of all mankind in nature with Christ, their representative head, who has done away with death, by his own death in their stead: the ground of the resurrection of believers is not merely this, but their personal union with Him as their "Life" (Colossians, 3. 4, effected causatively by the Holy Spirit, and instrumentally by faith as the subjective, and by ordinances as the objective means. 24. Then—after that: next in the succession of "orders" or "ranks," the end—the general resurrection, and final judgment and consummation (Matthew, 25. 46). delivered up...kingdom to...Father—(cf. John, 13. 3.) Seeming at variance with Daniel, 7. 14, "His dominion is an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away." Really, His giving up of the mediatorial kingdom to the Father, when the end for which the mediatorial economy was established, has been accomplished, is altogether in harmony with its continuing everlastingly. The change which shall then take place, shall be in the manner of administration, not in the Kingdom itself; God shall then come into direct connexion with the earth, instead of mediatorially, when Christ shall have fully and finally removed every thing that serves or the holy God and a sinful earth Colossians.

The glory of God is the final end of Christ's orial office (Philippians, 2, 10, 11). His co- with the Father is independent of the latter, or to it, and shall, therefore, continue when its shall have ceased. His manhood, too, shall tingly continue, though, as now, subordinate Father. The throne of the Lamb (but no longer orial), as well as of God, shall be in the heavenly levelation, 22, 3; cf. 3, 21). The unity of the ad, and the unity of the church, shall be sinu- sly manifested at Christ's second coming. Cf. iab, 3, 9; Zechariah, 14, 9; John, 17, 21-24. The MSS. for "shall have delivered up," read, "de- up," which suits the sense better. It is "when ll have put down all rule," that "He delivereth kingdom to the Father." shall have put down :- The effect produced during the millenary f Himself and His saints (Psalm 110, 1; 8, 6; to which passages St. Paul refers, resting his nt on the two words, "all" and "until," of the st: a proof of verbal inspiration of Scripture (cf. tion, 2, 25, 27); Meanwhile, He "rules in the of His enemies" (Psalm 110, 2). He is styled King" when He takes His great power (Matthew, Revelation, 11, 15, 17). The Greek for "put is, "done away with," or "brought to nought," must be subject to Him, whether openly op- powers, as Satan and His angels, or kings and ; principalities (Ephesians, 1, 21). 25, must- be- Scripture foretells it, till - there will be no eed of His mediatorial kingdom, its object : been realized. enemies under his feet—(Luke, Ephesians, 1, 22.) 25. shall be—Greek, "is done with" (Revelation, 20, 14; cf. 1, 18). It is to be, especially this applies (e. 55-57); even in the f unbelievers, death is done away with by the f resurrection. Satan brought in sin, and sin it in death! So they shall be destroyed (rendered e powerless) in the same order (e. 56; Hebrews, Revelation, 19, 20; 20, 14). 27. all things—in- g death (cf. Ephesians, 1, 22; Philippians, 3, 21; ws, 2, 8; 1 Peter, 3, 22). It is said, "hath put," at God has said, is the same as if it were already osure is it. St. Paul here quotes the 8th Psalm of of his previous declaration, "For (it is writ- He hath put all things under his feet," under t— as His footstool (Psalm 110, 1). In perfect sting subjection, when he—viz., God, who by His inspired the Psalmist. 28. Son...himself...subject as the creatures are, but as a Son, voluntarily inate to, though co-equal with the Father. In sliatorial kingdom, the Son had been, in a man- distinct from the Father. Now, His kingdom verge in the Father's, with whom He is one: not here is thus any derogation from His honour; for ther Himself wills "that all should honour the s they honour the Father" (John, 5, 22, 23; He- , 1, 6). God... all in all—as Christ is all in all mans, 3, 11; cf. Zechariah, 14, 9). Then, and not en, "all things," without the least infringement Divine prerogative, shall be subject to the Son, se Son subordinate to the Father, whilst co- y sharing his glory. Contrast Psalm 10, 4; 14, 1. he saints do not fully realize God as their "all" (73, 25) now, though desiring it; then each shall od to all to me. 29. Else—if there be no resur- . what shall they do?—How wretched is their : they... which are baptized for the dead—third pe- class distinct from that in which the apostle himself, "we" (e. 30): first person. ALFORD there is an allusion to a practice at Corinth of ing a living person in behalf of a friend who naptized: thus St. Paul, without giving the action to the practice, uses an ad hominem argument from it, against its practisers, some of whom, though using it, denied the resurrection: "What ac- count can they give of their practice: why are they at the trouble of it, if the dead rise not?" [So Jesus used an ad hominem argument, Matthew, 12, 27.] But if so, it is strange three is no direct censure of it. Some Marconites adopted the practice at a later period, prob- ably from taking this passage, as ALFORD does: but, generally, it was unknown in the church. BENGEL translates, "over (immediately upon) the dead," i.e., who will be gathered to the dead immediately after baptism. Cf. Job, 17, 1, "the graves are ready for me." The price they get for their trouble is, that they should be gathered to the dead for ever (e. 13, 16). Many in the ancient church put off baptism till near death. This seems the better view: though there may have been some rites of symbolical baptism at Corinth, now unknown, perhaps grounded on Jesus' words (Matthew, 20, 22, 23), which St. Paul here alludes to. The best punctuation is, "If the dead rise not at all, why are they then baptized for them" (so the oldest MSS. read the last words, instead of "for the dead") 30. we— apostles (e. 9; ch. 4, 9). A gradation from those who could only for a little time enjoy this life (i.e., those baptized at the point of death), to us, who could enjoy it longer, if we had not renounced the world for Christ. [BENGEL.] 31. by your rejoicing—by the glorying which I have concerning you, as the fruit of my labours in the Lord. Some of the earliest MSS. and fathers, read "our," with the same sense. BENGEL understands "your rejoicing," to be the enjoyable state of the Corin- thians, as contrasted with his dying daily to give his converts rejoicing or glorying (ch. 4, 8; 2 Corinthians, 4, 12, 15; Ephesians, 3, 13; Philippians, 1, 20). But the words, "which I have," favour the explanation— the rejoicing which I have over you. Many of the oldest MSS. and Vulgate insert "brethren" here. I die daily—This ought to stand first in the sentence, as it is so put prominently forward in the Greek. I am day by day in sight of death, exposed to it, and expecting it (2 Corinthians, 4, 11, 12; 1, 8, 9; 11, 23). 32. Punctuate thus: "If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me? If the dead rise not, let us eat and drink," &c. [BENGEL.] If "merely as a man" (with the mere human hope of the present life: not with the Christian's hope of the resurrection: answering to "If the dead rise not," the parallel clause in the next sentence: I have fought with men resembling savage beasts. Heraclitus, of Ephesus, had termed his countrymen "wild beasts" 400 years before. So Epimenides called the Cretians (Titus, 1, 12). St. Paul was still at Ephesus (ch. 16, 8), and there his life was daily in danger (ch. 4, 9; cf. 2 Corinthians, 1, 8). Though the tumult (Acts, 19, 29, 30) had not yet taken place (for after it he set out immedi- ately for Macedonia, this epistle was written evi- dently just before it, when the storm was gathering, "many adversaries" (ch. 16, 9) were already menacing him. what advantageth it me?—seeing I have renounced all that, "as a mere man," might compensate me for such sufferings, gain, fame, &c. let us eat, &c.—Quoted from LXX. (Isaiah, 22, 15) where the prophet describes the reckless self-indulgence of the despisers of God's call to mourning. Let us enjoy the good things of life now, for it soon will end. St. Paul imitates the language of such sceptics, to reprove both their theory and practice. "If men but persuade themselves that they shall die like the beasts, they soon will live like beasts too." [SOUTH.] 33. evil communications corrupt good manners—a current saying, forming a verse in Menander, the comic poet, who probably took it from Euripides (Socrates Historia Ecclesiastica, 3, 16). "Evil communications" refer to intercourse with those who deny the resurrection. Their notion seems to have been, that the resurrection is merely spiritual, that sin has its seat solely in the body, and will be left behind when the soul leaves it, if, indeed, the soul survive death at all. good—not only good-natured, but pliant. Intimacy with the profligate society around, was apt to corrupt the principles of the Corinthians. 24. Awake—lit., “out of the sleep” of carnal intoxication into which ye are thrown by the influence of these sceptics [v. 32; Joel. 1. 5]. to righteousness—in contrast with “sin” in this verse, and corrupt manners, v. 23. sin not—do not give yourselves up to sinful pleasures. The Greek expresses a continued state of abstinence from sin. Thus, St. Paul implies that they who live in sinful pleasures readily persuade themselves of what they wish, viz., that there is to be no resurrection, some—the same as in v. 12. have not the knowledge of God—and so know not His power in the resurrection (Matthew, 22. 29). Stronger than “are ignorant of God.” An habitual ignorance: wilful, in that they prefer to keep their sins, rather than part with them, in order to know God (cf. John, 7. 17; 1 Peter, 2. 15). to your shame—that you Corinthian Christians, who boast of your knowledge, should have among you, and maintain intercourse with, those so practically ignorant of God, as to deny the resurrection. 35. Haw—It is folly to deny a fact of REVELATION, because we do not know the “how.” Some measure God’s power by their petty intelligence, and won’t admit, even on His assurance, any thing which they cannot explain. Ezekiel’s answer of faith to the question, is the truly wise one (Ezekiel, 37. 3). So Jesus argues not on principles of philosophy, but wholly from “the power of God,” as declared by the word of God (Matthew, 19. 26; Mark, 10. 27; 12. 23; Luke, 18. 27). come—The dead are said to depart, or to be deceased: those rising again to come. The objector could not understand how the dead are to rise, and with what kind of a body they are to come. Is it to be the same body? If so, how is this, since the resurrection bodies will not eat or drink, or beget children, as the natural bodies do? Besides, the latter have mouldered into dust. How then can they rise again? If it be a different body, how can the personal identity be preserved? St. Paul answers, in one sense, it will be the same body, in another, a distinct body. It will be a body, but a spiritual, not a natural, body. 36. fool—with all thy boasted philosophy (Psalm 14. 1). that which thou—“Thou,” emphatical: appeal to the objector’s own experience: “The seed which thou thyself sowest.” St. Paul, in this verse and v. 42, answers the question v. 35, “How,” and in v. 37-41 and 43, the question, “With what kind of body?” He converts the very objection (the death of the natural body) into an argument. Death, so far from preventing quickening, is the necessary prelude and prognostication of it, just as the seed “is not quickened” into a new sprout with increased produce, “except it die” (except a dissolution of its previous organization takes place). Christ by His death for us has not given us a reprieve from death as to the life which we have from Adam; nay, He permits the law to take its course on our fleshly nature; but He brings from Himself new spiritual and heavenly life out of death v. 37. 37. not that body that shall be—A body beautiful and no longer a “bare grain.” [BENJEL.] No longer without stalk or ear, but clothed with blade and ears, and yielding many grains instead of only one. [GROTIUS.] There is not an identity of all the particles of the old and the new body. For the perpetual transmutation of matter is inconsistent with this. But there is a hidden germ which constitutes the identity of body amidst all outward changes: the outward accretions fall off in its development, whilst the germ remains the same. Every such germ (“seed,” v. 38) “shall have its own body,” and be instantly recognised, just as each plant now is known from the seed that was sown [see Note, ch. 6. 13]. So Christ by the same image illustrated the truth that His death was the necessary prelude of His putting on His glorified body, which is the ground of the regeneration of the many who believe (John, 12. 24). Progress is the law of the spiritual, as of the natural world. Death is the avenue not to mere revivification or reanimation, but to resurrection and regeneration (Matthew, 19. 28; Philippians, 3. 21). Cf. “planted,” &c., Romans, 6. 5. 38, as it hath pleased him—at creation, when He gave to each of the (kinds of) seeds (so the Greek is for “to every seed”) a body of its own (Genesis, 1. 11, “after its kind,” suited to its species). So God can and will give to the blessed at the resurrection their own appropriate body, such as it pleases Him, and such as is suitable to their glorified state: a body peculiar to the individual, substantially the same as the body sown. 39-41. Illustrations of the suitability of bodies, however various, to their species: the flesh of the several species of animals; bodies celestial and terrestrial; the various kinds of light in the sun, moon, and stars, respectively. fish—animal organisms. [DE WETTE.] He implies by the word that our resurrection bodies shall be in some sense really flesh, not mere phantoms of air. [EPISTOL.] So some of the oldest creeds expressed it, “I believe in the resurrection of the flesh.” Cf. as to Jesus’ own resurrection body, Luke, 24. 39; John, 20. 37; to which ours shall be made like, and therefore shall be flesh, but not of animal organism (Philippians, 3. 21) and liable to corruption. But v. 50 below implies, it is not “flesh and blood” in the animal sense we now understand them; for these “shall not inherit the kingdom of God,” not the same—not flesh of the same nature and excellency. As the kinds of flesh, however widely differing from one another, do not cease to be flesh, so the kinds of bodies, however differing from one another, are still bodies. All this is to illustrate the difference of the new celestial body from its terrestrial seed, whilst retaining a substantial identity. beasts—quadrupeds, another of fishes...another of birds—Most of the oldest MSS. read thus, “another FLESH of birds...another of fishes;” the order of nature. 40. celestial bodies—Not the sun, moon, and stars, which are first introduced v. 41, but the bodies of angels, as distinguished from the bodies of earthly creatures. the glory of the celestial—(Luke, 9. 26.) glory of...terrestrial—(Matthew, 6. 28, 29; 1 Peter, 1. 24.) 41. one glory of...sun...another...of...moon—The analogy is not to prove different degrees of glory among the blessed (whether this may be, or not, indirectly hinted at), but this: As the various fountains of light, which is so similar in its aspect and properties, differ (the sun from the moon, and the moon from the stars; and even one star from another star, though all seem so much alike); so there is nothing unreasonable in the doctrine that our present bodies differ from our resurrection bodies, though still continuing bodies. Cf. the same simile, appropriate especially in the clear Eastern skies (Daniel, 12. 3; Matthew, 13. 43). Also that of seeds in the same parable (Matthew, 13. 24; Galatians, 6. 7, 8). 42. sows—Following up the image of seed. A delightful word instead of burial, in corruption—liable to corruption; corruptible: not merely a prey when dead to corruption; as the contrast shows, “raised in incorruption.” i. e., not liable to corruption, incorruptible. 43. in dishonour—answering to “our vile body” (Philippians, 3. 21); lit., “our body of humiliation;” liable to various humiliations of disease, injury, and decay at last. in glory—the garment of incorruption (v. 42, 43) like His glorious body (Philippians, 3. 21), which we shall put on (v. 49, 53; 2 Corinthians, 5. 2-4). in weakness—liable to infirmities (2 Corinthians, 13. 4), in power—answering to a “spiritual body” (v. 44; cf. Luke, 1. 17, “Spirit and power”). Not liable to the weaknesses of our present frail bodies (Isaiah, 23. 24; Revelation, 21. 4). 44. a natural body—lit., “an animal body,” a body moulded in its organism of "flesh and blood" (v. 50) to suit the animal soul which predominates in it. The Holy Spirit in the spirit of believers, indeed, is an earnest of a superior state (Romans, 8, 11), but meanwhile in the body the animal soul preponderates; hereafter the Spirit shall predominate, and the animal soul be duly subordinate. spiritual body—a body wholly moulded by the Spirit, and its organism not conformed to the lower and animal (Luke, 20, 35, 36), but to the higher and spiritual, life (cf. ch. 2, 14; 1 Thessalonians, 5, 23). there is, &c.—The oldest MSS. read, "If there is a natural (or animal-souled) body, there is also a spiritual body." It is no more wonderful a thing, that there should be a body fitted to the capacities and want of man's highest part, his spirit, than (which we see to be the case) that there should be one fitted to the capacities and wants of his subordinate part, the animal soul. [ALFORD.] 45.—in accordance with the distinction just mentioned between the natural or animal-souled body and the spiritual body. It is written—(Genesis, 2, 7)—"Man became (was made to become) a living soul," i.e., endowed with an animal soul, the living principle of his body, the last Adam—the last Head of humanity, who is to be fully manifested in the last day, which is His day (John, 6, 39). He is so called in Job, 19, 25; see my Note there (cf. Romans, 5, 14). In contrast to "the last," St. Paul calls "man" (Genesis, 2, 7) "the first Adam," quickening—not only living, but making alive (John, 5, 21; 6, 33, 39, 40, 44, 57, 62, 63; Romans, 8, 11). As the natural or animal-souled body (v. 44) is the fruit of our union with the first Adam, an animal-souled man, so the spiritual body is the fruit of our union with the second Adam, who is the quickening Spirit (2 Corinthians, 3, 17). As He became representative of the whole of humanity in His union of the two natures, He exhausted in His own person the sentence of death passed on all men, and giveth spiritual and everlasting life to whom He will. 46. afterward—Adam had a soul not necessarily mortal, as it afterwards became by sin, but "a living soul," and destined to live for ever, if he had eaten of the tree of life (Genesis, 3, 22); still his body was but an animal-souled body, not a spiritual body, such as believers shall have; much less was he a "life-giving spirit," as Christ. His soul had the germ of the Spirit, rather than the fulness of it, such as man shall have when restored "body, soul, and spirit," by the second Adam (1 Thessalonians, 5, 23). As the first and lower Adam came before the second and heavenly Adam, so the animal-souled body comes first, and must die before it be changed into the spiritual body (i.e., that in which the Spirit predominates over the animal soul), 47. of the earth—inasmuch as being sprung from the earth, he is "earthy" (Genesis, 2, 7; 3, 19, "dust thou art"); i.e., not merely earthy or born upon the earth, but terrene, or of earth, lit., "of heaped earth" or clay. Adam means red earth. The Lord—Omitted in the oldest MSS. and versions. from heaven—(John, 3, 13, 31.) Humanity in Christ is generic. In Him man is impersonated in his true ideal as God originally designed him. Christ is the representative man, the federal head of redeemed man. 48. As is the earthy—vis., Adam, they... that are earthy—all Adam's posterity in their natural state (John, 3, 6, 7). the heavenly—Christ, they... that are heavenly—His people in their regenerate state (Philippians, 3, 20, 21). As the former precedes the latter state, so the natural bodies precede the spiritual bodies. 49. as—Greek, "even as" (see Genesis, 1, 3). we shall also bear—or wear as a garment. [BENGE.] The oldest MSS., and versions, and fathers, read, "We must also bear," or "let us also bear." It implies the Divine appointment (cf. "must," v. 53) and faith assenting to it. An exhortation, and yet implying a promise (so Romans, 8, 29). The conformity to the image of the heavenly Representative man is to be begun here in our souls, in part, and shall be perfected at the resurrection in both bodies and souls. 50. (See Notes, v. 37, 39.) "Flesh and blood" of the same animal and corruptible nature as our present (v. 44) animal-souled bodies, cannot inherit the kingdom of God. Therefore the believer acquiesces gladly in the unrepealed sentence of the holy law, which appoints the death of the present body as the necessary preliminary to the resurrection body of glory. Hence he "dies daily" to the flesh and to the world, as the necessary condition to his regeneration here and hereafter (John, 3, 6; Galatians, 2, 20). As the being born of the flesh constitutes a child of Adam, so the being born of the Spirit constitutes a child of God, cannot—Not merely is the change of body possible, but it is necessary. The spirit extracted from the dregs of wine does not so much differ from them, as the glorified man does from the mortal man (BENGE.) of mere animal flesh and blood (Galatians, 1, 16). The resurrection body will be still a body though spiritual, and substantially retaining the personal identity: as is proved by Luke, 24, 39; John, 20, 27, compared with Philippians, 3, 21, the kingdom of God—which is not all merely animal, but altogether spiritual. Corruption doth not inherit, though it is the way to, incorruption (v. 52, 53, 54). Behold—Calling attention to the "mystery" heretofore hidden in God's purposes, but now revealed, yet—emphatical in the Greek; I show (Greek, "tell," vis., by the word of the Lord, 1 Thessalonians, 4, 16) you, who think you have so much knowledge, "a mystery" (cf. Romans, 11, 25) which your reason could never have discovered. Many of the old MSS. and fathers read, "We shall all sleep, but we shall not all be changed;" but this is plainly a corrupt reading, inconsistent with 1 Thessalonians, 4, 15, 17, and with the argument here, which is that a change is necessary (v. 53). English Version is supported by some of the oldest MSS. and fathers. The Greek is lit., "We all shall not sleep, but," &c. The putting off of the corruptible body for an incorruptible by an instantaneous change will, in the case of "the quick," stand as equivalent to death, appointed to all men (Hebrews, 9, 27); of this Enoch and Elijah are types and forerunners. The "we" implies that Christians in that age and every successive age since and hereafter were designed to stand waiting, as if Christ might come again in their time, and as if they might be found among "the quick." 52. the last trump—at the sounding of the trumpet on the last day [VATABLUS] (Matthew, 24, 31; 1 Thessalonians, 4, 16). Or the Spirit by St. Paul hints that the other trumpets mentioned subsequently in the Apocalypse shall precede, and that this shall be the last of all (cf. Isaiah, 27, 13; Zechariah, 9, 14). As the law was given with the sound of a trumpet, so the final judgment according to it (Hebrews, 12, 19; cf. Exodus, 19, 16). As the Lord ascended "with the sound of a trumpet" (Psalm 47, 5), so He shall descend (Revelation, 11, 15). The trumpet was sounded to convoke the people on solemn feasts, especially on the first day of the seventh month (the type of the completion of time: seven being the number for perfection; on the tenth of the same month was the atonement, and on the fifteenth the feast of tabernacles, commemorative of completed salvation out of the spiritual Egypt. cf. Zechariah, 14, 18, 19; cf. Psalm 50, 1-7. Cf. His calling forth of Lazarus from the grave "with a loud voice," John, 11, 43, with 5, 25, 28. and—immediately, in consequence. 53. this—pointing to His own body and that of those whom he addresses, put on—as a garment (2 Corinthians, 5, 2, 3). immortality—Here only, besides 1 Timothy, 6, 16, the word "immortality" is found. No where is the immortality of the soul, distinct from the body, taught; a notion which many erroneously have derived from heathen philosophers. Scripture does not contemplate the anima ious state brought about by death, as the consummation to be earnestly looked for (2 Corinthians, 5, 4), but the resurrection. 54. then—not before. Death has as yet a sting even to the believer, in that his body is to be under its power till the resurrection. But then the sting and power of death shall cease for ever. Death is swallowed up in victory—in Hebrew of Isaiah, 25, 3, from which it is quoted, "He (Jehovah) will swallow up death in victory: i.e., for ever: as "in victory" often means in Hebrew idiom (Jeremiah, 3, 5; Lamentations, 5, 20). Christ will swallow it up so altogether victoriously that it shall never more regain its power (cf. Hosea, 6, 2; 13, 14; 2 Corinthians, 5, 4; Hebrews, 2, 14, 15; Revelation, 20, 14; 21, 4). 55. Quoted from Hosea, 13, 14, substantially; but freely used by the warrant of the Spirit by which St. Paul wrote. The Hebrew may be translated, "O death, where are thy plagues? Where, O Hades, is thy destruction?" The LXX. "Where is thy victory (lit., in a lacus), O death? Where is thy sting, O Hades?" "Sting" answers to the Hebrew "plagues," viz., a poisoned sting causing plagues. Appropriate, as to the old serpent (Genesis, 3; Numbers, 21, 6). "Victory" answers to the Hebrew "destruction." Cf. Isaiah, 25, 7, "destroy...vell...over all nations," viz., victoriously destroy it; and to "in victory" (v. 54), which he triumphantly repeats. The "where" implies their past victorious destroying power and sting, now gone for ever: obtained through Satan's triumph over man in Eden, which enlisted God's law on the side of Satan and death against man (Romans, 5, 12, 17, 21). The souls in Hades being freed by the resurrection, death's sting and victory are gone. For "O grave," the oldest MSS. and various read, "O death," the second time. 56. If there were no sin, there would be no death. Man's transgression of the law gives death its lawful power. strength of sin is the law—Without the law sin is not perceived or imputed (Romans, 3, 20; 4, 15; 5, 13). The law makes sin the more grievous, by making God's will the clearer (Romans, 7, 8-10). Christ's people are no longer "under the law" (Romans, 6, 14). 57. to God—The victory was in no way due to ourselves (Psalm 98, 1). giveth—a present certainty, the victory—which death and Hades ("the grave") had aimed at, but which, notwithstanding the opposition of them, as well as of the law and sin, we have gained. The repetition of the word (v. 54, 55) is appropriate to the triumph gained. 58. beloved—Sound doctrine kindles Christian love. steadfast—not turning aside from the faith of the resurrection of yourselves. unmovable—not turned aside by others (v. 12; Colossians, 1, 23). the work of the Lord—the promotion of Christ's kingdom (Philippians, 2, 30). not in vain—as the deniers of the resurrection would make it (v. 14, 17). in the Lord—applying to the whole sentence and its several clauses: Ye, as being in the Lord by faith, know that your labour in the Lord (i.e., labour according to His will is not to be without its reward in the Lord (through His merits and according to His gracious appointment).

CHAPTER XVI.

VER. 1-24. DIRECTIONS AS TO THE COLLECTION FOR THE JUDEAN CHRISTIANS: ST. PAUL'S FUTURE PLANS; HE COMMENDS TO THEM TIMOTHY, APOLLOS, &c. SALUTATIONS AND CONCLUSION. 1. collection for the saints—at Jerusalem (Romans, 15, 26) and in Judea (Acts, 11, 29, 30; 24, 17; cf. 2 Corinthians, 8, 4; 9, 1, 12). He says "saints" rather than "the poor," to remind the Corinthians that in giving, it is to the Lord's people, their own brethren in the faith. Towards the close of the national existence of the Jews, Judea and Jerusalem were harassed with various troubles, which in part affected the Jewish Christians. The community of goods which existed among them for a time gave temporary relief, but tended ultimately to impoverish all by paralysing individual exertion (Acts, 2, 44), and

hence was soon discontinued. A beautiful fruit of grace it was, that he who had by persecutions robbed many of their all (Acts, 20, 10), should become the foremost in exertions for their relief. as I have given—rather, "pace order:" viz., during my journey through Galatia, that mentioned Acts, 18, 23. The churches of Galatia and Phrygia were the last which Paul visited before writing this epistle. He was now at Ephesus, and came thither immediately from visiting them (Acts, 18, 23, 19, 1). That he had not been silent in Galatia on contributions for the poor, appears from the hint let fall in his epistle to that church (Galatians, 2, 10): an undesired coincidence and mark of genuineness. [PALEY'S Horse Pauline.] He proposes the Galatians as an example to the Corinthians, the Corinthians to the Macedonians, the Corinthians and Macedonians to the Romans (Romans, 15, 26, 27; 2 Corinthians, 9, 2). There is great force in example. 2. first day of...week—already kept sacred by Christians as the day of the Lord's resurrection, the beginning: day both of the physical and of the new spiritual creations: it gradually superseded the Jewish sabbath on the seventh day (Psalm 118, 23-24; John, 20, 19, 26; Acts, 20, 7; Revelation, 1, 10). So the beginning of the year was changed from autumn to spring when Israel was brought out of Egypt. Three annual feasts, all typical of Christian truths, were directed to be kept on the first day of the week: the feast of the wave offering of the first sheaf, answering to the Lord's resurrection; Pentecost, or the feast of weeks, typical of the fruits of the resurrection in the Christian church (Leviticus, 23, 11, 15, 16, 36); the feast of tabernacles at harvest, typical of the ingathering of the full number of the elect from one end of heaven to the other. Easter was directed to be kept as a holy sabbath (Exodus, 12, 16). The Christian sabbath commemorates the respective works of the Three Persons of the triune God—creation, redemption (the resurrection), and sanctification (on Pentecost the Holy Ghost being poured out). Jesus came to fulfil the Spirit of the Law, not to cancel it, or to lower its standard. The primary object of the sabbath is holiness, not merely rest: "Remember that thou keep holy the sabbath day." Cf. Genesis, 2, 3. "God blessed and sanctified it, because...in it He had rested," &c. The word "Remember" implies that it was in existence before the giving of the law from Sinai, and refers to its institution in Paradise (cf. Exodus, 16, 22, 23, 26, 30). "Six days shalt thou labour:" the spirit of the command is fulfilled whether the six days labour be on the last six days or on the first. A perpetual sabbath would doubtless be the highest Christian ideal; but living in a world of business where the Christian ideal is not yet realized, if a law of definite times was necessary in Paradise, it is still more so now. every one of you—even those in limited circumstances. lay by him—though there be not a weekly public collection, each is privately to set apart a definite proportion of his weekly income for the Lord's cause and charity. in store—abundantly; the earnest of a better store laid up for the giver (1 Timothy, 6, 19). as God hath prospered him—lit., "whosoever he may be prospered in," or "may by prosperity have acquired" [ALFORD] (Matthew, 23, 15-20; 2 Corinthians, 8, 12), that there be no gatherings when I come—that they may not then have to be made, when your and my time ought to be employed in more directly spiritual things. When men give once for all, not so much is given. But when each lays by something every Lord's day, more is collected than one would have given at once. [BENJEL.] 3. approve by your letters—rather translate, "Whosoever ye shall approve, them will I send with letters:" viz., letters to several persons at Jerusalem, which would be their credentials. There could be no need of letters from them before Paul's coming, if the persons recommended were not to be sent off before it. lit., "by letters:" an abbreviated expression for, "I will send, recommending them by letters." [GROTIUS.] If English Version be retained, the sense will be, "When I come, I will send those whom by your letters, then to be given them, ye shall approve." But the antithesis (opposition or contrast) to Paul himself (v. 4) favours Grotius' view. So "by" means with (Romans, 2. 27); and the Greek for "by" is translated with 2 Corinthians, 2. 4. liberality—lit., gracious or free gift (2 Corinthians, 8. 4. 4. meet—"worth while," if your collections be large enough to be worth an apostle's journey (a stimulus to their liberality), I will accompany them myself instead of giving them letters credential (v. 3; cf. Acts, 20. 1-4. with me—to guard against all possible suspicion of evil (2 Corinthians, 8. 4. 19-21). 5-7. His first intention had been (2 Corinthians, 1. 15, 16) to pass through them (Corinth) to Macedonia, and again return to them from Macedonia, and so to Judea; this he had announced in the lost epistle (ch. 5. 9); now having laid aside this intention for which he was charged with levity, 2 Corinthians, 1. 17, &c., whereas it was through levity, 2 Corinthians, 1. 23; 2. 17, he announces his second plan of "not seeing them now by the way," but "passing through Macedonia" first on his way to them, and then "tarrying a while," and even "abiding and wintering with them," for I do pass—As much as to say, "This is what I at last resolve upon" (not as the erroneous subscription of the epistle represents it, as if he was THEN at Philippi, on his way through Macedonia): implying that there had been some previous communication upon the subject of the journey, and also that there had been some indecisiveness in the apostle's plan. [PALEY.] In accordance with his second plan, we find him in Macedonia when 2 Corinthians was written (2 Corinthians, 2. 13; 8. 1; 9. 2, 4), and on his way to Corinth (2 Corinthians, 12. 14; 13. 1; cf. Acts, 20. 1, 2). "Pass through" is opposed to "abide" (v. 6). He was not yet in Macedonia (as v. 8 shows), but at Ephesus; but he was thinking of passing through it, not abiding as he purposed to do at Corinth). 6. He did "abide and even winter" for the three WINTER months in Greece (Corinth), Acts, 20. 3, 6; from which passage it seems that Paul probably left Corinth about a month before the "days of unleavened bread" or the Passover (so as to allow time to touch at Thessalonica and Berea, from which cities two of his companions were; as we read he did at Philippi); so that this the three months at Corinth would be December, January, and February. [BARKS, Horæ Apostolicæ.] ye—emphatical in the Greek, withnesser I go—He purposed to go to Judea (2 Corinthians, 1. 16) from Corinth, but his plans were not positively fixed as yet (Note, v. 4; cf. Acts, 19. 21, 7. I will not see you now by the way—lit., "I do not wish to see you this time in passing;" i. e., to pay you now what would have to be a merely passing visit as I did in the second visit (2 Corinthians, 12. 11). In contrast to "a while," i. e., some time, as the Greek might better be translated. but—The oldest MSS. read "for." 8, at Ephesus—whence St. Paul writes this epistle. Cf. v. 19. "Asia" wherein Ephesus was, until Pentecost—He seems to have stayed as he here purposes; for just when the tumult which drove him away broke out, he was already intending to leave Ephesus (Acts, 19. 21, 22). Combined with ch. 5. 7, 8, this verse fixes the date of this epistle to a few weeks before Pentecost, and very soon after the passover. 9. door—(2 Corinthians, 2. 12.) An opening for the extension of the gospel. Wise men are on the watch for, and avail themselves of, opportunities. So "door of hope," Hosea, 2. 15. "Door of faith," Acts, 14. 27. "An open door," Revelation, 3. 8. "A door of utterance," Colossians, 4. 3. "Great," i. e., extensive. "Effectual," i. e., requiring great labours [EXTRUS]; or opportune for effecting great results. [BIZA.] many adversaries—who would block up the way and prevent us from entering the open door. No here false teachers, but open adversaries: both Jews and heathen. After St. Paul, by his now long continued labours at Ephesus, had produced effects which threatened the interests of those whose gains were derived from idolatry, "many adversaries" arose (Acts, 19. 9-23). Where great good is, there evil is sure to start up as its antagonist. 10. Now—rather, But. Therefore Timothy was not the bearer of the epistle; for it would not then be said, "If Timothy come." He must therefore have been sent by Paul from Ephesus before this epistle was written, to accord with ch. 4. 17-19; and yet the passage here implies, that St. Paul did not expect him to arrive at Corinth, till after the letter was received. He tells them how to treat him "if" he should arrive. Acts, 19. 21, 22, clears up the difficulty; Timothy, when sent from Ephesus where this epistle was written, did not proceed direct to Corinth, but went first to Macedonia; thus though sent before the letter, he might not reach Corinth till after it was received in that city. The undesigned coincidence between the epistle and the history, and the clearing up of the meaning of the former (which does not mention the journey to Macedonia at all) by the latter, is a sure mark of genuineness. [PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ.] It is not certain that Timothy actually reached Corinth; for in Acts, 19. 22, only Macedonia is mentioned; but it does not follow that though Macedonia was the immediate object of his mission, Corinth was not the ultimate object. The "IF Timothy come," implies uncertainty. 2 Corinthians, 1. 1, represents him with Paul in Macedonia; and 2 Corinthians, 12. 18, speaking of Titus and others sent to Corinth, does not mention Timothy, which it would have probably done, had one so closely connected with the apostle as Timothy was, stayed as his delegate at Corinth. The mission of Titus then took place, when it became uncertain whether Timothy could go forward from Macedonia to Corinth, Paul being anxious for immediate tidings of the state of the Corinthian church. ALFORD argues that if so, St. Paul's adversaries would have charged him with fickleness in this case also (2 Corinthians, 1. 17), as in the case of his own change of purpose. But Titus was sent directly to Corinth, so as to arrive there before Timothy could by the route through Macedonia. Titus' presence would thus make amends for the disappointment as to the intended visit of Timothy, and would disarm adversaries of a charge in this respect (2 Corinthians, 7. 6, 7). without fear—Referring perhaps to a nervous timidity in Timothy's character (1 Timothy, 3. 15; 6. 23, 23). His youth would add to this feeling, as well as his country, Lystra, likely to be despised in refined Corinth. 11. despise—This charge is not given concerning any other of the many messengers whom Paul sent. 1 Timothy, 4. 12, accounts for it (cf. Psalm 119. 141). He was a young man, younger probably than those usually employed in the Christian mission; whence St. Paul apprehending lest he should, on that account, be exposed to contempt, cautions him, "Let no man despise thy youth." [PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ.] conduct—set him on his way with every mark of respect, and with whatever he needs (Titus, 3. 13). in peace—(Acts, 16. 33; Hebrews, 11. 31.) "Peace" is the salutation of kindness and respect in the East; and so it stands for every blessing. Perhaps here there is too a contrast between "peace" and the "contentions" prevalent at Corinth (ch. 1. 11). I look for him—He and Titus were appointed to meet St. Paul in Troas, whither the apostle purposed proceeding from Ephesus (2 Corinthians, 2. 12, 13). St. Paul thus claims their respect for Timothy as one whom he felt so necessary to himself as "look for" to him. [THEOPHYL.] with the brethren—Others besides Krastus accompanied Timothy to Macedonia (cf. v. 12; Acts, 19. 22). 12. Apollos, I greatly desired...to come unto you—He says this, lest they should suspect that he from jealousy prevented

Apollos coming to them; perhaps they had expressly requested Apollos to be sent to them. Apollos was not at Ephesus when St. Paul wrote (cf. v. 19, and ch. 1. 1). Probably Apollos' unwillingness to go to Corinth at this time was because being aware of the undue admiration of his rhetorical style which led astray many at Corinth, he did not wish to sanction it (ch. 1. 12; 3. 4). St. Paul's noble freedom from all selfish jealousy led him to urge Apollos to go; and on the other hand, Apollos, having heard of the abuse of his name at Corinth to party purposes, perseveringly refused to go. St. Paul, of course, could not state in his letter particularly these reasons in the existing state of division prevalent there. He calls Apollos "brother" to mark the unity that was between the two. with the brethren—who bear this letter (v. 17). (See subscription added to the epistle.) COMYBEAR thinks Titus was one of the bearers of this first letter (2 Corinthians, 8. 2, 16-21; 12. 18). ALFORD thinks "the brethren" here may be the same as in v. 11. convenient time—Apollos did return to Corinth when their divisions were moderated (JEROME), and so it was a more reasonable time. 13. He shows that they ought to make their hopes of salvation to depend not on Apollos or any other teacher; that it rests with themselves. "Watch ye: for ye are slumbering. "Stand: for ye are like men tottering. "Quit you like men; be strong: for ye are effeminate" (v. 14). "Let all your things be done with charity" (ch. 3. 1; 13. 1): not with strifes as at present. (CERYSTOM.) "In the faith" which was assailed by some (ch. 15. 1. 2. 12-17). 15. first-fruits of Achaia—the first Achaean converts (cf. Romans, 16. 5). The image is from the first-fruits offered to the Lord (Leviticus, 23. 10; cf. ch. 15. 20). The members of this family had been baptized by Paul himself (ch. 1. 16). addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints—translate, "Set themselves (i.e., voluntarily) to minister unto the saints" (cf. 2 Corinthians, 8. 4). 16. That ye—translate, "That ye also," viz., in your turn...in return for their self-devotion. [ALFORD.] helpeth with them, labourerth—by himself. 17. Fortunatus...Achaicus—probably of Stephanas' household. that...lacking on your part—So far as you were unable yourselves to "refresh my spirit," in that you are absent from me, "they have supplied" by coming to me from you, and so supplying the means of intercourse between you and me. They seem to have carried this letter back; see the subscription below: hence the exhortations v. 18, 19, as though they would be at Corinth when the epistle arrived. 18. refreshed my spirit and yours—"yours" will be refreshed on receiving this letter, by knowing that "my spirit is refreshed" by their having come to me from you; and (perhaps) by the good report they gave of many of you (ch. 1. 4-8): my refreshment of spirit redounds to yours, as being my disciples (2 Corinthians, 7. 13; cf. Zechariah, 6. 8). acknowledge—render them due acknowledgments by a kind reception of them: 1 Thessalonians, 5. 12, "know" them in their true worth, and treat them accordingly. 19. Asia—not all Asia Minor, but Lybian Asia only, of which Ephesus was the capital. much—with especial affection. Aquila...Priscilla—(cf. Acts, 18. 2; Romans, 16. 3, 4.) Originally driven out of Italy by Claudius, they had come to Corinth (whence their salutation of the Corinthians is appropriate here), and then had removed with Paul from Corinth to Ephesus (Acts, 18. 2, 18, 19, 26); here, as at Rome subsequently, they set up a church (or assembly of believers) at their house (Romans, 16. 3, 5). A pattern to Christian husbands and wives. Their Christian self-devoting love appears wherever they were (Romans, 16. 3, 4). Even the gifted Apollos, so highly admired at Corinth, owed much of his knowledge to them (Acts, 18. 24-28). In v. 20, "All the brethren" (i.e., the whole church) seem to be distinguished from "the church that is in their house," which was but a partial and private assembly out of the general church at Corinth. NEANDER thinks Romans, 16. 23, refers to "the whole church" meeting at the house of Gaius (cf. Colossians, 4. 15). "Synagogue" implies an assembly in general, without reference to the character or motives of its members. "Church," like the Hebrew Kahal, implies an assembly legally convened; as, for instance, the Jews met as a body politic to receive the law (hence Stephen calls it "the church in the wilderness," Acts, 7. 38), and having a legal bond of union. Christ's followers when dispersed from one another cease to be a congregation synagogue, but still are a church, having the common bond of union to the same Head by the same faith and hope. [VITRINGA, Synagogue and Temple.] From this we may explain St. Paul's entering "into every house" and haling men and women: "he would in searching for Christians go to their several "houses" of prayer. in the Lord—They pray for all blessings on you from the Lord, the source of every good. [GROTIUS.] ALFORD explains, "in a Christian manner," as mindful of your common Lord. "In the Lord" seems to me to refer to their union together in Christ, their prayers for one another's good being in virtue of that union. 20. holy kiss—the token of the mutual love of Christians, especially at the Lord's supper (cf. Romans, 16. 16; 1 Thessalonians, 5. 20), "in which all the dimensions of the Corinthians would be swallowed up." [BENGEL.] 21. salutation...with mine own hand—he therefore dictated all the rest of the epistle. 22. A solemn closing warning added in his own hand: as in Ephesians, 6. 24; Colossians, 4. 18, the Lord—who ought to be "loved" above Paul, Apollos, and all other teachers. Love to one another is to be in connection with love to Him above all. IGNATIUS, Epistola ad Romanos 7, writes of Christ, "My love has been crucified" (cf. Song of Solomon, 2. 7). Jesus Christ—Omitted in the oldest MSS. let him be Anathema—accursed with that curse which the Jews who call Jesus "accursed" (ch. 12. 3) are bringing righteously on their own heads. [BENGEL.] So far from "saluting" him, I bid him be accursed. Maran-atha—Syriac for the Lord cometh. A motto or watchword to urge them to preparedness for the Lord's coming; as in Philipians, 4. 5, "The Lord is at hand." 23. The grace, &c.—This is the salutation meant in v. 21; and from which unbelievers (v. 22; cf. 2 John, 10. 11) are excluded. [BENGEL.] 24. My love, &c.—After having administered some severe rebukes, he closes with expressions of "love": his very rebukes were prompted by love, and therefore are altogether in harmony with the profession of love here made: it was love in Christ Jesus, and therefore embraced "all" who loved Him.

The subscription represents the epistle as written from Philippi. Verse 8 shows it was written at Ephesus. BENDEL conjectures that perhaps, however, it was sent from Philippi (v. 5), because the deputies of the Corinthians had accompanied Paul thither. From Ephesus there was a road to Corinth above Philippi.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE

INTRODUCTION.

THE following reasons seem to have induced St. Paul to write this second epistle to the Corinthians: (1.) That he might explain the reasons for his having deferred to pay them his promised visit, by taking Corinth as his way to Macedonia (1 Corinthians, 4. 19; ch. 1. 15, 16; cf. 1 Corinthians, 16. 5); and so that he might set forth to them his apostolic walk in general (ch. 1. 12, 24; 6. 9-13; 7. 2). (2.) That he might commend their obedience in reference to the directions in his first epistle, and at the same time direct them now to forgive the offender, as having been punished sufficiently (ch. 2. 1-11; 7. 6-16). (3.) That he might urge them to collect for the poor saints at Jerusalem (ch. 8. 1-9, 15). (4.) That he might maintain his apostolic authority and reprove gainsayers.

The external testimonies for its genuineness are, Irenæus, Hæreses 3. 7. 1; Athenagoras de resurrectione martirorum; Clement of Alexandria, Stromata 3. sec. 94; 4. sec. 104; Tertullian de pudicitia, ch. 12.

THE TIME OF WRITING was after Pentecost, A.D. 57, when St. Paul left Ephesus for Troas. Having stayed in the latter place for some time preaching the gospel with effect (ch. 2. 12), he went on to Macedonia, being eager to meet Titus there, having been disappointed in his not coming to Troas, as had been agreed on between them. Having heard from him the tidings he so much desired of the good effect produced on the Corinthians by his first epistle, and after having tested the liberality of the Macedonian churches (ch. 8. 1), he wrote this second epistle, and then went on to Greece, where he abode for three months; and then, after travelling by land, reached Philippi on his return at Passover or Easter 58 A.D. (Acts, 20. 1-6). So that this epistle must have been written about autumn 57 A.D.

Macedonia was THE PLACE from which it was written (ch. 2. 2, where the present tense "I boast," or "am boasting," implies his presence then in Macedonia). In Asia (Lydian Asia) he had undergone some great peril of his life (ch. 1. 2, 9), whether the reference be [Poley] to the tumult at Ephesus (Acts, 19. 23-41), or, as Aford thinks, to a dangerous illness in which he despaired of life. Thence he passed by Troas to Philippi, the first city which would meet him in entering Macedonia. The importance of the Philippian church would induce him to stay there some time: as also his desire to collect contributions from the Macedonian churches for the poor saints at Jerusalem. His anxiety of mind is recorded (ch. 7. 5) as occurring when he came into Macedonia, and therefore must have been at Philippi, which was the first city of Macedonia in coming from Troas; and here, too, from ch. 7. 6, compared with v. 5, must have been the scene of his receiving the comforting tidings from Titus. "Macedonia" is used for Philippi in 2 Corinthians, 11. 9, as is proved by comparison with Philippians, 4. 15, 16. So it is probably used here (ch. 7. 5). Aford argues from ch. 8. 1, where he speaks of the "grace bestowed on the churches (plural) of Macedonia," that Paul must have visited other churches in Macedonia, besides Philippi, when he wrote, e.g., Thessalonica, Berea, &c., and that Philippi, the first on his route, is less likely to have been the scene of his writing than the last on his route, whichever it was, perhaps, Thessalonica. But Philippi, as being the chief town of the province, was probably the place to which all the collections of the churches were sent. Ancient tradition, too (as appears from the subscription to this epistle), favours the view that Philippi was the place from which this epistle was sent by the hands of Titus, who received, besides, a charge to prosecute at Corinth the collection which he had begun at his first visit (ch. 8. 6).

THE STYLE is most varied, and passes rapidly from one phase of feeling to another: now joyous and consolatory, again severe and full of reproof; at one time gentle and affectionate, at another, sternly rebuking opponents, and upholding his dignity as an apostle. This variety of style accords with the warm and earnest character of the apostle, which nowhere is manifested more beautifully than in this epistle. His bodily frailty, and the chronic malady under which he suffered, and which is often alluded to (ch. 4. 7; 5. 1-4; 12. 7-9; cf. Notes, 1. 8), must have been especially trying to one of his ardent temperaments. But besides this, was the more pressing anxiety of the "care of all the churches." At Corinth, as elsewhere, Judaizing emissaries wished to bind legal fetters of letter and form (cf. ch. 2. 2-18) on the freedom and catholicity of the Church. On the other hand, there were freethinkers who defended their immorality of practices by infidel theories (1 Corinthians, 15. 12, 23-26). These were the "fightings without," and "fears within" (ch. 7. 5, 6) which agitated the apostle's mind, until Titus brought him comforting tidings from Corinth. Even then, whilst the majority at Corinth had testified their repentance, and, as St. Paul had desired, excommunicated the incontinent person, and contributed for the poor Christians of Judea, there was still a minority who, more contemptuously than ever, resisted the apostle. These accused him of crafty and mercenary motives, as if he had personal gain in view in the collection being made; and this, notwithstanding his scrupulous care to be above the possibility of reasonable suspicion, by having others besides himself to take charge of the money. This insinuation was palpably inconsistent with their other charge, that he could be no true apostle, as he did not claim maintenance from the churches which he founded. Another accusation they brought of cowardly weakness; that he was always threatening severe measures without daring to execute them (ch. 10. 8-16; 12. 2); and that he was vacillating in his teaching and practice; circumcising Timothy, and yet withholding circumcision from Titus; a Jew among the Jews, and a Greek among the Greeks. That most of these opponents were of the Judaizing party in the church, appears from ch. 11. 22. They seem to have been headed by an emissary from Judea ("He that cometh," ch. 11. 4), who had brought "letters of commendation" (ch. 3. 1) from members of the church at Jerusalem, and who boasted of his purity of Hebrew descent, and his close connexion with Christ Himself (ch. 11. 13, 23). His partisans contrasted his high pretensions with the timid humility of St. Paul (1 Corinthians, 2. 2); and his rhetoric with the apostle's plain and unadorned style (ch. 11. 6; 10. 10, 13). It was this state of things at Corinth, reported by Titus, that caused St. Paul to send him back forthwith thither with this second epistle, which is addressed, not to Corinth only (1 Corinthians, 1. 2), but to all the churches also in Achaia (ch. 1. 1), which had in some degree been affected by the same causes as affected the Corinthian church. The widely-different tone in different parts of the epistle, is due to the diversity which existed at Corinth between the penitent majority, and the refractory minority. The former he addresses with the warmest affection; the latter with menace and warning. Two deputies, chosen by the churches, to take charge of the contribution to be collected at Corinth, accompanied Titus (ch. 8. 18, 19, 22).

CHAPTER I.

Ver 1-24. THE HEADING: ST. PAUL'S CONSOLATIONS IN RECENT TRIALS IN ASIA: HIS SINCERITY TOWARDS THE CORINTHIANS: EXPLANATION OF HIS NOT HAVING VISITED THEM AS HE HAD PURPOSED. 1. Time: by our brother—When writing to Timothy himself, he calls him "my son" 1 Timothy, 1. 2. Writing of him, "brother," &c., and "my beloved son" 1 Corinthians, 4. 17. He had been sent before to Macedonia, and had met Paul at Philippi, when the apostle passed over from Thracia to Macedonia (cf. ch. 2. 12, 13; Notes, 1 Corinthians, 16. 10, 11), in all Achaia—comprising Heilas and the Peloponnese. The Gentiles themselves, and Annæus Gallio, the Pro-consul (Acts, 18.), strongly testified their disapproval of the accusation brought by the Jews against Paul. Hence, the apostle was enabled to labour in the whole province of Achaia with such success as to establish several churches there. 1. Thessalonians, 1. 8; 2. Thessalonians, 1. 4, where, writing from Corinth, he speaks of the "churches," i.e., not only the Corinthian, but others also—Athens, Cenchreae, and, perhaps, Sicyon, Argos, &c. He addresses "the church in Corinth" directly, and all "the saints" in the province, indirectly. In Galatians, 1. 2, all the "churches" are addressed directly in the same circular epistle. Hence, here he does not say, all the churches, but "all the saints." 3. This thanksgiving for his late deliverance forms a suitable introduction for consolation: their favourable reception of his reasons for not having fulfilled his promise of visiting them (cf. 1. 12). Father of mercies—i.e., the SOURCE of all mercies (cf. James, 1. 7; Romans, 12. 1). comfort—which flows from His "mercies" experienced. Like a true man of faith, he mentions "mercies" and "comfort," before he proceeds to speak of afflictions (cf. 4. 5, 6). The "tribulation" of believers is not inconsistent with God's mercy, and does not begot in them suspicion of it; nay, in the end they feel that He is "the God of all comfort" (i.e., who imparteth the only true and perfect comfort in every distress (Isaiah 46. 3, 5; James, 1. 11). 4. us—illustrious for me—1 Thessalonians, 2. 18. "But we may comfort them which are in any trouble"—Tribulation, as the Greek is the same as before. "Tribulation." The apostle lived, not to himself, but to the church; so, whatever graces God conferred on him, he considered granted not for himself alone, but that he might have the greater ability to help others. [PALMY.] So participation in all the afflictions of man peculiarly qualified Jesus to be man's comforter in all his various afflictions (Isaiah, 53. 4-6; Hebrews, 4. 15). 5. sufferings—standing in contrast with "salvation"—i.e., as "tribulation" distresses of mind, with comfort or "consolation." c. Christ—Cf. Colossians, 1. 24. The sufferings endured, whether by Himself, or by His church, with which He considers Himself identified (Matthew, 23. 37, 38; Acts, 9. 4; John, 4. 17, 21). Christ endures His people's sufferings: His own suffering, (i.e., because of the sympathy and mystical union between Him and us (Romans, 8. 17; 1 Corinthians, 4. 10). 2. They are borne for His sake. 3. They tend to His glory (Ephesians, 4. 1; 1 Peter, 4. 14, 16). absurd in us—i.e., "abundant to us." The order of the Greek, following words is more pertinent than in English Ver. on. "Even so through Christ, abundant hath our comfort." The so—i.e., plural as many; but the consolation though singular, adverbial supposition. Comfort: repeated rates in this epistle, above that in the first epistle, as now by the effect of the latter, most of the Corinthians had been much impressed. 6. we, afflicted... for your consolation—exemplifying, the communion of saints. Their hearts were, so to speak, mirrors reflecting the likeness of each other (Philippians, 2. 26, 27). [BARNES.] Anticipate the afflictions and the consolations of the apostle tend, as in him, so in them, as having communion with him, to their consolation (cf. 4. and

ch. 4. 18). The Greek for "afflicted" is the same as before, and ought to be translated, "Whether we be in tribulation," which is effectual—lit., worketh effectually, in the enduring, &c.—i.e., in enabling you to endure "the same sufferings which we also suffer." Here follows, in the oldest MSS, not as English Version in the beginning of v. 7, the clause, "And our hope is steadfast on your behalf." 7. so shall ye be—rather, "So are ye." He means, there is a community of consolation, as of suffering, between me and you. 8, 9. Referring to the imminent risk of life which he ran in Ephesus (Acts, 19. 23, &c.), when the whole multitude were wrought up to fury by Demetrius, on the plea of St. Paul and his associates having assailed the religion of Diana of Ephesus. The words (v. 9), "we had the sentence of death in ourselves," mean, that he looked upon himself as a man condemned to die. [PALMY.] ALFORD thinks the danger at Ephesus was comparatively so slight, that it cannot be supposed to be the subject of reference here, without exposing the apostle to a charge of cowardice, very unlike his fearless character: hence, he supposes St. Paul refers to some deadly sickness which he had suffered under (vs. 9, 10). But there is little doubt that, had Paul been snatched by the mob in the excitement, he would have been torn in pieces; and probably, besides what St. Luke in Acts records, there were other dangers of an equally distressing kind, such as, "lyings in wait of the Jews" (Acts, 20. 19, his ceaseless foes. They, doubtless, had incited the multitude at Ephesus (Acts, 19. 9, and were the chief of the "many adversaries" and "wild beasts," which he had to fight with there (1 Corinthians, 15. 32; 16. 9). His weak state of health at the time combined with all this to make him regard himself as all but dead (ch. 11. 29; 12. 10). What makes my supposition probable is, that the very cause of his not having visited Corinth directly as he had intended, and for which he proceeds to apologise (v. 13-22), was, that there might be time to see whether the evils arising there not only from Greek, but from Jewish disturbers of the church (ch. 11. 22), would be checked by his first epistle: their not being fully so was what entailed on him the need of writing this second epistle. His not expecting this here expressly is just what we might expect in the outset of this letter; towards the close, when he had won their favourable hearing by a kindly and firm tone, he gives a more distinct reference to Jewish agitators (ch. 11. 22), above strength—i.e., ordinary, natural powers of endurance, despaired—as far as human help or hope from man was concerned. But in respect to help from God we were "not in despair" (ch. 4. 8). 9. But—"Yea" in God which sauteh the dead—We had so given up all thoughts of life, that our only hope was fixed on the coming resurrection; so in 1 Corinthians, 15. 32, his hope of the resurrection was what buoyed him up in contending with foes, savage as wild beasts. Here he touches only on the doctrine of the resurrection, taking it for granted that its truth is admitted by the Corinthians, and urging its bearing on their practice. 10. With deliver—the oldest MSS, read, "will deliver," i.e., as regards immediate manifold dangers. "In whom we trust that he will also so the Greek, yet deliver us," refers to the continuance of God's delivering help hereafter. 11. helping together by prayer for us—rather, "helping together on our behalf by your supplications;" the words "for us" in the Greek following "helping together," not "prayer;" that for the gift. &c.—lit., "That on the part of many persons the gift of gift of grace; the mercy bestowed upon us by means of it, through the prayers of many may be entered thanks for may have thanks offered for it on our behalf." 12. For—Reason why he may confidently look for their prayers for him, our rejoicing—Greek, "our glorying." Not that he glories in the testimony of his conscience, as something to boast of; nay, this testimony is itself the thing in which his glorying consists. in simplicity—Most of the oldest MSS. read, "in holiness." English Version reading is perhaps a gloss from Ephesians, 6. 5. [ALFORD.] Some of the oldest MSS. and versions, however, support it. godly sincerity—lit., "sincerity of God;" i.e., sincerity as in the presence of God (1 Corinthians, 5. 8). We glory in this in spite of all our adversities. Sincerity in Greek implies the non-admixture of any foreign element. He had no sinister or selfish aims (as some insinuated) in falling to visit them as he had promised: such aims belonged to his adversaries, not to him (ch. 2. 17). "Fleshly wisdom" suggests tortuous and insincere courses; but the "grace of God," which influenced him by God's gift (Romans, 12. 3; 15. 15, suggests holy straight-forwardness and sincere faithfulness to promises (e. 17-20), even as God is faithful to His promises. The prudence which subserves selfish interests, or employs unchristian means, or relies on human means more than on the divine Spirit, is "fleshly wisdom" in the world—even in relation to the world at large, which is full of disingenuousness, more abundantly to you-ward—(ch. 2. 4). His greater love to them would lead him to manifest, especially to them, proofs of his sincerity, which his less close connection with the world did not admit of his exhibiting towards it. 13. We write none other things (in this epistle) than what ye read (in my former epistle [BENGE] present, because the epistle continued still to be read in the church as an apostolic rule). CONYBEARE & HOWSON think Paul had been suspected of writing privately to some individuals in the church in a different strain from that of his public letters; and translate, "I write nothing else to you but what ye read openly (the Greek meaning, 'ye read aloud,' viz., when St. Paul's epistles were publicly read in the congregation, 1 Thessalonians, 5. 27); ye, and what you acknowledge inwardly" or acknowledge—Greek, "or even acknowledge." The Greek for "read" and for "acknowledge" are words kindred in sound and root. I would translate, "None other things than what ye know by reading (by comparing my former epistle with my present epistle, or even know as a matter of fact) (viz., the consistency of my acts with my words), even to the end—of my life. Not excluding reference to the day of the Lord (e. 14, end; 1 Corinthians, 4. 5). 14. in part—in contrast to "even to the end" the testimony of his life was not yet completed. (THEOPHYL & BENGE) Rather, "in part," i.e., some of you, not all. (GROTIUS, ALFORD.) So in ch. 2. 8; Romans, 11. 25. The majority at Corinth had shown a willing compliance with St. Paul's directions in the first epistle; but some were still refractory. Hence arises the difference of tone in different parts of this epistle. See Introduction, your rejoicing—your subject of glorying or boast. "Are" (not merely shall be) implies the present recognition of one another as a subject of mutual glorying: that glorying being about to be realized in its fulness "in the day (of the coming) of the Lord Jesus." 15. in this confidence—of my character for sincerity being "acknowledged" by you (e. 12-14). was misled—I was intending, before—"To come unto you before" visiting Macedonia (where he now was). Cf. Note, 1 Corinthians, 16. 5; also 4. 18, which, combined with the words here, implies, that the insinuation of some at Corinth, that he would not come at all, rested on the fact of his having thus disappointed them. His change of intention, and ultimate resolution of going through Macedonia first, took place before his sending Timothy from Ephesus into Macedonia, and therefore (1 Corinthians, 4. 17) before his writing the first epistle. Cf. Acts, 19. 21, 22 (the order there is "Macedonia and Achaia," not Achaia, Macedonia); 20. 1, 2. that ye might have a second benefit—one in going to the other in returning from Macedonia. The "benefit" of his visits consisted in the grace and spiritual gifts which he was the means of imparting (Romans, 1. 11, 12). 16. This intention of visiting them on the way to Macedonia, as well as after having passed through it, must have reached the ears of the Corinthians in some way or other—perhaps in the last epistle (1 Corinthians, 4. 18; 5. 9). The sense comes out more clearly in the Greek order, "By you to pass into Macedonia, and from Macedonia to come again unto you." 17. use lightness—Was I guilty of levity viz., by promising more than I performed, or...according to the flesh, that with me there should be ye, yes, nay, nay!—The "or" expresses a different alternative Did I act with levity, or (on the other hand) do I purpose what I purpose like worldly (fleshly) men, so that my "yes" must at all costs be ye, and my "nay" nay [BENGE, WINKER, CALVIN] (Matthew, 14. 7, 9)? The repetition of the "yes" and "nay" hardly agrees with ALFORD'S view, "What I purpose do I purpose according to the changeable purposes of the fleshly (worldly) man, that there may be with me the ye, yes, and the nay, nay" (i.e., both affirmation and negation concerning the same thing). The repetition will thus stand for the single ye, and nay, as in Matthew, 5. 37; James, 5. 12. But the latter passage implies that the double "ye" here is not equivalent to the single "ye"; BENGE'S view, therefore, seems preferable. 18. He adds this lest they might think his doctrine was changeable like his purposes (the change in which he admitted in v. 17, whilst denying that it was due to "lightness," and at the same time implying that not it have changed, where there was good reason, would have been to imitate the fleshly minded who at all cost obstinately hold to their purpose), true—Greek, "faithful" (1 Corinthians, 1. 9). our word—the doctrine we preach, was not—The oldest MSS. read "is not," ye and nay—i.e., inconsistent with itself. 19. Proof of the unchangeableness of the doctrine from the unchangeableness of the subject of it, viz., Jesus Christ. He is called "the Son of God" to show the impossibility of change in One who is co-equal with God himself (cf. 1 Samuel, 15. 28; Malachi, 3. 6). by me, Silvanus and Timothy—The Son of God, though preached by different preachers, was one and the same, unchangeable. Silvanus is contracted into Silas (Acts, 15. 22, cf. 1 Peter, 5. 12). in him was ye—Greek, "is made ye in Him"; i.e., our preaching of the Son of God is confirmed as true in Him (i.e., through Him; through the miracles wherewith He has confirmed our preaching) [GROTIUS]; or rather, by the witness of the Spirit which He has given, v. 21, 22, and of which miracles were only one, and that a subordinate manifestation. 20. Rather, How many soever be the promises of God, in Him is the "ye" ("faithfulness to His word," contrasted with the "ye and nay," v. 19, i.e., inconsistency as to one's word), and in Him Amen—The oldest MSS. read, "Wherefore through Him is the Amen"; i.e., in Him is faithfulness ("ye") to His word, "wherefore through Him" is the immutable verification of it ("Amen"). As "ye" is His word, so "Amen" is His oath, which makes our assurance of the fulfilment doubly sure. Cf. "two immutable things (viz., His word and His oath) in which it was impossible for God to lie" (Hebrews, 6. 18; Revelation, 3. 14). The whole range of Old Testament and New Testament promises are secure in their fulfilment for us in Christ, unto the glory of God by us—Greek, "for glory unto God by us" (cf. ch. 4. 15), i.e., by our ministerial labours; by us His promises, and His unchangeable faithfulness to them, are proclaimed. CONYBEARE takes the "Amen" to be the Amen at the close of thanksgiving; but then "by us" would have to mean what it cannot mean here, "by us and you." 21. stablisheth us...in Christ—i.e., in the faith of Christ—in believing in Christ. anointed us—As "Christ" is the "Anointed" (which His name means), so "He hath anointed" (Greek, chrismata us, anctus ministers and believing people, with the Spirit (v. 22; 1 John, 2, 20, 27). Hence we become "a sweet savour of Christ" (ch. 2, 15). 22. sealed—A seal is a token assuring the possession of property to one; "sealed" here answers to "stablisheth us" (v. 21; 1 Corinthians, 9, 2), the earnest of the Spirit—i.e., the Spirit as the earnest (i.e., money given by a purchaser as a pledge for the full payment of the sum promised). The Holy Spirit is given to the believer now as a first instalment to assure him his full inheritance as a son of God shall be his hereafter (Ephesians, 1, 13, 14). "Sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession" (Romans, 8, 23). The Spirit is the pledge of the fulfilment of "all the promises" (v. 20, 23). Moreover I—Greek, "But I (for my part)," in contrast to God who hath assured us of His promises being hereafter fulfilled certainly (v. 20-23), call God—the all-knowing one, who avenges woful unfaithfulness to promises, for a record upon my soul—As a witness as to the secret purposes of my soul, and a witness against it, if I lie (Malachi, 3, 5), to spare you—in order not to come in a rebuking spirit, as I should have had to come to you, if I had come then, I came not as yet—Greek, no longer; i.e., I gave up my purpose of then visiting Corinth. He wished to give them time for repentance, that he might not have to use severity towards them. Hence he sent Titus before him. Cf. ch. 10, 10, 11, which shows that his detractors represented him as threatening what he had not courage to perform (1 Corinthians, 4, 18, 19). 24. Not for that—i.e., Not that. "Faith" is here emphatic. He had "dominion" or a right to control them in matters of discipline, but in matters of "faith" he was only a "fellow-helper of their joy" (viz., in believing, Romans, 15, 13; Philippians, 1, 25). The Greek is, "Not that we lord it over your faith." This he adds to soften the magisterial tone of v. 23. His desire is to cause them not sorrow (ch. 2, 1, 2), but "joy." The Greek for "helpers" implies a mutual leaning one on the other, like the mutually supporting buttresses of a sacred building. "By faith (Romans, 11, 20) ye stand;" therefore it is that I bestow such pains in "helping" your faith, which is the source of all true "joy" (Romans, 15, 13). I want nothing more, not to lord it over your faith.

CHAPTER II.

Vet. 1-17. REASON WHY REHAD NOT VISITED THEM ON HIS WAY TO MACEDONIA: THE INCESTUOUS PERSON OUGHT NOW TO BE FORGIVEN: HIS ANXIETY TO HEAR TIDINGS OF THEIR STATE FROM TITUS, AND HIS JOY WHEN AT LAST THE GOOD NEWS REACHED HIM. 1. with myself—in contrast to "you" (ch. 1, 23). The same antithesis between St. Paul and them appears in v. 2. not come again...in heaviness—"sorrow," implying that he had already paid them one visit in sorrow since his coming for the first time to Corinth. At that visit he had warned them "he would not spare if he should come again" (Notes, ch. 12, 2; cf. ch. 12, 14; 13, 1). See Introduction to the first epistle. The "in heaviness" implies mutual pain; they grieving him, and he them. Cf. v. 2, "I make you sorry," and v. 5, "If any have caused grief (sorrow)." In this verse he accounts for having postponed his visit, following up ch. 1, 23. 2. For—Proof that he shrinks from causing them sorrow ("heaviness"). If I—The "I" is emphatic. Some detractor may say that this (v. 1) is not my reason for not coming as I proposed; since I showed no scruple in causing "heaviness," or sorrow, in my epistle (the first epistle to the Corinthians). But I answer, if I be the one to cause you sorrow, it is not that I have any pleasure in doing so. Nay, my object was that he "who was made sorry by me" (viz., the Corinthians in general, v. 3; but with tacit reference to the incestuous person in particular) should repent, and so

"make me glad," as has actually taken place: "for...who is he then that?" &c. 3. I wrote this same unto you—viz., that I would not come to you then (v. 1), as, if I were to come then, it would have to be "in heaviness" (causing sorrow both to him and them, owing to their impenitent state). He refers to the first epistle (cf. 1 Corinthians, 16, 7; cf. 4, 19, 21; 5, 2-7, 13), sorrow from them of whom I ought to have joy—i.e., sorrow from their repentance, when he ought, on the contrary, to have joy from their penitent obedience. The latter happy effect was produced by his first epistle, whereas the former would have been the result, had he then visited them as he had originally proposed, having confidence...that my joy is the joy of you all—trusting that you, too, would feel that there was sufficient reason for the postponement, if it interfered with our mutual joy. [ALFORD.] The communion of saints, he feels confident in them "ALL" his charily overlooking for the moment, the small section of his detractors at Corinth, 1 Corinthians, 13, 7, will make his joy (v. 2) their joy. 4. So far from my change of purpose being due to "lightness" (ch. 1, 17), I wrote my letter to you (v. 3) "out of much affliction (Greek, 'trouble') and anguish of heart, and with many tears," not that ye should be grieved—Translate, "be made sorry," to accord with the translation, v. 2. My ultimate and main object was, "not that ye might be made sorry," but that through sorrow you might be led to repentance, and so to joy, redounding both to you and me (v. 2, 3). I made you sorry before going to you, that when I went it might not be necessary. He is easily made sorry, who is admonished by a friend himself weeping. [BESSEL.] that ye might know the love—of which it is a proof to rebuke sins openly and in season (Ecclesiastes) (Psalm 141, 5; Proverbs, 27, 6). "Love" is the source from which sincere reproof springs: that the Corinthians might ultimately recognise this as his motive, was the apostle's aim, which I have more abundantly unto you—who have been particularly committed to me by God (Acts, 18, 10; 1 Corinthians, 4, 15; 9, 2). 5. grief...grieved—Translate as before "sorrow...made sorry." The "any" is a delicate way of referring to the incestuous person, not...me, but in part—he has grieved me only in part (cf. ch. 1, 14; Romans, 11, 25), i.e., I am not the sole party aggrieved; most of you, also, were aggrieved, that I may not overcharge—that I may not unduly lay the weight of the charge on you all, which I should do, if I made myself to be the sole party aggrieved. ALFORD punctuates, "He hath not made sorry me, but in part (that I press not too heavily, viz., on him) you all." Thus "you all" is in contrast to "me," and "in part" is explained in the parenthetical clause. 6. Sufficient—without increasing it, which would only drive him to despair (v. 7), whereas the object of the punishment was, "that (his) spirit might be saved" in the last day, to such a man—a milder designation of the offender than if he had been named. [MEYER.] Rather, it expresses estrangement from such a one who had caused such grief to the church, and scandal to religion (Acts, 22, 22; 1 Corinthians, 5, 5). this punishment—His being "delivered to Satan for the destruction of the flesh:" not only excommunication, but bodily disease (Notes, 1 Corinthians, 5, 4, 5), inflicted of many—rather, "by the majority" (the more part of you). Not by an individual priest, as in the church of Rome, nor by the bishops and clergy alone, but by the whole body of the church. 7. with overmuch sorrow—Greek, "with HIS overmuch sorrow." 8. confirm your love toward him—by giving effect in act, and showing in deeds your love, viz., by restoring him to your fellowship, and praying for his recovering from the sickness penally inflicted on him. 9. For—Additional reason why they should restore the offender, viz., as a "proof" of their obedience "in all things," now in love, as previously in punishing (v. 6,

's desire. Besides his other reasons for visit, he had the further view, though received by them, of making an experiment of fidelity. This accounts for his deference in his first epistle, the reason for his change of view on before writing it). The full dissonance comes naturally from him now, in style, after he had seen the success of his visit; would not have been a reasonable comfort. All this accords with reality, and as possible from imposture. (PALEY'S E.) The interchange of feeling is marked e...that ye might know the love." &c.; rite, that I might know the proof of you." encouragement to their taking on the responsibility of restoring the offender. They ed of Paul's apostolic sanction to their if I forgive any thing, to whom I forgive; MSS. read, "For even what I have forgiven any thing," for your sakes (uses the past tense, as of a thing already); as in 1 Corinthians, 5, 3, "I have judged as speaking generally of forgiveness granted. It is for your sakes I have do forgive, that the church of which you at members) may suffer no hurt by the and that ye may learn leniency as well s. in the person of Christ—representing by his authority; answering to 1, 4, "In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ," "That we may have no advantage is by Satan," viz., by letting one of our ost to us through despair, we ourselves tan with the weapon, by our repulsive one now penitent. The loss of a single moon loss; therefore, in v. 10, he said, tes." St. Paul had "delivered" the oftan for the destruction of the flesh, that ht be saved" (1 Corinthians, 5, 5). Satan troy the spirit also: to let him do so, ive him an advantage, and let him over-ignorant of his devices—"Ignorant" and words akin in sound and root in Greek; hout knowledge of his knowing schemes. pected to meet Titus at Troas, to receive to the effect of his first epistle on the urch; but, disappointed in his expecta- passed on to Macedonia, where he met 1, 7, 5, 6, 7). rather, "no rest for my spirit" (Genesis, 8, 9). As here his "spirit" had no rest; so in ch. 7, 5, his "flesh." His "spirit" under the Holy Spirit, hence, concluded that it was not necessary to avail himself of the "door" of usefulness at Troas any longer. taking...leave of them—the disciples at Troas. 14. Now—Greek, "But." Though we left Troas disappointed in not meeting Titus there, and in having to leave so soon so wide a door, "thanks be unto God," we were triumphantly blessed in both the good news of you from Titus, and in the victories of the gospel every where in our progress. The cause of triumph cannot be restricted (as ALFORD explains) to the former; for "always," and "in every place," show that the latter also is intended, causeth us to triumph—The Greek is rather, as in Colossians, 2, 15, "triumphs over us;" "leadeth us in triumph." St. Paul regarded himself as a signal trophy of God's victorious power in Christ. His Almighty conqueror was leading him about, through all the cities of the Greek and Roman world, as an illustrious example of His power at once to subdue and to save. The foe of Christ was now the servant of Christ. As to be led in triumph by man is the most miserable, so to be led in triumph by God is the most glorious, lot that can befall any. [TRENCH.] Our only true triumphs are God's triumphs over us. His defeats to us are our only true victories. [ALFORD.] The image is taken from the triumphal procession of a victorious general. The additional idea is perhaps included, which distinguishes God's triumph from that of a human general, that the captive is brought into willing obedience (ch. 10, 5) to Christ, and so joins in the triumph; God "leads him in triumph" as one not merely triumphed over, but also as one triumphing over God's foes with God (which last will apply to the apostle's triumphant missionary progress under the leading of God). So BENOEL; "Who shows us in triumph, not (merely) as conquered, but as the ministers of His victory. Not only the victory, but the open 'showing' of the victory is marked; for there follows, Who maketh manifest," savour—retaining the image of a triumph. As the approach of the triumphal procession was made known by the odour of incense scattered far and wide by the incense-bearers in the train, so God "makes manifest by us" (his now at once triumphed over and triumphing captives, cf. Luke, 5, 10, "Catch," lit., "Take captive so as to preserve alive:") the sweet savour of the knowledge of Christ, the triumphant conqueror (Colossians, 2, 15), every where. As the triumph strikes the eyes, so the savour the nostrils; thus every sense feels the power of Christ's gospel. This manifestation (a word often recurring in his epistles to the Corinthians, cf. 1 Corinthians, 4, 5) refutes the Corinthian suspicions of his dishonestly, by reserve, hiding any thing from them (v. 17; ch. 4, 2). 15. The order is in Greek, "For (it is) of Christ (that) we are a sweet savour unto God;" thus, the "for" justifies his previous words (v. 14), "the savour of His (Christ's) knowledge." We not only scatter the savour, but "we are the sweet savour" itself (Song of Solomon, 1, 3; cf. John, 1, 14, 16; Ephesians, 5, 2; 1 John, 2, 27), in them that are saved—rather, "that are being saved...that are perishing" (Note, 1 Corinthians, 1, 18). As the light, though it blinds in darkness the weak, is for all that still light; and honey, though it taste bitter to the sick, is in itself still sweet; so the gospel is still of a sweet savour, though many perish through unbelief (CHRYSOSTOM Homilies, 5, 467) (ch. 4, 3, 4, 6). As some of the conquered foes led in triumph were put to death when the procession reached the capitol, and to them the smell of the incense was the "savour of death unto death," whilst to those saved alive, it was the "savour of life;" so the gospel was to the different classes respectively, in them—in the case of them. "Those being saved" (ch. 3, 1, to 4, 2): "Those that are perishing" (ch. 4, 3-5).

16. savour of death unto death...of life unto life—an odour arising out of death (a mere announcement of a dead Christ, and a virtually lifeless gospel, in which light un-believers regard the gospel message), ending (as the just and natural consequence) in death (to the unbeliever); (but to the believer) an odour arising out of life (i.e. the announcement of a risen and living Saviour), ending in life (to the believer) (Matthew, 21. 44; Luke, 2. 34; John, 9. 39). who is sufficient for these things 1—viz., for diffusing aright every where the savour of Christ, so diverse in its effects on believers and unbelievers. He here prepares the way for one purpose of his epistle, viz., to vindicate his apostolic mission from its detractors at Corinth, who denied his sufficiency. The Greek order puts prominently foremost the momentous and difficult task assigned to him, "For these things, who is sufficient?" He answers his own question (ch. 3. 8), "Not that we are sufficient of ourselves, &c., but our sufficiency is of God, who hath made us able (Greek, 'sufficient') ministers," &c. 17. not as many—(ch. 11. 18; Philippiana, 2. 31.) Rather, "the many," viz., the false teachers of whom he treats (chs. 10-12, especially ch. 11. 13; 1 Thessaloniana, 2. 3), which corrupt—Greek, "adulterating, as hucksters do wine for gain" (ch. 4. 2; Isaiah, 1. 22; 2 Peter, 2. 2, "Make merchandises of you"), as of sincerity...as of God—as one speaking from (out of) sincerity, as from (i.e., by the command of, and so in dependence on) God. in Christ—as united to Him in living membership, and doing His work (cf. ch. 12. 19). The whole gospel must be delivered such as it is, without concession to men's corruptions, and without selfish aims, if it is to be blessed with success (Acts, 20. 27).

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-18. THE SOLE COMMENDATION HE NEEDS TO PROVE GOD'S SANCTION OF HIS MINISTRY HE HAS IN HIS CORINTHIAN CONVERTS: HIS MINISTRY EXCELLED THE MOSAIC, AS THE GOSPEL OF LIFE AND LIBERTY EXCELLED THE LAW OF CONDEMNATION. 1. Are we beginning again to recommend ourselves (ch. 5. 19) (as some of them might say he had done in his first epistle; or, a reproof to "some" who had begun doing so? commendation—recommendation (cf. ch. 10. 18). The "some" refers to particular persons of the "many" (ch. 2. 17, teachers who opposed him, and who came to Corinth with letters of recommendation from other churches; and when leaving that city obtained similar letters from the Corinthians to other churches. The 13th canon of the council of Chalcedon (451 A.D.) ordained that "clergymen coming to a city where they were unknown, should not be allowed to officiate without letters commendatory from their own bishop." The history (Acts, 18. 27) confirms the existence of the custom here alluded to in the epistle: "When Apollos was disposed to pass into Achaia (Corinth, the brethren (of Ephesus) wrote, exhorting the disciples to receive him." This was about two years before the epistle, and is probably one of the instances to which St. Paul refers, as many at Corinth boasted of their being followers of Apollos (1 Corinthians, 1. 12). 2. our epistle—of recommendation, in our hearts—not letters borne merely in the hands. Your conversion through my instrumentality, and your faith which is "known of all men" by wide spread report (1 Corinthians, 1. 4-7), and which is written by memory and affection on my inmost heart, and is borne about wherever I go, is my letter of recommendation (1 Corinthians, 9. 2). known and read—words akin in root, sound, and sense (so ch. 1. 13). "Ye are known to be my converts by general knowledge; then ye are known more particularly by your reflecting my doctrine in your Christian life." The hand-writing is first "known," then the epistle is "read" [GROTIUS] (ch. 4. 2; 1 Corinthians, 14. 26). There is no so powerful a sermon to the world, as a consistent Christian life. The eye of the world takes in more than the ear. Christian's lives are the only religious books the world reads. IONAXIUS (ad Ephecos, ch. 18.) writes, "Give un-believers the chance of believing through you. Consider yourselves employed by God; your lives the form of language in which He addresses them. Be mild when they are angry, humble when they are haughty; to their blasphemy oppose prayer without ceasing; to their inconsistency, a steadfast adherence to your faith." 3. declared—The letter is written so legibly that it can be "read by all men" (v. 2, Troasote, "Being manifestly shown to be an epistle of Christ," a letter coming manifestly from Christ, and "ministered by us," i.e., carried about and presented by us as its (ministering) bearers to those (the world) for whom it is intended: Christ is the Writer and the Recommender, ye are the letter recommending us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God—St. Paul was the ministering pen or other instrument of writing as well as the ministering bearer and presenter of the letter. "Not with ink" stands in contrast to the letters of commendation which "some" at Corinth (v. 1) used. "Ink" is also used here to include all outward materials for writing, such as the Hittite tables of stone were. These, however, were not written with ink, but "graven" by "the finger of God" (Exodus, 31. 18; 32. 16). Christ's epistle his believing members covered by St. Paul's is better still: it is written not merely with the finger, but with the "Spirit of the living God." It is not the "ministration of death" as the law, but of the "living Spirit" that "giveth life" (v. 6-8). not in—not on tables, tablets of stone, as the ten commandments were written (v. 7), in fleshy tables of the heart—ALL the best MSS. read, "On your hearts (which are) tables of flesh." Once your hearts were spiritually what the tables of the law were physically, tables of stone, but God has "taken away the stony heart out of your flesh, and given you a heart of flesh" (flesh, not fleshy, i.e., carnal; hence it is written, "out of your flesh," i.e., your carnal nature, Ezekiel, 11. 19; 36. 26. Cf. v. 2, "As ye are our epistle written in our hearts," so Christ has in the first instance made you "His epistle written with the Spirit in (on) your hearts." I bear on my heart, as a testimony to all men, that which Christ has by His Spirit written in your heart (ALFORD) (cf. Proverbs, 3. 3; 7; 3; Jeremiah, 31. 31-34). This passage is quoted by PALEY (Horæ Paulinæ) as illustrating one peculiarity of St. Paul's style, viz. his going off at a word into a parenthetical reflection: here it is on the word "epistle." So "savour," ch. 2. 14-17. 4. And—Greek, "But," "Such confidence, however (viz., of our 'sufficiency,' v. 4; 6; ch. 2. 16) [to which he reverts after the parenthesis] as ministers of the New Testament, 'not fainting,' ch. 4. 1), we have through Christ (not through ourselves, cf. v. 18) toward God" (i.e., in our relation to God and His work, the ministry committed by Him to us, for which we must render an account to Him). Confidence toward God is solid and real, as looking to Him for the strength needed now, and also for the reward of grace to be given hereafter. Cf. Acts, 21. 16, "Hope toward God." Human confidence is unreal in that it looks to man for its help and its reward. 5. The Greek is, "Not that we are even yet after so long experience as ministers sufficient to think any thing of ourselves as (coming) FROM ourselves; but our sufficiency is derived FROM God." "From" more definitely refers to the source out of which a thing comes; "of" is more general. "To think," Greek, to "reason out" or "devise," to attain to sound preaching by our reasonings. (THROBOMEX.) The "we" refers here to ministers (2 Peter, 1. 21), any thing—even the least. We cannot expect too little from man, or too much from God. 6. able—rather, as the Greek is the same, corresponding to v. 6, translate, "sufficient as ministers" (Ephesians, 3. 7; Colossians, 1. 23). the new testament —“the new covenant” as contrasted with the Old Testament or covenant (1 Corinthians, 11. 25; Galatians, 4. 24). He reverts here again to the contrast between the law on “tables of stone,” and that “written by the Spirit—joined with “ministers: ministers not of the mere literal precept, in which the old law, as then understood, consisted; “but of the Spirit,” i.e., the spiritual holiness which lay under the old law, and which the new covenant brings to light (Matthew, 5. 17-19) with new motives added, and a new power of obedience imparted, viz., the Holy Spirit (Romans, 7. 6). Even in writing the letter of the New Testament, St. Paul and the other sacred writers were ministers not of the letter, but of the spirit. No piety of spirit could exempt a man from the yoke of the letter of each legal ordinance under the Old Testament; for God had appointed this as the way in which he chose a devout Jew to express his state of mind towards God. Christianity, on the other hand, makes the spirit of our outward observances every thing, and the letter a secondary consideration (John, 4. 24). Still the moral law of the ten commandments, being written by the finger of God, is as obligatory now as ever; but put more on the gospel spirit of “love,” than on the letter of a servile obedience, and in a deeper and fuller spirituality (Matthew, 5. 17-48; Romans, 13. 9). No literal precepts could fully comprehend the wide range of holiness which LOVE, the work of the Holy Spirit, under the gospel, suggests to the believer’s heart instinctively from the word understood in its deep spirituality. Letter killeth—by bringing home the knowledge of guilt and its punishment, death; v. 7, “ministration of death” (Romans, 7. 9). spirit: vivifying life—The spirit of the gospel when brought home to the heart by the Holy Spirit, gives new spiritual life to a man (Romans, 6. 4, 11). This “spirit of life” is for us in Christ Jesus (Romans, 8. 2, 10), who dwells in the believer as a “quickening” or “life-giving Spirit” (1 Corinthians, 6. 48). Note, the spiritualism of rationalism is very different. It would admit no “stereotyped revelation,” except so much as man’s own inner instrument of revelation, the conscience and reason, can approve of; thus making the conscience judge of the written word, whereas the apostles make the written word the judge of the conscience (Acts, 17. 11; 1 Peter, 4. 1). True spirituality rests on the whole written word, applied to the soul by the Holy Spirit as the only infallible interpreter of its far-reaching spirituality. The letter is nothing without the spirit, in a subject essentially spiritual. The spirit is nothing without the letter, in a record substantially historical. 7. the ministration of death—the legal dispensation, summed up in the de-rogation, which denounces death against man for transgression, written and engraven in stones—There is no “and” in the Greek. The lit. translation is, “The ministration of death in letters,” of which “engraven on stones” is an explanation. The preponderance of oldest MSS. is for the English Version reading. But one, perhaps the oldest existing MSS., has “in the letter,” which refers to the preceding words (v. 6), “the letter killeth,” and this seems the probable reading. Even if we read as English Version, “The ministration of death (written) in letters,” alludes plainly to the literal precepts of the law as only bringing us the knowledge of sin and “death,” in contrast to “the Spirit” in the gospel bringing us “life” (v. 6). The opposition between “the letters” and “the Spirit” (v. 8) confirms this. This explains why the phrase in Greek should be “in letters,” instead of the ordinary one which English Version has substituted, “written and,” was glorious—lit., “was made (invested) in glory;” glory was the atmosphere with which it was encompassed, could not steadfastly behold—lit., “fix their eyes on.” Exodus, 34. 30, “The skin of his face shone; and they were AFRAID to come nigh him.” “Could not,” therefore means here, for FEAR. The “glory of Moses’ countenance” on Sinai passed away when the occasion was over: a type of the transitory character of the dispensation which he represented (v. 11), as contrasted with the permanency of the Christian dispensation (v. 11). 8. be rather glorious—lit., “be rather (i.e., still more, invested) in glory.” “Shall be,” i.e., shall be found to be in part now, but fully when the glory of Christ and His saints shall be revealed. 9. ministration of condemnation—the law regarded in the “letter” which “killeth” (v. 6; Romans, 7. 9-11). The oldest existing MS. seems to read as English Version. But most of the almost contemporary MSS., versions, and fathers, read, “If to the ministration of condemnation there be glory,” the ministration of righteousness—the gospel, which especially reveals the righteousness to God (Romans, 1. 17), and imputes righteousness to men through faith in Christ (Romans, 3. 21-25; 4. 2, 22-25), and imparts righteousness by the Spirit (Romans, 8. 1-4), exalted—“abound.” 10. For even the ministration of condemnation, the law, v. 7 (which has been glorified at Sinai in Moses’ person), has now (English Version translates less fully, “was made...had”) lost its glory in this respect by reason of the surpassing glory (of the gospel): as the light of the stars and moon fades in the presence of the sun. 11. was glorious—lit., “was with glory;” or “marked by glory,” that which remaineth—abideth (Revelation, 14. 6). Not “the ministry,” but the Spirit, and His accompaniments, life and righteousness, is glorious—lit., “is in glory.” The Greek “with” or “by” is appropriately applied to that of which the glory was transient. “In” to that of which the glory is permanent. The contrast of the Old and New Testaments proves that St. Paul’s chief opponents at Corinth were Judaizers, 12. such hope of the future glory, which shall result from the ministration of the gospel (v. 8, 9), plainness of speech—openness, without reserve (ch. 2. 17; 4. 2). 13. We use no disguise, “as Moses put a veil over his face, that the children of Israel might not look steadfastly upon the end of that which was to be done away.” [ELIACOTT, &c.] The view of Exodus, 34. 30-35, according to LXX. is adopted by St. Paul, that Moses in going in to speak to God removed the veil till he came out and had spoken to the people; and then when he had done speaking, he put on the veil that they might not look on the end, or the fading, of that transitory glory. The veil was the symbol of concealment, put on directly after Moses’ speaking; so that God’s revelations by him were interrupted by intervals of concealment. [ALFORD.] But ALFORD’S view does not accord with v. 7, the Israelites “could not look steadfastly on the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance.” Plainly Moses’ veil was put on because of their not having been able to “look steadfastly at him.” Paul here (v. 13) passes from the literal fact to the truth symbolized by it, the blindness of Jews and Judaizers to the ultimate end of the law: stating that Moses put on the veil that they might not look steadfastly at (Christ, Romans, 10. 4) the end of that (law) which (like Moses’ glory) is done away. Not that Moses had this purpose; but often God attributes to His prophets the purpose which He has himself. Because the Jews could not see, God judicially gave them up so as not to see. The glory of Moses’ face is antitypically Christ’s glory shining behind the veil of legal ordinances. The veil which has been taken off to the believer is left on to the unbelieving Jew, so that he should not see (Isaiah, 6. 10; Acts, 28. 26, 27). He stops short at the letter of the law, not seeing the end of it. The evangelical glory of the law, like the shining of Moses’ face, cannot be borne by a carnal people, and therefore remains veiled to them until the Spirit comes to take away the veil (v. 14-17). [CAMERON.] 14-18. Parenthetical: Of Christians in general. He reverts rather, "a veil is upon their heart" (their understanding affected by the corrupt will, John, 8, 43; 1 Cor. xiii, 2-11). The Tabernacle was worn in the same manner by every worshiper, and to this veil hanging over the breast there may be an indirect allusion here. (Note, 1 Corinthians, 11, 4: the apostle making it symbolize the spiritual veil on their heart. 16. Moses took off the veil on entering into the presence of the Lord. So as to the Israelites whom Moses represents, "whenever their heart is) turns (not as English Version, "shall turn") to the Lord, the veil is [by the very fact] (not as English Version, "shall be") taken away." Exodus, 34, 34, is the allusion; not Exodus, 34, 29, 31, as ALFORD thinks. Whenever the Israelites turn to the Lord, who is the Spirit of the law, the veil is taken off their heart in the presence of the Lord: as the literal veil was taken off by Moses in going before God: no longer resting on the dead letter, the veil, they by the Spirit commune with God and with the inner spirit of the Mosaic covenant (which answers to the glory of Moses' face unveiled in God's presence), 17. the Lord—Christ (v. 14, 16; ch. 4, 6), is that Spirit—is THE Spirit, viz., that Spirit spoken of in v. 6, and here resumed after the parenthesis (v. 7-16: Christ is the Spirit and "end" of the Old Testament, who giveth life to it, whereas "the letter killeth" (1 Corinthians, 13, 45; Revelation, 19, 10, end), where the Spirit of the Lord is—in a man's "heart" (v. 16; Romans, 8, 9, 10), there is liberty—(John, 8, 36.) "There," and there only. Such cease to be slaves to the letter, which they were whilst the veil was on their heart. They are free to serve God in the Spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus (Philippians, 3, 3); they have no longer the spirit of bondage, but of free sonship (Romans, 8, 15; Galatians, 4, 7). "Liberty" is opposed to the letter (of the legal ordinances, and to the veil, the badge of slavery; also to the fear which the Israelites felt in beholding Moses' glory unveiled (Exodus, 34, 30; 1 John, 4, 18). 18. But we all—Christians, as contrasted with the Jews who have a veil on their hearts, answering to Moses' veil on his face. He does not resume reference to ministers till ch. 4, 1. with open face—translate, "with unveiled received from God, makes men active for 1, 11-13. we faint not—in boldness of sp and patience in suffering (v. 2, 8-16, &c —lit., "bid farewell to" of dishonour shame." "I am not ashamed of the Lord, Romans, 1, 16). Shame would lead whereas "we use great plainness of sp" "by manifestation of the truth." Cf. fully declared. Here refers to the dising of "many" teachers at Corinth (ch. 2, 1 handling, deceitfully—So "corrupt" or word of God" (ch. 2, 17; cf. 1 Thess commending—recommending ourselves ch. 2, 1. to—the verdict of, every—(ch. 5, 11.) Not to men's carnal judgment alluded to (ch. 2, 1), in the sight of Galatians, 1, 10) 2. But if—Yes, eye is the case), hid—rather in reference "veiled." "Hid" (Greek, Colossians, that withdrawn from view altogether, thing within reach of the eye, but not to be seen. So it was in the case to them—in the case only of them: for it is quite plain, that are lost—rather, "ing" (1 Corinthians, 1, 18). So the same "light" to the people of God, was "d Egyptian foes of God (Exodus, 14, 20). Translate, "In whose case," god of worldly make him their God (Philippian in fact, "the prince of the power of the that ruleth in the children of disobedience 2, 2), minds—" understandings," meant as in ch. 3, 14, them which believe as "them that are lost" (or "are perishing salomonians, 2, 10-12. SOUTH quaintly as malefactor's eyes are covered, he is in execution" (Esther, 7, 8). Those perish are not merely veiled, but blinded (ch. not "blinded," but "hardened," light gospel of Christ—Translate, "The lightning: the propagation from the lightened, to others of the dark of the term to "servants." 6. For—Proof that we are true servants of Jesus unto you, commanded the light—Greek, "By speaking the word, commanded light" (Genesis, 1. 3). hath shined—rather, as Greek, "is He who shined." (It is God) who commanded light, &c., that shined, &c. (Job. 37. 15): Himself our Light and Sun, as well as the Creator of light (Malachi, 4. 2; John, 8. 12). The physical world answers to the spiritual in our hearts—in themselves dark, to give the light—i.e., to propagate to others the light, &c., which is in us (cf. Note, v. 4). the glory of God—answering to "the glory of Christ" (Note, v. 4). In the face of Jesus Christ—Some of the oldest MSS. retain "Jesus." Others omit it. Christ is the manifestation of the glory of God, as His image (John, 14. 9). The allusion is still to the brightness on Moses' "face." The only true and full manifestation of God's brightness and glory is "in the face of Jesus" (Hebrews, 1. 3). 7. "Lest any should say, How then is it that we continue to enjoy such unspeakable glory in a mortal body? St. Paul replies, this very fact is one of the most marvellous proofs of God's power, that an earthen vessel could bear such splendour and keep such a treasure." (CHRYSOSTOM Homilies, 8. 494. A.) The treasure or "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God." The fragile "earthen vessel" is the body, the "outward man" (v. 16; cf. v. 10), liable to afflictions and death. So the light in Gideon's pitchers, the type (Judges, 7. 16-20, 22). The ancients often kept their treasures in jars or vessels of earthenware. "There are earthen vessels which yet may be clean; whereas a golden vessel may be filthy." [BENGL.] that the excellency of the power, &c.—that the power of the ministry (the Holy Spirit), in respect to its surpassing "excellency," exhibited in winning souls (1 Corinthians, 2. 4) and in sustaining us ministers, might be ascribed solely to God, we being weak as earthen vessels. God often allows the vessel to be chipped and broken, that the excellency of the treasure contained, and of the power which that treasure has, may be all His (v. 10, 11; John, 3. 30). may be of God...not of us—rather, as Greek, "may be God's" (may be seen and be thankfully (v. 15) acknowledged to belong to God, and not (to come) from us.) The power not merely comes from God, but belongs to Him continually, and is to be ascribed to Him. 8. Greek, "Being hard pressed, yet not inextricably straitened: reduced to inextricable straits" (nominative to "we have," v. 7). on every side—Greek, "in every respect" (cf. v. 10, "always;" ch. 7. 5). This verse expresses inward distresses; next verse, outward distresses (ch. 7. 5). "Without were fightings: within were fears." The first clause in each member of the series of contrasted participles, implies the earthenness of the vessels; the second clause, the excellency of the power, perplexed, but not in despair—Greek, "not utterly perplexed." As perplexity refers to the future; so "troubled" or "hard pressed" refers to the present. 9. not forsaken—by God and man. Jesus was forsaken by both: so much do His sufferings exceed those of His people (Matthew, 27. 46). cast down—or "struck down?" not only "persecuted," i.e., chased as a deer or bird (1 Samuel, 26. 20), but actually struck down as with a dart in the chase (Hebrews, 11. 35-38). The Greek "always" in this verse means, "throughout the whole time;" in v. 11 the Greek is different, and means, "at every time," "in every case when the occasion occurs," bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus—i.e., having my body exposed to being put to death in the cause of Jesus (the oldest MSS. omit "the Lord"), and having in it the marks of such sufferings, I thus bear about wheresoever I go, an image of the suffering Saviour in my own person (v. 11; ch. 1. 6; cf. 1 Corinthians, 16. 31). Doubtless, St. Paul was exposed to more dangers than are recorded in Acts (cf. ch. 7. 8; 11. 26). The Greek for "the dying" is tit, "the being made a corpse;" such St. Paul regarded his body, yet a corpse which shares in the life-giving power of Christ's resurrection, as it has shared in His dying and death. that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body—rather, "may be"—The name "Jesus," by itself, is often repeated here, as St. Paul seems, amidst sufferings, peculiarly to have felt its sweetness. In v. 11 the same words occur with the variation "in our mortal flesh." The fact of a dying, corpse-like body being sustained amidst such trials, manifests that "the (resurrection) life also," as well as the dying, of Jesus, exerts its power in us. I thus bear about in my own person an image of the risen and living, as well as of the suffering, Saviour. The "our" is added here to "body," though not in the beginning of the verse, "For the body is ours not so much in death, as in life." [BENGL.] 11. we which live—in the power of Christ's "life" manifested in us, in our whole man, body as well as spirit (Romans, 8. 10, 11; Note, v. 10; cf. ch. 3. 16). St. Paul regards his preservation amidst so many exposures to "death," by which St. Stephen and St. James were cut off, as a standing miracle (ch. 11. 23). delivered unto—not by chance: by the ordering of Providence, who shows "the excellency of His power" (v. 7), in delivering unto DEATH His living saints, that He may manifest LIFE also in their dying flesh. "Flesh," the very element of decay not merely their "body," is by Him made to manifest LIFE. 12. The "death" of Christ, manifested in the continual "perishing" of our outward man" (v. 16), works peculiarly in us, and is the means of working spiritual "life" in you. The life whereof we witness in our bodily dying, extends beyond ourselves, and is brought by our very dying to you. 13. Translate as Greek, "But having," &c., i.e., notwithstanding the trials just mentioned, we having, &c. the same spirit of faith, according as it, &c.—cf. Romans, 8. 15, on the usage of "spirit of," &c. The Holy Spirit acting on our spirit. Though "death worketh in us, and life in you" (v. 12), yet as we have the same spirit of faith as you, we therefore [believingly] look for the same immortal life as you [EXISTUS], and speak as we believe. ALFORD not so well translates, "The same...faith with that described in the Scriptures" (Psalm 116. 10). The balance of the sentence requires the parallelism to be this, "According to that which is written, I believed, and therefore have I spoken; we also believe, and therefore speak," &c., without fear, amidst "afflictions" and "deaths" (v. 17). 14. Knowing—by faith (ch. 5. 1), shall raise up us also—at the resurrection (1 Corinthians, 6. 13, 14). by Jesus—The oldest MSS. have "with Jesus," present us vividly picturing the scene before the eyes (Jude, 24). with you—(ch. 1. 14; 1 Thessalonians, 2. 19, 20; 3. 13.) 15. For—Confirming his assertion "with you" (v. 14), and "life...worketh in you" (v. 12). all things—whether the afflictions and labours of us ministers (v. 8-11), or your prosperity (v. 12; 1 Corinthians, 3. 21, 22; 4. 8-12). for your sakes—(2 Timothy, 2. 10.) abundant grace, &c.—rather, "That grace (the grace which preserves us in trials and works life in you), being made the greater (multiplied) by means of the greater number (of its recipients), may cause the thanksgiving to abound to," &c. (CHRYSOSTOM) (ch. 1. 11; 9. 11, 12). The Greek is susceptible also of this translation, "That grace, being made the greater (multiplied) on account of the thanksgiving of the greater number (for grace already received), may abound (abundantly redounded to)," &c. Thus the Greek for "abound" has not to be taken in an active sense, but in its ordinary neuter sense, and so the other Greek words, Thanksgiving invites more abundant grace (2 Chronicles, 20. 19-22; Psalm 18. 2; 50. 23). 16. we faint not—withstanding our sufferings. Resuming e. i. outward man—the body, the flesh, perish—"is wearing away;" "is wasted away" by afflictions. inward man—our spiritual and true being.

the "life" which even in our mortal bodies (v. 11) "manifests the life of Jesus." is renewed—"is being renewed," viz., with fresh "grace" (v. 13), and "faith" (v. 13), and hope (v. 17, 18). 17. which is but for a moment—"Our PRESENT light (burden of) affliction" (so the Greek; cf. Matthew, 11, 30). [ALFORD.] Cf. "now for a season...in heaviness" (1 Peter, 1, 6). The contrast, however, between this and the "ETERNAL weight of glory" requires, I think, the translation, "Which is but for the present passing moment." So WAHL. "The lightness of affliction" (he does not express "burden" after "light;" the Greek is "the light of affliction") contrasts beautifully with the "weight of the glory," worketh—rather, "worketh out," a far more exalting and—rather, "in a surpassing and still more surpassing manner" [ALFORD]: "more and more exceedingly" [ELLIOTT, TRENCH, &c.] Greek, "In excess and to excess." The glory exceeds beyond all measure the affliction. 18. look not at—as our aim, things...seen—"earthly things" (Philippians, 3, 19). We mind not the things seen, whether affliction or refreshment come, so as to be seduced by the latter, or deterred by the former. [CHRYSOSTOM.] things...not seen—not "the invisible things" of Romans, 1, 20, but the things which, though not seen now, shall be so hereafter. temporal—rather, "for a time;" in contrast to eternal. English Version uses "temporal" for temporary. The Greek is rightly translated in the similar passage, "the pleasures of sin for a season."

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-21. THE HOPE (ch. 4, 17, 18) OF ETERNAL GLORY IN THE RESURRECTION BODY. Hence arises his ambition to be accepted at the Lord's coming judgment. Hence, too, his endeavour to deal openly with men, as with God, in preaching: thus giving the Corinthians whereof to boast concerning him against his adversaries. His constraining motive is the transforming love of Christ, by whom God has wrought reconciliation between Himself and men, and has committed to the apostle the ministry of reconciliation. 1. For—Assigning the reason for the statement (ch. 4, 17), that affliction leads to exceeding glory, we know—assuredly (ch. 4, 14; Job, 19, 25). it—For all shall not die; many shall be "changed" without "dissolution" (1 Corinthians, 15, 51-53). If this daily delivering unto death (ch. 3, 11) should end in actual death, earthly—not the same as orthis (1 Corinthians, 15, 47). It stands in contrast to "in the heavens," house of this tabernacle—rather, "house of the tabernacle." "House" expresses more permanency than belongs to the body; therefore the qualification, "of the tabernacle" (implying that it is shifting, not stationary), is added (cf. Job, 4, 19; 2 Peter, 1, 13, 14). It thus answers to the tabernacle in the wilderness. Its wooden frame and curtains were out in course of time when Israel dwelt in Canaan, and a fixed temple was substituted for it. The temple and the tabernacle in all essentials were one: there was the same ark, the same cloud of glory. Such is the relation between the "earthly" body and the resurrection body. The Holy Spirit is enshrined in the believer's body as in a sanctuary (1 Corinthians, 3, 16). As the ark went first in taking down the wilderness tabernacle, so the soul (which like the ark is sprinkled with blood of atonement, and is the sacred deposit in the inmost shrine, 2 Timothy, 1, 12) in the dissolution of the body; next the coverings were removed, answering to the flesh; lastly, the framework and boards, answering to the bones, which are last to give way (Numbers, 4). St. Paul, as a tentmaker, uses an image taken from his trade (Acts, 18, 3). dissolved—a mild word for death, in the case of believers, we have—in assured prospect of possession, as certain as if it were in our hands, laid up "in the heavens" for us. The tense is present (cf. John, 3, 36; 6, 47, "hath"). ing of God—rather, "from God." A solid building, not a temporary tabernacle or tent. "Our stands in contrast to "from God." For this present body be also from God, yet it is not fit perfect from His hands, as our resurrection to be, not made with hands—contrasted with erected by man's hands (1 Corinthians, 15, 44). Christ's body is designated, as contrasted with tabernacle reared by Moses (Mark, 14, 58; 19, 11). This "house" can only be the resurrected in contrast to the "earthly house of the tabe our present body. The intermediate state directly taken into account. A comma should "eternal," and "in the heavens." 2. For in this "For also in this," herein (ch. 8, 19). ALFORD it, "in this" tabernacle. Verse 4, which seems favours this. But the parallelism is sufficient by making "in this we groan" refer generally was just said (v. 1, viz., that we cannot obt "house in the heavens" except our "earthly nacle" be first dissolved by death. "We Romans, 8, 23) under the body's weakness: liability to death, earnestly desiring to be cloth—translate, "earnestly longing to have o clothed upon," &c., etc., by being found after at coming, and so to escape dissolution by death, and to have our heavenly body put on over the The groans of the saints prove the existence longing desire for the heavenly glory, a desire cannot be planted by God within us in vain, as to disappointment, our house—Different Gree that in v. 1; translate, "our habitation," "ou cite;" it has a more distinct reference to the tent than the general term "house" (v. 1). He tended to have made the verb to this nominati are willing" (rather, "well content"); but digres the word "confident" (v. 6, 7), he resumes the w different form, viz., as an assertion: "We are ce and well content." "Being confident...we ar dent" may be the Hebraic idiom of emphasis; 1 7, 34, Greek, "Having seen, I have seen," i. e., surely seen, always—under all trials. BEN-GUR the contrast between "always confident" and dent," especially at the prospect of being "abs the body," &c. We are confident as well as at as also most of all in the hope of a blessed departure. whilst...at home...absent—translate as Greek. "Whilst we sojourn in our home in the body, we are away from our home in the Lord." The image from a "house" is retained (cf. Philippians, 3. 20; Hebrews, 11. 13-16; 13. 14). 7. we walk—in our Christian course here on earth, not by sight—Greek, "not by appearance." Our life is governed by faith in our immortal hope; not by the outward specious appearance of present things. [TITHE. Synonyms.] Cf. "apparently" LXX., "by appearance," Numbers, 12. 8. WAML supports English Version. Ch. 4. 18, also confirms it (cf. Romans, 8. 24; 1 Corinthians, 13. 12, 13). God has appointed in this life faith for our great duty, and in the next, vision for our reward [SOUTH] (1 Peter, 1. 8). 8. willing—lit., "well content." Translate also, "To go (lit., migrate) from our home in the body, and to come to our home with the Lord." We should prefer to be found alive at the Lord's coming, and to be clothed upon with our heavenly body (v. 2-4). But feeling, as we do, the sojourn in the body to be a separation from our true home "with the Lord," we prefer even dissolution by death, so that in the intermediate disembodied state we may go to be "with the Lord" (Philippians, 1. 23). "To be with Christ" (the disembodied state) is distinguished from Christ's coming to take us to be with Him in soul and body (1 Thessalonians, 4. 14-17. "with the Lord"). Perhaps the disembodied spirits of believers have fullness of communion with Christ unseen; but not the mutual recognition of one another, until clothed with their visible bodies at the resurrection (cf. 1 Thessalonians, 4. 13-17), when they shall with joy recognise Christ's image in each other perfect. 9. Wherefore—with such a sure "confidence" of being blessed, whether we die before, or be found alive at, Christ's coming, we labour—lit., "make it our ambition;" the only lawful ambition, whether present or absent—whether we be found at His coming present in the body, or absent from it, accepted—Greek, "well-pleasing." 10. appear—rather, "be made manifest," viz., in our true character. So "appear," Greek, "be manifested" (Colossians, 3. 4; cf. 1 Corinthians, 4. 5). We are at all times, even now, manifest to God; then we shall be so to the assembled intelligent universe and to ourselves: for the judgment shall be not only in order to assign the everlasting portion to each, but to vindicate God's righteousness, so that it shall be manifest to all His creatures, and even to the conscience of the sinner himself, receive—his reward of grace proportioned to "the things done," &c. (ch. 9. 6-9; 1 John, 8). Though salvation be of grace purely, independent of works, the saved may have a greater or less reward, according as he lives to, and labours for, Christ more or less. Hence there is scope for the holy "ambition" (Note, v. 9; Hebrews, 6. 10). This verse guards against the Corinthians supposing that all share in the house—"from heaven" (v. 1. 2). There shall be a searching judgment which shall sever the bad from the good, according to their respective deeds, the motive of the deeds being taken into account, not the mere external act; faith and love to God are the sole motives recognized by God as sound and good (Matthew, 12. 36, 37; 23. 34-45). done in his body—The Greek may be, "by the instrumentality of the body;" but English Version is legitimate (cf. Greek, Romans, 2. 27). Justice requires that substantially the same body which has been the instrument of the unbeliever's sin, should be the object of punishment. A proof of the essential identity of the natural and the resurrection body. 11. terror of the Lord—the coming judgment, so full of terrors to unbelievers. [ESTIUS.] ELLICOTT and ALFORD, after GROTIUS and BENGE, translate, "The fear of the Lord" (ch. 7. 1; Ecclesiastes, 12. 13; Acts, 9. 31; Romans, 3. 18; Ephesians, 5. 21). persuade—Ministers should use the terrors of the Lord to persuade men, not to rouse their enemy (Jude, 23). BERGER, ESTIUS, and ALFORD, explain: "Persuade men" (by our whole lives, v. 13), viz., of our integrity as ministers. But this would have been expressed after "persuade," had it been the sense. The connexion seems as follows: He had been accused of seeking to please and win men, he therefore says (cf. Galatians, 1. 10), "it is as knowing the terror (or fear) of the Lord that we persuade men; but (whether men who hear our preaching recognise our sincerity or not) we are made manifest unto God as acting on such motives (ch. 4. 2); and I trust also in your consciences." Those so "manifested" need have no "terror" as to their being "manifested" (English Version, appear) before the judgment-seat" (v. 10). 12. For—The reason why he leaves the manifestation of his sincerity in preaching to their consciences (ch. 3. 1), viz., his not wishing to "commend" himself again, occasion to glory—(ch. 1. 14)—viz., as to our sincerity, in appearance—Greek, "face" (cf. 1 Samuel, 16. 7). The false teachers gloried in their outward appearance, and in external recommendations (ch. 11. 18) their learning, eloquence, wisdom, riches, not in vital religion in their heart. Their conscience does not attest their inward sincerity, as mine does (ch. 1. 12). 13. be—rather as Greek, "have been." The contrast is between the single act implied by the past tense, "If we have ever been beside ourselves," and the habitual state implied by the present, "Or whether we be sober," i.e., of sound mind, beside ourselves—The accusation brought by Festus against him (Acts, 26. 24). The holy enthusiasm with which he spake of what God effected by His apostolic ministry, seemed to many to be boasting madness, sober—humbling myself before you, and not using my apostolic power and privileges, to God...for your cause—The glorifying of his office was not for his own, but for God's glory. The abasing of himself was in adaptation to their infirmity, to gain them to Christ (1 Corinthians, 9. 22). 14. For—Accounting for his being "beside himself" with enthusiasm: the love of Christ towards us (in His death for us, the highest proof of it, Romans, 5. 6-8), producing in turn love in us to him, and not mere "terror" (v. 11), constrains us—with irresistible power (invites us to the one great object to the exclusion of other considerations. The Greek implies to compress forcibly the energies into one channel. Love is jealous of any rival object encroaching the soul (ch. 11. 1-3). because we thus judge—lit., "as" "having judged thus;" implying a judgment formed at conversion, and ever since regarded as a settled truth, that if—i.e., that since. But the oldest MSS. omit "if." "That one died for all" (Greek, "in behalf of all"). Thus the following clause will be, "Therefore all (lit., 'the all,' viz., for whom He died) died." His dying is just the same as if they all died; and in their so dying, they died to sin and self, that they might live to God their Redeemer, whose henceforth they are (Romans, 6. 2-11; Galatians, 2. 20; Colossians, 3. 3; 1 Peter, 4. 1-3). 15. they which live—in the present life (ch. 4. 11, "we which live") [ALFORD]; or, they who are thus indebted to Him for life of soul as well as body. [MENOCHIUS.] died for them—He does not add, "rose again for them," a phrase not found in St. Paul's language. [BENGE.] He died in their stead, He rose again for their good, "for (the effecting of) their justification" (Romans, 4. 25), and that He might be their Lord (Romans, 14. 7-9). ELLICOTT and ALFORD join "for them" with both "died" and "rose again;" as Christ's death is our death, so His resurrection is our resurrection; Greek, "Who for them died and rose again," not henceforth—Greek, "no longer," viz., now that His death for them has taken place, and that they know that His death saves them from death eternal, and His resurrection life brings spiritual and everlasting life to them. 16. Wherefore—because of our settled judgment (v. 10).

time he had never known Christ save in His heavenly life. To the Twelve it was "expedient that Christ should go away" that the Comforter should come, and so they might know Christ in the higher spiritual aspect, and in His new life-giving power, and not merely "after the flesh," in the carnal aspect of Him (Romans, 6. 9-11; 1 Corinthians, 15. 45; 1 Peter, 3. 18; 4. 1, 2). Doubtless, Judaizing Christians at Corinth prided themselves on the mere fleshly (ch. 11. 18) advantage of their belonging to Israel, the nation of Christ, or on their having seen Him in the flesh, and thence claimed superiority over others as having a nearer connexion with Him (v. 12; ch. 10. 7.). St. Paul here shows the true aim should be to know Him spiritually as new creatures (v. 16, 17), and that outward relations towards Him profit nothing (Luke, 19. 10-21; John, 16. 7, 22; Philip- pians, 3. 3-10). This is at variance with both Romish Mariolatry and transubstantiation. Two distinct Greek verbs are used here for "know": the first ("know we no man"), means "to be personally acquainted with;" the latter ("known Christ...know...no more") is to recognize, or estimate. St. Paul's estimate of Christ, or the expected Messiah, was carnal, but is so now no more. 17. Therefore — Connected with the words in v. 16. "We know Christ no more after the flesh." As Christ has entered on His new heavenly life by His resurrection and ascension, so all who are "in Christ" (i.e., united to Him by faith as the branch is in the vine) are new creatures (Romans, 6. 9-11). "New" in the Greek implies a new nature quite different from any thing previously existing, not merely recent, which is expressed by a different Greek word (Galatians, 6. 16). creature—lit., "creation," and so the creature resulting from the creation cf. John, 3. 3, 5; Ephesians, 2. 10; 4. 23; Colossians 3. 10. 11). As we are "in Christ," so "God was in Christ" (v. 10); hence He is mediator between God and us. old things—selfish, carnal views (cf. v. 16) of ourselves, of other men, and of Christ, passed away — spontaneously, like the snow of early spring [BENNETT] before the advancing sun. behold—implying an allusion to Isaiah 43. 19, and 65. 17. 18. all [THE, Greek] things—all our privileges in this new 10, 33), "approving ourselves," and all the other participates down to v. 10, are nominatives to "we also entreat you" (v. 1), to show the pains he took to enforce his exhortation by example, as well as present. [ALFORD.] "Offence" would be given, if we were without "patience" and the other qualifications which he therefore subjects (cf. Romans, 14, 19, 4. Translate, to mark the true order of the Greek words, "In every thing, as God's ministers recommending ourselves," i.e., that our hearers may give our message a favourable hearing, through our consistency in every respect, not that they may glorify us. Alluding to ch. 3, 1, he implies, We commend ourselves, not like them by word, but by deed. patience—(ch. 12, 12.) Fit first. "Fur- ness" follows (v. 6). Three triplets of trials exercising the "patience" (patient endurance) follow: Afflictions (or "tribulations"), necessities, distresses (or "straits"); stripes, imprisonments, tumults; labours, watchings, fastings. The first triplet expresses afflictions gener- ally; the second, those in particular, arising from the violence of men; the third, those which he brought on himself directly or indirectly. 5. stripes—(ch. 11, 23, 24 Acts, 16, 23.) imprisonments—(ch. 11, 23.) He had been, doubtless, elsewhere imprisoned besides at Philippi, when he wrote this epistle. tumults—(Acts, 13, 50; 14, 5, 19; 16, 22; and recently 19, 23-41.) labours—in the cause of Christ (ch. 11, 23; Romans, 16, 12). watchings—(ch. 11, 27.) Sleepless nights, fastings—The context here refers to his trials, rather than devotional exercises (cf. ch. 11, 27). Thus, "floodness" would seem to be the sense (cf. 1 Corinthians, 4, 11; Philippians, 4, 12). But the usual sense of the Greek is fasts, in the strict sense; and in ch. 11, 27, it is spoken of independently of "hunger and thirst." (Cf. Luke, 2, 37; Acts, 10, 30; 14, 23.) However, Matthew, 15, 32, Mark, 8, 3, justify the sense, more favoured by the context, floodness, though a rare use of the word. GAUSEN remarks, "The apostles combine the highest offices with the humblest exterior; as every thing in the church was to be cast in the mould of death and resurrection, the cardinal principle throughout Christianity." 6. By... by, &c.—rather, as Greek, "In...in," &c., implying not the instrument, but the sphere or element in which his ministry moved. knowledge—spiritual; in gospel mysteries, unattainable by mere reason (1 Corinthians, 2, 6-16; 2 Corinthians, 3, 6, 17, 18). long-suffering...kind- ness—associated with "charity" or "love" (1 Corin- thians, 13, 4), as here, by the Holy Ghost—in virtue of His influences which produce these graces, and other gifts, "love unfeigned" being the foremost of them. 7. By the word of truth, by the power of God—rather "In... in," &c. As to "the word of truth" (cf. ch. 4, 2; Colos- sians, 1, 8), and "the (miraculous) power of God" (ch. 4, 7); 1 Corinthians, 2, 4, "in demonstration of the Spirit and of power." by the armour—Greek, "through" or "by means of the armour," &c. "Righteousness," which is the breastplate alone in Ephesians, 6, 13-17, here is made the whole Christian panoply (cf. ch. 16, 4). on...right...and...left—i.e., guarding on every side, 8. Translate, "Through glory and dishonour" (disgrace), viz., from those in authority, and accruing to us present. "By," or "through evil report and good report," from the multitude, and affecting us absent. [BENGL.] Re- garded "as deceivers" by those who, not knowing (v. 9), dishonour and give us an evil report; "as true," by those who "know" (v. 9) us in the real "glory" of our ministry. In proportion as one has more or less of glory and good report, in that degree has he more or less of dishonour and evil report. 9. unknown...yet well known—"unknown" in our true character to those who "evil report" of us. "Well known" to those who hold us in "good report" (v. 8). COSTEARE explains, "Unknown by men, yet acknowledged by God" (1 Corinthians, 13, 12). Perhaps both God and men (believers) are intended as knowing him (ch. 5, 11, and 11. 6.) aying—live—(ch. 1. 9; 4. 10, 11; 11. 23.) Cf. Gaius's remark, Notes, v. 6. "Behold" calls attention to the fact as something beyond all expectation, chastened...not killed—realizing Psalm 118. 18. 10. The "as" no longer is used to express the opinion of his adversaries, but the real state of him and his fellow-labourers, making many rich—Spiritually (1 Corinthians, 1. 6, after the example of our Lord, who "by his poverty made many rich" (ch. 8. 9), having nothing—Whatever of earthly goods we have, and these are few, we have as though we had not: as tenants removable at will, not owners (1 Corinthians, 7. 20), possessing all things—The Greek implies firm possession, holding fast in possession (cf. 1 Corinthians, 3. 21, 22). The things both of the present and of the future are, in the truest sense, the believer's in possession, for he possesses them all in Christ, his lasting possession, though the full fruition of them is reserved for the future eternity. 11. month—open unto you—I use no concealment, such as come at Corinth have insinuated (ch. 4. 2). I use all freedom and openness of speech to you as to beloved friends. Hence he introduces here, "O Corinthians" (cf. Philippians, 4. 16). The enlargement of his heart towards them (ch. 7. 3) produced his openness of mouth, i.e., his unreserved expression of his inmost feelings. As an unloving man is narrow in heart, so the apostle's heart is enlarged by love, so as to take in his converts at Corinth, not only with their graces, but with their many short-comings (cf. 1 Kings, 4. 29; Psalm 119. 32; Isaiah, 60. 5). 12. Any constraint ye feel towards me, or narrowness of heart, is not from want of largeness of heart on my part towards you, but from want of it on your part towards me: "bowels," i.e., affections (cf. ch. 12. 15), not straitened in us—i.e., for want of room in our hearts to take you in. 13. Translate, "As a recompence in the same kind...be enlarged also yourselves." (ELLIOTT, &c.) "In the same way" as my heart is enlarged towards you (v. 11), and "as a recompence" for it (Galatians, 4. 12). I speak as unto my children—as children would naturally be expected to recompence their parents' love with similar love. 14. Be not—Greek, "Become not." unqually yoked—"yoked with one alien in spirit." The image is from the symbolical precept of the law (Leviticus, 19. 19): "Thou shalt not let thy cattle gender with a diverse kind," or the precept (Deuteronomy, 22. 10): "Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together." Cf. Deuteronomy, 7. 3, forbidding marriages with the heathen; also 1 Corinthians, 7. 39. The believer and unbeliever are utterly heterogeneous. Too close intercourse with unbelievers in other relations also is included (v. 10; 1 Corinthians, 8. 10; 10. 14). fellowship—fit, share, or participation, righteousness—the state of the believer, justified by faith, unrighteousness—rather, as always translated elsewhere, "iniquity," the state of the unbeliever, the fruit of unbelief, light—of which believers are the children (1 Thessalonians, 5. 8). 15. Belial—Hebrew, "worthlessness, unprofitableness, wickedness." As Satan is opposed to God, and Antichrist to Christ; Belial being here opposed to Christ, must denote all manner of Antichristian uncleanness. (BENNETT.) he that believeth with an infidel—translate, "a believer with an unbeliever." 16. agreement—accordance of sentiments (cf. 1 Kings, 18. 21; Ephesians, 5. 7, 11), the temple of God—i.e., you, believers (1 Corinthians, 3. 16; 6. 19), with idols—cf. Dagon before the ark (1 Samuel, 5. 2), as—even as God said. Quotation from Leviticus, 25. 12; Jeremiah, 31. 33; 32. 38; Ezekiel, 37. 26, 27; cf. Matthew, 28. 20; John, 14. 23, walk in them—rather, "among them." As "dwell" implies the Divine presence, so "walk," the Divine operation. God's dwelling in the body and soul of saints may be illustrated by its opposite, demoniacal possession of body and soul, my people—rather, "they shall be to me a people." 17.

Quoted from Isaiah, 22. 11, with the freedom of one inspired, who gives variations sanctioned by the Holy Spirit, "he ye separate"—"be separated" (Hosea, 4. 17), teach not the unclean thing—rather, "any thing unclean" (ch. 7. 1; Micah, 2. 14). Teaching is more pointing, as implying participation, than seeing, receive you—The Greek implies, "to myself," as persons heretofore out of doors, but now admitted within (ch. 4. 1-14). With this accords the clause, "Come out from among them," viz., so as to be received to me. So Ezekiel, 30. 41, "I will accept you;" and Zephaniah, 2. 15, "gather her that was driven out." "The intercourse of believers with the world should resemble that of angels, who, when they have been sent a message from heaven, discharge their office with the utmost promptness, and joyfully fly back home to the presence of God" (1 Corinthians, 7. 31; & 9. 10). 18. Translate, "I will be to you in the relation of a Father, and ye shall be to me in the relation of sons," &c. This is a still more endearing relation than (v. 16), "I will be their God, and they...my people." Cf. the promise to Solomon (1 Chronicles, 22. 6; Isaiah, 43. 6; Revelation, 21. 2, 7; Jeremiah, 31. 1, 9), Lord Almighty—"The Lord the Universal Ruler; nowhere else found but in Revelation. The greatness of the Promiser enhances the greatness of the promisee.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-16. SELF-PURIFICATION THEIR DUTY RESULTING FROM THE FORGOING. HIS LOVE TO THEM, AND JOY AT THE GOOD EFFECTS OF THEM OF HIS FORMER EPISTLE, AS REPORTED BY TITUS. 1. cleanse ourselves—This is the conclusion of the exhortation (ch. 6. 1, 14; 1 John, 3. 3; Revelation, 22. 11). Sinfulness—"the unclean thing" (ch. 6. 17), of the flesh—for instance, fornication, prevalent at Corinth (1 Corinthians, 6. 16-18), and spirit—for instance, idolatry, direct or indirect (1 Corinthians, 6. 9; 8. 1, 7; 10. 7, 21, 22). The spirit (Psalm 32. 2) receives pollution through the flesh, the instrument of uncleanness, perfecting holiness—The cleansing away impurity is a positive step towards holiness (ch. 6. 17). It is not enough to begin; the end crowns the work (Galatians, 3. 3; 5. 7; Philippians, 1. 6). fear of God—often conjoined with the consideration of the most glorious promises (ch. 4. 11; Hebrews, 4. 1). Privilege and promise go hand in hand. 2. Receive us—with enlarged hearts (ch. 6. 12). We have wronged...corrupted...defrauded no man—(cf. v. 2.) This is the ground on which he asks their reception (of making room for) him in their hearts. We wronged none by an undue exercise of apostolic authority; v. 13 gives an instance in point. We have corrupted none, viz., by beguilements and flatteries, whilst preaching "another gospel," as the false teachers did (ch. 11. 3, 4). We have defrauded none by "making a gain" of you (ch. 12. 17). Modestly he leaves them to supply the positive good which he had done: suffering all things himself that they might be benefited (v. 9. 12; ch. 12. 13). 3. In excusing myself, I do not accuse you, as though you suspected me of such things; (MEMORICITUS) or as though you were guilty of such things; for I speak only of the false apostles. (ESTIUS, and Greek commentators.) Rather, "as though you were ungrateful and treacherous." [BEZA.] I...said before—in ch. 6. 11, 12; cf. Philippians, 1. 7. and also live with you—the height of friendship. I am ready to die and live with you and for you (Philippians, 1. 7, 20, 24; 2. 17, 18). Cf. as to Christ, John, 10. 11. 4. boldness of speech—cf. ch. 6. 11) glaring of you—Not only do I speak with unreserved openness to you, but I glory (boast) greatly to others in your behalf, in speaking of you, filled with comfort—at the report of Titus (v. 6, 7, 9, 13; ch. 1. 4). exceeding joyful—Greek, I overabound with joy (v. 7, 9, 16). ex- tribulation—described in v. 4; also in ch. 4. 7, 8; 6. 4, 5. Cf. euteronomy, 32, 25, to which he seems to refer. Translate in the order required by the text that comforteth those that are cast a God." Confirmation of v. 10 from the Corinthians' own experience. carelessness—solicitude, fit., "diligence;" opposed to their past negligence in the matter. in you —Greek, "for you," yes—not only "carefulness" or diligence, but also "clearing of yourselves," viz., to me by Titus; anxiety to show you disapproved of the deed, indignation—against the offender. fear—of the wrath of God, and of sinning any more [SCLATER and CALVIN]; fear of Paul (GROTIUS) (1 Corinthians, 4, 2, 19-21). vehem- ment desire—longing for restoration to Paul's approval. [CONYBEARE & HOWSON.] "Fear" is in spite of one's self. "Longing desire" is spontaneous, and implies strong love and an aspiration for correction. [CALVIN.] "Desire" for the presence of Paul, as he had given them the hope of it (1 Corinthians, 4, 10; 16, 5). [GROTIUS & ESTIUS.] zeal—for right and for God's honour against what is wrong. Or, "for the good of the soul of the offender." [BENSON.] revenge—translate, "Exact- ing of punishment" (1 Corinthians, 5, 2, 3). Their "carefulness" was exhibited in the six points just specified: "clearing of themselves," and "indignation" in relation to themselves; "fear" and "vehement desire" in respect to the apostle; "zeal" and "re- venge" in respect to the offender [BENSON] (cf. v. 7). In all—the respects just stated. clear—Greek, "pure," viz., from complicity in the guilty deed. "Approved yourselves," Greek, "commended yourselves." What- ever suspicion of complicity rested on you (1 Corin- thians, 5, 2, 6), through your former remissness, you have cleared off by your present strenuousness in re- probating the deed. 12, though I wrote unto you—"making you sorry with my letter" (v. 9), his cause that suffered wrong—the father of the incestuous person who had his father's wife (1 Corinthians, 5, 1). The father, thus it seems, was alive, that our care for you, &c.—Some of the oldest MSS. read thus, "That you care for us might be made manifest unto you," &c. But the words, "unto you," thus, would be rather obscure; still the obscurity of the genuine reading may have been the very reason for the change being made by correctors into the reading of English Version. ALFORD explains the reading: "He wrote in order to bring out their zeal on his behalf (i.e., to obey his command), and make it manifest to themselves in God's sight, i.e., to bring out among them their zeal to regard and obey him." But some of the oldest MSS. and ver- sions (including the Fulgate and old Italian) support English Version. And the words, "to you," suit it better than the other reading. Ch. 2, 4, "I wrote... that ye might know the love which I have more abundantly unto you," plainly accords with it, and disproves ALFORD'S assertion that English Version is inconsistent with the fact as to the purpose of his letter. His writ- ing, he says, was not so much for the sake of the in- dividual offender, or the individual offended, but from his "earnest care" or concern for the welfare of the church. 13. The oldest MSS. read thus, "Therefore (Greek, "for this cause," viz., because our aim has been attained) we have been (English Version "were," is not so accurate) comforted; yea (Greek, "but"), in our com- fort we exceedingly the more joyed for the joy of Titus," &c. (cf. v. 7). 14. any thing—i.e., at all. I am not ashamed—"I am not put to shame," viz., by learning from Titus that you did not realize the high character I gave him of you. as...all things...in truth, even so our boasting... is found a truth—As our speaking in general to you was true (ch. 1, 18), so our particular boasting before Titus concerning you is now, by his report, proved to be truth (cf. ch. 9, 2). Some oldest MSS. read expressly, "concerning you;" this in either reading is the sense. 15. his inward affection—fit., bowels (cf. ch. 6, 12; Philippians, 1, 8; 2, 1; Colossians, 3, 12). obedience—(ch. 2, 9.) fear and trembling—with trembling anxiety to obey my wishes, and fearful lest there should be ought in yourselves to offend him and me (v. 11; cf.

1 Corinthians, 2. 3. 16. therefore—Omitted in the oldest MSS. The conclusion is more emphatical without it, that I have confidence in you in all things—rather, as Greek, "that in every thing I am of good courage concerning lit., in the case of you," as contrasted with my former doubts concerning you.

CHAPTER VIII.

VER. 1-24. THE COLLECTION FOR THE SAINTS: THE READINGS OF THE MACEDONIANS A PATTERN TO THE CORINTHIANS: CHRIST THE HIGHEST PATTERN: EACH IS TO GIVE WILLINGLY AFTER HIS ABILITY: TITUS AND TWO OTHERS ARE THE AGENTS ACCREDITED TO COMPLETE THE COLLECTION. 1. we do you to wit—we make known to you, the grace of God bestowed on the churches of Macedonia—Their liberality was not of themselves naturally, but of God's grace bestowed on them, and enabling them to be the instrument of God's "grace" to others v. 6, 10. The importance given in this epistle to the collection, arose as well from St. Paul's engagement (Galatians, 2. 10), as also chiefly from his hope to conciliate the Judaizing Christians at Jerusalem to himself and the Gentile believers, by such an act of love on the part of the latter towards their Jewish brethren. 2. trial of affliction—The Greek expresses, "in affliction (or tribulation)," which testeth them: lit., "in a great testing of affliction," abundance of their joy—The greater was the depth of their poverty, the greater was the abundance of their joy. A delightful contrast in terms, and triumph, in fact, of spirit over flesh. their deep poverty—Greek, "their poverty down to the depth of it," abounded unto the riches, &c.—Another beautiful contrast in terms: Their poverty had the effect, not of producing stinted gifts, but of "abounding in the riches of liberality not as Margm., "simplicity," though the idea of simplicity of motive to God's glory and man's good, probably enters into the idea (cf. Romans, 12. 8, and Margm., ch. 9. 11, Note, 12; James, 1. 5. 3-5. they were willing—rather, supply from v. 5, the ellipsis thus, "According to their power...yea, and beyond their power, THEY GAVE," of themselves—not only not being besought, but themselves beseeching us. 4. that we would receive—omitted in the oldest MSS. Translate therefore, "beseeching of us...the grace and fellowship of lit., to grant them the favour of sharing in the ministering unto the saints." The Macedonian contributions must have been from Philippi, because Philippi was the only church that contributed to St. Paul's support (Philippians, 4. 10, 15, 16. 5. And this they did, not as we hoped—translate, "And not as we hoped (i.e., far beyond our hopes), but their own selves gave they first to the Lord." "First," not indicating priority of time, but first of all, above all in importance. The living of themselves takes precedence of their other gifts, as being the motive which led them to the latter (Romans, 13. 16. by the will of God—not according to the will of God, but "moved by the will of God, who made them willing" (Philippians, 2. 13). It is therefore called lit., "the grace of God." 6. Inasmuch that—As we saw the Macedonians' alacrity in giving, we could not but exhort Titus, that as we collected in Macedonia, so he in Corinth should complete the work of collecting which he had already begun there, lest ye, the wealthy people of Corinth, should be outdone in liberality by the poor Macedonians, as he had begun—Greek, "previously begun," etc., the collection at Corinth, before the Macedonians began to contribute, during the visit to Corinth from which he had just returned. finish in you the same grace—complete among you this act of grace or beneficence on your part. also—as well as other things which he had to do among them. [ALFORD.] 7. in faith—(ch. 1. 21.) utterance—(Note, 1 Corinthians, 1. 6.) Not as ALFORD, "doctrine" or "word," knowledge—(1 Corinthians, 8. 1.) diligence—in every thing that is good. your love to us—lit.,

"love from you (i.e., on your part) in us" (i.e., which has us for its object—which is felt in the case of us). 8. not by commandment—not by way of commandment—by the occasion of the forwardness of others, and, &c.—rather, "But by (mention of) the forwardness of others (as an inducement to you), and to prove (lit., proving) the sincerity of your love." The Greek is "by means of," not "on account of the forwardness," &c. BENGE, ELLICOTT, &c., translate, "By means of the forwardness of others, proving the sincerity of your love also." The former is the simpler construction in the Greek. 9. ye know the grace—the act of gratuitous love whereby the Lord emptied Himself of His previous heavenly glory (Philippians, 2. 6, 7 for your sakes, became poor—Yet this is not demanded of you (v. 14); but merely that, without impoverishing yourselves, you should relieve others with your abundance. If the Lord did so much more, and at so much heavier a cost, for your sakes; much more may you do an act of love to your brethren at so little a sacrifice of self. might be rich—in the heavenly glory which constitutes His riches, and all other things, so far as is really good for us (cf. 1 Corinthians, 3. 21, 22. 10. advice—Herein he does not (as some misinterpret the passage disclaim inspiration for the advice he gives; but under the Spirit, states that it is his "opinion" [ALFORD] or "judgment" [ELLICOTT, &c.], not a command, that so their offering might be free and spontaneous, this—my giving you an advice, not a command, who have begun before—"seeing that ye have begun before" the Macedonian churches: "a year ago" should be connected with this clause. not only to do, but also to be forward—There were three steps: (1.) the forwardness, more lit., "the will"; (2.) the setting about it, lit., "doing it"; (3.) the completion of it. [ALFORD.] In the two former, not only the act, but the intention, the Corinthians preceded the Macedonians. BENGE explains, "Not only to do FOR THE PAST YEAR, but also to be forward" or willing FOR THIS YEAR. ELLICOTT translates, "already," instead of "before." "Ye began already, a year ago, not only to do, but also to be forward." It appears hence, that something had been done in the matter a year before: to other texts, however, show the collection was not yet paid (cf. v. 11, and ch. 9. 5, 7). This agrees with one, and only one, supposition, viz., that every man had laid by in store the fund from which he was afterwards to contribute, the very case which is shown by 1 Corinthians, 16. 2, to have existed. [PALFREY—Horæ Paulinæ.] 11. perform—"complete the doing also" (Note, v. 10. a readiness to will—Greek, "the readiness of will" referring to v. 10, where the Greek for "to be forward," ought to be translated as here, "to will," performance—"completion." [ALFORD.] The godly should show the same zeal to finish, as well as to begin well, which the worldly exhibit in their undertakings (Jeremiah, 44. 25. 12. For—Following up the rule "out of that which ye have" (v. 11), and no more, a willing mind—rather, as Greek, "the readiness," viz., to will, referring to v. 11, accepted—Greek, "favourably accepted," according to that a man has—The oldest MSS. omit "a man." Translate, "According to whatsoever it have: the willing mind, or readiness" to will, is personified. He judges not according to what a man has the opportunity to do, but according to what he would do if he had the opportunity (cf. Mark, 14. 8; and the widow's mite, Luke, 21. 3, 4. 13. VER. 1-15. REASONS FOR HIS SENDING TITUS. THE GREATER THEIR BOUNTIFULNESS, THE MORE SHALL BE THE RETURN OF BLESSING TO THEM, AND THANKSGIVING TO GOD. 1. For—connected with ch. 8. 16: "Show love to the messengers of the churches; for as concerns the ministration for the saints, it is superfluous for me to write to you who are so forward already." writes—emphatical: It is superfluous to write, for you will have witnesses present. [BENGL.] 2. ready a year ago—to send off the money, owing to the apostle's former exhortation (1 Corinthians, 16. 1, 2). your zeal—Greek, "the zeal from you," i.e., on your part; propagated from you to others, provoked—i.e., stimulated, very many—Greek, "the greater number," vis., of the Macedonians. 3. have I sent—we should say, "I send;" whereas the ancients put it in the past, the time which it would be by the time that the letter arrived, the brethren—(ch. 8. 18, 22)—Titus and the two others, should be in vain in this behalf—"should be proved futile in this particular," however true in general (ch. 7. 4). A tacit compliment, softening the sharp monition, as I said—as I was saying (v. 2). 4. if they of Macedonia—rather as Greek, "if Macedonians," unprepared—with your collection; see v. 2, "ready," Greek, "prepared," we, not to say ye—Ye would naturally feel more ashamed for yourselves, than we (who boasted of you) would for you, confident boasting—The oldest MSS. read simply "confidence," vis., in your liberality. 5. that they would go before—translate, "that they should," &c. whereof ye had notice before—rather, "promised before;" long announced by me to the Macedonians" (v. 2). [BENGL.] "Your promised bounty." [ELLIOTT, &c.] not as of covetousness—translate, "not as matter of covetousness," which it would be, if you gave niggardly. 6. I say—ELLIOTT, &c., supply the ellipsis thus: "But remember this" bountifully—lit., "with," or "in blessings." The word itself implies a beneficent spirit in the giver cf. v. 7, end), and the plural implies the abundance and liberality of the gifts. "The reaping shall correspond to the proportions and spirit of the sowing." [BENGL.] Cf. Ezekiel, 34. 26, "Showers of blessing." 7. according as he purpoeth in his heart—Let the full consent of the free will go with the gift. God's gifts are bestowed on us, not that we may have them to ourselves, but that we may the more "abound in good works" to others, sufficiency—so as not to need the help of others, having yourselves from God "bread for your food" (r. 10). in all things—Greek, "in every thing." every good work—of charity to others, which will be "your seed sown" (r. 10). 9. As it is written—realizing the highly blessed character portrayed in Psalm 112. 9. He—the "good man" (Psalm 112. 6). dispersed—as seed sown with full and open hand, without anxious thought in what direction each grain may fall. It is implied also that he has always what he may disperse. [BENEFIC.] So in Psalm 112. 9. the poor—The Greek word is here only found in New Testament, "one in straitened circumstances, who earns his bread by labour." The word usually employed means "one so poor as to live by begging," his righteousness—Here "beneficence": the evidence of his being righteous before God and man. Cf. Deuteronomy, 24. 13; Matthew, 6. 1, "alms"; Greek, "righteousness," remaineth—unexhausted and unfailing. 10. Translate as in Isaiah, 55. 10, "He that ministereth (supplieth) seed to the sower and bread for food" (lit. "bread for eating"), minister—rather future, as the oldest MSS., "shall minister (supply) and multiply," your seed—your means for liberality, the fruits of your righteousness—the heavenly rewards for your Christian charity (Matthew, 10. 42). Righteousness shall be itself the reward, even as it is the thing rewarded, Hosea, 10. 12; Matthew, 5. 6; 6. 12. Cf. e. s. bountyfulness—Greek, "singleness of liberality." Translated "simplicity," Romans, 12. 8. causeth through us—lit., "worketh through us" i. e., through our instrumentality as the distributors, thanksgiving—in on the part of the recipients. 12. [ELLIOTT, &c.] Or, "the experimental proof" of your Christian character, afforded by "this ministration," i. e., the recipients, for your professed subjection—Greek, "for the subjection of your profession;" i. e., your subjection in accordance with your profession, in relation to the gospel. Ye yield yourselves in willing subjection to the gospel precepts, evinced in acts, as well as in profession, your liberal distribution—Greek, "the liberality of your contribution in relation to them," &c. 14. Translate, "Themselves also with prayer for you, longing after you on account of the exceeding grace of God resting upon you." English Version is, however, good sense: They glorify God (r. 13) by the experimental proof, &c., "and by their prayer for you." But the Greek favours the former. 15. his unspeakable gift—the gift of his own son, which includes all other inferior gifts (ch. 8. 9; Romans, 8. 32). If we have received from God "His unspeakable gift," what need it thing is it, if we give a few perishing gifts for His sake?

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-18. HE VINDICATES HIS APOSTOLIC AUTHORITY AGAINST THOSE WHO DEPRECIATED HIM FOR HIS PERSONAL APPEARANCE. HE WILL MAKE HIS POWER FELT WHEN HE COMES. HE BOASTS NOT, LIKE THEM, BEYOND HIS MEASURE. 1. I Paul myself—no longer "we," "us," "our" (ch. 9. 11): I who am represented by depreciators as "base," &c., I, the same Paul, of my own accord "beseech you;" or rather "entreat," "exhort" you for your sake. As "I beseech you" is distinct Greek verb, v. 2, for my sake, by the meekness and gentleness of Christ—he mentions these

graces of Christ especially (Psalm 118. 35; Matthew, 11. 29), as on account of his imitation of them in particular he was despised. [GRIOT.] He entreats them by these, in order to show that though he must have recourse to more severe measures, he is naturally inclined to gentle ones after Christ's example. [MARNOKHIA.] "Meekness" is more in the mind internally; "gentleness" in the external behaviour, and in relation to others; for instance, the condescending yieldingness of a superior to an inferior, the former not insisting on his strict rights. [TAKSCH.] BENOGL explains it, "By the meekness and gentleness derived by me from Christ," not from my own nature: he objects to understanding it of Christ's meekness and gentleness, since no where else is "gentleness" attributed to Him. But though the exact Greek word is not applied to Him, the idea expressed by it is (cf. Isaiah, 40. 11; Matthew, 12. 19, 20), in presence—in personal appearance when present with you, base—Greek, "lowly;" timid, humbly diffident: opposed to "bold." "Am" stands here by ironical concession for "am reputed to be" (cf. v. 10). 2. I beseech you—Intimating that, as he can beseech in letters, so he can be severe in their presence, that I may not be—that I may not have to be bold, &c. with that confidence—that authoritative sternness. I think—I am wanted to be, as if we walked according to the flesh—His Corinthian detractors judged of him by themselves, as if he were influenced by fleshly motives, the desire of favour, or fear of giving offence, so as not to exercise his authority when present. 3. For—Reason why they should regard him "beseeching" them r. 2 not to oblige him to have recourse to "bold" and stern exercise of authority. "We walk in the flesh," and so in weakness; but not "according to the flesh" (r. 2). Moreover, though we walk in it, we do not walk according to it. A double contrast or antithesis. "They who accuse us of walking after the flesh, shall find [to their cost] that we do not war after the flesh; therefore compel us not to use our weapons." [ATTORCI.] 4. A connotation of those who try to propagate their creed by force and persecution (cf. Luke, 9. 34-36). carnal—translated, "fleshly" to preserve the allusion to v. 2, 3. weapons—for punishing offending members r. 6; 1 Corinthians, 4. 21; 5. 5, 13: boldness of speech, ecclesiastical discipline r. 5; ch. 13. 19, the power of the word, and of the sacraments, the various extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, mighty through God—Greek, "mighty to God," i. e., mighty before God: not humanly, but divinely powerful. The power is not ours, but God's. Cf. "fair to God," i. e., divinely fair. Margin, Acts, 7. 39. Also above (ch. 2. 13), "unto God a sweet savour." "The efficacy of the Christian religion proves its truth." [BENOGL.] pulling down—As the Greek is the same as in v. 3, translated, "casting down." Cf. Jeremiah, 1. 10; the inspired servants of God inherit the commission of the Old Testament prophets, strong holds—(Proverbs, 21. 22)—etc., in which sinners entrench themselves against reproof: all that opposes itself to Christ; the learning, and eloquence, and philosophical subtleties on which the Corinthians prided themselves. So Joshua's trumpet blast was "mighty" under God to overthrow the walls of Jericho. 5. imaginations—rather, "reasonings." Whereas "thought" expresses men's own purpose, and determination of living after their own pleasure. [TITM.] high thing—so it ought to be translated. Romans, 8. 39. A distinct Greek word from that in Ephesians, 3. 15, "height," and Revelation, 21. 16, which belongs to God and heaven, from whence we receive nothing hurtful. But "high thing" is not so much "height" as something made high, and belongs to those regions of air where the powers of darkness "exalt themselves" against Christ and us. Ephesians, 2. 2; 6. 12; 2 Thessalonians, 2. 4. exalteth itself—2 Thessalonians, 2. 4, supports English Version rather Where there is exaltation, there knowledge of God is wanting. Arrange the words following thus: "Bringing (i. e., intent of the mind or will) into the obedience of Christ," i. e., to obey Christ. The apostle's spiritual warfare are: dishes what is opposed to Christ; (2.) He; (3.) it brings into obedience to Christ (2. 6; 16. 20). The "reasonings" (English imaginations) are utterly "cast down," all intents" (English Version, "thoughts") viling captives, and tender the voluntary faith to Christ the conqueror. 8. bore himself tremblingly among them, whereas the false teachers spoke with authoritative bearing and language. 11. think this—"consider this," such will see be—or "are" in general, not merely shall we be at our next visit. 12. "We do not presume (trouy) to judge ourselves among, or in comparison with, some of them that commend themselves." The charge falsely brought against him of commending himself (ch. 3. 1; 5. 12), really holds good of the false teachers. The phrase, "judge ourselves of the number," is drawn from the testing of athletes and senators, the "approved" being set down on the roll. [WABL.] measuring themselves by themselves—"among themselves," to correspond to the previous verb, "judge ourselves among them." Instead of measuring themselves by the public standard, they measure themselves by one made by themselves: they do not compare themselves with others who excel them, but with those like themselves; hence their high self esteem. The one-eyed is easily king among the blind, are not wise—with all their boasted "wisdom" (1 Corinthians, 1. 19-20), they are any thing but "wise." 13. not boast without measure—Greek, "to unmeasured bounds." There is no limit to a man's high opinion of himself, so long as he measures himself by himself (v. 13) and his fellows, and does not compare himself with his superiors. It marks the personal character of this epistle that the word "boast" occurs twenty-nine times in it, and only twenty-six times in all the other epistles put together. Undeterred by the charge of vanity, he felt he must vindicate his apostolic authority by facts. [CONYBEARE & HOWSON.] It would be to "boast of things without our measure," were we to boast of conversions made by "other men's labours" (v. 16), distributed—apportioned. [ALFORD.] a measure—as a measure. [ALFORD.] to reach—"that we should reach as far as even to you?" not that he meant to go no further (v. 16; Romans, 15. 20-24). St. Paul's "measure" is the apportionment of his sphere of gospel labours ruled for him by God. A "rule" among the so-called "apostolic canons" subsequently was, that no bishop should appoint ministers beyond his own limits. At Corinth no minister ought to have been received without St. Paul's sanction, as Corinth was apportioned to him by God as his apostolic sphere. The epistle here incidentally, and therefore undesignedly, confirms the independent history, the Acts, which represents Corinth as the extreme limit as yet of his preaching, at which he had stopped, after he had from Philippi passed southward successively through Amphipolis, Apollonia, Thessalonica, Berea, and Athens. [PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ,] 14. "We are not stretching ourselves beyond our measure, as (we should be) if we did not reach unto you; (but we do,) for as far as even to you have we come in preaching the gospel." 15. "Not boasting to unmeasured bounds (i. e., not exceeding our own bounds by boasting) of (lit., "in") other men's labours," when—"as your faith goes on increasing." The cause of his not yet reaching with the gospel the regions beyond Corinth, was the weakness as yet of their faith. He desired not to leave the Corinthians before the proper time, and yet not to put off preaching to others too long. enlarged by you—Greek, "in your case." Our success in your case will give us an important step towards further progress beyond you (v. 16), according to our rule—according to our divinely-assigned apportionment of the area or sphere of our work; for "we stretch not ourselves beyond our measure" (v. 14), abundantly—Greek, "unto exceeding abundance?" so as to exceed the limits we have yet reached (v. 16). 16. To—i. e., so as to preach... beyond you (and) not to boast, &c. in another man's line of things made ready to our hand—Do not connect "line of things," &c.; but "boast of things," &c. To make this clearer, arrange the words thus, "Not to boast as to things (already made by the preaching of others ready to our hand in another man's line (i.e., within the line, or sphere of labour, apportioned by God to another). 17. gloriesth—translate, to accord with v. 16, "boasteth." In contrast to his opponents' practice of boasting in another's line or sphere, St. Paul declares the only true boasting is in the Lord (1 Corinthians, 1, 31; 15, 10). 18. (Proverbs, 27, 2.) whom the Lord commenseth—to whom the Lord has given as his "epistle of commendation," the believers whom he has been the instrument of converting; as was St. Paul's case (ch. 3, 1-3). is approved—can stand the test of the final trial. A metaphor from testing metals (Romans, 10, 10; 1 Corinthians, 11, 19). So on the other hand those finally rejected by the Lord are termed "reprobate silver" (Jer. 6, 20).

CHAPTER XI.

VER. 1-33. THROUGH JEALOUSY OVER THE CORINTHIANS WHO MADE MORE ACCOUNT OF THE FALSE APOSTLES THAN OF HIM, HE IS OBLIGED TO COMMEND HIMSELF AS IN MANY RESPECTS SUPERIOR. 1. Would to God—translate as Greek, "I would that" bear with me—I may ask not unreasonably to be borne with: not so the false apostles (v. 4, 20). my—Not in the oldest MSS. folly—The Greek is a milder term than that for "foolishness" in 1 Corinthians, 3, 19; Matthew, 5, 22; 25, 2. The Greek for "folly" here implies inprudence; the Greek for "foolishness" includes the idea of persecution and wickedness, and indeed bear—a request (so v. 16). But the Greek and the sense favour the translation, "But indeed I need not wish it, for ye do bear with me" still I wish you to bear with me further, whilst I enter at large into self-commendations. 2. For I am jealous—The justification of his self-commendations lies in his zealous care lest they should fall from Christ, to whom he, as "the friend of the bridegroom" (John, 3, 29), has espoused them: in order to lead them back from the false apostles to Christ, he is obliged to boast as an apostle of Christ, in a way which, but for the motive, would be "folly," godly jealousy—lit., "jealousy of God" (cf. ch. 1, 12, "godly sincerity," lit., "sincerity of God"). "If I am immoderate, I am immoderate to God." (BENJAMIN.) A jealousy which has God's honour at heart (1 Kings, 19, 10). I...espoused you—St. Paul uses a Greek term applied properly to the bridegroom, just as he ascribes to himself "jealousy," a feeling properly belonging to the husband: so entirely does he identify himself with Christ, present you as a chaste virgin to Christ—at His coming, when the heavenly marriage shall take place (Matthew, 25, 6; Revelation, 19, 7, 9). What St. Paul here says he desires to do, viz., "present" the church as "a chaste virgin" to Christ, Christ Himself is said to do in the fuller sense. Whatever ministers do effectively, is really done by Christ (Ephesians, 5, 27-32). The espousals are going on now. He does not say "chaste virgins" for not individual members, but the whole body of believers conjointly constitute the Bride. 3. I fear—(ch. 12, 20)—not inconsistent with love. His source of fear was their yielding character. subtily—the utter foe of the "simplicity" which is intent on one object, Jesus, and seeks none "other," and no "other" and different Spirit (v. 4); but loves him with tender SINGLENES OF AFFECTION. Where Eve first gave way, was in mentally harbouring for a moment the possibility insinuated by the serpent, of GOD not having her truest interests at heart, and of this "other" professing friend being more concerned for her than GOD, corrupted—so as to lose their virgin purity through seducers (v. 4). The same Greek stands for "minds" as for "thoughts" (ch. 10, 5, where see note); intents of the will, or mind. The oldest MSS. after "simplicity," add, "and the purity" or "chastity," in Christ—rather, "that is towards Christ." 4. If, &c.—which in fact is impossible. However, if it were possible, ye might then bear with them (see Note, v. 1,

But there can be no new gospel: there is but the one which I first preached; therefore it ought not to be "borne" by you, that the false teachers should attempt to supersede me. he that cometh—the high-sounding title assumed by the false teachers, who arrogated Christ's own peculiar title (Greek, Matthew, 11, 3, and Hebrews, 10, 37), "He that is coming." Perhaps he was leader of the party which assumed peculiarly to be "Christ's" (ch. 10, 7; 1 Corinthians, 1, 12); hence his assumption of the title, preacheth... receive—is preaching...ye are receiving, Jesus—the "Jesus" of gospel history. He therefore does not say "Christ," which refers to the office, another...another-Greek, "another Jesus...a different Spirit...a different gospel." Another implies a distinct individual of the same kind; different implies one quite distinct in kind, which ye have not received—from us, spirit...received...gospel...accepted—The will of man is passive in RECEIVING the "Spirit," but it is actively concurrent with the will of God (which goes before to give the good will) in ACCEPTING the "gospel," ye might well bear with him—There would be an excuse for your conduct, though a bad one (for ye ought to give heed to no gospel other than what ye have already heard from me, Galatians, 1, 6, 7); but the false teachers do not even pretend they have "another Jesus" and a "different gospel" to bring before you, they merely try to supplant me, your accredited Teacher. Yet ye not only "bear with" them, but prefer them. 5. For—my claim is superior to that of the false teachers, "For," &c. I suppose—I reckon. [ALFORD.] I was not—Greek, "That I have not been, and am not," the very chiefest apostles—James, Peter, and John, the witnesses of Christ's transfiguration and agony in Gethsemane. Rather, "those overmuch apostles," those surpassers of the apostles in their own esteem. This sense is proved by the fact that the context contains no comparison between him and the apostles, but only between him and the false teachers; v. 6 also alludes to these, and not to the apostles; cf. also the parallel phrase, "false apostles" (Note, v. 13, and ch. 12, 11). [ALFORD.] 6. rude—Greek; "a common man;" a "laic;" not rhetorically trained; unskilled in finish of diction. 1 Corinthians, 2, 1-4; 13, ch. 10, 16, 11, shows his words were not without weight, though his "speech" was deficient in oratorical artifice. "Yet I am not so in my knowledge" (ch. 12, 1-8; Ephesians, 3, 1-5), have been...made manifest—Read with the oldest MSS., "We have made things (gospel truths) manifest:" thus showing our "knowledge." English Version would mean, I leave it to yourselves to decide whether I be rude in speech, &c.; for we have been thoroughly (lit., "in every thing") made manifest among you (lit., "in respect to you;" "in relation to you"). He had not by reserve kept back his "knowledge" in divine mysteries from them (ch. 2, 17; 4, 2; Acts, 20, 30, 37), in all things—The Greek rather favours the translation "among all men;" the sense then is, we have manifested the whole truth among all men with a view to your benefit. [ALFORD.] But the Greek in Philipians, 4, 12, "In each thing and in all things," sanctions English Version, which gives a clearer sense. 7. Have I—lit., "Or have I?" Connected with last verse, "Or will any of you make it an objection that I have preached to you gratuitously? He leaves their good feeling to give the answer, that this, so far from being an objection, was a decided superiority in him above the false apostles (1 Corinthians, 9, 6-15), abasing myself—in my mode of living, waiving my right of maintenance, and earning it by manual labour; perhaps with slaves as his fellow-labourers (Acts, 18, 3; Philipians, 4, 12). ye...exalted—spiritually, by your admission to gospel privileges, because—"in that," gospel of God—"of God" implies its divine glory to which they were admitted. Respy—"without charge." 8.  oldest MSS. read, "that I, too," viz., as well as they, may boast myself. 17. not after the Lord—by inspired guidance he excepts this "glorying" or "boasting" from the inspired authoritativeness which belongs to all else that he wrote; even this boasting, though undesirable in itself, was permitted by the Spirit, taking into account its aim, viz., to draw off the Corinthians from their false teachers to the apostle. Therefore this passage gives no proof that any portion of Scripture is uninspired. It merely guards against his boasting being made a justification of boasting in general, which is not ordinarily "after the Lord," i.e., consistent with Christian humility. foolishly—Greek, "in foolishness," exalt himself—under the pretext of apostolic dignity, smites you on the face—under the pretext of divine zeal.

 The height of insolence on their part, and of servile en-

This epistle 55-57 A.D. Fourteen years before will bring to 41-43 A.D., the time of his second visit to (Acts, 22, 17). He had long been intimate orinthians, yet had never mentioned this before: it was not a matter lightly to be spoken of tell—rather as Greek, "I know not." If he must have been caught up bodily; if body, as seems to be Paul's opinion, his spirit been caught up out of the body. At all recognises the possibility of conscious recipi-embodied spirits, caught up—(Acts, 8, 20.) d heaven—"even to," &c. These raptures plural, "visions," "revelations" had two rst he was caught up "to the third heaven," thence to "Paradise" (see 4) (CLEMENS, 888 Stromata, 5, 427), which seems to denote loss of the third heaven (BENGL.) ALFORD thinks it to be the same bodily affliction as in Galatians, 4, 13, 14. It certainly was something personal, affecting him individually, and not as an apostle; causing at once acute pain (as "thorn" implies) and shame ("buffet" as slaves are buffeted, 1 Peter, 2, 20). messenger of Satan—who is permitted by God to afflict His saints, as Job (Job, 2, 7; Luke, 13, 16), to buffet me—In Greek, present: to buffet me even now continuously. After experiencing the state of the blissful angels, he is now exposed to the influence of an evil angel. The chastisement from hell follows soon upon the revelation from heaven. As his sight and hearing had been ravished with heavenly "revelations," so his touch is pained with the "thorn in the flesh." 8. For—"concerning this thing," thrice—To his first and second prayer no answer came. To his third the answer came, which satisfied his faith and led him to bow his will to God's will. So Paul's master, Jesus, thrice prayed on the mount of Olives, in resignation to the Father's will. The thorn seems (from v. 9, and Greek v. 7, "that he may buffet me") to have continued with Paul when he wrote, lest still he should be "overmuch lifted up." The Lord—Christ. Escape from the cross is not to be sought even indirectly from Satan (Luke, 4, 7). "Satan is not to be asked to spare us." (BENGL.) 9. said—lit., "He hath said;" implying that his answer is enough. (ALFORD.) is sufficient—The trial must endure, but the grace shall also endure and never fail thee (ALFORD) (Deuteronomy, 33, 25). The Lord puts the words into Paul's mouth, that following them up he might say, "O Lord, thy grace is sufficient for me." (BENGL.) My strength—Greek, "power," is made perfect—has its most perfect manifestation, in weakness—Do not ask for sensible strength, for my power is perfected in man's "strengthlessness" (so the Greeks). The "for" implies, thy "strengthlessness" (the same Greek as is translated "weakness;" and in v. 10, "infirmities") is the very element in which my "power" (which moves coincident with "my grace") exhibits itself most perfectly. So that Paul instead of desiring the infirmity to "depart," "rather" henceforth "glories in infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest (Greek, 'tabernacle upon') cover my infirmity all over as with a tabernacle; cf. Greek, John, 1, 13) upon" him. This effect of Christ's assurance on him appears, ch. 4, 7; 1 Corinthians, 2, 3, 4; cf. 1 Peter, 4, 14. The "my" is omitted in some of the oldest MSS.; the sense is the same, "power" (referring to God's power) standing absolutely, in contrast to "weakness" (put absolutely, for man's weakness). Paul often repeats the word "weakness" or "infirmity" (chs. 11, 12, and 13.) as being Christ's own word. The Lord has more need of our weakness than of our strength; our strength is often His rival; our weakness, His servant, drawing on His resources, and showing forth His glory. Man's extremity is God's opportunity; man's security is Satan's opportunity. God's way is not to take His children out of trial, but to give them strength to bear up against it (Psalm 88, 7; John, 17, 16). 10. take pleasure in—Too strongly. Truly, &c.—There is understood some such clause as this, "And yet I have not been commended by you," in all patience, in signs, &c.—The oldest MSS. omit "in." "Patience" is not one of the "signs," but the element in which they were wrought: endurance of opposition which did not cause me to leave off working. [ALFORD.] Translate, "In ... patience, by signs," &c. His mode of expression is modest, putting himself, the worker, in the background, "were wrought," not "I wrought." As the signs have not been transmitted to us, neither has the apostleship. The apostles have no literal successors (cf. Acts, 1. 21, 22. mighty deeds—palpable works of Divine omnipotence. The silence of the apostles in fourteen epistles, as to miracles, arises from the design of those epistles being hortatory, not controversial. The passing allusions to miracles in seven epistles prove that the writers were not enthusiasts to whom miracles seem the most important thing. Doctrines were with them the important matter, save when convincing adversaries. In the seven epistles the mention of miracles is not obtrusive, but marked by a calm air of assurance, as of facts acknowledged on all hands, and therefore unnecessary to dwell on. This is a much stronger proof of their reality, than if they were formally and obtrusively asserted. Signs and wonders is the regular formula of the Old Testament, which New Testament readers would necessarily understand of supernatural works. Again, in the gospels the miracles are so inseparably and congruously tied up with the history, that you cannot deny the former without denying the latter also. And then you have a greater difficulty than ever, viz., to account for the rise of Christianity; so that the infidel has something infinitely more difficult to believe, than that which he rejects, and which the Christian more rationally accepts. 13. wherein you were inferior—i.e., were treated with less consideration by me than were other churches. I myself—I made a gain of you neither myself, nor by those others whom I sent, Titus, &c. (c. 17. 18). wrong—His declining support from the Corinthians might be regarded as the denial to them of a privilege, and a mark of their spiritual inferiority, and of his looking on them with less confidence and love (cf. ch. 11. 9, 11). 14. the third time—See Introduction to First Corinthians. His second visit was probably a short one (1 Corinthians, 16. 7), and attended with humiliation through the scandalous conduct of some of his converts (cf. v. 21; ch. 2. 1) It was probably paid during his three years' sojourn at Ephesus, from which he could pass so readily by sea to Corinth (cf. ch. 1. 15, 16; 13. 1, 2). The context here implies nothing of a third preparation to come; but, "I am coming, and the third time, and will not burden you this time any more than I did at my two previous visits." [ALFORD.] not yours, but you—(Philippians, 4. 17.) children,—parents—St. Paul was their spiritual father (1 Corinthians, 4. 14, 15). He does not, therefore, seek earthly treasure from them, but lays up the best treasure (viz., spiritual) "for their souls" (c. 15). 15. I will... spend—all I have, be spent—all that I am. This is more than even natural parents do. They "lay up treasures for their children." But I spend not merely my treasures, but myself, for you—Greek "for your souls": not for your mere bodies, the less I be loved—Love rather descends than ascends. (BENGEL.) Love him as a true friend who seeks your good more than your good will. 16. I did not burden you—The "I" in the Greek is emphatic. A possible insinuation of the Corinthians is hereby anticipated and refuted: "But, you may say, granted that I did not burden you myself; nevertheless, being crafty, I caught you (in my net) with guile:" viz., made a gain of you by means of others (1 Thessalonians, 2. 3). 17. Paul's reply: You know well I did not. My associates were as disinterested as myself. An important rule to all who would influence others for good. 18. I desired Titus—viz., to go unto you. Not the mission mentioned ch. 8. 6, 17, 22; but a mission previous to this epistle, probably that from which he had just returned announcing to Paul their penitence (ch. 7. 6, &c.). a brother—rather "our (lit., the) brother;" one well known to the Corinthians, and perhaps a Corinthian; probably one of the two mentioned ch. 8. 18, 22. same spirit—inwardly, steps—outwardly. 19. CHAPTER XIII.

VER. 1-14. HE THREATENS A SEVERE PROOF OF HIS APOSTOLIC AUTHORITY, BUT PREFERS THAT HE WOULD SPARE HIM THE NECESSITY FOR IT. 1. This is the third time I am coming to you—not merely preparing to come to you. This proves an intermediate visit between the two recorded in Acts, 18. 1, &c.; 20. 2. In the month of two or three visitations shall every word be established—Quoted from Deuteronomy, 19. 15, LXX. "I will judge you without examination, nor will I abstain from punishing upon due evidence." [CONYBEARE & HOWSON.] I will no longer be among you "in all patience" towards offenders (ch. 12. 12). The apostle in this case, where ordinary testimony was to be had, does not look for an immediate revelation, nor does he order the culprits to be cast out of the church before his arrival. Others understand the "two or three visitations" to mean his two or three visits as establishing either (1.) the truth of the facts alleged against the offenders, or (2.) the reality of his threats. I prefer the first explanation to either of the two latter. 2. Rather, "I have already said (at my second visit), and tell you (now) beforehand, as I did) WHEN I WAS PRESENT THE SECOND TIME, SO ALSO NOW IN MY ABSENCE (the oldest MSS. omit the 'I write,' which here wrongly follows in English Version Greek text) to them which heretofore have sinned (viz., before my second visit, ch. 12. 21), and to all others" (who have sinned since my second visit, or are in danger of sinning), &c. The English Version, "as if I were present the second time, viz., this next time, is quite inconsistent with c. 1. "this is the third time I am coming to you," as Paul could not have called the same journey at once "the second" and "the third time" of his coming. The antithesis between "the second time" and "now" is

I come again, &c.—i.e., whenever I come, 29. 2. These were probably the very former threat which he now repeats again. A reason why he will not spare: Since ye are to give a "proof" that Christ speaks in and is better if ye would "prove your own self." This disproves the assertion of some who nowhere asserts the infallibility of its own writing it, which—"who" (Christ), in relation to you, by me and in this very exercising upon you strong discipline. He has given many proofs of His power in and even in punishing offenders (ch. 5. 11, and no need to put me to the proof in this, Christ has exhibited great proofs of His power among you (ch. 12. 12). [GREGORY.] It is not me, but Christ, whom ye wrong: it is that ye try in despising my admonitions, coming from my authority. [CALVIN.] 4. I fitted in some of the oldest MSS.; then For He was even crucified, &c. through weak, "from weakness," i.e., His assumption of weakness was the source, or necessary condition, the possibility of His crucifixion flowed from it, 14; Philippians, 2. 7, 8. by—Greek, "wing to," the power of God—the Father 4; 6. 4; Ephesians, 1. 20. weak in him—i.e., our union with Him, and after His passion predominates in us for a time (exhibited infirmities) and weak "bodily presence," ch. 10; and also in our not putting into exercise our power of punishing offenders, just for a time kept in abeyance His power), we shun him—not only hereafter with Him, free exercise infirmities, in the resurrection life (ch. 2. 21), but presently in the exercise of our authority against offenders, which flows to it to you from the power of God, however now seem to you. "With Him," i.e., even exercises His power in His glorified resurrection after His weakness for a time. 5. Examine yourselves (make trial of yourselves.) prove your own self: This should be your first aim, rather than proof of Christ speaking in me" (v. 3). your self need not speak much in proof of Christ, your minister (v. 3), for if ye try your own self ye will see that Christ is also in you (v. 3). [ROMANS, 8. 10.] Finding Christ yourselves by faith, ye may well believe what He says in me, by whose ministry ye have received. [ESTIUS.] To doubt it would be the same as, after so many miracles and exhibitions of God's presence, still cried (Exodus, 17. 7) "The Lord among us or not" (cf. Mark, 8. 11)? reprobrates—The Greek softens the expression reprobrates, i.e., not abiding the same word in the context); a tested. Image from metals (Jeremiah, 1. 6. 27; Romans, 1. 23). 6. we...not reprobatable to abide the "proof" to which ye put I trust that your own Christianity will be your own (observe, "ye shall know," answers our own selves, "v. 6) as sufficient "proof" not reprobrates, but that "Christ speaks in me," without needing a proof from me more trying to yourselves. If ye doubt my apostleship, ye must doubt your own Christianity, for ye are the fruits of my apostleship. 7. I pray—The oldest MSS. read, "we pray," not that we should appear approved—not to gain credit for ourselves, your ministers, by your Christian conduct; but for your good. [ALFORD.] The antithesis to "reprobrates" leads me to prefer explaining with BENNETT, "We do not pray that we may appear approved," by restraining you when ye do evil; "but that ye should do what is right" (English Version, "honest?"), though we be as reprobrates—though we be thereby deprived of the occasion for exercising our apostolic power (viz., in punishing), and so may appear "as reprobrates" (incapable of affording proof of Christ speaking in us). 8. Our apostolic power is given us that we may use it not against, but for the furtherance of, the truth. Where you are free from fault, there is no scope for its exercise; and this I desire. Far be it from me to use it against the innocent, merely in order to increase my own power (v. 10). 9. are glad—Greek, "rejoice," when we are weak—having no occasion for displaying our power; and so seeming "weak," as being compassed with "infirmities" (ch. 10. 10; 11. 29, 30). ye...strong—"mighty" in faith and the fruits of the Spirit, and—Not in the oldest MSS. we wish—Greek, "pray for," your perfection—lit., "perfect restoration," lit., that of a dislocated limb. Cf. v. 11. "Be perfect," the same Greek word; also in 1 Corinthians, 1. 10, "perfectly joined together"; Ephesians, 4. 12, "the perfecting of the saints." 10. Therefore—Because I wish the "sharpness" to be in my letters rather than in deeds. [CHRYSOSTOM.] edification...not to destruction—for building up...not for casting down. To "use sharpness" would seem to be casting down, rather than building up; therefore he prefers not to have to use it. 11. farewell—meaning in Greek also "rejoice"; thus in bidding farewell he returns to the point with which he set out, "we are helpers of your joy" (ch. 1. 21; Philippians, 4. 4). Be perfect—Become perfect by filling up what is lacking in your Christian character (Ephesians, 4. 13). be of good comfort—(ch. 1. 6; 7. 8-13; 1 Thessalonians, 4. 18.) 14. The benediction which proves the doctrine of the Divine Trinity in unity. "The grace of Christ" comes first, for it is only by it we come to "the love of God" the Father (John, 14. 6). The variety in the order of Persons proves that "in this Trinity none is afore or after other." [ATHANAS, CREED.] communion—joint fellowship, or participation, in the same Holy Ghost, which joins in one Catholic Church, His temple, both Jews and Gentiles. Whoever has "the fellowship of the Holy Ghost," has also "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," and "the love of God;" and vice versa. For the three are inseparable, as the three Persons of the Trinity itself. [CHRYSOSTOM.] The doctrine of the Trinity was not revealed clearly and fully till Christ came, and the whole scheme of our redemption was manifested in Him, and we know the Holy Three in One more in their relations to us (as set forth summarily in this benediction), than in their mutual relations to one another (Deuteronomy, 29. 29). Amen—Omitted in the oldest MSS. Probably added subsequently for the exigencies of public joint worship.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE GALATIANS.
INTRODUCTION.

THE internal and external evidence for St. Paul's authorship is conclusive. The style is characteristically Pauline. The superscription, and allusions to the apostle of the Gentiles in the first person, throughout the epistle, establish the main truth (ch. 1. 1, 13-24; 2. 1-14). His authorship is also upheld by the unanimous testimony of the ancient church, cf. Irenaeus adversus Haereses, 3. 7. 2 (Galatians, 3. 19); Polycarp (Philippians, ch. 2) quotes Galatians, 4. 22, and 6. 7; Justin Martyr, or whoever wrote the Oratio ad Graecos, alludes to Galatians, 4. 12, and 4. 22.

The epistle was written "TO THE CHURCHES OF GALATIA" (ch. 1. 2, a district of Asia Minor, bordering on Phrygia, Pontus, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Paphlagonia. The inhabitants Gallo-graeci, contracted into Galati, another form of the name Kelts) were Gauls in origin, the latter having overrun Asia Minor, after they had pillaged Delphi, about B.C. 280, and at last permanently settled in the central parts, thence called Gallograeci or Galatia. Their character, as shown in this epistle, is in entire consonance with that ascribed to all written. Cesar, B. G., 4. 5, "The infirmity of the Gauls is that they are fickle in their resolves and fond of change, and not to be trusted." So Thierry [quoted by Aiford], "Frank, impetuous, impatient, eminently intelligent, but at the same time extremely changeable, inconstant, fond of show, perpetually quarrelling, the fruit of excessive vanity." They received St. Paul at first with all joy and kindness; but soon wavered in their allegiance to the gospel and to him, and barked as eagerly now to Judaizing teachers, as they had before to him (ch. 4. 14-18). The apostle himself had been the first preacher among them (Acts, 16. 6; Galatians, 1. 8; 4. 13 see Notes; "on account of infirmity of flesh I preached unto you at the first;" implying that sickness detained him among them, 19); and had then probably founded churches, which at his subsequent visit he "strengthened" in the faith (Acts, 18. 23). His first visit was about A. D. 51, during his second missionary journey. Josephus, Antiquities, 18. 62, testifies that many Jews resided in Anagyrus in Galatia. Among these and their brethren, doubtless, as elsewhere, he began his preaching. And though subsequently the majority in the Galatian churches were Gentiles (ch. 4. 5, 9), yet these were soon infected by Judaizing teachers, and almost suffered themselves to be persuaded to undergo circumcision (ch. 1. 6; 2. 1, 3; 5. 2, 3; 6. 12, 13). Accustomed as the Galatians had been, when heathen, to the mystic worship of Cybele (prevalent in the neighbouring region of Phrygia), and the theosophic doctrines connected with that worship, they were the more ready to believe that the full privileges of Christianity could only be attained through an elaborate system of ceremonial symbolism (ch. 4. 9-11; 5. 7-12). They even gave ear to the insinuation that Paul himself observed the law among the Jews, though he persuaded the Gentiles to renounce it, and that his motive was to keep his converts in a subordinate state, excluded from the full privileges of Christianity, which were enjoyed by the circumcised alone. Ch. 5. 11; 4. 16, cf. with 2. 17; and that in "becoming all things to all men," he was an interested flatterer (ch. 1. 10), aiming at forming a party for himself; moreover, that he falsely represented himself as an apostle divinely commissioned by Christ, whereas he was but a messenger sent by the Twelve and the church at Jerusalem, and that his teaching was now at variance with that of St. Peter and James, "pillars" of the church, and therefore ought not to be accepted.

HIS PURPOSE, then, in writing this epistle was (1.) to defend his apostolic authority (ch. 1. 11-19; 2. 1-14); (2.) to counteract the evil influence of the Judaizers in Galatia (ch. 3. and 4.), and to show that their doctrine destroyed the very essence of Christianity, by lowering its spirituality to an outward ceremonial system; (3.) to give exhortation for the strengthening of Galatian believers in faith towards Christ, and in the fruits of the Spirit (ch. 5. and 6.). He had already, first to Laod, testified against the Judaizing teachers (ch. 1. 9; 4. 16; Acts, 18. 23); and now that he has heard of the continued and increasing prevalence of the evil, he writes with his own hand (ch. 6. 11) a labour which he usually delegated to an amanuensis for this epistle to oppose it. The sketch he gives in it of his apostolic career confirms and expands the account in Acts, and shows his independence of human authority, however exalted. His protest against Peter in ch. 2. 14-21. 4. 2; notes the figment, not merely of papal, but even of that apostle's supremacy; and shows that Peter, save when specially inspired, was fallible like other men.

There is much in common between this epistle and that to the Romans on the subject of justification by faith only, and not by the law. But the epistle to the Romans handles the subject in a didactic and logical mode, without any special reference; this epistle, in a controversial manner, and with special reference to the Judaizers in Galatia.

THE STYLE combines the two extremes, sternness (ch. 1.; 2. 1-6) and tenderness (ch. 4. 19, 20), the characteristics of a man of strong emotions, and both alike well suited for acting on an impressionable people such as the Galatians were. The language is abrupt, as was suited to the urgency of the question and the greatness of the danger. A tone of sadness, too, is apparent, such as might be expected in the letter of a warm-hearted teacher who had just learned, that those whom he loved, were forsaking his teachings for those of perverters of the truth, as well as giving ear to calumnies against himself.

THE TIME OF WRITING was after the visit to Jerusalem recorded in Acts, 15. 1, &c., &c., A. D. 50, if that visit be, as some profess, identical with that in ch. 2. 1, &c. Further, as ch. 1. 9 ("as we said before"), and 4. 16 ("I have [Aiford] become your enemy" &c., at my second visit, whereas I was welcomed by you at my first visit), refer to his second visit (Acts, 18. 23), this epistle must have been written after the date of that visit (the autumn of A. D. 54). Ch. 4. 12, "Ye know how...I preached, at the first" (Greek, "at the former time"), implies that Paul, at the time of writing, had been twice in Galatia; and ch. 1. 6, "I marvel that ye are so soon removed," implies that he wrote not long after having left Galatia for the second time; probably in the early part of his residence at Ephesus (Acts, 18. 23; 19. 1, &c., from A. D. 54, the autumn, to A. D. 57, Pentecost). [Aiford] Compares & Howson, from the similarity between this epistle and that to the Romans, the same line of argument in both occupying the writer's mind, think it was not written till his stay at Corinth (Acts, 20. 2, 3), during the winter of 57-8, whence he wrote his epistle to the Romans; and certainly, in the theory of the earlier writing of it from Ephesus, it does seem unlikely that the two epistles to the Corinthians so dissimilar, should intervene between those so similar as the epistles to the Galatians and Romans; or that the epistle to the Galatians should intervene between the second to the Thessalonians and the first to the Corinthians. The decision between the two theories rests on the words, "so soon." If these be not considered inconsistent with little more than three years having elapsed since his second visit to Galatia, the argument, from the similarity to the epistle to the Romans, seems to me conclusive. Thus so the Galatians seems written on the urgency of the occasion, tidings having reached him at Corinth from Ephesus of g of many of his Galatian converts, in an admulatory and controversial tone, to maintain the great principles of liberty and justification by faith only; that to the Romans is a more deliberate and systematic exposition of the truths of theology, subsequently drawn up in writing to a church with which he was personally unacquainted. I. 6, for Birks' view. Paley (Horæ Paulinæ) well remarks how perfectly adapted the conduct of the argument is to the circumstances under which the epistle was written. Thus, that to the Galatians, a church which Paul had visited mainly upon authority; that to the Romans, to whom he was not personally known, entirely upon argument.

CHAPTER I.

SUPERScription. GREETINGS. THE HIS WRITING IS THEIR SPEEDY FALLING IN THE GOSPEL HE TAUGHT. DEFENCE OF HIS APOSTOLIC CALL INDEPENDENT Judaizing teachers had persuaded the Galatians that St. Paul had taught them the new doctrine, and at second hand; that the founder of the church himself possessed only a deputed commission, and authority being in Jerusalem; moreover, that whatever he said among them, he had himself at other places, given way to the doctrine. To refute this, he appeals to the fact of his conversion, and to the manner of his visit to the apostles when he met them at Jerusalem, so far was his doctrine from being derived from them, or they from exclaiming any superiority that they had simply assented to what he preached among the Gentiles, which he preached, not by them to him, but by him. [PALEY.] Such an apologetic epistle is a later forgery, the objections which it brings out incidentally, not being obtruded but by a forger; and also being such as arise in the earliest age of the church. ALIAS and Judaism still held a prominent position—in the earliest epistles, the two to the Romans, through humility, he uses no title; but associates with him "Silvanus and Timothy"; yet here, though "brethren" (v. 2) are used, he does not name them, but puts his own apostleship prominent; evidently because his commission needs now to be vindicated from the charge of being a forgery. FROM Expressing from which his mission came, "not from men, but from Christ and the Father (understood) as God." BY expresses the immediate operating cause. Not only was the call from God as source, but by Christ and the Father as the agent in calling him (Acts, 22. 15, and 26. 18); laying on of Ananias' hands (Acts, 9. 17) is a sign to this; for that was but a sign of the fact, the true cause. So the Holy Ghost calls him (Acts, 13. 2, 3): he was an apostle before this mission. MAN—SINGULAR to mark the contrast with "Christ." The opposition between "Christ" and "His name" being put in closest connection with God the Father, imply His Godhead. THE DEAD—implying that, though he had died in His humiliation as the other apostles made an objection against him, he had been constituted an apostle by Him in His power (Matthew, 28. 18; Romans, 1. 4, 5). TO THE ASCENSION, the consequence of the death, and the cause of His giving "apostles," (Acts, 1. 11). He rose again, too, for our justification (Acts, 4. 25); thus St. Paul prepares the way for the subject of the epistle, justification in the law. 2. all the brethren—I am not a doctrine; all my colleagues in the gospeling with me (Acts, 19. 29, Galus and at Ephesus; Acts, 20. 4, Sopater, Secundus, Tychicus, Trophimus, some, or all of with me. Not that these were joint authors of the epistle; but joined him in the salutations. The phrase, "all the

brethren," accords with a date when he had many travelling companions, he and they having to bear jointly the collection to Jerusalem. [CONYBEARE & HOWSON.] the churches—Pessinus and Ancyra were the principal cities; but doubtless there were many other churches in Galatia (Acts, 18. 23; 1 Corinthians, 16. 1). He does not attach any honourable title to the churches here, as elsewhere, being displeased at their Judaizing. See 1 Corinthians; 1 Thessalonians, &c. The first epistle of Peter is addressed to Jewish Christians sojourning in Galatia (1 Peter, 1. 1), among other places mentioned. It is interesting thus to find the apostle of the circumcision, as well as the apostle of the uncircumcision, once at issue (ch. 2. 7-10), co-operating to build up the same churches. 3. from—from—Omit the second "from." The Greek joins God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ in closest union, by there being but the one preposition. 4. gave himself—(ch. 2. 20)—unto death, as an offering. Found only in this and the Pastoral Epistles. The Greek is different in Ephesians, 5. 25 (Note). for our sakes—which enlivened us to the present evil world. deliver us from this—Greek, "out of the," &c. The Father and Son are each said to "deliver us," &c. (Colossians, 1. 13); but the Son, not the Father, "gave Himself for us" in order to do so, and make us citizens of a better world (Philippians, 3. 20). The Galatians in desiring to return to legal bondage are, he implies, renouncing the deliverance which Christ wrought for us. This he more fully repeats, ch. 3. 13. "Deliver" is the very word used by the Lord as to His deliverance of Paul himself (Acts, 26. 17): an undesignated coincidence between St. Paul and Luke. word—Greek, "age: systems or course of the world, regarded from a religious point of view. The present age opposes the "glory" (v. 6) of God, and is under the authority of the Evil one. The "ages of ages" (Greek, v. 6) are opposed to "the present evil age," according to the will of God and the Father—Greek, "Of Him who is at once God (the sovereign Creator) and our Father" (John, 4. 38, 39; 10. 18, end). Without merit of ours. His sovereignty as "God," and our filial relation to Him as "OUR FATHER," ought to keep us from blending our own legal notions (as the Galatians were doing) with His will and plan. This paves the way for his argument. 5. be glory—rather, as Greek, "Be the glory;" the glory which is peculiarly and exclusively His. Cf. Ephesians, 3. 21, Note. 6. Without the usual expressions of thanksgiving for their faith, &c., he vehemently plunges into his subject, zealous for "the glory" of God (v. 6), which was being disparaged by the Galatians falling away from the pure gospel of the "grace" of God. I marvel—implying that he had hoped better things from them, whence his sorrowful surprise at their turning out so different from his expectations. so soon—after my last visit; when I hoped and thought you were untainted by the Judaizing teachers. If this epistle was written from Corinth, the interval would be a little more than three years, which would be "soon" to have fallen away, if they were apparently sound at the time of his visit. Ch. 4. 18, 20, may imply that he saw no symptom of unsoundness then, such as he hears of in them now. But English Version is probably not correct there. See Note, also see Introduction. If from Ephesus, the interval would be not more than one year. BIRKS holds the epistle to have been written from Corinth after his first visit to seducers from without, with whom the chief guilt lay; and the present, "Ye are being removed," implies that their seduction was only in process of being effected, not that it was actually effected. WAHL, ALFORD, &c., take the Greek as middle voice. "Ye are removing" or "passing over." "Shifting your ground." [CONYBEARE & HOWSON.] But thus the point of St. Paul's oblique reference to their misleaders is lost; and in Hebrews, 7. 12, the Greek is used passively, justifying its being taken so here. On the impulsiveness and fickleness of the Gauls, whence the Galatians sprang (another form of Kelts, the progenitors of the Erse, Gauls, Cynri, and Belgians), see Introduction and Cesar, B. G., 3. 19. from him that called you—God the Father (v. 15; ch. 5. 8; Romans, 8. 30; 1 Corinthians, 1. 9; 1 Thessalonians, 2. 12; 5. 94). into—rather, as Greek, "is the grace of Christ," as the element in which, and the instrument by which, God calls us to salvation. Cf. Note, 1 Corinthians, 7. 16; Romans, 5. 15. "the gift by Greek, 'in' grace (Greek, 'the grace') of (the) one man." "The grace of Christ," is Christ's gratuitously purchased and bestowed justification, reconciliation, and eternal life. another—rather, as Greek, "a second and different gospel," i. e., into a so-called gospel, different altogether from the only true gospel. 7. another—A distinct Greek word from that in v. 6. Though I called it a gospel (v. 6), it is not really so. There is really but one gospel, and no other gospel, but—translate." Only that there are some that trouble you," &c. (ch. 5. 10, 12). All I meant by the "different gospel" was nothing but a perversion by "some" of the one gospel of Christ. would pervert—Greek, "wish to pervert:" they could not really pervert the gospel, though they could pervert gospel professors (cf. ch. 4. 9, 17, 21; 6. 12, 13; Colossians, 2. 18). Though acknowledging Christ, they insisted on circumcision and Jewish ordinances, and professed to rest on the authority of other apostles, viz., Peter and James. But Paul recognises no gospel, save the pure gospel. 8. This is the same visit to Jerusalem as in Acts, 9, 26, and at this visit occurred the vision (Acts, 22, 17, 18). The incident which led to his leaving Damascus (Acts, 9, 25; 2 Corinthians, 11, 33) was not the main cause of his going to Jerusalem. So that there is no discrepancy in the statement here that he went "to see Peter," or rather, as Greek, "to make the acquaintance of," "to become personally acquainted with." The two oldest MSS. read, "Cephas," the name given Peter elsewhere in the epistle, the Hebrew name; as Peter is the Greek (John, 1, 42). Appropriate to the view of him here as the apostle especially of the Hebrews. It is remarkable that Peter himself, in his epistles, uses the Greek name Peter, perhaps to mark his antagonism to the Judaizers who would cling to the Hebrew form. He was prominent among the apostles, though James, as bishop of Jerusalem, had the chief authority there (Matthew, 16, 18). fifteen days—only fifteen days; contrasting with the long period of three years, during which, previously, he had exercised an independent commission in preaching: a fact proving on the face of it, how little he owed to Peter in regard to his apostolical authority or instruction. The Greek for "to see," at the same time implies, visiting a person important to know, such as Peter was. The plots of the Jews prevented him staying longer (Acts, 9, 29). Also, the vision directing him to depart to the Gentiles, for that the people of Jerusalem would not receive his testimony (Acts, 22, 17, 18). abide—or "tarried." [ELLCOTT, &c.] 19. Cf. Acts, 9, 27, 28, wherein Luke, as an historian, describes more generally what St. Paul, the subject of the history, himself details more particularly. The history speaks of "apostles;" and St. Paul's mention of a second apostle besides Peter, reconciles the epistle and the history. At Stephen's martyrdom, and the consequent persecution, the other ten apostles, agreeably to Christ's directions, seem to have soon (though not immediately, Acts, 8, 14), left Jerusalem to preach elsewhere. James remained in charge of the mother church, as its bishop. Peter, the apostle of the circumcision, was present during Paul's fifteen days' stay; but he, too, presently after (Acts, 9, 32), went on a circuit through Judea. James, the Lord's brother—This designation, to distinguish him from James the son of Zebedee, was appropriate whilst that apostle was alive. But before St. Paul's second visit to Jerusalem (ch. 2, 1; Acts, 15, 1), he had been beheaded by Herod (Acts, 12, 2). Accordingly in the subsequent mention of James here (ch. 2, 9, 12), he is not designated by this distinctive epithet: a minute, undesigned coincidence, and proof of genuineness. James was the Lord's brother, not in our strict sense, but in the sense, "cousin," or "kinsman" (Matthew, 23, 10; John, 20, 17). His "brethren" are never called "sons of Joseph," which they would have been, had they been the Lord's brothers strictly. However, cf. Psalm 69, 8, "I am an alien to my mother's children." In John, 7, 3, 5, the "brethren" who believed not in Him, may mean His near relations, not including the two of His brethren, i.e., relatives (James and Jude) who were among the twelve apostles. Acts, 1, 14. "His brethren," refer to Simon and James, and others (Matthew, 13, 55) of His kinsmen, who were not apostles. It is not likely there would be two pairs of brothers named alike, of such eminence as James and Jude; the likelihood is that the apostles, James and Jude, are also the writers of the epistles, and the brethren of Jesus. James and James, were sons of Alphaeus and Mary.

sister of the Virgin Mary. 20. Solemn avowal that his statement is true that his visit was but for fifteen days, and that he saw no apostle save Peter and James. Probably it had been reported by Judaizers that he had received a long course of instructions from the apostles in Jerusalem from the first; hence his earnestness in asserting the contrary facts. 21. I came into... Syria and Cilicia — "preaching the faith" (v. 23), and so, no doubt, founding the churches in Syria and Cilicia, which he subsequently confirmed in the faith (Acts, 15, 23, 41). He probably went first to Caesarea, the main seaport, and thence by sea to Tarsus of Cilicia, his native place (Acts, 9, 30), and thence to Syria; Cilicia having its geographical affinities with Syria, rather than with Asia Minor, as the Tarsus mountains separate it from the latter. His placing "Syria" in the order of words before "Cilicia," is due to Antioch being a more important city than Tarsus, as also to his longer stay in the former city. Also "Syria and Cilicia," from their close geographical connexion, became a generic geographical phrase, the more important district being placed first. [CONYBEARE & HOWSON.] This sea journey accounts for his being "unknown by face to the churches of Judea" (v. 22). He passes by in silence his second visit, with aims, to Judea and Jerusalem (Acts, 11, 30); doubtless because it was for a limited and special object, and would occupy but a few days (Acts, 12, 25), as there raged at Jerusalem at the time a persecution in which James, the brother of John, was martyred, and Peter was in prison, and James seems to have been the only apostle present (Acts, 12, 17); so it was needless to mention this visit, seeing that he could not at such a time have received the instruction which the Galatians alleged he had derived from the primary fountains of authority, the apostles. 22. So far was I from being a disciple of the apostles, that I was even unknown in the churches of Judea (excepting Jerusalem, Acts, 9, 26-29), which were the chief scene of their labours. 23. Translate as Greek, "They were hearing;" tidings were brought them from time to time. [CONYBEARE & HOWSON.] he which persecuted us in times past—"our former persecutor." [ALFORD.] The designation by which he was known among Christians still better than by his name "Saul," destroyed—Greek, "was destroying." 24. in me—"in my case." "Having understood the entire change, and that the former wolf is now acting the shepherd's part, they received occasion for joyful thanksgiving to God in respect to me." [THEODORET.] How different, he implies to the Galatians, their spirit from yours.

Ver. 1-21. HIS CO-ORDINATE AUTHORITY AS APOSTLE OF THE CIRCUMCISION RECOGNIZED BY THE APOSTLES. (A.D. 50), when the council of the apostles and church decided that Gentile Christians need not be circumcised. His omitting allusion to that decree is, (1.) because his design here is to show the Galatians his own independent apostolic authority, whence he was not likely to support himself by their decision. Thus we see that general councils are not above apostles. (2.) Because he argues the point upon principle, not authoritative decisions. (3.) The decree did not go the length of the position maintained here: the council did not impose Mosaic ordinances; the apostle maintains, the Mosaic institution itself is at an end. (4.) The Galatians were Judaizing, not because the Jewish law was imposed by authority of the church as necessary to Christianity, but because they thought it necessary to be observed by those who aspired to higher perfection (ch. 3, 3; 4, 21). The decree would not at all disprove their view, and therefore would have been useless to quote. St. Paul meets them by a far more direct confutation. "Christ is of no effect unto you whosoever are justified by the law" (ch. 5, 4). [PALEY.] Titus...also—Specified on account of what follows as to him, in v. 3. Paul and Barnabas, and others, were deputed by the church of Antioch (Acts, 15, 2) to consult the apostles and elders at Jerusalem on the question of circumcision of Gentile Christians. 2. by revelation—Not from being absolutely dependent on the apostles at Jerusalem, but by independent Divine "revelation." Quite consistent with his at the same time, being a deputy from the church of Antioch, as Acts, 15, 2, states. He by this revelation was led to suggest the sending of the deputation. Cf. the case of Peter being led by vision, and at the same time by Cornelius' messengers, to go to Caesarea, Acts, 10. I...communicated unto them—viz., to the apostles and elders" (Acts, 15, 2); to the apostles in particular (v. 9), privately—that he and the apostles at Jerusalem might decide previously on the principles to be adopted and set forward before the public council (Acts, 15, 1). It was necessary that the Jerusalem apostles should know beforehand that the gospel Paul preached to the Gentiles was the same as theirs, and had received Divine confirmation in the results it wrought on the Gentile converts. He and Barnabas related to the multitude, not the nature of the doctrine they preached as Paul did privately to the apostles; but only the miracles vouchsafed in proof of God's sanctioning their preaching to the Gentiles (Acts, 15, 12). to them...of reparation—James, Cephas, and John, and probably some of the "elders;" v. 6, "those who seemed to be somewhat," lest, &c.—lest I should be running, or have run, in vain? i.e., lest they might see that I am not running, and have not run, in vain. Paul does not himself fear lest he be running, or had run, in vain; but lest he should, if he gave them no explanation, seem so to them. His race was the swift-running proclamation of the gospel to the Gentiles (cf. "run," Margyn, for "Word...have free course," 2 Thessalonians, 3, 1). His running would have been in vain, had circumcision been necessary, since he did not require it of his converts. 3. But—So far were they from regarding me as running in vain, that "not even Titus who was with me, who was a Greek (and therefore uncircumcised), was compelled to be circumcised." So the Greek should be translated, The "false brethren," v. 4 ("certain of the sect of the Pharisees which believed," Acts, 15, 5), demanded his circumcision. The apostles, however, constrained by the firmness of Paul and Barnabas (v. 6), did not compel or insist on his being circumcised. Thus they virtually sanctioned Paul's course among the Gentiles, and admitted his independence as an apostle: the point he desires to set forth to the Galatians. Timothy, on the other hand, as being a proselyte of the gate, and son of a Jewish (Acts, 16, 1), he circumcised (Acts, 16, 3). Christianity did not interfere with Jewish usages, regarded merely as local ordinances, though no longer having their religious significance, in the case of Jews and proselytes, whilst the Jewish polity and temple still stood; after the overthrow of the latter, those usages naturally ceased. To have insisted on Jewish usages for Gentile converts, would have been to make them essential parts of Christianity. To have rudely violated them at first in the case of Jews, would have been inconsistent with that charity which (in matters indifferent) is made all things to all men, that by all means it may win some (1 Corinthians, 9, 22; cf. Romans, 14, 1-7, 13-23). Paul brought Titus about with him as a living example of the power of the gospel upon the uncircumcised heathen. 4. And that—i.e., id concerning Titus (viz., my not permitting circumcised) was not from contempt of circ, but "on account of the false brethren" 1, 24; who, had I yielded to the demand for of that I deemed circumcision necessary.

strict adherence to the law, and so was especially popular among the Jewish party, though he did not fall into their extremes; whereas Peter was somewhat estranged from them through his intercourse with the Gentile Christians. To each apostle was assigned the sphere best suited to his temperament: to St. James, who was tenacious of the law, the Jerusalem Jews; to Peter, who had opened the door to the Gentiles, but who was Judaically disposed, the Jews of the dispersion; to Paul, who, by the miraculous and overwhelming suddenness of his conversion, had the whole current of his early Jewish prejudices turned into an utterly opposite direction, the Gentiles. Not separately and individually, but collectively the apostles together represented Christ, the One Head, in the apostleship.

"Cephas" in the oldest MSS. Paul's withstanding Peter is the strongest proof that the former gives of the independence of his apostleship in relation to the other apostles, and upsets the Romish doctrine of St.
Peter's supremacy. The apostles were not always inspired; but were so always in writing the Scriptures.
If then the inspired men who wrote them were not invariably at other times infallible much less were the uninspired men who kept them. The Christian fathers may be trusted generally as witnesses to facts, but not implicitly followed in matters of opinion. come to Antioch—then the citadel of the Gentile church; where first the gospel was preached to idolatrous Gent les, and where the name "Christians" was first given (Acts, 11. 20, 26), and where Peter is said to have been subsequently bishop. The question at Antioch was not whether the Gentiles were admissible to the Christian covenant without becoming circumcised—that was the question settled at the Jerusalem council just before—but whether the Gentile Christians were to be admitted to social intercourse with the Jewish Christians without conforming to the Jewish institution. The Judaizers, soon after the council had passed the resolutions recognising the equal rights of the Gentile Christians, repaired to Antioch, the scene of the gathering in of the Gentiles (Acts, 11. 20-30), to witness, what to Jews would look so extraordinary, the receiving of men to communion of the church without circumcision.
Regarding the proceeding with prejudice, they explained away the force of the Jerusalem decision; and probably also desired to watch whether the Jewish Christians among the Gentiles violated the law, which that decision did not verbally sanction them in doing, though giving the Gentiles latitude (Acts, 15. 19). t₁ was not infallible, any more than Peter, was that the Jewish converts were still to observe Jewish ordinances, from which he had decided with the council the Gentiles should be free (Acts, 15, 19). NEANDER, however, may be right in thinking these self-styled delegates from James, were not really from him. Acts, 15, 24, favours this. "Certain from James," may mean merely that they came from the church at Jerusalem under James' bishopric. Still James' leanings were to legalism, and this gave him his influence with the Jewish party (Acts, 21, 18-26). eat with...Gentiles—as in Acts, 10, 10-20, 48, according to the command of the vision (Acts, 11, 3-17). Yet after all, this same Peter, through fear of man (Proverbs, 29, 25), was faithless to his own so distinctly avowed principles (Acts, 15, 7-11). We recognise the same old nature in him as led him, after faithfully witnessing for Christ, yet for a brief space, to deny him. "Ever the first to recognise, and the first to draw back from great truths." (ALFORD.) An undesigned coincidence between the gospels and the epistle in the consistency of character as portrayed in both. It is beautiful to see how early misunderstandings of Christians are lost in Christ. For in 2 Peter, 3, 15, Peter praises the very epistles of Paul which he knew contained his own condemnation. Though apart from one another, and differing in characteristics, the two apostles were one in Christ. withdraw—Greek, "began to withdraw," &c. This implies a gradual drawing back. "Separated," entire severance. 13. the other—Greek, "the rest." Jews—Jewish Christians. dissembled likewise—Greek, "Joined in hypocrisy," &c., in living as though the law were necessary to justification, through fear of man, though they knew from God their Christian liberty of eating with Gentiles, and had availed themselves of it already (Acts, 11, 2-17). The case was distinct from that in 1 Corinthians, chs. 8-10; Romans, 14. It was not a question of liberty, and of bearing with others' infirmities, but one affecting the essence of the gospel, whether the Gentiles are to be virtually "compelled to live as do the Jews," in order to be justified (e. 14). Barnabas also—"Even Barnabas:" one least likely to be led into such an error, being with Paul in first preaching to the idolatrous Gentiles: showing the power of bad example and numbers. In Antioch, the capital of Gentile Christianity, and the central point of Christian missions, the controversy first arose, and in the same spot it now broke out afresh; and here Paul had first to encounter the party that afterwards persecuted him in every scene of his labours (Acts, 15, 30-35). 14. walked not uprightly—lit., "straight:" "were not walking with straightforward steps." Cf. ch. 6, 16. truta of the gospel—which teaches that justification by legal works and observances is inconsistent with redemption by Christ. Paul alone here maintained the truth against Judaism, as afterwards against heathenism (2 Timothy, 4, 16, 17). Peter—"Cephas" in the oldest MSS. before...all—1 Timothy, 6, 20.) If thou, &c.—"If thou, although being a Jew (and therefore one who might seem to be more bound to the law than the Gentiles, lived habitually, without scruple and from conviction, Acts, 15, 10, 11), as a Gentile (freely eating of every food, and living in other respects also as if legal ordinances in no way justify, v. 12), and not as a Jew, how is it that (so the oldest MSS. read, for "why") thou art compelling (virtually, by thine example) the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?" (lit., to Judaize, i.e., to keep the ceremonial customs of the Jews: What had been formerly obedience to the law, is now mere Judaism). The high authority of Peter would constrain the Gentile Christians to regard Judaizing as necessary to all, since Jewish Christians could not consort with Gentile converts in communion without it. 15, 16. Connect these verses together, and read with most of the oldest MSS. "But" in the beginning of v. 16: "We (I and thou, Peter) by nature (not by proselfism), Jews, and not sinners as (Jewish language termed the Gentiles) from among the Gentiles, yet (lit., BUT) knowing that, &c., even we (resuming the 'we' of v. 15, 'we also,' as well as the Gentile sinners; casting away trust in the law), have believed," &c. not justified by the works of the law—as the GROUND of justification. "The works of the law" are those which have the law for their object—which are wrought to fulfil the law. (ALFORD.) but by—translate. "But only (in no other way save) through faith in Jesus Christ," as the MEAN and instrument of justification. Jesus Christ—in the second case, read with the oldest MSS., "Christ Jesus," the Messiahship coming into prominence in the case of Jewish believers, as "Jesus" does in the first case, referring to the general proposition, justified by the faith of Christ—i.e., by Christ, the object of faith, as the ground of our justification: for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified—He rests his argument on this as an axiom in theology, referring to Psalm 143, 2. "Moses and Jesus Christ; The law and the promise: Doing and believing; Works and faith; Wages and the gift: The curse and the blessing—are represented as diametrically opposed." (BROOK.) The moral law is, in respect to justification, more legal than the ceremonial, which was an elementary and preliminary gospel: So "Sinal" (ch. 4, 24), which is more famed for the Decalogue than for the ceremonial law, is made pre-eminently the type of legal bondage. Thus, justification by the law, whether the moral or ceremonial, is excluded (Romans, 3, 20). 17. Greek, "But if, seeking to be justified in (i.e., in believing union with) Christ (who has in the gospel theory fulfilled the law for us), we (you and I ourselves also were found in your and my former communion with Gentiles) sinners (such as from the Jewish stand-point that now we resume, we should be regarded, since we have cast aside the law, thus having put ourselves in the same category as the Gentiles, who, being without the law, are, in the Jewish view, 'sinners,' v. 15), is therefore Christ, the minister of sin?" (Are we to admit the conclusion, in this case inevitable, that Christ having failed to justify us by faith, so has become to us the minister of sin, by putting us in the position of "sinners," as the Judaic theory, if correct, would make us, along with all others who are "without the law," Romans, 2, 14; 1 Corinthians, 9, 21; and with whom, by eating with them, we have identified ourselves: The Christian mind revolts from so shocking a conclusion, and so, from the theory which would result in it. The whole sin lies, not with Christ, but with him who would necessitate such a blasphemous inference. By his false theory, though "seeking" from Christ, we have not "found" salvation (in contradiction to Christ's own words, Matthew, 7, 7), but "have been ourselves also (like the Gentiles) found" to be "sinners," by having entered into communion with Gentiles (v. 12). 18. Greek, "For if the things which I overthrow (by the faith of Christ), those very things I build up again (viz., legal righteousness, by subjecting myself to the law), I prove myself (lit., 'I commend myself'), a transgressor." Instead of commending yourself as you sought to do (v. 12, end), you merely commend yourself as a transgressor. The "I" is intended by Paul for Peter to take to himself, as it is his case, not Paul's own, that is described. A "transgressor" is another word for "sinner" (in v. 17, for "sin is the transgression of the law." You, Peter, by now asserting the law to be obligatory, are proving yourself a "sinner," or "transgressor," in your having set it aside by living as the Gentiles, and with them: Thus you are debarred by transgression from justification by the law, and you debar yourself from justification by Christ, since in your theory He becomes a minister of sin. 19. Here Paul seems to pass from his exact words to Peter, to the general purport of his argument on the question. However, his direct address atians seems not to be resumed till ch. 3, 1, b Galatians, " &c. For—But I am not a sinner" by forsaking the law. "For, &c. Prominent denial of the consequence that "Christ is the author of sin" (e. 17), and of the premises from which it follows. Christ, so far from being the author of sin and death, is the establisher of right and life. I am entirely in Him. [BENGL.] Iphatical. Paul himself, not Peter, as in the law, through the law—which was my "schooling me to Christ" (ch. 3, 24): both by its 3, 13; Romans, 3, 20 driving me to Christ, and by God's wrath against sin, and, when understood, teaching that itself is not per se but must give place to Christ whom it profits scope and end (Romans, 10, 4); and drawing Him by its promises (in the prophecies a part of the Old Testament law) of a better messiah, and of God's law written in the heart (Jer. 31, 33; Acts, 10, 43). The law—lit., "I died to the law," and so am, i. e., am passed from under its power, in non-justification or condemnation (Colossians, 2, 14; 7, 4, 6); just as a woman is bound and to a husband, ceases to be so when death interposes, and may be lawfully married to another husband. So by believing in Christ in His death, we, being considered as in Him, are severed from the law's past power (ch. 6, 14; 1 Corinthians, 7, 29; Romans, 6, 6-11; 24). live unto God—(Romans, 6, 11; 2 Corinthians, 4, 1, 2). "I am crucified—lit., seen crucified with Christ." This more particularly the foregoing, "I am dead" (e. 19; Philippians, 10). nevertheless I live; yet not I—Greek, miss I live, no longer indeed! "I" Though I live, (and this no longer that old man such was (cf. Romans, 7, 17). No longer Saul the king; Colossians, 3, 11, but "another man," cf. 10, 6). ELLICOTT, &c., translate, "And it is I that live, but Christ that liveth in me." Plain antithesis between "crucified" and "lives in me." "Nevertheless," the new life—as contrasted with my life before. In the flesh—my life seems to be a mere "in the flesh," but this is not my true life: the mask of life under which lives another, who is my true life. [LUTHER.] I live by &c.—Greek, "in faith (viz.), that of (i. e., son) the Son of God." "In faith," answers it to "in the flesh." Faith, not the flesh, is the element in which I live. The phrase, "the Son of God," reminds us that His divine Sonship is His life-giving power. loved me—His eternal love is the link that unites me to the Son and His "giving Himself for me," is the proof of that love. 21. I do not frustrate the law—I do not make it void, as thou, Peter, art doing, for—justifying the strong expression, "or 'make void,'" is dead in vain—Christ died needlessly," or "without just cause" having died, shows that the law has to justify us; for if the law can justify or acquit, the death of Christ is superfluous. [FOM.]

CHAPTER III.

B. REPROOF OF THE GALATIANS FOR LEAVING FAITH FOR LEGALISM. JUSTIFICATION VINDICATED: THE LAW SHOWN TO BE SUBJECT TO THE PROMISE: BELIEVERS ARE THE SEED OF ABRAHAM, WHO WAS JUSTIFIED BY FAITH. THE LAW WAS OUR SCHOOLMASTER TO BRING US TO CHRIST THAT WE MIGHT BECOME SONS OF GOD BY FAITH. 1. That ye should not be bewitched

—fascinated you so that you have lost your wits. Themistius says the Galatians were naturally very acute in intellect. Hence, St. Paul wonders they could be so misled in this case. yea—Emphatical. "You, before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been graphically set forth (lit., in writing, viz., by vivid portraiture in preaching) among you, crucified" (so the sense and Greek order require rather than English Version). As Christ was "crucified," so ye ought to have been by faith "crucified with Christ," and so "dead to the law" (ch. 2, 10, 20). Reference to the "eyes" is appropriate, as fascination was supposed to be exercised through the eyes. The sight of Christ crucified ought to have been enough to counteract all fascination. 2. "Was it by the works of the law that ye received the Spirit manifested by outward miracles, e. 8; Mark, 16, 17; Hebrews, 2, 4; and by Spiritual graces, e. 14; Galatians, 4, 5, 6; Ephesians, 1, 13, or by the hearing of faith?" The "only" implies, "I desire, omitting other arguments, to rest the question on this alone:" I who was your teacher, desire now to "learn" this one thing from you. The epithet "Holy" is not prefixed to "Spirit," because that epithet is a joyous one, whereas this epistle is stern and reproving. [BENGL.] hearing of faith—Faith consists not in working, but in receiving (Romans, 10, 16, 17). 3. begun—the Christian life (Philippians, 1, 6). In the spirit—Not merely was Christ crucified, "graphically set forth" in my preaching, but also "the Spirit" confirmed the word preached, by imparting His Spiritual gifts. "Having thus begun" with the receiving His Spiritual gifts, "are ye now being made perfect" (so the Greek), i. e., are ye seeking to be made perfect with fleshly ordinances of the law? [ESTIUS.] Cf. Romans, 2, 25; Philippians, 3, 3; Hebrews, 9, 10. Having begun in the Spirit, i. e., the Holy Spirit ruling your spiritual life as its "essence and active principle" [ELLICOTT], in contrast to "the flesh," the element in which the law works. [ALFORD.] Having begun your Christianity in the Spirit, i. e., in the Divine life that proceeds from faith, are ye seeking after something higher still (the perfecting of your Christianity) in the sensuous and the earthly, which cannot possibly elevate the inner life of the Spirit, viz., outward ceremonies. [NEANDER.] No doubt the Galatians thought that they were going more deeply into the Spirit: for the flesh may be easily mistaken for the Spirit, even by those who have made progress, unless they continue to maintain a pure faith. [BENGL.] 4. Have ye suffered so many things—viz., persecution from Jews and from unbelieving fellow-countrymen, incited by the Jews, at the time of your conversion. In vain—fruitlessly, needlessly; since ye might have avoided them by professing Judaism. [GROTIUS.] Or, shall ye, by falling from grace, lose the reward promised for all your sufferings, so that they shall be "in vain" (ch. 4, 11; 1 Corinthians, 15, 2, 17-19, 29-32; 2 Thessalonians, 1, 5-7; 2 John, 8) yet—rather, "If it be really or 'indeed' in vain." [ELLICOTT, &c.] "If, as it must be, what I have said, 'in vain,' is really the fact." [ALFORD.] I prefer understanding it as a mitigation of the preceding words. I hope better things of you, for I trust you will return from legalism to grace; if so, as I confidently expect, you will not have "suffered so many things in vain." [ESTIUS.] For "God has given you the Spirit, and has wrought mighty works among you" (e. 5; Hebrews, 10, 32-36). [BENGL.] 5. He...that ministereth—or "supplieth," God (2 Corinthians, 9, 10). He who supplied and supplies to Jews and the Spirit still, to the present time. These miracles do not prove grace to be in the heart (Mark, 9, 38, 39). He speaks of these miracles as a matter of unquestioned notoriety among those addressed: an undesigned proof of their genuineness (cf. 1 Corinthians, 12). worketh miracles among you—rather, "in you," as ch. 2, 8; Matthew, 14, 2; Ephesians, 2, 2; Philippians, 2, 13; at your conversion and since. [ALFORD] doeth he it by the works of the law—i. e., as a consequence resulting from (so the Greek) the works of the law (cf. v. 2). This cannot be, because the law was then unknown to you when you received those gifts of the Spirit. 6. The answer to the question in v. 5, is here taken for granted. It was by the hearing of faith: following this up, he says, "Even as Abraham believed," see (Genesis, 15, 4-6; Romans, 4, 3). God supplies unto you the Spirit as the result of faith, not works, just as Abraham obtained justification by faith, not by works (v. 6, 8, 16; ch. 4, 22, 26, 28). Where justification is, there the Spirit is, so that if the former comes by faith, the latter must also. 7. They which are of faith—as the source and starting-point of their spiritual life. The same phrase is in the Greek of Romans, 3, 26. the same—these, and these alone, to the exclusion of all the other descendants of Abraham. children—Greek, "sons" (v. 29). 8. And—Greek, "Moreover," forseeing—One great excellency of Scripture is, that in it all points liable ever to be controverted, are, with prescient wisdom, decided in the most appropriate language. would justify—rather, "justifieth." Present indicative. It is now, and at all times, God's one way of justification. the heathen—rather, "the Gentiles" or "the nations," as the same Greek is translated at the end of the verse. God justifieth the Jews, too, "by faith, not by works." But he specifies the Gentiles in particular here, as it was their case that was in question, the Galatians being Gentiles. preached before the gospel—"announced beforehand the gospel." For the "promise" was substantially the gospel by anticipation. Cl. John, 8, 56; Hebrews, 4, 2. A proof that "the old fathers did not look only for transitory promises" (Article VII., Church of England). Thus the gospel, in its essential germ, is older than the law, though the full development of the former is subsequent to the latter. In thee—not "in thy seed," which is a point not here raised; but strictly "in thee," as followers of thy faith, it having first shown the way to justification before God [ALFORD]; or "in thee," as Father of the promised seed, viz., Christ (v. 16), who is the Object of faith (Genesis, 22, 18; Psalm 72, 17), and imitating thy faith (see Note, v. 9). all nations—or as above, "all the Gentiles" (Genesis, 12, 3; 18, 18; 22, 18). be blessed—an act of grace, not something earned by works. The blessing of justification was to Abraham by faith in the promise, not by works. So to those who follow Abraham, the Father of the faithful, the blessing, i. e., justification, comes purely by faith in Him who is the subject of the promise. 9. they—and they alone. of faith—Note, v. 7, beginning, with—together with. faithful—Implying what it is in which they are "blessed together with him," viz., faith, the prominent feature of his character, and of which the result to all who like Him have it, is justification. 10. Confirmation of v. 9. They who depend on the works of the law cannot share the blessing, for they are under the curse "written," Deuteronomy, 27, 26. LXX. PERFECT obedience is required by the words, "in all things." CONTINUAL obedience by the word, "continueth." No man renders this obedience (cf. Romans, 3, 19, 20). It is observable, Paul quotes Scripture to the Jews who were conversant with it, as in epistle to the Hebrews, as said or spoken; but to the Gentiles, as written. So Matthew, writing for Jews, quotes it as said, or spoken; Mark and Luke, writing for Gentiles, as written (Matthew, 1, 22; Mark, 1, 2; Luke, 2, 22, 23). [TOWNSON.] 11. by the law—Greek, "in the law." Both in and by are included. The syllogism in this verse and v. 12, is, according to Scripture, The just shall live by faith. But the law is not of faith, but of doing, or works (see, does not make faith, but works, the conditional ground of justifying). Therefore "in," or "by the law, no man is justified before God" (whatever the case may be before men. Romans, 4, 5)—not even if he could, which he cannot, keep the law, because the Scripture element and conditional mean of justification is faith. The just shall live by faith—(Romans, 1, 17; Habakkuk, 2, 4.) Not as BENGEL & ALFORD, "He who is just by faith shall live." The Greek supports English Version. Also the contrast is between "live by faith" (viz., as the ground and source of his justification), and "live in them," viz., in his doings or works (v. 12, as the conditional element wherein he is justified. 12. doeth—Many depended on the law, although they did not keep it; but without doing, saith Paul, it is of no use to them (Romans, 2, 13, 17, 23; 10, 5, 13. Abrupt exclamation, as he breaks away impatiently from those who would involve us again in the curse of the law, by seeking justification in it, to "Christ," who "has redeemed us from its curse." The "us" refers primarily to the Jews, to whom the law principally appertained, in contrast to "the Gentiles" (v. 14; cf. ch. 4, 3, 8). But it is not restricted solely to the Jews, as ALFORD thinks; for these are the representative people of the world at large, and their "law" is the embodiment of what God requires of the whole world. The curse of its non-fulfilment affects the Gentiles through the Jews; for the law represents that righteousness which God requires of all, and which, since the Jews failed to fulfil, the Gentiles are equally unable to fulfil. Verse 10, "As many as are of the works of the law, are under the curse," refers plainly, not to the Jews only, but to all, even Gentiles (as the Galatians), who seek justification by the law. The Jews' law represents the universal law which condemned the Gentiles, though with less clear consciousness on their part (Romans, 2). The revelation of God's "wrath" by the law of conscience, in some degree prepared the Gentiles for appreciating redemption through Christ when revealed. The curse had to be removed from off the heathen, too, as well as the Jews, in order that the blessing, through Abraham, might flow to them. Accordingly, the "we," in "that we might receive the promise of the Spirit," plainly refers to both Jews and Gentiles, redeemed us—bought us off from our former bondage (ch. 4, 5), and "from the curse" under which all lie who trust to the law and the works of the law for justification. The Gentile Galatians, by putting themselves under the law, were involving themselves in the curse from which Christ has redeemed the Jews primarily, and through them the Gentiles. The ransom-price He paid was His own precious blood (1 Peter, 1, 18, 19; cf. Matthew, 20, 28; Acts, 20, 28; 1 Corinthians, 6, 20; 7, 23; 1 Timothy, 2, 6; 2 Peter, 2, 1; Revelation, 5, 9). being made—Greek, "having become." a curse for us—Having become what we were, in our behalf, "a curse," that we might cease to be a curse. Not merely accursed (in the concrete), but a curse, in the abstract, bearing the universal curse of the whole human race. So 2 Corinthians, 5, 21, "Sin for us," not sinful, but bearing the whole sin of our race, regarded as one vast aggregate of sin. See Note there. "Anathema" means "set apart to God," to His glory, but to the person's own destruction. "Curse," an execration, writes—Deuteronomy, 21, 23. Christ's bearing the particular curse of hanging on the tree, is a sample of the general curse which He representatively bore. Not that the Jews put to death malefactors by hanging; but after having put them to death otherwise, in order to brand them with peculiar ignominy, they hung the bodies on a tree, and such malefactors were accursed by the law (cf. Acts, 5, 30; 10, 39). God's providence ordered it so that to fulfil the prophecy of the curse and other prophecies, Jesus should be crucified, and so hang on the tree, though that death was not a Jewish mode of execution. The Jews accordingly, in contempt, call Him "the hanged one," Tolai, and Christians, "worshippers of the hanged one," and make it their great objection that He died the accursed death. [TRYPHO, in Justin Martyr, p. 202;

1. 24.] Hung between heaven and earth as worthy of either." 14. The intent of "Christ a curse for us." "To the end that upon the blessing of Abraham (i.e., promised to, viz., justification by faith) might come in us" (cf. v. 8), that we might receive the promise Spirit—the promised Spirit (Joel, 2. 28, 29; 49). This clause follows not the clause immediately preceding (for our receiving the Spirit is not the blessing of Abraham coming on the but "Christ hath redeemed us," &c. through works. Here he resumes the thought in the Spirit from without, kindles within us something whereby we lay hold of Christ, and even of Himself, that He may dwell within us.)

J. 15. I speak after the manner of men—I illustrate from a merely human transaction lay occurrence, but a man's covenant—whose it is far less important to maintain, if it be when once it hath been ratified, no man can set it aside, not even the author much less any second party. None does so in common equity. Much less would the God do so. The law is here, by personification as a second person, distinct from, and it is, the promise of God. The promise is ever more peculiarly belongs to God. The law is as something extraneous, afterwards in-exceptional, and temporary (v. 17-19; 21-24). One addeth new conditions "making" the "of none effect" (v. 17). So legal Judaisme no alteration in the fundamental relation God and man, already established by the promise; it could not add as a new condition of the law, in which case the fulfilment of the promise would be attached to a condition for man to perform. The "covenant" here free grace, a promise afterwards carried into the gospel. 16. This verse is parenthetical. The promise was not "spoken" (so Greek) to Abraham alone, but "to Abraham and to the latter especially; and this means that which is inseparable from Him, the æ, and the spiritual, His body, the church). Having come when the law was given, the promise could not have been then fulfilled, but the coming of Him, the Seed, to whom it was promised—plural, because the same promise repeated (Genesis, 12. 3, 7; 15. 5, 18; 17. 7; 22. 18), as it involved many things: earthly blessings eternal children of Abraham in Canaan, and heavenly blessings to his spiritual children both promised to Christ, "the seed" and the Head of the literal and spiritual Israel the spiritual seed there is no distinction of seed; but to the literal seed, the promises still remain to be fulfilled (Romans, 11. 29). The promise was not made with "many" seeds (which if it had been, a pretext might exist for supposing one seed before the law, another under the law that those sprung from one seed, say the Jews admitted on different terms, and with a degree of acceptability, than those sprung from another seed), but with the one seed; therefore, that in Him "all families of the earth shall be blessed" (Genesis, 12. 3), joins in this one Seed, Jew and Gentile, as fellow-heirs on the same acceptability, viz., by grace through faith (Gal. 3. 13); not to some by promise, to others by works alike, circumcised and uncircumcised, but one seed in Christ (Romans, 4. 16), on the other hand, contemplates the Jews less as distinct seeds. God makes a covenant, not of promise; whereas the law is a covenant of works. Whereas the law brings in a mediator, a third party (v. 19, 20), God makes His covenant of promise with the one seed, Christ (Genesis, 17. 7), and embraces others only as they are identified with, and represented by, Christ, one... Christ—not in the exclusive sense, the man Christ Jesus, but "Christ" (Jesus is not added, which would limit the meaning), including His people who are part of Himself, the Second Adam, and Head of redeemed humanity. Verses 28, 29, prove this, "Ye are all one in Christ Jesus" (Jesus is added here as the person is indicated). And if ye be Christ's, ye are Abraham's seed, heirs according to the promise." 17. this I say—"this is what I mean," by what I said in v. 15, confirmed... of God—"ratified by God" (v. 15), in Christ—rather, "unto Christ" (cf. v. 16). However, Vulgate and the old Italian versions translate as English Version. But the oldest MSS. omit the words altogether, the law which was—Greek, "which came into existence 430 years after" (Exodus, 12. 40, 41). He does not, as in the case of "the covenant," add "enacted by God" (John, 1. 17). The dispensation of "the promise" began with the call of Abraham from Ur into Canaan, and ended on the last night of his grandson Jacob's sojourn in Canaan, the land of promise. The dispensation of the law, which engenders bondage, was beginning to draw on from the time of his entrance into Egypt, the land of bondage. It was to Christ in him, as in his grandfather Abraham, and his father Isaac, not to him or them as persons, the promise was spoken. On the day following the last repetition of the promise orally (Genesis, 46. 1-6), at Beersheba, Israel passed into Egypt. It is from the end, not from the beginning of the dispensation of promise, that the interval of 430 years between it and the law is to be counted. At Beersheba, after the covenant with Abimelech, Abraham called on the everlasting God, and the well was confirmed to him and his seed as an everlasting possession. Here God appeared to Isaac. Here Jacob received the promise of the blessing, for which God had called Abraham out of Ur, repeated for the last time, on the last night of his sojourn in the land of promise. cannot—Greek, "doth not disannul." make... of none effect—The promise would become so, if the power of conferring the inheritance be transferred from it to the law (Romans, 4. 14). 18. the inheritance—all the blessings to be inherited by Abraham's literal and spiritual children, according to the promise made to him and to his Seed, Christ, justification and glorification (ch. 4. 7; Romans, 8. 17; 1 Corinthians, 6. 9). but God, &c.—The Greek order requires rather, "But to Abraham it was by promise that God hath given it." The conclusion is, Therefore the inheritance is not of, or from, the law (Romans, 4. 14). 19. "Wherefore then serveth the law?" as it is of no avail for justification, is it either useless, or contrary to the covenant of God? [CALVIN.] added—to the original covenant of promise. This is not inconsistent with v. 15, "No man addeth thereto;" for there the kind of addition meant, and therefore denied, is one that would add new conditions, inconsistent with the grace of the covenant of promise. The law, though misunderstood by the Judaizers as doing so, was really added for a different purpose, viz., "because of (or as the Greek, 'for the sake of') the transgressions," i.e., to bring out into clearer view the transgressions of it (Romans, 7. 7-9); to make men more fully conscious of their sins, by being perceived as transgressions of the law, and so to make them long for the promised Saviour. This accords with v. 23, 24; Romans, 4. 15. The meaning can hardly be "to check transgressions," for the law rather stimulates the corrupt heart to disobey it (Romans, 5. 20; 7. 13). till the seed—during the period up to the time when the seed came. The law was a preparatory dispensation for the Jewish nation (Romans, 5. 20; Greek, "the law came in additionally and incidentally"), intervening between the promise and its fulfillment in Christ. come—(cf. "faith came," v. 23.) the promise—(Romans, 4, 21.) ordained—Greek, "constituted" or "disposed," by angels—as the instrumental enactors of the law. [ALFORD.] God delegated the law to angels as something rather alien to Him and severe (Acts, 7, 53; Hebrews, 2, 2, 3; cf. Deuteronomy, 33, 2, "He came with ten thousands of saints," i.e., angels, Psalm 68, 17). He reserved "the promise" to Himself, and dispensed it according to His own goodness, in the hand of a mediator—vis., Moses. Deuteronomy, 5, 5, "I stood between the Lord and you:" the very definition of a mediator. Hence the phrase often recurs, "By the hand of Moses." In the giving of the law, the "angels" were representatives of God, Moses, as mediator, represented the people. 20. "Now a mediator cannot be of one (but must be of two parties whom he mediates between); but God is one" (not two: owing to His essential unity not admitting of an intervening party between Him and those to be blessed; but as the ONE Sovereign, His own representative, giving the blessing directly by promise to Abraham, and, in its fulfillment, to Christ, "the Seed," without new conditions, and without a mediator such as the law had). The conclusion understood is, Therefore a mediator cannot appertain to God; and consequently, the law, with its inseparable appendage of a mediator, cannot be the normal way of dealing of God, the one, and unchangeable God, who dealt with Abraham by direct promise, as a sovereign, not as one forming a compact with another party, with conditions and a mediator attached thereto. God would bring man into immediate communion with Him, and not have man separated from Him by a mediator that keeps back from access, as Moses and the legal priesthood did (Exodus, 19, 12, 13, 17, 21-24; Hebrews, 12, 19-24). The law that thus interposed a mediator and conditions between man and God, was an exceptional state limited to the Jews, and parenthetically preparatory to the gospel, God's normal mode of dealing, as He dealt with Abraham, vis., face to face directly; by promise and grace, and not conditions; to all nations united by faith in the one seed (Ephesians, 2, 14, 16, 18), and not to one people to the exclusion and severance from the ONE common Father, of all other nations. It is no objection to this view, that the gospel, too, has a mediator (1 Timothy, 2, 5). For Jesus is not a mediator separating the two parties in the covenant of promise or grace, as Moses did, but ONE in both nature and office with both God and man (cf. "God in Christ," v. 17); representing the whole universal manhood (1 Corinthians, 15, 22, 45, 47), and also bearing in Him "all the fulness of the Godhead." Even His mediatorial office is to cease when its purpose of reconciling all things to God shall have been accomplished (1 Corinthians, 15, 24); and God's ONENESS (Zechariah, 14, 9), as "all in all," shall be fully manifested. Cf. John, 1, 17, where the two mediators—Moses, the severing mediator of legal conditions, and Jesus, the uniting mediator of grace—are contrasted. The Jews began their worship by reciting the Schemah, opening thus, "Jehovah our God is ONE Jehovah;" which words their Rabbis (as Jarchius) interpret as teaching not only the unity of God, but the future universality of His Kingdom on earth (Zephaniah, 3, 9). St. Paul (Romans, 3, 30) infers the same truth from the ONENESS of God (cf. Ephesians, 4, 4-6). He, as being ONE, unites all believers, without distinction, to Himself (e. g. 8, 16, 28; Ephesians, 1, 10; 2, 14; cf. Hebrews, 2, 11) in direct communion. The unity of God involves the unity of the people of God, and also His dealing directly without intervention of a mediator, 21. "Is the law (which involves a mediator) against the promises of God (which are without a mediator, and rest on God alone and immediately)? God forbid," lit.—The law, as an externally prescribed rule, can never internally impart spiritual life to men naturally dead in sin, and change the disposition. If the law had been a law capable of giving life," verity in very reality, and not in the mere fancy of legalists' righteousness would have been by the law" (for where life is, there righteousness, its condition, must also be). But the law does not pretend to give life, and therefore not righteousness; so there is no opposition between the law and the promise. Righteousness can only come through the promise to Abraham, and through its fulfillment in the gospel of grace. 22. But—as the law cannot give life or righteousness. [ALFORD.] Or the "But" means, So far is righteousness from being of the law, that the knowledge of sin is rather what comes of the law. [BENJEL.] the Scripture—which began to be written after the time of the promise, at the time when the law was given. The written letter was needed to set PERMANENTLY to convict man of disobedience to God's command. Therefore he says, "the Scripture," not the "Law." Cf. v. 8, "Scripture," for "the God of the Scripture" concluded—"shut up," under condemnation, as in a prison. Cf. Isaiah, 24, 22, "As prisoners gathered in the pit and shut up in the prison." Beautifully contrasted with "the liberty wherewith Christ makes free" which follows, e. 7, 9, 25, 26; ch. 5, 1; Isaiah, 61, 1, all—Greek neuter, "the universe of things;" the whole world, man, and all that appertains to him, under sin—(Romans, 3, 9, 19; 11, 32.) the promise—the inheritance promised (v. 18), by faith of Jesus Christ—i.e., which is by faith in Jesus Christ, might be given—The emphasis is on "given;" that it might be a free gift; not something earned by the works of the law (Romans, 4, 23), to them that believe—to them that have "the faith of (in) Jesus Christ" just spoken of. 23. faith—viz., that just mentioned (v. 22), of which Christ is the object. kept—Greek, "kept in ward;" the effect of the "shutting up" (v. 22; ch. 4, 2; Romans, 7, 6), into—with a view to the faith, &c. We were, in a manner, morally forced to it, so that there remained to us no refuge but faith. Cf. the phrase, Psalm 78, 56; Mark, 31, 8, which should afterwards, &c.—"which was afterwards to be revealed." 24. "So that the law hath been (i.e., hath turned out to be) our schoolmaster (or 'tutor,' lit., 'pedagogue'—this term, among the Greeks, meant a faithful servant intrusted with the care of the boy from childhood to puberty, to keep him from evil, physical and moral, and accompany him to his amusements and studies) to guide us unto Christ," with whom we are no longer "shut up" in bondage, but are freemen. "Children (lit., infants) need such tutoring (ch. 4, 3), might be—rather, "that we may be justified by faith;" which we could not be till Christ, the object of faith, had come. Meanwhile the law, by outwardly checking the sinful propensity which was constantly giving fresh proofs of its refractoriness—as thus the consciousness of the power of the sinful principle became more vivid, and hence the sense of need both of forgiveness of sin and freedom from its bondage was awakened—the law became a "schoolmaster to guide us unto Christ." [NEANDER.] The moral law shows us what we ought to do, and so we learn our inability to do it. In the ceremonial law we seek, by animal sacrifices, to answer for our not having done it, but find dead victims no satisfaction for the sins of living men, and that outward purifying will not cleanse the soul; and that therefore we need an infinitely better sacrifice, the antitype of all the legal sacrifices. Thus delivered up to the judicial law, we see how awful is the doom we deserve: thus the law at last leads us to Christ, with whom we find righteousness and peace. "Sin, sin!" is the word heard again and again in the Old Testament. Had it not there for centuries rung in the ear, and fastened on the conscience, the joyful sound, "grace for grace," would not have been the watchword of the New Testament. This was the end of the whole system of sacrifices."

ROLUCK.] 25. "But now that faith is come," &c., sees the lawgiver cannot bring us into the heavenly man, though he can bring us to the border of it. At a point he is superseded by Joshua, the type of us, who leads the true Israel into their inheritance. The law leads us to Christ, and there its office ceases. children—Greek, "sons," by—Greek, "through faith," is all (Jews and Gentiles alike) are no longer children requiring a tutor, but sons emancipated and living at liberty. 27. baptized into Christ—(Romans, 6) have put on Christ—ye did, in that very act of being baptized into Christ, put on, or clothe yourselves in, Christ; so the Greek expresses. Christ is to you toya virilis (the Roman garment of the full-grown man, assumed when ceasing to be a child). [BENGL.] FAKER defines a Christian, "One who has put on ist." The argument is, By baptism ye have put on ist; and therefore, He being the Son of God, ye come sons by adoption, by virtue of His Sonship by unction. This proves that baptism, where it answers to ist, is not a mere empty sign, but a means of actual transference from the state of legal condemnation to that of living union with Christ, and of sonship with Him in relation to God (Romans, 13. 14). ist alone can, by baptizing with His Spirit, make inward grace correspond to the outward sign. But He promises the blessing in the faithful use of the sign, the church has rightly presumed, in charity, in such is the case, nothing appearing to the contrary. There is in this sonship by faith in Christ, no class privileged above another, as the Jews under the law have been above the Gentiles (Romans, 10. 12; 1 Corinthians, 12. 13; Colossians, 3. 11). bond nor free—Christ is belongs to both by faith; whence he puts "bond nor free." Cf. Notes, 1 Corinthians, 7. 21, 22; Ephesians, 6. 8. neither male nor female—rather, as Greek, here is not male and female." There is no distinction of male and female. Difference of sex makes no difference in Christian privileges. But under the law male sex had great privileges. Males alone had in ir body circumcision, the sign of the covenant (and baptism applied to male and female alike); they were capable of being kings and priests, whereas of either sex are now "kings and priests unto God" (relation, 1. 6); they had prior right to inheritances. the resurrection the relation of the sexes shall cease (see, 30. 36). one—Greek, "one man;" masculine, neuter, viz., "one new man" in Christ (Ephesians, 5). 29. and heirs—The oldest MSS. omit "and," ist is "Abraham's seed" (v. 16); ye are "one in ist" (v. 28), and one with Christ, as having "put Christ" (v. 27); therefore ye are "Abraham's seed," which is tantamount to saying (whence the "and" is lifted), ye are "heirs according to the promise" (not y the law; v. 18); for it was to Abraham's seed that inheritance was promised (v. 16). Thus he arrives the same truth which he set out with (v. 7). But a new "seed" of a righteous succession could be had. One single faultless grain of human nature was not by God Himself, the source of a new and unchangeable seed; "the seed" (Psalm 102. 30) who receive in Him a new nature and name (Genesis, 3. 14; Job, 43. 10, 11; John, 12. 24). In Him the lineal descent from David becomes extinct. He died without territory. But He lives and shall reign on David's throne. No one has a legal claim to sit upon it but nsel, He being the only living direct representative of David's throne. His spiritual seed derive their birth in the travail of His soul, being born again of His id, which is the incorruptible seed (John, 1. 12; Romans, 8. 8; 1 Peter, 1. 23).

CHAPTER IV.

EF. 1-31. THE SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED: ILLUSTRATION OF OUR SUBJECTION TO THE LAW ONLY TILL THE BEST CARE, FROM THE SUBJECTION OF AN HEIR TO

HIS GUARDIAN TILL HE IS OF AGE. ST. PAUL'S GOOD-WILL TO THE GALATIANS SHOULD LEAD THEM TO THE SAME GOOD-WILL TO HIM AS THEY HAD AT FIRST SHOWN. THEIR DESIRE TO BE UNDER THE LAW, SHOWN BY THE ALLEGORY OF ISAAC AND ISHMAEL TO BE INCONSISTENT WITH THEIR GOSPEL LIBERTY. 1-7. The fact of God's sending His Son to redeem us who were under the law (v. 4), and sending the Spirit of His Son into our hearts (v. 6), confirms the conclusion (ch. 3. 29) that we are "heirs according to the promise," the heir—(ch. 3. 29.) It is not, as in earthly inheritances, the death of the father, but our Father's sovereign will simply that makes us heirs. child—Greek, "one under age," differeth nothing, &c.—i.e., has no more freedom than a slave (so the Greek for "servant" means). He is not at his own disposal. lord of all—by title and virtual ownership (cf. 1 Corinthians, 3. 21, 22). 2. tutors and governors—rather, "guardians of the person and stewards" (of the property). Answering to "the law was our schoolmaster" or "tutor" (ch. 3. 24). until the time appointed of the Father—in His eternal purposes (Ephesians, 1. 9-11). The Greek is a legal term, expressing a time defined by law, or testamentary disposition. 3. we—the Jews primarily, and inclusively the Gentiles also. For the "we" in v. 5, plainly refers to both Jew and Gentile believers. The Jews in their bondage to the law of Moses, as the representative people of the world, include all mankind virtually amenable to God's law (Romans, 2. 14, 15; cf. ch. 3. 13, 12, Notes). Even the Gentiles were under "bondage," and in a state of discipline suitable to nonage, till Christ came as the Emancipator. were in bondage—as "servants" (v. 7). under the elements—or "rudiments" rudimentary religious teaching of a non-Christian character: the elementary lessons of outward things (ist, "of the [outward] world"); such as the legal ordinances mentioned, v. 10 (Colossians, 2. 8, 20). Our childhood's lessons. [CONYBEARE & HOWSON.] Lit., The letters of the alphabet (Hebrews, 5. 12). 4. the fulness of the time—viz., "the time appointed by the Father" (v. 2). Cf. Note, Ephesians, 1. 10; Luke, 1. 57; Acts, 2. 1; Ezekiel, 5. 2. "The church has its own ages." [BENGL.] God does nothing prematurely, but, foreseeing the end from the beginning, waits till all is ripe for the execution of His purpose. Had Christ come directly after the fall, the enormity and deadly fruits of sin would not have been realized fully by man, so as to feel his desperate state and need of a Saviour. Sin was fully developed. Man's inability to save himself by obedience to the law, whether that of Moses, or that of conscience, was completely manifested; all the prophecies of various ages found their common centre in this particular time; and Providence, by various arrangements in the social and political, as well as the moral, world, had fully prepared the way for the coming Redeemer. God often permits physical evil long before he teaches the remedy. The small pox for long had committed its ravages before inoculation, and then vaccination, was discovered. It was essential to the honour of God's law to permit evil long before He revealed the full remedy. Cf. "the set time" (Psalm 102. 13). was come—Greek, "came." sent forth—Greek, "Sent forth out of heaven from Himself." [ALFORD & BENGL.] The same verb is used of the Father's sending forth the Spirit (v. 6). So in Acts, 7. 12. Cf. with this verse, John, 8. 42; Isaiah, 48. 16. his—Emphatical. "His own Son." Not by adoption, as we are (v. 5); nor merely His Son by the anointing of the Spirit which God sends into the heart (v. 6; John, 1. 18). made of a woman—"made" is used as in 1 Corinthians, 15. 45. "The first man, Adam, was made a living soul," Greek, "made to be (born) of a woman." The expression implies a special interposition of God in His birth as man, viz., causing Him to be conceived by the Holy Ghost. So ESTIUS. was, under the law—"made to be under the law." No

merely as GROTZKE & ALFORD explain. "Born subject to the law as a Jew." But "made" by His Father's appointment, and His own free-will, "subject to the law," to keep it all, ceremonial and moral, perfectly for us, as the Representative Man, and to suffer and exhaust the full penalty of our whole race's violation of it. This constitutes the significance of His circumcision, His being presented in the temple (Luke, 2, 21, 23, 27; cf. Matthew, 5, 17), and His baptism by John, when He said (Matthew, 2, 18), "Thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness." 5. Te-Greek, "That He might redeem" them... under the law—Primarily the Jews; but as these were the representative people of the world, the Gentiles, too, are included in the redemption (ch. 3, 13). redeem—The Greek implies the suitability of the thing as long ago predestined by God. "Receive as something destined or due" (Luke, 23, 41; 2 John, 8). Herein God makes of sons of men sons of God, inasmuch as God made of the Son of God the Son of man. (ST. AUGUSTINE on Psalm 82.) 6. because ye are sons, &c.—The gift of the Spirit of prayer is the consequence of our adoption. The Gentile Galatians might think, as the Jews were under the law before their adoption, that so they, too, must first be under the law. St. Paul, by anticipation, meets this objection by saying, Ye ARE sons, therefore ye need not to be as children (v. 1) under the tutelage of the law, as being already in the free state of "sons" of God by faith in Christ (ch. 3, 26), no longer in your nature (as "children," v. 1). The Spirit of God's only Begotten Son in your hearts, sent from, and leading you to cry to, the Father, attests your sonship by adoption; for the Spirit is the "earnest of your inheritance" (Romans, 8, 15, 16; Ephesians, 1, 13). "It is because ye are sons that God sent forth" (the Greek requires this translation, not "hath sent forth") into OUR (so the oldest MSS. read for "your," in English Versions) hearts the Spirit of His Son, crying, "Abba, Father" (John, 1, 12). As in v. 5, he changed from "them," the third person, to "we," the first person, so here he changes from "ye," the second person, to "our," the first person: this he does to identify their case as Gentiles, with his own and that of his believing fellow-countryman, as Jews. In another point of view, though not the immediate one intended by the context, this verse expresses, "Because ye are sons (already in God's electing purpose of love), God sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts," &c.: God thus, by sending His Spirit in due time, actually conferring that sonship which He already regarded as a present reality ("are") because of His purpose, even before it was actually fulfilled. So Hebrews, 2, 13, where "the children" are spoken of as existing in His purpose, before their actual existence. The Spirit of His Son—By faith ye are one with the Son, so that what is His is yours; His Sonship ensures your sonship; His Spirit ensures for you a share in the same. "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of His" (Romans, 8, 9). Moreover, as the Spirit of God proceeds from God the Father, so the Spirit of the Son proceeds from the Son; so that the Holy Ghost, as the creed saith, "proceedeth from the Father and the Son." The Father was not begotten: the Son is begotten of the Father: the Holy Ghost proceeding from the Father and the Son. crying—Here the SPIRIT is regarded as the agent in praying, and the believer as His organ. In Romans, 8, 15, "The Spirit of adoption" is said to be that whereby we cry, "Abba, Father;" but in Romans, 8, 26, "THE SPIRIT ITSELF maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered." The believer's prayer is His prayer; hence arises its acceptability with God. Abba, Father—The Hebrew says, "Abba" (a Hebrew term), the Greek, "Father" ("Pater," a Greek term in the original), both united together in one Sonship and one cry of faith, "Abba, Father." So, "Even so ('Nai,' Greek),

Amen" (Hebrew, both meaning the same (Revelation, 1, 7). Christ's own former cry is the believers' cry, "Abba, Father" (Mark, 14, 36). 7. Wherefore—Conclusion inferred from v. 4-6. then—Individualizing and applying the truth personally to each. Such an individual appropriation of this comforting truth God grants in answer to them who cry, "Abba, Father," heir of God through Christ.—The oldest MSS. read, "an heir through God." This combines on behalf of man, the whole before-mentioned agency of THE TRINITY: the Father sent His Son and the Spirit; the Son has freed us from the law; the Spirit has completed our sonship. Thus the redeemed are heirs through the Triune God, not through the law, nor through fleshly descent [WINDSCHMANN & ALFORD] (ch. 3, 15 confirms this). heir—Confirming ch. 3, 29; cf. Romans, 8, 17. 8-11. Appeal to them not to turn back from their privileges as free sons, to legal bondage again. then—when ye were "servants" (v. 7). ye knew not God.—Not opposed to Romans, 1, 21. The heathen originally knew God, as Romans, 1, 21 states, but did not choose to retain God in their knowledge, and so corrupted the original truth. They might still have known Him, in a measure, from His works, but as a matter of fact they knew Him not, so far as His eternity, His power as the Creator, and His holiness, are concerned. are no gods—i.e., have no existence, such as their worshippers attribute to them, in the nature of things, but only in the corrupt imaginations of their worshippers (Notes, 1 Corinthians, 8, 4; 10, 19, 20; 2 Chronicles, 13, 9). Your "service" was a different bondage from that of the Jews, which was a true service. Yet theirs, like yours, was a burdensome yoke; how then is it ye wish to resume the yoke after that God has transferred both Jews and Gentiles to a free service? 9. know God, or rather are known of God—They did not first know and love God, but God first, in His electing love, knew and loved them as His, and therefore attracted them to the saving knowledge of Him (Matthew, 7, 23; 1 Corinthians, 8, 3; 2 Timothy, 2, 19; cf. Exodus, 33, 12, 17; John, 15, 16; Philippians, 3, 12). God's great grace in this made their fall from it the more heinous. how—expressing indignant wonder at such a thing being possible, and even actually occurring (ch. 1, 6). "How is it that ye turn back again!" &c. weak—powerless to justify; in contrast to the justifying power of faith (ch. 3, 24; cf. Hebrews, 7, 18). beggarly—contrasted with the riches of the inheritance of believers in Christ (Ephesians, 1, 18). The state of the "child" (v. 1) is weak, as not having attained manhood; "beggarly," as not having attained the inheritance. elements—"rudiments." It is as if a school-master should wish to go back to learning the A B C (BENGLI) again—There are two Greek words in the original. "Ye desire again, beginning afresh, to be in bondage." Though the Galatians, as Gentiles, had never been under the Mosaic yoke, yet they had been under "the elements of the world" (v. 3); the common designation for the Jewish and Gentile systems alike, in contrast to the gospel (however superior the Jewish was to the Gentile). Both systems consisted in outward worship, and cleaved to sensible forms. Both were in bondage to the elements of sense, as though these could give the justification and sanctification which the inner and spiritual power of God alone could bestow. ye desire—or "will." Will-worship is not acceptable to God (Colossians, 2, 18, 23). 10. To regard the observance of certain days as in itself meritorious as a work, is alien to the free spirit of Christianity. This is not incompatible with observing the Sabbath of the Christian Lord's day as obligatory, though not as a work (which was the Jewish and Gentile error in their observance of days), but as a holy mean appointed by the Lord for attaining the great end, holiness. The whole lie alike belongs to the Lord in the gospel view, just as the whole world, and not the Jews only, belong to Him. But as in Paradise, so now one portion of time is needed wherein to draw off the soul more entirely from secular business to God (Colossians, 2, 16). "Sabbaths, new moons, and set feasts" (1 Chronicles, 23, 31; 2 Chronicles, 31, 3), answer to "days, months, times." "Months" however, may refer to the first and seventh months, which were sacred on account of the number of feasts in them. times—Greek, "seasons," viz., those of the three great feasts, the Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles. years—The Sabbatical year was about the time of writing this epistle, A.D. 48. [BENJEL.] 11. lest—Greek, "lest haply." My fear is not for my own sake, but for yours. 12. be as I am—"As I have in my life among you cast off Jewish habits, so do ye; for I am become as ye are," viz., in the non-observance of legal ordinances. "The fact of my laying them aside among Gentiles, shows that I regard them as not at all contributing to justification or sanctification. Do you regard them in the same light, and act accordingly." His observing the law among the Jews, was not inconsistent with this, for he did so only in order to win them, without compromising principle. On the other hand, the Galatian Gentiles, by adopting legal ordinances, showed that they regarded them as needful for salvation. This St. Paul combats. ye have not injured me at all—viz., at the period when I first preached the gospel among you, and when I made myself as you are, viz., living as a Gentile, not as a Jew. You at that time did me no wrong; "ye did not despise my temptation in the flesh" (v. 14); nay, you "received me as an angel of God." Then in v. 16, he asks, "Have I then, since that time, become your enemy by telling you the truth?" 13. how through infirmity—rather, as Greek, "Ye know that because of an infirmity of my flesh I preached," &c. He implies that bodily sickness, having detained him among them, contrary to his original intention, was the occasion of his preaching the gospel to them. at the first—viz., "at the former time;" implying that at the time of writing he had been twice in Galatia. See my Introduction; also v. 16, and ch. 5, 21, Notes. His sickness was probably the same as recurred more violently afterward, "the thorn in the flesh" (2 Corinthians, 12, 7), which also was overruled to good (2 Corinthians, 12, 9, 10), as the "infirmity of the flesh" here. 14. my temptation—The oldest MSS. read, "your temptation." My infirmity which was, or might have been, a "temptation," or trial, to you, ye despised not, i.e., ye were not tempted by it to despise me and my message. Perhaps, however, it is better to punctuate and explain as LACHMANS, connecting it with v. 13. "And (ye know) your temptation (i.e., the temptation to which ye were exposed through the infirmity) which was in my flesh. Ye despised not (through natural pride), nor rejected (through spiritual pride, but received me," &c. "Temptation does not mean here, as we now use the word, tendency to an evil habit, but BODILY TRIAL," as an angel of God—as a heaven-inspired and sent messenger from God: angel means messenger (Malachi, 2, 7). Cf. the phrase, 2 Samuel, 19, 27, a Hebrew and oriental one for a person to be received with the highest respect (Zechariah, 12, 8). An angel is free from the flesh, infirmity, and temptation, as Christ—being Christ's representative (Matthew, 10, 40). Christ is Lord of the angels. 15. Were, &c.—Of what value was your congratulation (so the Greek for "blessedness" expresses) of yourselves, on account of your having among you me, the messenger of the gospel, considering how entirely you have veered about since? Once you counted yourselves blessed in being favoured with my ministry, ye would have plucked out your own eyes—one of the dearest members of the body—so highly did you value me: a proverbial phrase for the greatest self-sacrifice (Matthew, 6, 29). COSTYBANE & HOWSON think that this particular form of proverb was used with reference to a weakness in St. Paul's eyes, connected with a nervous frame, perhaps affected by the brightness of the vision described, Acts, 23, 11; 2 Corinthians, 12, 1-7. "You would have torn out your own eyes to supply the lack of mine." The divine power of Paul's words and works, contrasting with the feebleness of his person (2 Corinthians, 10, 10), powerfully at first impressed the Galatians, who had all the impulsiveness of the Keltic race from which they sprang. Subsequently they soon changed with the fickleness which is equally characteristic of Kelts. 16. Translate, "Am I, then, become your enemy (an enemy in your eyes) by telling you the truth" (ch. 2, 5, 14)? He plainly did not incur their enmity at his first visit, and the words here imply that he had since then, and before his now writing, incurred it; so that the occasion of his telling them the unwelcome truth, must have been at his second visit (Acts, 18, 23; see my Introduction). The fool and sinner hate a reprover. The righteous love faithful reproof (Psalm 141, 5; Proverbs, 9, 8). 17. They—your flatterers: in contrast to Paul himself who tells them the truth. zealously—zeal in proselytism was characteristic especially of the Jews, and so of Judaizers (ch. 1, 14; Matthew, 23, 16; Romans, 10, 2). affect you—i.e., court you (2 Corinthians, 11, 2). not well—not in a good way, or for a good end. Neither the cause of their zealous courting of you, nor the manner, is what it ought to be. they would excise you—"they wish to shut you out" from the kingdom of God (i.e., they wish to persuade you that, as unenraptured Gentiles, you are shut out from it), "that ye may zealously court them," i.e., become circumcised, as zealous followers of themselves. ALFORD explains it, that their wish was to shut out the Galatians from the general community, and attract them as a separate clique to their own party. So the English word, "exclusive," is used. 18. good to be zealously affected—rather, to correspond to "zealously court" in v. 18. "to be zealously courted." I do not find fault with them for zealously courting you, nor with you for being zealously courted; provided it be "in a good cause" (translate so), "it is a good thing" (1 Corinthians, 9, 20-23). My reason for saying the "not well" (v. 17) the Greek is the same as that for "good," and "in a good cause," in v. 28), is that their zealous courting of you is not in a good cause. The older interpreters, however, support English Version (cf. ch. 1, 14). always—translate and arrange the words thus, "At all times, and not only when I am present with you." I do not desire that I exclusively should have the privilege of zealously courting you. Others may do so in my absence with my full approval, if only it be in a good cause, and if Christ be faithfully preached (Philippians, 1, 16-18). 19. My little children—(1 Timothy, 1, 18; 2 Timothy, 2, 1; 1 John, 2, 1). My relation to you is not merely that of one zealously courting you (v. 17, 18), but that of a father to his children (1 Corinthians, 4, 15). I travel in birth—i.e., like a mother in pain till the birth of her child, again—a second time. The former time was when I was "sent with you" (v. 18; cf. Note, v. 13). Christ be formed in you—that you may live nothing but Christ, and think nothing but Christ (ch. 2, 20), and glory in nothing but Him, and His death, resurrection, and righteousness (Philippians, 3, 8-10; Colossians, 1, 27). 20. Translate as Greek, "I could wish." If circumstances permitted (which they do not), I would gladly be with you. [M. SWART.] now—as I was twice already. Speaking face to face is so much more effective towards loving persuasion than writing (2 John, 12; 3 John, 13, 14). change my voice—as a mother (v. 19); adapting my tone of voice to what I saw in person your case might need. This is possible to one present, but not to one in writing. [GROTIUS & ESTIUS.] I stand in doubt of you—rather, "I am perplexed about you," viz., were ye deal with you, what kind of words to use, gentle or severe, to bring you back to the right path. 21. desires—of your own accord madly courting that which must condemn and ruin you. do ye not hear—do ye not consider the mystic sense of Moses' words? [GNORRIS.] The law itself sends you away from itself to Christ. [ERRERA.] After having sufficiently maintained his point by argument, the apostle confirms and illustrates it by an inspired allegorical exposition of historical facts, containing in them general laws and types. Perhaps his reason for using allegory was to confute the Judaizers with their own weapons: subtle, mystical, allegorical interpretations, unauthorized by the Spirit, were their favourite arguments, as of the Rabbins in the synagogues. Cf. the Jerusalem Talmud, Tractata Succa, cap. Hechalil. St. Paul meets them with an allegorical exposition, not the work of fancy, but sanctioned by the Holy Spirit. History, if properly understood, contains in its complicated phenomena, simple and continually-recurring divine laws. The history of the elect people, like their legal ordinances, had, besides the literal, a typical meaning (cf. 1 Corinthians, 10. 1-4; 15. 45, 47; Revelation, 11. 8). Just as the extraordinarily-born Isaac, the gift of grace according to promise, supplanted, beyond all human calculations, the naturally-born Ishmael; so the new theocratic race, the spiritual seed of Abraham by promise, the Gentile, as well as Jewish believers, were about to take the place of the natural seed, who had imagined that to them exclusively belonged the kingdom of God. 22. (Genesis, 16. 5-16; 21. 2.) Abraham—whose sons ye wish to be (cf. Romans, 9. 7-9). a bond maid... a free woman—rather, as Greek, "the bond maid... the free woman." 23. after the flesh—born according to the usual course of nature: in contrast to Isaac, who was born "by virtue of the promise" (so the Greek), as the efficient cause of Sarah's becoming pregnant out of the course of nature (Romans, 4. 19). Abraham was to lay aside all confidence in the flesh (after which Ishmael was born), and to live by faith alone in the promise (according to which Isaac was miraculously born, contrary to all calculations of flesh and blood). 24. are an allegory—rather, "are allegorical," i.e., have another besides the literal meaning. these are the two covenants—"these (women) are (i.e., mean). Omit 'the' with all the oldest MSS.) two covenants." As among the Jews the bondage of the mother determined that of the child, the children of the free covenant of promise, answering to Sarah, are free; the children of the legal covenant of bondage are not so. one from—i.e., taking its origin from mount Sinai. Hence, it appears, he is treating of the moral law (ch. 3. 19) chiefly (Hebrews, 12. 18). Paul was familiar with the district of Sinai in Arabia (ch. 1. 17), having gone thither after his conversion. At the gloomy scene of the giving of the law, he learned to appreciate, by contrast, the grace of the gospel, and so to cast off all his past legal dependencies, which gendereth—i.e., bringing forth children unto bondage. Cf. the phrase (Acts, 2. 25), "children of the covenant which God made... saying unto Abraham." Agar—i.e., Hagar. 25. Translate, "For this word, Hagar, is (imports) mount Sinai in Arabia" (i.e., among the Arabians,—in the Arabian tongue). So CHRYSOSTOM explains. Haraut, the traveller, says that to this day the Arabians call Sinai, "Hadschar," i.e., Hagar, meaning a rock or stone. Hagar twice fled into the desert of Arabia (Genesis, 16. and 21.): from her the mountain and city took its name, and the people were called Hagarenes. Sinai, with its rugged rocks, far removed from the promised land, was well suited to represent the law which inspires with terror, and the spirit of bondage. answereth—lit., "stands in the same rank with," "she corresponds to." &c. Jerusalem which now is—i.e., the Jerusalem of the Jews, having only a present temporary existence, in contrast with the spiritual Jerusalem of the gospel, which in germ under the form of the promise, existed ages before, and shall be for ever in ages to come. and—The oldest MSS. read, "For she is in bondage." As Hagar was in bondage to her mistress, so Jerusalem that now is, is in bondage to the law, and also to the Romans: her civil state thus being in accordance with her spiritual state. [BENGEL.] 26. This verse stands instead of the sentence which we should expect, to correspond to v. 24, "One from mount Sinai," viz., the other covenant from the heavenly mount above, which is (answers in the allegory to) Sarah. Jerusalem... above—Hebrews, 12. 23. "the heavenly Jerusalem." "New Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God" (Revelation, 3. 12; 21. 2). Here "the Messianic theocracy, which before Christ's second appearing is the church, and after it, Christ's kingdom of glory." [MEYER.] free—as Sarah was: opposed to "she is in bondage" (v. 23), all—Omitted in many of the oldest MSS., though supported by some. "Mother of us," viz., believers who are already members of the invisible church, the heavenly Jerusalem, hereafter to be manifested (Hebrews, 12. 22. 27. [Isaiah, 54. 1.] thus barren—Jerusalem above: the spiritual church of the gospel, the fruit of "the promise," answering to Sarah, who bore not "after the flesh"; as contrasted with the law, answering to Hagar, who was fruitful in the ordinary course of nature. Isaiah speaks primarily of Israel's restoration after her long continued calamities; but his language is framed by the Holy Spirit so as to reach beyond this to the spiritual Zion: including not only the Jews, the natural descendants of Abraham and children of the law, but also the Gentiles. The spiritual Jerusalem is regarded as "barren" whilst the law trammelled Israel, for she then had no spiritual children of the Gentiles, break forth—into crying, cry—about for joy. many mere—translate as Greek, "Many are the children of the desolate the New Testament church made up in the greater part from the Gentiles, who once had not the promise, and so was destitute of God as her husband, more than of her which hath an (Greek, THE) husband" (the Jewish church having God for her husband, Isaiah, 54. 6; Jeremiah, 2. 2). Numerous as were the children of the legal covenant, those of the gospel covenant are more so. The force of the Greek article is, "Her who was the husband of which the other is destitute." 28. we—The oldest MSS. and versions are divided between "we" and "ye." "We" better accords with v. 26, "Mother of us." children of promise—not children after the flesh, but through the promise (v. 23, 29, 31). "We are" so, and ought to wish to continue so. 29. persecuted—Ishmael "mocked" Isaac, which contained in it the germ and spirit of persecution (Genesis, 21. 9). His mocking was probably directed against Isaac's piety and faith in God's promises. Being the elder by natural birth, he haughtily prided himself above him that was born by promise: as Cain hated Abel's piety, him, born after the Spirit—The language, though referring primarily to Isaac, born in a spiritual way (viz., by the promise or word of God, rendered by His Spirit efficient out of the course of nature, in making Sarah fruitful in old age), is so framed as especially to refer to believers justified by gospel grace through faith, as opposed to carnal men, Judaizers, and legalists. even so it is now—ch. 5. 11; 6. 12, 17; Acts, 9. 29; 13. 45, 49, 50; 14. 1, 2, 19; 17. 5, 13; 18. 5, 6.) The Jews persecuted Paul, not for preaching Christianity in opposition to heathenism, but for preaching it as distinct from Judaism. Except in the two cases of Philippi and Ephesus (where the persons beginning the assault were peculiarly interested in his expulsion), he was nowhere set upon by the Gentiles, unless they were first stirred up by the Jews. The coincidence between Paul's epistles and Luke's history (the Acts) in this respect, is plainly undesigned, and so a proof of (see PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ). 30. Genesis, here Sarah's words are, "Shall not be heir, even with Isaac." But what was there, is here by inspiration expressed in its spiritual import, applying to the New believer, who is antitypically "the son of man." In John, 8. 35, 36, Jesus refers to it—from the house and inheritance: literally; spiritually, the carnal and legalists, shall the Greek is stronger, "must not be heir," 31. So thou — The oldest MSS. read, "This is the conclusion inferred from es. In ch. 3. 29, and 4. 7, it was established w Testament believers, are "heirs." If, heirs, "we are not children of the bond use son, according to Scripture, was 'not to 0, but of the free woman" (whose son was 0 Scripture, to be heir). For we are not is Ishmael, but accepted as sons and heirs.

CHAPTER V.

PERORATION. EXHORTATION TO STAND E GOSPEL LIBERTY, JUST SET FORTH, AND LED BY JUDAIZERS INTO CIRCUMCISION, JUSTIFICATION: YET THOUGH FREE, TO ANOTHER BY LOVE: TO WALK IN THE USING THE FRUIT THEREOF, NOT IN THE FLESH. 1. The oldest MSS. read, "In ALFORD, MONELEY, HUMPHRY, & ELLIS as there is, no Greek for 'in,' as there is, 15, 16. 13; Philippians, 1, 27; 4, 1. Christ, by circumcision (Luke, took to obey all the law, and fulfil all right- nus; any, therefore, that now seeks to fulfil itself in any degree for justifying righteous- himself from the grace which flows from

Christ's fulfilment of it, and becomes "a debtor to do the whole law" (v. 3). The decree of the Jerusalem council had said nothing so strong as this; it had merely decided that Gentile Christians were not bound to legal observances. But the Galatians, whilst not pretending to be so bound, imagined there was an efficacy in them to merit a higher degree of perfection (ch. 3. 3). This accounts for St. Paul not referring to the decree at all. He took much higher ground. See PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ. The natural mind loves outward fetters, and is apt to forge them for itself, to stand in lieu of holiness of heart. 5. For—Proof of the assertion, "fallen from grace," by contrasting with the case of legalists, the "hope" of Christians, through the Spirit—Greek, rather, "by the Spirit," in opposition to by the flesh (ch. 4. 29), or fleshly ways of justification, as circumcision and legal ordinances. "We" is emphatical, and contrasted with "whosever of you would be justified by the law" (v. 4), the hope of righteousness—"We wait for the (realization of the) hope (which is the fruit) of the righteousness (i.e., justification which comes) by lit., from—out of) faith," Romans, 5, 1, 4, 5; 8. 24, 25, "Hope...we with patience wait for it." This is a farther step than being "justified," not only are we this, but "wait for the hope" which is connected with it, and is its full consummation. "Righteousness," in the sense of justification, is by the believer once for all already attained; but the consummation of it in future perfection above, is the object of hope to be waited for: "the crown of righteousness laid up" (3 Timothy, 4. 8); "the hope laid up for you in heaven" (Colossians, 1, 5; 1 Peter, 1, 3). 6. For—Confirming the truth that it is "by faith" (v. 5). In Jesus Christ—Greek, "in Christ Jesus." In union with Christ (the ANOINTED SAVIOUR), that is, Jesus of Nazareth, nor uncircumcision—This is levelled against those who, being not legalists, or Judaizers, think themselves Christians on this ground alone. faith which worketh by love—Greek, "working" &c. This corresponds to "a new creature" (ch. 6. 15), as its definition. Thus in v. 5, 6, we have the three, "faith," "hope," and "love." The Greek expresses, "Which effectually worketh;" which exhibits its energy by love (so 1 Thessalonians, 2. 13). Love is not joined with faith in justifying, but is the principle of the works which follow after justification by faith. Let not legalists, upholding circumcision, think that the essence of the law is set at nought by the doctrine of justification by faith only. Nay, "all the law is fulfilled in one word—love," which is the principle on which "faith worketh" (v. 14). Let them, therefore, seek this "faith," which will enable them truly to fulfil the law. Again, let not those who pride themselves on uncircumcision think that, because the law does not justify, they are free to walk after "the flesh" (v. 13). Let them, then, seek that "love" which is inseparable from true faith (James, 2. 8, 13-22). Love is utterly opposed to the enmities which prevailed among the Galatians (v. 15, 20). The Spirit (v. 5) is a Spirit of "faith" and "love" (cf. Romans, 14. 17; 1 Corinthians, 7. 19). 7. Translate, "Ye were running well" in the gospel race (1 Corinthians, 9. 24-26; Philippians, 3. 13, 14). was, &c.—none whom you ought to have listened to (BENGLI); alluding to the Judaizers (cf. ch. 3. 1). hinder—The Greek means, lit., "hinder by breaking up a road." not obey the truth—not submit yourselves to the true gospel way of justification. 8. This persuasion—Greek, "The persuasion," viz., to which you are yielding. There is a play on words in the original, the Greek for persuasion being akin to "obey" (v. 7). This persuasion which ye have obeyed, cometh not of—i.e., from: Does not emanate from Him, but from an enemy, that calleth you—(v. 13; ch. 1. 6; Philippians, 3. 14; 1 Thessalonians, 5. 24.) The calling is the rule of the whole race. [BENGLI.] 9. A little heaven—The false heaven.

was prominent among the seducers, though the delusionist might beset them all (ch. 1. 7; 4. 17). I shall bear—as a Jew—I am—in the end and in a credible judgment—to be a Jew. St. Paul's doctrine is the case of the seducer, who were misled through thoughtlessness, and who, now that they are set right by him, he confidently hopes, in God's goodness, will return to the right way, from that of the seducer who is doomed to judgment, whoever he be—whether great (ch. 1. 8) or small. 11. Translate, "If I am still preaching (as I did before conversion, circumcision, why am I still persecuted?" The Judaizing troubler of the Galatians had said, "Paul himself preaches circumcision," as is shown by his having circumcised Timothy (Acts, 16. 3; cf. also Acts, 20. 6; 21. 24). Paul replies by anticipation of their objection. As regards myself, the fact that I am still persecuted by the Jews, shows plainly that I do not preach circumcision: for it is just because I preach Christ crucified, and not the Mosaic law, as the sole ground of justification, that they persecute me. If for conciliation he lived as a Jew among the Jews, it was in accordance with his principle enunciated (1 Corinthians, 7. 15, 20; 9. 20). Circumcision, or uncircumcision, are things indifferent in themselves; their lawfulness or unlawfulness depends on the animus of him who used them. The Gentile Galatians' animus in circumcision could only be their supposition that it influenced favourably their standing before God. Paul's living as a Gentile among Gentiles, plainly showed that, if he lived as a Jew among Jews, it was not that he thought it meritorious before God, but as a matter indifferent, wherein he might lawfully conform as a Jew by birth to those with whom he was, in order to put no needless stumblingblock to the gospel in the way of his countrymen. then—I resuming that I did so, "then," in that case, "the offence of stumblingblock, 1 Corinthians, 1. 23, occasioned to the Jews by) the cross has become done away." Thus the Jews' accusation against Stephen, was not that he preached Christ crucified, but that "he spake blasphemous words against this holy place and the law." They would, in some measure, have borne the former, if he had mixed with it justification now in a state of crucifixion (Romans, 6, 6); so that the Spirit can produce in them, comparatively uninterrupted by it, "the fruit of the Spirit" (v. 22). "Man, by faith, is dead to the former standing-point of a sinful life, and rises to a new life (v. 25) of communion with Christ (Colossians, 2, 3). The act by which they have crucified the flesh with its lusts, is already accomplished ideally in principle. But the practice, or outward conformation of the life, must harmonize with the tendency given to the inward life" (v. 26). [NEANthe body of sin, which has caused the acting of all spiritual life, viz., our standing by faith as dead to, and severed from, sin, and the condemnation of the law.

 "Life by (or in) the Spirit," is not an occasional influence of the Spirit, but an abiding state, wherein we are continually alive, though sometimes sleeping and inactive. 26. Greek, "Let us not become." Whilst not common both to the orthodox and Judaizing Galatians.

 I. Brethren—An expression of kindness, to conciliate attention. Translate as Greek, "If a man even be overtaken" (i.e., caught in the very act [ALFORD & ELLI-COTT]; BEFORE he expects; unexpectedly). BENGEL explains the "before" in the Greek compound verb, "If a man even be overtaken in a fault before ourselves." If another has really been overtaken in a fault the first; for often he who is first to find fault, is the very one who has first transgressed. a fault—Greek, "a transgression," "a fall;" such as a falling back into legal bondage. Here he gives mention to those who have not so fallen, "the spiritual," to be not "vain-glorious" (ch. 5, 26), but forbearing to such (Romans, 15, 1). restore—The Greek is used of a dislocated limb, reduced to its place. Such is the tenderness with which we should treat a fallen member of the church in restoring him to a better state. the spirit of meekness—the meekness which is the gift of the Holy Spirit working in our spirit (ch. 5, 22, 26). "Meekness" is that temper of spirit towards God whereby we accept His dealings dure meekly their provocations, and do not withdraw 14 "love" John, 13: 34; 15: 12; Romans, 15: 3, gives Christ as the example in the particular duty here. 3. Self-conceit, the exact hindrance to forbearance and sympathy toward our fellow-men, must be laid aside, something—possessed of some spiritual pre-eminence, so as to be exempt from the frailty of other men, when he is nothing—The Greek is subjective: "Being, if he would come to himself, and look on the real fact, nothing" [ALFORD] (v. 2, 6; Romans, 12: 3; 1 Corinthians, 8: 2). deceiveth himself—lit., "he mentally deceives himself." Cf. James, 1: 26, "deceiveth his own heart." 4. his own work—not merely his own opinion of himself, have rejoicing in himself alone—translate, "Have his (matter for) glorying in regard to himself alone, and not in regard to another" (viz., not in regard to his neighbour, by comparing himself with whom, he has fancied he has matter for boasting as that neighbour's superior). Not that really a man by looking to "himself alone" is likely to find cause for glorying in himself. Nay, in v. 3, he speaks of a "burden" or load, not of matter for glorying, as what really belongs to each man. But he refers to the idea those whom he censures had of themselves; they thought they had cause for "glorying" in themselves, but it all arose from unjust self-conceited comparison of themselves with others, instead of looking at home. The only true glorying, if glorying it is to be called, is in the testimony of a good conscience, glorying in the cross of Christ. 5. For (by this way, v. 4, of proving himself, not depreciating his neighbour by comparison) each man shall bear his own "burden," or rather, "load" (viz., of sin and infirmity), the Greek being different from that in v. 2. This verse does not contradict v. 2. There he tells them to bear with others' "burdens" of infirmity in sympathy; here, that self-examination will make a man to feel he has enough to do with "his own load" of sin, without comparing himself boastfully with his neighbour. Cf. v. 3. Instead of "thinking himself to be something," he shall feel the "load" of his own sin; and this will lead him to bear sympathetically with his neighbour's burden of infirmity. Asop says a man carries two bags over his shoulder, the one with his own sins hanging behind, heading (ch. 1. 1), and ch. 3. 1, show that this epistle claims to be that of St. Paul. This claim is confirmed by the Announcements of Irenaeus, Herases, E. 2, 3, and 1. 8, 5; Clemens, Alexandrinus Stromata, 4. sec. 65; and Paul. 1, sec. 8; adu. Gals. 4. 211. It is quoted by Valentinus (150 A.D.), vis., ch. 3. 14-18, as we know from Hippolytus' Refut. of p. 198. Polycarp, Ep. Philipp., ch. 13, testifies to its canonicity. So Tertullian adv. Marcion, 5. 17. Ignatius, Ep. 13. Besides the frequent and affectionate mention made by St. Paul of the Christian state, privileges, and persons ephestians, in his epistle.

EPHESIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

the theory, besides the ordinary one, have been held on the question, to whom the epistle is addressed. Grorius, a heretic Marcion, maintains that it was addressed to the church at Laodicea, and that if it is the epistle to which I refer, Colossians, 4. 16. But the epistle to the Colossians was probably written before that to the Ephesians, as from the parallel passages in Ephesians bearing marks of being expanded from those in Colossians; and Marcion o have drawn his notion, as to our epistle, from St. Paul's allusion (Colossians, 4. 16) to an epistle addressed by him Laodiceana. Origen, and Clement of Alexandria, and even Tertullian, who refers to Marcion, give no sanction to his

No single MS. contains the heading, "to the saints that are at Laodicea." The very resemblance of the epistle ephestians to that to the Colossians, is against the theory; for if the former were really the one addressed to Laodicea ana, 4. 16), St. Paul would not have deemed it necessary that the churches of Colosse and Laodicea should interchange

The greetings, moreover (Colossians, 4. 16), which he sends through the Colossians to the Laodiceans, are quite rtible with the idea that Paul wrote an epistle to the Laodiceans at the same time, and by the same bearer, Titheicus rer of our epistle to the Ephesians, as well as of that to Colosse; for who, under such circumstances, but would send tings directly in the letter to the party saluted? The letter to Laodicea was evidently written some time before Colosse. Archbishop Usher has advanced the second theory: That it was an angelical letter headed, as in MS. B., saints that are . . . and to the faithful," the name of each church being inserted in the copy sent to it; and that sent to Ephesus first, occasioned its being entitled, as now, the Epistle to the Ephesians. Alford makes the follow- ings to this theory:—(1.) It is at variance with the spirit of the epistle, which is clearly addressed to one and of persons throughout, co-existing in one place, and under the same circumstances. (2) The improbability that the apostle, who in two of his epistles (2 Corinthians and Galatians) has so plainly specified their encyclical character, should have here omitted such specification. (3) The still greater improbability that he should have, as on this hypothesis must be assumed, written a circular epistle to a district, of which Ephesus was the commercial capital, addressed to various churches within that district, yet from its very contents (as by the opponents' hypothesis) not admitting of application to the church of that metropolis, in which he had spent so long a time, and to which he was so affectionately bound. (4) The inconsistency of this hypothesis with the address of the epistle, and the universal testimony of the ancient church. The absence of personal greetings is not an argument for either of the two theories; for similarly there are none in Galatians, Philippians, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, 1 Timothy. The better he knows the parties addressed, and the more general and solemn the subject, the less he seems to give of these individual notices. Writing, as he does in our epistle, on the constitution and prospects of Christ's universal church, he refers the Ephesians, as to personal matters, to the bearer of the epistle, Tychicus (ch. 6, 21, 22). As to the omission of "which are at Ephesus" (ch. 1, 1), in MS. B., so "in Rome" (Romans, 1, 7) is omitted in some old MSS.; it was probably done by churches among whom it was read, in order to generalize the reference of its contents, and especially where the subject of the epistle is catholic. The words are found in the margin of B., from a first hand; and are found in all the oldest MSS. and versions.

St. Paul's first visit to Ephesus (on the sea coast of Lydia, near the river Cayster) is related in Acts, 18, 19-21. The work begun by his disputations with the Jews in his short visit, was carried on by Apollos (Acts, 18, 24-26), and Aquila and Priscilla (26). At his second visit, after his journey to Jerusalem, and thence to the east regions of Asia Minor, he remained at Ephesus "three years" (Acts, 19, 10, the "two years" in which verse are only part of the time, and Acts, 20, 31); so that the founding and rearing of this church occupied an unusually large portion of the apostle's time and care; whence his language in this epistle shows a warmth of feeling, and a free outpouring of thought, and a union in spiritual privileges and hope between him and them (ch. 1, 3, &c.), such as are natural from one so long and so intimately associated with those whom he addresses. On his last journey to Jerusalem, he sailed by Ephesus and summoned the elders of the Ephesian church to meet him at Miletus, where he delivered his remarkable farewell charge (Acts, 20, 18-35).

Our epistle was addressed to the Ephesians during the early part of his imprisonment at Rome, immediately after that to the Colossians, to which it bears a close resemblance in many passages, the apostle having in his mind generally the same great truths in writing both. It is an undesigned proof of genuineness that the two epistles, written about the same date, and under the same circumstances, bear a closer mutual resemblance than those written at distant dates, and on different occasions. Cf. ch. 1, 7, with Colossians, 1, 14; ch. 1, 10, with Colossians, 1, 20; ch. 3, 2, with Colossians, 1, 25; ch. 5, 19, with Colossians, 2, 16; ch. 6, 22, with Colossians, 4, 2; ch. 1, 19; 2, 5, with Colossians, 2, 13, 13; ch. 4, 2-4, with Colossians, 2, 12-15; ch. 4, 16, with Colossians, 2, 19; ch. 4, 22, with Colossians, 3, 13; ch. 4, 22-24, with Colossians, 3, 8, 10; ch. 5, 6-8, with Colossians, 2, 6-8; ch. 5, 15, 16, with Colossians, 4, 5; ch. 6, 19, 20, with Colossians, 4, 3, 4; ch. 5, 22-23; 6, 1-9, with Colossians, 3, 18; ch. 4, 24, 25, with Colossians, 3, 9; ch. 5, 20-22, with Colossians, 3, 17, 18. Tychicus and Onesimus were being sent to Colosse, the former bearing the two epistles to the two churches respectively, the latter furnished with a letter of recommendation to Philemon, his former master, residing at Colosse. The date was probably about four years after his parting with the Ephesian elders at Miletus (Acts, 20), about 62 A.D., before his imprisonment had become of the more severe kind, which appears in his epistle to the Philippians. From ch. 6, 19, 20, it is plain he had at the time, though a prisoner, some degree of freedom in preaching, which accords with Acts, 28, 23, 30, 31, where he is represented as receiving at his lodgings all inquirers. His imprisonment began in February 61 A.D., and lasted "two whole years" (Acts, 28, 30) at least, and perhaps longer.

The church of Ephesus was made up of converts partly from the Jews and partly from the Gentiles (Acts, 18, 8-10). Accordingly, the epistle so addresses a church constituted (ch. 2, 14-22). Ephesus was famed for its idol temple of Artemis or Diana, which, after its having been burnt down by Herostratus, on the night that Alexander the Great was born (B.C. 333), was rebuilt at enormous cost, and was one of the wonders of the world. Hence, perhaps, have arisen his images in this epistle drawn from a beautiful temple: the church being in true inner beauty that which the temple of the idol tried to realize in outward show (ch. 2, 19-22). The epistle (ch. 4, 17; 5, 1-13) implies the proficacy for which the Ephesian bathers were notorious. Many of the same expressions occur in the epistle, as in St. Paul's address to the Ephesian elders. Cf. ch. 1, 6, 7, and 2, 7, as to "grace," with Acts, 20, 24, 32; this may well be called "the epistle of the grace of God." [A]lford. Also, as to his "bonds," ch. 3, 1, and 4, 1, with Acts, 20, 22, 23. Also ch. 1, 11, as to "the counsel of God," with Acts, 20, 27. Also ch. 1, 14, as to "the redemption of the purchased possession," with Acts, 20, 28. Also ch. 1, 14, 18; ch. 2, 20, and ch. 5, 5, as to "building up" the "inheritance," with Acts, 20, 32.

The object of the epistle is "to set forth the ground, the course, and the aim and end of THE CHURCH OF THE FAITHFUL IN CHRIST." He speaks to the Ephesians as a type or sample of the church universal. [A]lford. Hence, "the church" throughout the epistle is spoken of in the singular, not in the plural, "churches." The church's foundation, its course, and its end, are his theme alike in the larger and smaller divisions of the whole epistle. "Every where the foundation of the church is in the will of the Father; the course of the church is by the satisfaction of the Son; the end of the church is the life in the Holy Spirit." [A]lford. Cf. respectively ch. 1, 11; ch. 3, 5; ch. 3, 18. This having been laid down as a matter of doctrine (this part closing with a sublime doxology, ch. 3, 14-21), is then made the ground of practical exhortations. In these latter also (from ch. 4, 1, onward), the same threefold division prevails, for the church is represented as founded on the counsel of "God the Father, who is above all, through all, and in all," reared by the "one Lord," Jesus Christ, through the "one Spirit" (ch. 4, 4-6, &c.), who give their respective graces to the several members. These last are therefore to exercise all these graces in the several relations of life, as husbands, wives, servants, children, &c. The conclusion is that we must put on "the whole armour of God" (ch. 6, 13).

The sublimity of the STYLE and LANGUAGE corresponds to the sublimity of the subjects, and exceeds almost that of any part of his epistles. It is appropriate that those to whom he so wrote, were Christians long grounded in the faith. The very sublimity is the cause of the difficulty of the style, and of the presence of peculiar expressions occurring, not found elsewhere.

CHAPTER I.

VER. 1-23. INSCRIPTION: ORIGIN OF THE CHURCH IN THE FATHER'S ETERNAL COUNSEL, AND THE SON'S BLOODSHEDDING: THE SEALING OF IT BY THE SPIRIT. THANKSGIVING AND PRAYER THAT THEY MAY FULLY

KNOW GOD'S GRACIOUS POWER IN CHRIST TOWARDS THE SAINTS. 1. by—rather, "through the will of God;" called to the apostleship through that same "will" which originated the church (v. 5, 9, 11; cf. Galatians, 1, 4). which are at Ephesus—See Introduction. 12-18 saints...and to the faithful.—The same persons are referred to by both designations, as the Greek proves: "to those who are saints, and faithful in Christ Jesus." The sanctification by God is here put before man's faith. The twofold aspect of salvation is thus presented, God's grace in the first instance sanctifying us (i.e., setting us apart in His eternal purposes as holy unto Himself); and our faith, by God's gift, laying hold of salvation (2 Thessalonians, 2. 13; 1 Peter, 1. 2). 2. (Romans, 1. 7; 1 Corinthians, 1. 3; 2 Corinthians, 1. 2; Galatians, 1. 3.) 3. The doxologies in almost all the epistles imply the real sense of grace experienced by the writers and their readers (1 Peter, 1. 3). From v. 3, to 14, sets forth summarily the gospel of the grace of God: the FATHER'S work of love, v. 3 (choosing us to holiness, v. 4; to sonship, v. 5; to acceptance, v. 6); the Son's, v. 7 redemption, v. 7; knowledge of the mystery of His will, v. 9; an inheritance, v. 11); the HOLY SPIRIT'S, v. 13 sealing, v. 13; giving an earnest of the inheritance, v. 14. the God and Father of...Christ—and so the God and Father of us who are in Him (John, 20. 17). God is "the God" of the man Jesus, and "the Father" of the Divine Word. The Greek is, "Blessed us," not "hath blessed us," referring to the past original counsel of God. As in creation (Genesis, 1. 22), so in redemption (Genesis, 12. 3; Matthew, 6. 3-11; 25. 34) God "blesses" His children; and that not in mere words, but in acts, as—all Christians, blessings—Greek, "blessing." "All," i.e., "every possible blessing for time and eternity, which the Spirit has to bestow" (so "spiritual" means, not "spiritual," as the term is now used, as opposed to bodily). In heavenly places—A phrase five times found in this epistle, and not elsewhere (v. 20; ch. 2. 6; 3. 10; 6. 12); Greek, "in the heavenly places." Christ's ascension is the means of introducing us into the heavenly places, which by our sin were barred against us. Cf. the change made by Christ, Colossians, 1. 20; ch. 1. 20. Whilst Christ in the flesh was in the form of a servant, God's people could not realize fully their heavenly privileges as sons. Now "our citizenship (Greek) is in heaven" (Philippians, 3. 20, where our High Priest is ever "blessing" us. Our "treasures" are there (Matthew, 6. 20, 21); our aims and affections (Colossians, 3. 1, 2; our hope (Colossians, 1. 5; Titus, 2. 13); our inheritance (1 Peter, 1. 4). The gift of the Spirit itself, the source of the "spiritual blessing," is by virtue of Jesus having ascended thither (ch. 4. 8). In Christ—the centre and source of all blessing to us. 4. hath chosen us—Greek, "chose us out for Himself" (viz., out of the world, Galatians, 1. 4); referring to His original choice, spoken of as past. In him—The repetition of the idea, "in Christ" (v. 3). Implies the paramount importance of the truth that it is in Him, and by virtue of union to Him, the Second Adam, the Restorer ordained for us from everlasting, the Head of redeemed humanity, believers have all their blessings (ch. 3. 11). before the foundation of the world—This assumes the eternity of the Son of God (John, 17. 5. 24), as of the election of believers in Him (3 Timothy, 1. 9; 2 Thessalonians, 2. 13). that we should be holy—Positively (Deuteronomy, 14. 2). without blame—Negatively (ch. 5. 27; 1 Thessalonians, 3. 13). before him—It is to Him the believer looks, walking as in His presence, before whom he should be accepted in the judgment (Colossians, 1. 22; cf. Revelation, 7. 16). in love—Joined by BENGLI, &c., with v. 6, "in love having predestinated us," &c. But English Version is better. The words qualify the whole clause, "that we should be holy...before Him." Love, lost to man by the fall, but restored by redemption, is the root and fruit and sun of all holiness (ch. 3. 2; 1 Thessalonians, 3. 12. 13). 5. predestinated—More special in respect to the end and precise means, Arabic "chosen" or elected. We are "chosen out of the rest of the world; predestinated to all things that secure the inheritance for us (v. 11; Romans, 8. 20). "Foreordained," by Jesus—Greek, "through Jesus," to himself—the Father (Colossians, 1. 20). ALFORD explains, "adoption... into Himself," i.e., so that we should be partakers of the Divine nature (2 Peter, 1. 4). LACHMANN reads, "unto Him." The context favours the explanation of CALVIN, &c.: God has regard to Himself and the glory of His grace (v. 6, 12, 14) as His ultimate end. He had one only begotten Son, and He was pleased, for His own glory, to choose out of a lost world many to become His adopted sons. Translate, "unto Himself," the good pleasure of His will—So the Greek (Matthew, 11. 26; Luke, 10. 21). We cannot go beyond "the good pleasure of His will" in searching into the causes of our salvation, or of any of His works (v. 9. [Job, 33. 13.]). Why needest thou philosophize about an imaginary world of optimism? Thy concern is to take heed that thou be not bad. There was nothing in us which deserved His love (v. 1. 9, 11). [BENGLI.] 6. (Ver. 7, 17, 18). The end aimed at (Psalm 60. 23), &c.. That the glory of His grace may be praised by all His creatures, men and angels, wherein—Some of the oldest MSS. read, "which." Then translate, "which He graciously bestowed on us." But English Version is supported by good MSS. and the oldest versions. us accepted—A kindred Greek word to "grace" Charitos, echaritosen; translate, "graciously accepted." made us subjects of His grace—"embraced us in the arms of His grace" (Romans, 3. 24; 5. 15). in the Blessed—Pre-eminently so called (Matthew, 3. 17; 17. 6; John, 3. 36; Colossians, 1. 13). Greek, "Son of His love." It is only "in His Beloved" that He loves us (v. 3; 1 John, 4. 9, 10). 7. In whom—"the Beloved" (v. 6; Romans, 3. 21). We have—as a present possession. redemption—Greek, "our life, the redemption." THE redemption which is the grand subject of all revelation, and especially of the New Testament (Romans, 3. 24, viz. from the power, guilt, and penal consequences of sin (Matthew, 1. 21). If a man were unable to redeem himself from being a bond servant, his kinsman might redeem him (Leviticus, 25. 48). Hence, antipatically the Son of God became the Son of man, that as our kinsman He might redeem us (Matthew, 20. 28). Another "redemption" follows, viz. that "of the purchased possession" hereafter (v. 14). through His blood—ch. 2. 13—as the instrument; the propitiation, i.e., the consideration (devised by His own love) for which He, who was justly angry (Isaiah, 12. 1), becomes propitious to us; the expiation, the price paid to Divine justice for our sin (Acts, 20. 28; Romans, 3. 25; 1 Corinthians, 6. 20; Colossians, 1. 20; 1 Peter, 1. 18, 19). the forgiveness of sins—Greek, "the remission of our transgressions;" not merely "pre-remission," as the Greek (Romans, 3. 25) ought to be translated. This "remission," being the explanation of "redemption," includes not only deliverance from sin's penalty, but from its pollution and enslaving power, negatively; and the reconciliation of an offended God, and a satisfaction unto a just God, positively. riches of his grace—ch. 2. 7—"the exceeding riches of His grace." Cf. v. 18, and ch. 3. 16, "according to the riches of His glory;" so that "grace" is His "glory." 8. Father. "Which He made to abound towards us," all wisdom and prudence—"Wisdom" in devising the plan of redeeming mankind; "prudence" in executing it by the means, and in making all the necessary arrangements of providence for that purpose. St. Paul attributes to the gospel of God's grace "all" possible "wisdom and prudence," in opposition to the boasts of wisdom and prudence which the unbelieving Jews and heathen philosophers, and false apostles arrogated for their teachings. Christ crucified, though esteemed "foolishness" by the world, is "the wisdom of God" (1 Corinthians, 1. 18-30). Cf. ch. 3. 10. "the manifold wisdom of God." 9. "He hath abounded," or "made (grace) to abound toward us"

(v. 2, 3) that He made known to us, viz., experientially, in our hearts, the mystery—God's purpose of redemption hidden hitherto in His counsel, but now revealed (ch. 2, 19; Romans, 16, 25; Colossians, 1, 26, 27). This "mystery" is not like the heathen mysteries which were imparted only to the initiated few. All Christians are the initiated. Only unbelievers are the uninitiated, according to his good pleasure—Showing the cause why "He hath made known to us the mystery," viz., His own loving "good pleasure" toward us; also the time and manner of His doing so, as according to His good pleasure, purpose—(v. 11) in Himself—God the Father. EPHRAIM takes it, "in Him," i.e., Christ, as v. 2, 4. But the proper name, "in Christ," v. 10, immediately after, is inconsistent with His being here meant by the pronoun. 10. Translation: "Unto the dispensation of the fulness of the times," i.e., "which He purposed in Himself" (v. 9) with a view to the economy of the gracious administration belonging to the fulness of the times (Greek, "at times," "seasons"). More comprehensive than "the fulness of the time" (Galatians, 4, 4). The whole of the gospel times (plural) is meant, with the benefit to the church dispersed in them severally and successively. Cf. "the ages to come" (ch. 2, 7). "The ends of the ages" (Greek, 1 Corinthians, 10, 11); "the times (name Greek as here, 'the seasons' or 'fitly appointed times') of the Gentiles" (Luke, 21, 34); "the seasons which the Father hath put in His own power" (Acts, 1, 7); "the times of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the prophets since the world began" (Acts, 3, 20, 21). The coming of Jesus at the first advent, "in the fulness of time," was one of these "times." The descent of the Holy Ghost "when Pentecost was fully come" (Acts, 2, 1), was another. The testimony given by the apostles to Him "in due time" ("in its own seasons," Greek) (1 Timothy, 2, 6), was another. The conversion of the Jews "when the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled," the second coming of Christ, the "restitution of all things" the millennial kingdom, the new heaven and earth, shall be severally instances of "the dispensation of the fulness of the times," i.e., "the dispensation of" the gospel events and benefits belonging to their respective "times," when severally filled up or completed. God the Father, according to His own good pleasure and purpose, is the Dispenser both of the gospel benefits, and of their several fitting times (Acts, 1, 7), gather together in one—Greek, "sum up under one head;" "recapitulate." The "good pleasure which He purposed," was "to sum up all things Greek, "run whole range of things" in Christ" (Greek, "the Christ," i.e., His Christ). [ALFORD.] God's purpose is to sum up the whole creation in Christ, the Head of angels, with whom He is linked by His in visible nature, and of men with whom He is linked by His humanity; of Jews and Gentiles; of the living and the dead (ch. 3, 15); of animate and inanimate creation. Sin has disarranged the creature's relation of subordination to God. God means to gather up all together in Christ; or as Colossians, 1, 20 saith, "By Him to reconcile all things unto Himself, whether things in earth or things in heaven." ALFORD well says, "The church of which the apostle here mainly treats, is subordinated to Him in the highest degree of conscious and joyful union; those who are not His Spiritually, in mere subjugation, yet consciously; the inferior tribes of creation unconsciously; but objectively, all are summed up in Him." 11. In whom—By virtue of union to whom, obtained an inheritance—id., "We were made to have an inheritance." [WAL.] Cf. v. 18, "His inheritance in the saints." As His inheritance is there said to be in them, so theirs is here said to be in Him (Acts, 26, 18). However, v. 12, "That we should as to...His glory" (not "that we should have"), favours the translation of BENCKE, ELLIOTT, &c., "We were made an inheritance." So the literal Israel (Deuteronomy, 4, 20; 5, 29; 28, 9). "Also" does not mean "we also," nor as English Version, "in whom also;" but, besides His having "made known to us His will," we were also "made His inheritance," or "we have also obtained an inheritance," preteritum—(v. 8) The foreordination of Israel as the elect nation, answers to that of the spiritual Israel, believed, to an eternal inheritance, which is the thing meant here. The "we" here and in v. 12, means Jewish believers (whence the reference to the election of Israel nationally ceased, as contrasted with "you" (v. 12) Gentile believers, purpose—Repeated from "purposed" (v. 2; ch. 2, 23). The church existed in the mind of God eternally, before it existed in creation, counsel of his will—v. 5, "the good pleasure of His will." Not arbitrary caprice, but infinite wisdom ("counsel") joined with sovereign will. Cf. his address to the same Ephraim, Acts, 20, 27, "All the counsel of God" (Levitic, 23, 25). Also in the natural and spiritual creation, God is not an agent constrained by necessity, "whosoever counsel in, there is election, or else it is vain; when a will, there must be freedom, or else it is weak." [FRANCOIS.] 12. (Ver. 14.) who first trusted in Christ—either (we Jewish Christians), "who have before hoped in the Christ," who before the Christ came, looked forward to His coming, waiting for the consolation of Israel. Cf. Acts, 26, 2, 7, "I am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers: unto which our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come." Acts, 28, 20, "the hope of Israel." [ALFORD.] Cf. v. 18; ch. 2, 12; 4, 4. 13. In whom ye also—Ye Gentiles. Supply as English Version, "trusted," from v. 12; or "are." The priority of us Jews, does not exclude you Gentiles, from sharing in Christ (cf. Acts, 13, 46), the word of truth—the instrument of sanctification, and of the new birth (John, 17, 17; 3 Timothy, 2, 15; James, 1, 18). Cf. Colossians, 1, 6, where also, as here, it is connected with "hope." Also ch. 4, 21, sealed—as God's confirmed children, by the Holy Spirit as the seal (Acts, 19, 1-6; Romans, 8, 16, 23; 2 Corinthians, 1, 22; John, 3, 24). A seal impressed on a document gives undoubted validity to the contract in it (John, 3, 33; 4, 27; cf. 2 Corinthians, 3, 2). So the sense of "the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost" (Romans, 5, 5), and the sense of adoption given through the Spirit at regeneration (Romans, 8, 15, 16), assure believers of God's good will to them. The Spirit, like a seal, impresses on the soul at regeneration the image of our Father. The "sealing" by the Holy Spirit is spoken of as past once for all. The witnessing to our hearts that we are the children of God, and heirs (v. 11), is the Spirit's present testimony, the "earnest of the (coming) inheritance" (Romans, 8, 16-18), that "Holy Spirit of promise—rather, as the Greek, "The Spirit of promise, even the Holy Spirit;" The Spirit promised both in the Old and New Testaments (Joel, 2, 28; Zechariah, 12, 10; John, 7, 38, 39). The word promised the Holy Spirit. Those who "believed the word of truth" were sealed by the Spirit accordingly. 14. earnest—the first instalment paid as a pledge that the rest will follow (Romans, 8, 23; 2 Corinthians, 1, 22). until—rather, "Unto the redemption," &c.; joined thus, "ye were sealed v. 13 unto," i.e., "for the purpose of, and against, the accomplishment of," the redemption," viz., not the redemption in its first stage, made by the blood of Christ which secures our title, but, in its final completion, when the actual possession shall be ours, the full "redemption of the body" (Romans, 8, 23) as well as of the soul, from every infirmity (ch. 4, 30). The deliverance of the creature (the body, and the whole visible creation) from the bondage of corruption, and from the usurping prince of this world, into the glorious liberty of the children of God (Romans, 8, 21-23; 2 Peter,

3. 15. of the purchased possession—God's people purchased (acquired, Greek) as His peculiar (Greek) possession by the blood of Christ (Acts, 20. 28). We value highly that which we pay a high price for; so God, His church (ch. 5. 24, 28; 1 Peter, 1. 18; 2. 9; Malachi, 3. 17, Margia, "my special treasure"). 15. Wherefore—Because ye are in Christ and sealed by His Spirit (v. 13, 14). I also—on my part, in return for God's so great benefits to you, after I heard—ever since I have heard. Not implying that he had only heard of their conversion: an erroneous argument used by some against the address of this epistle to the Ephesians (Note, v. 1); but referring to the report he had heard since he was with them, as to their Christian graces. So in the case of Philemon, his "beloved fellow-labourer" (Philemon, 1), he uses the same words (Philemon, 4. 5), your faith—rather, as Greek, "the faith among you," i.e., which many (not all) of you have, love unto all the saints—of whatever name, simply because they are saints. A distinguishing characteristic of true Christianity (ch. 6. 24). "Faith and love he often joins together. A wondrous pair." [CHRYSOSTOM.] Hope is added, v. 18. (Colossians, 1. 9.) of you—Omitted in the oldest MSS. Then the translation may be as English Version still, or as ALFORD, "Making mention of them" (your "faith and love"). 17. A fit prayer for all Christians, the God of our Lord Jesus—Appropriate title here; as in v. 20-23, he treats of God's raising Jesus to be Head over all things to the church. Jesus Himself called the Father "My God" (Matthew, 27. 46). the Father of glory—(cf. Acts, 7. 2.) The Father of that infinite glory which shines in the face of Christ, who is "the glory" (the true Shechinah; through whom also "the glory of the inheritance" (v. 18), shall be ours (John, 17. 24; 2 Corinthians, 3. 7, to 4. 6). the spirit of wisdom—whose attribute is infinite wisdom, and who works wisdom in believers (Isaiah, 11. 2). and revelation—whose function it is to reveal to believers spiritual mysteries (John, 16. 14, 15; 1 Corinthians, 2. 10). in the knowledge—rather, as Greek (see Note, 1 Corinthians, 13. 12), "in the full knowledge of Him," viz., God, 18. understanding—The oldest MSS., versions, and fathers, read "heart." Cf. the contrary state of the unbelieving, the heart being in darkness (ch. 4. 18; Matthew, 13. 15). Translate, "Having the eyes of your heart enlightened" (ch. 6. 11; Matthew, 1. 16). The first effect of the Spirit moving in the new creation, as in the original physical creation (Genesis, 1. 3; 2 Corinthians, 4. 6). So THEOPHILUS to ACTYLUCAS, 1. 3, "the ears of the heart." Where spiritual light is, there is life (John, 1. 4). The heart is "the core of life" [HARLESS], and the fountain of the thoughts; whence "the heart" in Scripture includes the mind, as well as the inclinations. Its "eye," or inward vision, both receives and contemplates the light (Matthew, 6. 22, 23). The eye is the symbol of intelligence (Ezekiel, 1. 18). the hope of his calling—the hope appertaining to His having called you; or, to the calling wherewith He has called you, and—Omitted in the oldest MSS. and versions, riches of the glory, &c.—(Colossians, 1. 27.) his inheritance in the saints—The inheritance which He has in store in the case of the saints. I prefer explaining, "The inheritance which He has in his saints." (See Note, v. 11; Deuteronomy, 32. 9.) 19. exceeding—"surpassing," power to us-ward who believe—The whole of the working of His grace which He is carrying on, and will carry on, in us who believe. By the term "saints" (v. 15), believers are regarded as absolutely perfect, and so as being God's inheritance; in this sense, as in the course of fighting the good fight of faith, according to—in accordance with what might be expected from working—Greek, "the energizing;" translate, "the effectual working" (ch. 3. 7). The same super-human power was needed and exerted to make us believes, as was needed and exerted to raise Christ from the dead (v. 20). Cf. Philippians, 3. 10, "the power of His resurrection" (Colossians, 2. 12; 1 Peter, 1. 3-6), of his mighty power—Greek, "of the strength of his might." 20. in Christ—as our "first fruits" of the resurrection, and Head, in virtue of God's mighty working in whom His power to us-ward is made possible and actual. [ALFORD.] when he raised him—in that He raised Him." The raising of Christ is not only an earnest of our bodies being hereafter raised, but has a spiritual power in it involving (by virtue of our living union with Him, as members with the Head) the resurrection, spiritually of the believer's soul now, and consequently, of his body hereafter (Romans, 4. 8-11; 8. 11). The Son, too, as God, though not as man, had a share in raising His own human body (John, 2. 19; 10. 17, 18). Also the Holy Spirit (Romans, 1. 4; 1 Peter, 3. 18). set him—Greek, "made Him sit." The glorious spirits stand about the throne of God, but they do not sit at God's right hand (Hebrews, 1. 13), at His own right hand—(Psalm 110. 1.) Where He remains till all His enemies have been put under His feet (1 Corinthians, 15. 24). Being appointed to "rule in the midst of His enemies" during their rebellion (Psalm 110. 2). He shall resign His commission after their subjection (PEARSON) (Mark, 16. 19; Hebrews, 1. 3; 10. 12). in the heavenly places—(v. 3.) As Christ has a literal body, heaven is not merely a state, but a place; and where He is, there His people shall be (John, 14. 3). 21. Greek, "Far (or high) above all (ch. 4. 10) principality (or rule, 1 Corinthians, 15. 24), and authority, and power (Matthew, 28. 18), and dominion (or lordship)." Cf. Philippians, 2. 9; Colossians, 1. 16; Hebrews, 7. 26; 1 Peter, 3. 22. Evil spirits (who are similarly divided into various ranks, ch. 6. 12), as well as angels of light, and earthly potentates, are included (cf. Romans, 8. 38). Jesus is "King of kings, and Lord of lords" (Revelation, 19. 16). The higher is His honour, the greater is that of His people, who are His members joined to Him the Head. Some philosophizing teachers of the school of Simon Magus, in western Asia Minor, had, according to Irenaeus and Epiphanius, taught their hearers these names of various ranks of angels. St. Paul shows that the truest wisdom is to know Christ as reigning above them all, every name—every being whatever. "Any other creature" (Romans, 8. 39). In this world—Greek, "age," i.e., the present order of things. "Things present...things to come" (Romans, 8. 38). that...to come—Names which now we know not, but shall know hereafter in heaven. We know that the Emperor goes before all, though we cannot enumerate all the satraps and ministers of his court; so we know that Christ is set above all, though we cannot name them all." [BENGEI.] 22. put...under—Greek, "put in subjection under" (Psalm 8. 6; 1 Corinthians, 15. 27). gave...to the church—for her special advantage. The Greek order is emphatic: "HIM He gave as Head over all things to the church." Had it been any one save HIM, her Head, it would not have been the boon it is to the church. But as He is Head over all things who is also her Head (and she the body), all things are hers (1 Corinthians, 3. 21-23). He is OVER "far above" all things: in contrast to the words, "to the church," viz., for her advantage. The former are subject; the latter is joined with Him in His dominion over them. "Head" implies not only His dominion, but our union; therefore, while we look upon Him at the right hand of God, we see ourselves in heaven (Revelation, 3. 21). For the Head and body are not severed by any thing intervening, else the body would cease to be the body, and the Head cease to be the Head. [PEARSON from CHRYSOSTOM.] 23. his body—His mystical and spiritual, not literal, body. Not, however, merely figurative or metaphorical. He is really, though spiritually, the church's Head.

His life is her life. She shares His crucifixion and His consequent glory. He possesses every thing, His fellowship with the Father, His fulness of the Spirit, and His glorified manhood, not merely for Himself, but for her, who has a membership of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones (ch. 5. 29). fulness—"the filled up receptacle." [EADIE.] The church is dwelt in and filled by Christ. She is the receptacle, not of His inherent, but of His communicated, plenitude of gifts and graces. As His is the "fulness" (John, 1. 16; Colossians, 1. 19; 2. 9) inherently, so she is His "fulness" by His impartation of it to her, in virtue of her union to Him (ch. 5. 18; Colossians, 2. 10). "The full manifestation of His being, because penetrated by His life." [CONYBEARE & HOWSON.] She is the continued revelation of His Divine life in human form; the fullest representative of His plenitude. Not the angelic hierarchy, as false teachers taught (Colossians, 2. 9, 10, 18), but Christ Himself is the "fulness of the God-head," and she represents Him. KOPPE translates less probably, "the whole universal multitude." filleth all in all—Christ as the Creator, Preserver, and Governor of the world, constituted by God (Colossians, 1. 16, &c.), fills all the universe of things with all things. "Fills all creation with whatever it possesses." [ALFORD.] The Greek is "filleth for Himself."

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-22. GOD'S LOVE AND GRACE IN QUICKENING US, ONCE DEAD, THROUGH CHRIST. HIS PURPOSE IN DOING SO; EXHORTATION BASED ON OUR PRIVILEGES AS BULLETS TOGETHER, AN HOLY TEMPLE, IN CHRIST, THROUGH THE SPIRIT. 1. And you—"You also," among those who have experienced His mighty power in enabling them to believe (v. 19-23), hath he quickened—Supplied from the Greek (v. 5), dead—spiritually (Colossians, 2. 13). A living corpse: without the gracious presence of God's Spirit in the soul, and so unable to think, will, or do ought that is holy, in trespasses...sins—in them, as the element in which the unbeliever is, and through which he is dead to the true life. Sin is the death of the soul. Isaiah, 5. 2; John, 5. 25. "dead" (spiritually), 1 Timothy, 5. 6. "Alienated from the life of God" (ch. 4. 18). Translate, as Greek, "in your trespasses," &c. "Trespass" in Greek, expresses a FALL or LAPSE, such as the transgression of Adam whereby he fell. "Sin" (Greek, "Hamartia") implies innate corruption and ALIENATION from God (lit., erring of the mind from the rule of truth), exhibited in acts of sin (Greek, "Hamartemata"). BENGEL refers "trespasses" to the Jews who had the law, and yet revolted from it; "sins," to the Gentiles who know not God. 2. the course of this world—the career (lit., "the age," cf. Galatians, 1. 4), or present system of this world (1 Corinthians, 2. 6, 12; 3. 18, 19, as opposed to "the world to come"); alien from God, and lying in the wicked one (1 John, 5. 19). "The age" (which is something more internal and ethical) regulates "the world" (which is something more external), the prince of the power of the air—the unseen God who lies underneath guiding "the course of this world" (2 Corinthians, 4. 4); ranging through the air around us: cf. Mark, 4. 4, "fowls of the air" (Greek, "heaven") &c. (v. 15). "Satan" and his demons. Cf. ch. 6. 12; John, 12. 31. Christ's ascension seems to have cast Satan out of heaven (Revelation, 12. 5, 9, 10, 12, 13), where he had been heretofore the accuser of the brethren (Job, 1). No longer able to accuse in heaven those justified by Christ, the ascended Saviour (Romans, 8. 33, 34), he assails them on earth with all trials and temptations; and "we live in an atmosphere poisonous and impregnated with deadly elements. But a mighty purification of the air will be effected by Christ's coming" [AUBRELEN], for Satan shall be bound (Revelation, 12. 12, 13, 15, 17; 20. 2, 3). "The power" is here used collectively for the "powers of the air;" in apposition with which "powers" stand the "spirits," comprehended in the singular, "the spirit," taken also collectively; the aggregate of the "seducing spirits" (1 Timothy, 4. 1) which "work now (still); not merely, as in your case, 'in time past' in the sons of disobedience (a Hebraism: men who are not merely by accident disobedient, but who are essentially sons of disobedience itself: cf. Matthew, 3. 7), and of which Satan is here declared to be "the prince." The Greek does not allow "the spirit" to refer to Satan, "the prince" himself, but to "the powers of the air" of which he is prince. The powers of the air are the embodiment of that evil "spirit" which is the ruling principle of unbelievers, especially the heathen (Acts, 26. 18), as opposed to the spirit of the children of God (Luke, 4. 33). The potency of that "spirit" is shown in the "disobedience" of the former. Cf. Deuteronomy, 32. 20, "children in whom is no faith" (Isaiah, 26. 9; 57. 4). They disobey the gospel both in faith and practice (2 Thessalonians, 1. 3; 1 Corinthians, 2. 12). 3. also we—i.e., we also. St. Paul here joins himself in the same category with them, passing from the second person (v. 1, 2) to the first person here. all—Jews and Gentiles. our conversation—"our way of life" (2 Corinthians, 1. 12; 1 Peter, 1. 18). This expression implies an outwardly more decorous course, than the open "walk" in gross sins on the part of the majority of Ephesians in times past, the Gentile portion of whom may be specially referred to in v. 2. Paul and his Jewish countrymen, though outwardly more seemly than the Gentiles (Acts, 26. 4, 5, 18), had been essentially like them in living to the unrenewed flesh, without the Spirit of God. fulfilling—Greek, "doing" mind—Greek, "our thoughts." Mental suggestions and purposes (independent of God), as distinguished from the blind impulses of "the flesh," and were by nature—He intentionally breaks off the construction, substituting "and we were" for "and being," to mark emphatically his and their past state by nature, as contrasted with their present state by grace. Not merely is it, we had our way of life fulfilling our fleshly desires, and so being children of wrath; but we were by nature originally "children of wrath," and so consequently had our way of life fulfilling our fleshly desires. "Nature," in Greek, implies that which has grown in us as the peculiarity of our being, growing with our growth, and strengthening with our strength, as distinguished from that which has been wrought on us by mere external influences: what is inherent, not acquired (Job, 14. 4; Psalm 51. 6). An incidental proof of the doctrine of original sin. children of wrath—not merely "sons," as in the Greek, "sons of disobedience" (v. 2), but "children" by generation; not merely by adoption, as "sons" might be. The Greek order more emphatically marks this innate corruption: "Those who in their (very) nature are children of wrath:" v. 5, "grace" is opposed to "nature" here; and salvation (implied in v. 5, 8, "saved") to "wrath." Cf. Article IX., Church of England Common Prayer Book. "Original, or birth-sin, standeth not in the following of Adam, but is the fault and corruption of the nature of every man, naturally engendered of Adam [Christ was supernaturally conceived by the Holy Ghost of the virgin], whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil; and therefore, in every person born into this world, it deserveth God's wrath and damnation." St. Paul shows that even the Jews, who boasted of their birth from Abraham, were by nature birth equally children of wrath as the Gentiles, whom the Jews despised on account of their birth from idolaters (Romans, 2. 9; 5. 12-14). "Wrath abideth" on all who disobey the gospel in faith and practice (John, 3. 36). The phrase, "children of wrath," is a Hebraism, i.e., objects of God's wrath from childhood, in our natural state, as being born in sin which God hates. So "son of death" (Margm, 2 Samuel, 12. 6); "son of perdition" (John, 17. 12; 2 Thessalonians, 2. 3. as others—Greek, "as the rest" of mankind are (1 Thessalonians, 4. 13). 4. God, who is rich—Greek, "(as) being rich in mercy." for—i.e., "because of His great love." This was the special ground of God's saving us; as "rich in mercy" (cf. v. 7; ch. 1. 7; Romans, 2. 4; 10. 12) was the general ground. "Mercy takes away misery; love confers salvation." [BENGL.] 5. dead in sins—The best reading is in the Greek: "dead in our (lit., the) trespasses." quickened—"vivified" spiritually, and by consequence hereafter, corporally. There must be a spiritual resurrection of the soul, before there can be a comfortable resurrection of the body [PEARSON] (John, 11. 25, 26; Romans, 8. 11). together with Christ—The Head being seated at God's right hand, the body also sits there with Him. [CHRYSOSTOM.] We are already seated there in Him ("in Christ Jesus," v. 6), and hereafter shall be seated by Him; in Him already as in our Head, which is the ground of our hope; by Him hereafter, as by the conferring cause, when hope shall be swallowed up in fruition. [PEARSON.] What God wrought in Christ, He wrought (by the very fact) in all united to Christ, and one with Him. by grace ye are saved—Greek, "Ye are in a saved state." Not merely "ye are being saved," but ye "are passed from death unto life" (John, 5. 24). Salvation is to the Christian not a thing to be waited for hereafter, but already realized (1 John, 3. 14). The parenthetical introduction of this clause here (cf. v. 8) is a burst of St. Paul's feeling, and in order to make the Ephesians feel that grace from first to last is the sole source of salvation; hence, too, he says "ye," not "we." 6. raised us up together—with Christ. The "raising up" pre-supposes previous quickening of Jesus in the tomb, and of us in the grave of our sins, made us sit together—with Christ, viz., in His ascension. Believers are bodily in heaven in point of right, and virtually so in Spirit, and have each their own place assigned there, which in due time they shall take possession of (Philippians, 3. 20, 21). He does not say "on the right hand of God": a prerogative reserved to Christ peculiarly: though they shall share His throne (Revelation, 3. 21). in Christ Jesus—Our union with Him is the ground of our present spiritual, and future bodily, resurrection and ascension. "Christ Jesus" is the phrase mostly used in this epistle, in which the Office of the Christ, the Anointed prophet, priest, and king, is the prominent thought; when the Person is prominent, "Jesus Christ" is the phrase used. 7. Greek, "That He might show forth (middle reflexive voice: for His own glory, ch. 1. 6, 12, 14) in the ages which are coming on," i.e., the blessed ages of the gospel which supersede "the age (Greek, for 'course') of this world" (v. 2), and the past "ages" from which the mystery was hidden (Colossians, 1. 26, 27). These good ages, though beginning with the first preaching of the gospel, and thenceforth continually succeeding one another, are not consummated till the Lord's coming again (cf. ch. 1. 21; Hebrews, 6. 5). The words, "coming on," do not exclude the time then present, but imply simply the ages following upon Christ's "raising them up together" spiritually (v. 6). kindness—"benignity," through Christ—rather, as Greek, "in Christ" the same expression as is so often repeated, to mark that all our blessings centre "IN HIM." 8. For—illustrating "the exceeding riches of His grace in kindness." Translate as in v. 5, "Ye are in a saved state," through faith—The effect of the power of Christ's resurrection (ch. 1. 19, 20; Philippians, 3. 10) whereby we are "raised together" with Him (v. 6; Colossians, 2. 12). Some of the oldest MSS. read, "through your (lit., the) faith." The instrument or man of salvation on the part of the person saved: Christ alone is the meritorious agent, and that—viz., the act of believing, or "faith." "Of yourselves" stands in opposition to, "it is the gift of God" (Philippians, 1. 29). "That which I have said, 'through faith,' I do not wish to be understood so as if I excepted faith itself from grace." [ETRUS.] "God justifies the believing man, not for the worthiness of his belief, but for the worthiness of Him in whom he believes." [HOOKER.] The initiation, as well as the increase, of faith, is from the Spirit of God, not only by an external proposal of the word, but by internal illumination in the soul. [PEARSON.] Yet "faith" cometh by the means which man must avail himself of, viz., "hearing the word of God" (Romans, 10. 17), and prayer (Luke, 11. 13), though the blessing is wholly of God (1 Corinthians, 3. 6, 7). 9. Not of works—This clause stands in contrast to "by grace," as is confirmed by Romans, 4. 4, 5; 11. 6. lest—rather, as Greek, "that no man should boast" (Romans, 3. 27; 4. 2). 10. workmanship—lit., "a thing of His making"; "handiwork." Here the spiritual creation, not the physical, is referred to (v. 8, 9). created—having been created (ch. 4. 24; Psalm 102. 18; Isaiah, 43. 21; 2 Corinthians, 5. 5, 17). unto—"for good works." "Good works" cannot be performed until we are new "created unto" them. St. Paul never calls the works of the law "good works." We are not saved by, but created unto, good works. before ordained—Greek, "before made ready" (cf. John, 5. 36). God marks out for each in His purposes beforehand, the particular good works, and the time and way which he sees best. God both makes ready by His Providence the opportunities for the works, and makes us ready for their performance (John, 16. 10; 2 Timothy, 2. 21). that we should walk in them—not "be saved" by them. Works do not justify, but the justified man works (Galatians, 5. 22-25). 11. The Greek order in the oldest MSS. is, "That in time past (lit., once) ye, &c. Such remembrance shapens gratitude and strengthens faith (v. 19). [BENGL.] Gentiles in the flesh—i.e., Gentiles in respect to circumcision. called Uncircumcision—The Gentiles were called (in contempt), and were, the Uncircumcision; the Jews were called, but were not truly, the Circumcision. [ELICOTT.] in the flesh made by hands—as opposed to the true "circumcision of the heart in the Spirit, and not the letter" (Romans, 2. 29), "made without hands in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ" (Colossians, 2. 11). 12. without Christ—Greek, "separate from Christ," having no part in Him; far from Him. A different Greek word (anew) would be required to express, "Christ was not present with you." [ITTM.] alien—Greek, "alienated from." Not merely "separated from." The Israelites were cut off from the commonwealth of God, but it was as being self-righteous, indolent, and unworthy, not as aliens and strangers. [CHRYSOSTOM.] The expression, "alienated from," takes it for granted that the Gentiles, before they had apostatized from the primitive truth, had been sharers in light and life (cf. ch. 4. 15, 23). The hope of redemption through the Messiah, on their subsequent apostasy, was embodied into a definite "commonwealth" or polity, viz., that "of Israel," from which the Gentiles were alienated. Contrast v. 13; ch. 3. 6; 4. 4, 5; with Psalm 147. 20. covenants of promise—rather, "...of the promise," viz., "to thee and thy seed will I give this land" (Romans, 9. 4; Galatians, 3. 16). The plural implies the several renewals of the covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and with the whole people at Sinai. [ALFORD.] "The promise" is singular, to signify that the covenant, in reality, and substantially, is one and the same at all times, but only different in its accidents and external circumstances (cf. Hebrews, 1. 1, "at sundry times and in divers manners"). without—hope—beyond this life (1 Corinthians, 15. 19). The conjectures of heathen philosophers as to a future life were at best vague, and utterly unsatisfactory. They had no Divine "promise," and therefore no sure ground of "hope." Epicurus and Aristotle did not believe in it at all. The Platonists believed the soul passed through perpetual changes, now happy, and then again miserable. The Stoics, that it existed no longer than till the time of the general burning up of all things, without God—Greek, "atheists," i.e., they had not "God" in the sense we use the word, the Eternal Being who made and governs all things (cf. Acts, 14, 15, "Turn from these vanities unto the living God who made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all things therein"), whereas the Jews had distinct ideas of God and immortality. Cf. also Galatians, 4, 8, "Ye knew not God... ye did service unto them which are no gods" (1 Thessalonians, 4, 5). So also pantheists are atheists, for an impersonal God is no God, and an ideal immortality no immortality. [THOLUCK.] in the world—in contrast to belonging to "the commonwealth of Israel." Having their portion and their all in this godless vain world (Psalm 17, 14), from which Christ delivers His people (John, 15, 19; 17, 14; Galatians, 1, 4). 13. now—in contrast to "at that time" (v. 12). In Christ Jesus—"Jesus is here added, whereas the expression before (v. 12) had been merely "Christ," to mark that they know Christ as the personal Saviour, "Jesus," sometimes—Greek, "afortetime," far off—The Jewish description of the Gentiles, far off from God and from the people of God (v. 17; Isaiah, 57, 19; Acts, 2, 39). are—Greek, "have been," by—Greek, "in." Thus "the blood of Christ" is made the seal of a covenant in which their nearness to God consists. In ch. 1, 7, where the blood is more directly spoken of as the instrument, it is "through His blood." [ALFORD.] 14. he—Greek, "Himself" alone, pre-eminently, and none else. Emphatical, our peace—not merely "Peacemaker," but "Himself" the price of our (Jews' and Gentiles' alike) peace with God, and so the bond of union between "both" in God. He took both into Himself, and reconciled them, united, to God, by His assuming our nature and our penal and legal liabilities (v. 15; Isaiah, 5, 5, 6; Micah, 5, 5; Colossians, 1, 20). His title, "Shiloh," means the same (Genesis, 49, 10). The middle wall of partition—Greek, "parted," the partition" or "fence"—the middle wall which parted Jew and Gentile. There was a balustrade of stone which separated the court of the Gentiles from the holy place, which it was death for a Gentile to pass. But this, though incidentally alluded to, was but a symbol of the partition itself, viz., "the enmity" between "both" and God (v. 15), the real cause of separation from God, and so the mediate cause of their separation from one another. Hence there was a twofold wall of partition, one the inner wall, severing even the Jewish people from entrance to the holy part of the temple where the priests officiated, the other the outer wall, separating the Gentile proselytes from access to the court of the Jews (cf. Ezekiel, 44, 7; Acts, 21, 28). Thus this twofold wall represented the Sinaitic law, which both severed all men, even the Jews, from access to God (through sin, which is the violation of the law), and also separated the Gentiles from the Jews. As the term "wall" implies the strength of the partition; so "fence" implies that it was easily removed by God when the due time came. 15. Either, make "enmity" an apposition to "the middle wall of partition": "Hath broken down the middle wall of partition not merely as English Version, 'between us,' but also between all men and God, to wit, the enmity (Romans, 8, 7, by his flesh" (cf. v. 16; Romans, 8, 3), the law of commandments contained in—Greek, "the law of the commandments [consisting] in ordinances." This law was "the partition" or "fence," which embodied the expression of the "enmity" (the "wrath" of God against our sin, and our enmity to Him, v. 3) (Romans, 4, 15; 5, 20;

7, 10, 11; 8, 7). Christ has in, or by, His crucified flesh, abolished it, so far as its condemning and enmity-creating power is concerned (Colossians, 2, 14), substituting for it the law of love, which is the everlasting spirit of the law, and which flows from the realization in the soul of His love in His death for us. Translate what follows, "That He might make the two (Jews and Gentiles) into one new man." Not that He might merely reconcile the two to each other, but incorporate the two, reconciled in Him to God, into one new man: the old man to which both belonged, the enemy of God, having been slain in His flesh on the cross. Observe, too, ONE new man: we are all in God's sight but one in Christ, as we are but one in Adam. [ALFORD.] making peace—primarily between all and God, secondarily between Jews and Gentiles: He being "our peace." This "peace-making" precedes its publication (v. 17). 16. Translate, "Might altogether reconcile them both in one body (the church, Colossians, 3, 15) unto God through His cross." The Greek for "reconcile" (apocatalaxe), found only here and Colossians, 1, 20, expresses not only a return to favour with one (calallage), but so to lay aside enmity that complete amity follows; to pass from enmity to complete reconciliation. [TRIN.] slain the enmity—viz., that had been between man and God; and so that between Jew and Gentile which had resulted from it. By His being slain, He slew it (cf. Hebrews, 2, 14). thereby—Greek, "therein" "in" or "by the cross," i.e., His crucifixion (Colossians, 2, 15). 17. Translate, "He came and announced glad tidings of peace." "He came" with His own free love, and "announced peace" with His own mouth to the apostles (Luke, 24, 36; John, 20, 19, 21, 26); and by them to others, through His Spirit present in His church (John, 14, 15). Acts, 26, 23 is strictly parallel: after His resurrection "He showed light to the people" (them that were night) and to the Gentiles ("you that were afar off"), by His Spirit in His ministers (cf. 1 Peter, 3, 19), and to them—The oldest MSS. insert "peace" again: "And peace to them." The repetition implies the joy with which both alike would dwell again and again upon the welcome word "peace." So Isaiah, 57, 19, 18. Translate, "For it is through Him (John, 14, 6; Hebrews, 10, 19) that we have our access (ch. 3, 12; Romans, 5, 2), both of us, in (i.e., united in, i.e., by, 1 Corinthians, 12, 13, Greek) one Spirit to the Father," viz., as our common Father, reconciled to both alike; whence flows the removal of all separation between Jew and Gentile. The oneness of "the Spirit," through which we both have our access, is necessarily followed by oneness of the body, the church (v. 16). The distinctness of persons in the Divine Trinity appears in this verse. It is also fatal to the theory of sacerdotal priests in the gospel through whom alone the people can approach God. All alike, people and ministers, can draw nigh to God through Christ their ever living Priest. 19. Now therefore—rather, "So then." [ALFORD.] foreigners—rather, "sojourners," opposed to "members of the household," as "strangers" is to "fellow-citizens." Philipians, 3, 19, 20, "conversation," Greek, "citizenship," but—The oldest MSS. add, "are," with the saints—"the commonwealth of (spiritual) Israel" (v. 12, of God—THE FATHER: as JESUS CHRIST appears in v. 20, and THE SPIRIT in v. 22. 20. Translate as Greek, "Built up upon," &c. (participle: having been built up upon; omit, therefore, "and are"). Cf. 1 Corinthians, 3, 11, 12. The same image in ch. 3, 15, recurs in his address to the Ephesian elders (Acts, 20, 32), and in his epistle to Timothy at Ephesus (1 Timothy, 3, 15; 2 Timothy, 2, 19), naturally suggested by the splendid architecture of Diana's temple; the glory of the Christian temple is internal and real, not mere idolatrous gaud. The image of a building is appropriate also to the Jew-Christians; as the temple at Jerusalem was the strong hold of Judaism; as Diana's temple, of Revelation. Foundation of the apostles, &c.—i. e., upon their ministry and living example (cf. Matthew, 16. 18). Christ Himself, the only true foundation, was the grand subject of their ministry, and spring of their life. As one with Him and His fellow-workers, they, too, in a secondary sense, are called "foundations" (Revelation, 2. 14). The "prophets" are joined with them closely; for the expression is here not "foundations of the apostles and the prophets," but "foundations of the apostles and prophets." For the doctrine of both was essentially one (1 Peter, 1. 10, 11; Revelation, 10. 10). The apostles take the precedence (Luke, 10. 24). Thus he appropriately shows regard to the claims of Jews and Gentiles: "the prophets" representing the old Jewish dispensation, "the apostles" the new. The "prophets" of the new also are included. BURGON & ALFORD infer the meaning solely to these (ch. 3. 5; 4. 11). These passages imply, I think, that the New Testament prophets are not excluded; but the apostle's plain reference to Psalm 118. 22, "the head stone of the corner," proves that the Old Testament prophets are a prominent thought. David is called a "prophet" in Acts, 2. 30. Cf. also Isaiah, 28. 16: another prophet present to the mind of St. Paul, which prophecy leans on the earlier one of Jacob (Genesis, 48. 24). The sense of the context, too, suits this: Ye were once aliens from the commonwealth of Israel (in the time of her Old Testament prophets), but now ye are members of the true Israel, built upon the foundation of her New Testament apostles, and Old Testament prophets. St. Paul occasionally identifies his teaching with that of Israel's old prophets (Acts, 28. 23, 25, 29). The costly foundation stones of the temple (1 Kings, 5. 17) typified the same truth (cf. Jeremiah, 51. 26). The same stone is at once the corner stone, and the foundation stone on which the whole building rests. St. Paul supposes a stone or rock so large and so fashioned as to be both at once; supporting the whole as the foundation, and in part rising up at the extremities, so as to admit of the side walls meeting in it, and being united in it as the corner stone. [ZACHARIAS.] As the corner stone, it is conspicuous, as was Christ (1 Peter, 2. 6); and coming in men's way may be stumbled over, as the Jews did at Christ (Matthew, 21. 42; 1 Peter, 2. 7). 21. In whom—as holding together the whole. Itly framed—so as exactly to fit together. growth—"is growing" continually. Here an additional thought is added to the image; the church has the growth of a living organism, not the mere increase of a building. Cf. 1 Peter, 2. 5, "lively stones... built up a spiritual house." Cf. ch. 4. 16; Zechariah, 4. 12, "The Branch shall build the temple of the Lord," where similarly the growth of a branch, and the building of a temple, are joined, hay—as being the "habitation of God" (v. 22). So "in the Lord" (Christ) answers to "through the Spirit" (v. 22; cf. ch. 3. 16, 17). "Christ is the inclusive Head of all the building, the element in which it has its being and its growth." [ALFORD.] 22. are builded together—translate, "Are being builded together," through—Greek, "In the Spirit." God, by His Spirit &c. believers, has them for His habitation (1 Corinthians, 3. 16, 17; 6. 19; 2 Corinthians, 6. 16).

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-21. HIS APOSTOLIC OFFICE TO MAKE KNOWN THE MYSTERY OF CHRIST REVEALED BY THE SPIRIT: PRAYER THAT BY THE SAME SPIRIT THEY MAY COMPREHEND THE VAST LOVE OF CHRIST: DOXOLOGY ENDING THIS DIVISION OF THE EPISTLE. As the first chapter treated of the FATHER'S office; and the second, THE SON'S, so this, that of THE SPIRIT. 1. of Jesus Christ—Greek, "Christ Jesus." The office is the prominent thought in the latter arrangement; the person, in the former. He here marks the Messiahship of "Christ," maintained by him as the origin of his being a "prisoner," owing to the jealousy of the Jews being roused at his preaching it to the Gentiles. His very

bonds were profitable to ("for" or "in behalf of") Gentiles (v. 13; 2 Timothy, 2. 10). He digresses at "For this cause," and does not complete the sentence which he had intended, until v. 14, where he resumes the words, "For this cause," &c., because I know this your call of God as Gentiles (ch. 2. 11-23), to be "fellow-heirs" with the Jews (v. 6), "I bow my knees to" the Father of our common Saviour (v. 14, 16) to confirm you in the faith by His Spirit. "I Paul" expresses the agent employed by the Spirit to enlighten them, after he had been first enlightened himself by the same Spirit (v. 2-5, 9). 2. If—The Greek does not imply doubt: "Assuming (what I know to be the fact, &c.) that ye have heard," &c. "If, as I presume," &c. The indicative in the Greek, shows that no doubt is implied: "Seeing that doubtless," &c. He by this phrase delicately reminds them of their having heard from himself, and probably from others subsequently, the fact. See Introduction, showing that these words do not disprove the address of this epistle to the Ephesians. Cf. Acts, 20. 17-24, the dispensation—"The office of dispensing, as a steward, the grace of God which was not 'is' given me to you-ward," &c., to dispense to you. 3. he made known—"The oldest MSS., &c., read, "That by revelation was the mystery (&c.), of the admission of the Gentiles, &c.;" ch. 1. 9 made known unto me" (Galatians, 1. 12, as I wrote afore—&c., in this epistle (ch. 1. 6, 10), the words of which he partly repeats. 4. understand my knowledge—"perceive my understanding." [ALFORD] or "intelligence." "When ye read," implies that, deep as are the mysteries of this epistle, the way for all to understand them is to read it (2 Timothy, 2. 15, 16). By perceiving his understanding of the mysteries, they, too, will be enabled to understand the mystery of Christ—"The 'mystery' is Christ Himself, once hidden, but now revealed (Colossians, 1. 27). 5. in other ages—Greek, "generations," not made known—He does not say, "Has not been revealed." Making known by revelation, is the source of making known by preaching. [BURGON.] The former was vouchsafed only to the prophets, in order that they might make known the truth so revealed to men in general, unto the sons of men—men in their state by birth, as contrasted with those illuminated "by the Spirit" (Greek, "in the Spirit," cf. Revelation, 1. 10; Matthew, 16. 17. as—"The mystery of the call of the Gentiles (of which Paul speaks here) was not unknown to the Old Testament prophets (Isaiah, 56. 6, 7; 49. 6). But they did not know it with the same explicit distinctness "as" it has been now known (Acts, 10. 15, 20; 11. 18-21). They probably did not know that the Gentiles were to be admitted without circumcision, or that they were to be on a level with the Jews in partaking of the grace of God. The gift of "the Spirit" in its fullness was reserved for the New Testament, that Christ might thereby be glorified. The epithet "holy," marks the special consecration of the New Testament "prophets" (who are here meant) by the Spirit, compared with which even the Old Testament prophets were but "sons of men" (Ezekiel, 2. 3, and elsewhere). 6. Translate, "That the Gentiles are," &c., and fellow-members of the same body, and fellow-partakers of the (so the oldest MSS. read, not His) promise, in Christ Jesus (added in the oldest MSS.), through the gospel." It is "in Christ Jesus" that they are made "fellow-heirs" in the inheritance of God: "of the same body" under the Head, CHRIST JESUS; and "fellow-partakers of the promise" in the communion of THE HOLY SPIRIT (ch. 1. 13; Hebrews, 6. 4). The Trinity is thus alluded to, as often elsewhere in this epistle (ch. 2. 19, 20, 22). 7. Whereof—"of which" gospel, according to—in consequence of, and in accordance with, "the gift of the grace of God," given—"which (gift of grace) was given to me by (Greek, according to, & v. 20; ch. 1. 19: as the result of, and in proportion to) the effectual working

(Greek, 'energy,' or 'in-working') of His power." 8. an —Not merely was I in times past, but I still am the least worthy of so high an office (cf. 1 Timothy, 1. 15, end). least of all saints—not merely "of all apostles" (1 Corinthians, 15. 9, 10). 16—Greek, "has been given," among—Omitted in the oldest MSS. Translate, "To announce to the Gentiles the glad tidings of the unsearchable Job, 5. 9) riches," &c., viz., of Christ's grace (ch. 1. 7; 2. 7). Romans, 11. 33, "unsearchable" as a mine inexhaustible, whose treasures can never be fully explored (v. 18, 10). 9. to make all men see—Greek, "to enlighten all" (ch. 1. 15; Psalm 18. 28; Hebrews, 6. 4). "All" (cf. Colossians, 1. 28). fellowship—The oldest MSS. read, "economy," or "dispensation" (cf. Colossians, 1. 25, 26; and Note, ch. 1. 10, above). "To make all see how it hath seemed good to God at this time to dispense through me and others, His stewardship what heretofore was a mystery." ELLICOTT explains it, "the arrangement," or "regulation" of the mystery (the union of Jews and Gentiles in Christ) which was now to be humbly traced and acknowledged. In the fact of its having secretly existed in the counsel of God, and now having been revealed to the heavenly powers by means of the church, from the beginning of the world—Greek, "from the beginning of the ages." Cf. ch. 1. 4; Romans, 16. 26; 1 Corinthians, 2. 7. The "ages" are the vast successive periods of time, marked by successive stages of creation and orders of beings. In God—"hidden in" His counsels (ch. 1. 9). created all things by Jesus Christ—God's creation of the world and all things therein, is the foundation of the rest of the "economy," which is freely dispensed according to the universal power of God. [BENJEL.] As God created "the whole range of things" (so the Greek), physical and spiritual alike. He must have an absolute right to adjust all things as He will. Hence, we may see His right to keep the mystery of world-wide salvation in Christ "hidden in Himself," till His own good time for revealing it. The oldest MSS., &c., omit "by Jesus Christ." 10. The design of God in giving St. Paul grace to proclaim to the Gentiles the mystery of salvation heretofore hidden, now—first: opposed to "hidden from the beginning of the world" (v. 3), unto the principalities and (Greek adds "the") powers—unto the various orders of good angels primarily, as these dwell "in the heavenly places" in the highest sense; "known" to their adoring joy (1 Timothy, 3. 16; 1 Peter, 1. 12). Secondly, God's wisdom in redemption is made known to evil angels, who dwell "in heavenly places" in a lower sense, viz., the air (cf. ch. 2. 2, with 6. 12; "known" to their dismay (1 Corinthians, 15. 24; Colossians, 2. 15). might be known—translate, "may be known," by the church—"by means of," or "through the church," which is the "theatre" for the display of God's manifold wisdom (Luke, 15. 10; 1 Corinthians, 4. 9); "a spectacle (Greek, 'theatre') to angels." Hence, angels are but our "fellow-servants" (Revelation, 19. 10). manifold wisdom—though essentially one, as Christ is one, yet varying the economy in respect to places, times, and persons (Isaiah, 55. 8, 9; Hebrews, 1. 1). Cf. 1 Peter, 4. 10, "stewards of the manifold grace of God." Man cannot understand aright its single acts, till he can survey them as a connected whole (1 Corinthians, 13. 12). The sail of the church is no hap-hazard remedy, or afterthought, but part of the eternal scheme, which, amidst manifold varieties of dispensation, is one in its end. 11. when as purposed—Greek; "made," ELLICOTT translates, "wrought." 12. Translate, "Our boldness and our access (ch. 2. 18) in confidence through our faith in Him." ALFORD quotes as an instance, Romans, 8. 28, &c. "THE access" (Greek) implies the formal introduction into the presence of a monarch. 13. "I entreat you not to be despised," for you—in your behalf, which is—rather, "which are your glory," viz., inasmuch as showing that God loved you so much, as both to give His Son for you, and to permit His apostles to suffer "tribulations" for you [CHRISTOSOM?] in preaching the gospel to the Gentiles. Note, v. 1, "prisoner for you Gentiles." My tribulations are your spiritual "glory," as your faith is furthered thereby (1 Corinthians, 4. 10). 14. For this cause—Resuming the thread of v. 1, "For this cause." Because ye have such a standing in God's church. [ALFORD.] bow my knees—the proper attitude in humble prayer. Posture affects the mind, and is not therefore unimportant. See Paul's practice, Acts, 20. 36; and that of the Lord Himself on earth, Luke, 22. 41. unto the Father—The oldest MSS. omit "of our Lord Jesus Christ." But Vulgate and some very old authorities retain them: v. 15, "From whom," in either case, refers to "the Father" (Pater), as "family" (patris, akin in sound and etymology) plainly refers to Him. Still the foundation of all sonship is in Jesus Christ. 15. the whole family—ALFORD, MIDDLETON, &c., translate, "every family;" alluding to the several families in heaven and in earth supposed to exist (THEOPHYLACT, CECUMENIUS, &c., in Suicer 2. 633), the apostle thus being supposed to imply that God, in His relation of Father to us His adopted children, is the great prototype of the paternal relation wherever found. But the idea that "the holy angels are bound up in spiritual families or compaternities," is nowhere else in Scripture referred to. And Acts, 2. 26, where the article is similarly omitted, and yet the translation is, "All the house of Israel," shows that in New Testament Greek the translation is justifiable, "all the family," or "the whole family;" which accords with Scripture views, that angels and men, the saints militant and those with God, are one holy family joined under the one Father in Christ, the mediator between heaven and earth (ch. 1. 10; Philipians, 2. 10). Hence angels are termed our "brethren" (Revelation, 19. 10), and "sons of God" by creation, as we are by adoption (Job, 35. 7). The church is part of the grand family, or kingdom, which comprehends, besides men, the higher spiritual world, where the archetype, to the realization of which redeemed man is now tending, is already realized. This universal idea of the "kingdom" of God as one divine community, is presented to us in the Lord's prayer. By sin men were estranged, not only from God, but from that higher spiritual world in which the kingdom of God is already realized. As Christ when He reconciled men to God, united them to one another in a divine community (joined to Himself, the one Head), breaking down the partition wall between Jew and Gentile (ch. 2. 14), so also He joins them in communion with all those who have already attained that perfection in the kingdom of God, to which the church on earth is aspiring (Colossians, 1. 20). [NEANDER.] is named—derives its origin and its name as sons of God. To be named, and to be, are one with God. To bear God's name is to belong to God as His own peculiar people (Numbers, 6. 27; Isaiah, 43. 7; 44. 6; Romans, 8. 25, 26). 16. according to—i.e., in abundance consonant to the riches of His glory; not "according to" the narrowness of our hearts. Colossians, 1. 11, "strengthened with all might according to His glorious power," by—Greek, "through;" "by means of His Spirit." i.e.—The Greek implies "influx into," the inner man—ch. 4. 22, 24; 1 Peter, 3. 4, "the hidden man of the heart." Not predicated of unbelievers, whose inward and outward man alike are carnal. But in believers, the "inner (new) man," their true self, stands in contrast to their old man, which is attached to them as a body of death daily being mortified, but not their true self. 17. That—So that, dwell—abidingly make His abode (John, 14. 23). Where the Spirit is, there Christ is (John, 11. 20, 18). by faith—Greek, "through faith," which opens the door of the heart to Jesus (John, 3. 20). It is not enough that He be on the tongue, or fit through the

in: the heart is His proper seat. [CALVIN.] "You are rooted and grounded in love" (cf. v. 19), is in Greek connected with this clause, not with the see, "that ye may be able to comprehend." "rooted" is an image from a tree; "grounded" (Greek, antedon) "having your foundations resting on"; in a building (cf. Note, ch. 2, 20, 21; Colossians, 1, 23; 1). Contrast Matthew, 13, 6, 21. "Love," the first fruit of the Spirit, flowing from Christ's love realized the soul, was to be the basis on which should rest its further comprehension of all the vastness of God's love. 18. May be able—even still further, etc. "May be fully able," breadth...length...depth st.—viz., the full dimensions of the spiritual plan, answering to "the fullness of God" (v. 19), to which the church, according to its capacity, ought to respond (cf. ch. 4, 10, 13; as to "the fullness of Christ," "breadth" implies Christ's world-wide love, embracing all men; the "length," its being extended through all ages (v. 21); the "depth," its profoundness which no creature can fathom (Romans, 11, 33); "height," its being beyond the reach of any foe to give us (ch. 4, 8). [LIEGMAN.] I prefer to understand "the breadth," etc., to refer to the whole of the mystery of free salvation in Christ for all, Gentile and Jew alike, of which he had been speaking (v. 3-6), of which he now prays they may have a fuller apprehension. As subsidiary to this, and the most vital part of it, he adds, "and to know the love of God" (v. 19). GROTIVS understands depth and height of God's goodness raising us from the lowest depression to the greatest height. 19. passeth—surpasseth, exceeds, parabolos "to know...which surpasseth knowledge," sc. that when he says "know," he does not mean that we can adequately know; all we know is, that His love exceeds far our knowledge of it, and with even a fresh accession of knowledge hereafter, will still exceed them. Even as God's power exceeds our thoughts (r. 20). filled with—rather, as Greek, "filled unto all the fullness of God" (this is the grand idea, i.e., filled, each according to your capacity, with divine wisdom, knowledge, and love; v. as God will, and as Christ who dwells in your hearts, hath filled the fullness of the Godhead dwelling in Him bodily) (Colossians, 2, 9). 20. unto him—Contrasted with ourselves and our needs. Translate, "That is able above things (what is above all things, to do exceeding things) and able above what we ask or even think" (thought is a wider range than prayers). The word above, occurs thrice as often in St. Paul's writings, as in all the rest of the New Testament, showing the warm utterance of Paul's spirit, according to the power-indwelling Spirit (Romans, 8, 26). He appeals to us and his experience. 21. Translate, "Unto Him the glory i.e., the whole glory of the gracious dispensation of salvation just spoken of) in the church theatre for the manifestation of the glory, v. to Christ Jesus (as in Him all the glory centres, Bariah, 6, 13 to all the generations of eternal ages," "of the age of the ages." Eternity is conceived as consisting of "ages" (these again consisting of "generations"), endlessly succeeding one another.

er. 1-32. EXHORTATIONS TO CHRISTIAN DUTIES RESTING ON OUR CHRISTIAN PRIVILEGES, AS UNITED ONE BODY, THOUGH VARYING IN THE GRACES GIVEN TO THE SEVERAL MEMBERS, THAT WE MAY BE BUILT UP INTO A PERFECT MAN IN CHRIST. 1. Translate, according to the Greek order, "I beseech you, therefore seeing that such is your calling of grace, chs. 2, 3, 1, 13; I the prisoner in the Lord" (i.e., imprisoned in the Lord's cause). What the world mentioned iniquity, he counts the highest honour, and dies in His bonds for Christ, more than a king in his realm. [THEOPHILET.] His bonds, too, are an argument which should enforce his exhortation. vocation—translate, "calling" to accord as the Greek does, with "called" (v. 4; ch. 1, 18; Romans, 8, 28, 30). Colossians, 3, 15, similarly grounds Christian duties on our Christian "calling." The exhortations of this part of the epistle are built on the conscious enjoyment of the privileges mentioned in the former part. Cf. ch. 4, 32, with ch. 1, 7; 5, 1, with 1, 6; 4, 30, with 1, 13; 5, 15, with 1, 8, 2, 3. lowliness—In classical Greek, the meaning is meanness of spirit: the gospel has elevated the word to express a Christian grace, viz., the esteeming of ourselves small, inasmuch as we are so; the thinking truly, and because truly, therefore lowly, of ourselves. [TRINCH.] meekness—that spirit in which we accept God's dealings with us without disputing and resisting; and also the accepting patiently of the injuries done us by men, out of the thought that they are permitted by God for the chastening and purifying of His people (2 Samuel, 16, 11; cf. Galatians, 6, 1; 2 Timothy, 2, 25; Titus, 2, 2). It is only the lowly, humble heart that is also meek (Colossians, 3, 12). As "lowliness and meekness" answer to "forbearing one another in love" (cf. "love," v. 15, 16), so "long-suffering" answers to (v. 4) "endeavouring (Greek, earnestly or zealously giving diligence) to keep (maintain) the unity of the Spirit (the unity between men of different tempers, which flows from the presence of the Spirit, who is Himself "one," v. 4) in (united in) the bond of peace" (the "bond" by which "peace" is maintained, viz., "love," Colossians, 3, 14, 15 [BENNETT]; or, peace itself is the "bond" meant, uniting the members of the church [ALFORD]). 4. In the apostles' creed, the article as to THE CHURCH properly follows that as to THE HOLY GHOST. To the Trinity naturally is annexed the church, as the house to its tenant, to God His temple, the state to its founder. [AUGUSTINE, Enchir. ad Laurentium, c. 15.] There is yet to be a church, not merely potentially, but actually Catholic or world-wide; then the church and the world will be co-extensive. Rome falls into inextricable error by setting up a mere man as a visible head, antedating that consummation which Christ, the true visible Head, at His appearing shall first realize. As the "SPIRIT" is mentioned here, so the "LORD" (Jesus), v. 5, and "God the Father," v. 6. Thus the Trinity is again set forth, hope—here associated with "the Spirit," which is the "earnest of our inheritance" (ch. 1, 13, 14). As "faith" is mentioned, v. 5, so "hope" here, and "love," v. 2. The Holy Spirit, as the common higher principle of life (ch. 2, 15, 22), gives to the church its true unity. Outward uniformity is as yet unattainable; but beginning by having one mind, we shall hereafter end by having "one body." The true "body" of Christ (all believers of every age) is already "one," as joined to the one Head. But its unity is as yet not visible, even as the Head is not visible; but it shall appear when He shall appear (John, 17, 21-23; Colossians, 3, 4). Meanwhile the rule is, "In essentials, unity; in doubtful questions, liberty; in all things, charity." There is more real unity where both go to heaven under different names, than when with the same name one goes to heaven, the other to hell. Truth is the first thing: those who reach it, will at last reach unity, because truth is one. Whilst those who seek unity as the first thing, may purchase it at the sacrifice of truth, and so of the soul itself. "your calling"—the one "hope" flowing from our "calling" is the element "IN" which we are "called" to live. Instead of privileged classes, as the Jews under the law, a unity of dispensation was henceforth to be the common privilege of Jew and Gentile alike. Spirituality, universality, and unity, were destined to characterize the church; and it shall be so at last (Isaiah, 2-4; 11, 9, 13; Zephaniah, 3, 9; Zechariah, 11, 17). 5. Similarly "faith" and "baptism" (the sacramental seal of faith are connected (Mark, 16, 16; Colossians, 2, 12. Cf. 1 Corinthians, 12, 13. "Faith" is not here that which we believe, but the act of believing, the mean by which we apprehend the "one Lord." "Baptism" is specified, being the sacrament whereby we are incorporated into the "one body." Not the Lord's supper, which is an act of matured communion on the part of those already incorporate, "a symbol of union, not of unity." [ELLCOTT.] In 1 Corinthians, 10, 17, where a breach of union was in question, it forms the rallying point. [ALFORD.] There is not added, "One Pope, one council, one form of government." [Cautions for times.] The church is one in unity of faith (v. 5; Jude, 3); unity of origination (ch. 2, 19-21); unity of sacraments (v. 5; 1 Corinthians, 10, 17; 12, 13); unity of "hope" (v. 4; Titus, 1, 3); unity of charity (v. 3); unity (not uniformity) of discipline and government: for where there is no order, no ministry with Christ as the Head, there is no church. [PEARSON, Creed, article 9.] 6. above—"over all." The "one God over all" (in His sovereignty and by His grace) is the grand source and crowning apex of unity (ch. 2, 10, end), through all—by means of Christ who "fillth all things" (v. 10; ch. 2, 20, 21), and is "a propitiation" for all men (1 John, 2, 2). in you all—The oldest MSS. omit "you." Many of the oldest versions and fathers and old MSS. read, "in us all." Whether the pronoun be read or not, it must be understood either from the "ye," v. 4, or from the "us," v. 7; for other parts of Scripture prove that the Spirit is not "in all men, but only in believers (Romans, 8, 9, 14). God is "Father" both by generation (as Creator) and regeneration (ch. 2, 10; James, 1, 17, 18; 1 John, 5, 1). 7. But—Though "one" in our common connexion with "one Lord, one faith, &c., one God," yet "each one of us" has assigned to him his own particular gift, to be used for the good of the whole: none is overlooked: none therefore can be dispensed with for the edifying of the church (v. 12). A motive to unity (v. 3). Translate, "Unto each one of us was the grace (which was bestowed by Christ at His ascension, v. 8) given according to," &c. the measure—the amount "of the gift of Christ" (Romans, 12, 3, 6). 8. Wherefore—"For which reason," viz., in order to intimate that Christ, the Head of the church, is the author of all these different gifts, and that giving of them is an act of His "grace." [ESTIUS.] he saith—God, whose word the Scripture is (Psalm 68, 18). When he ascended—God is meant in the Psalm, represented by the ark, which was being brought up to Zion in triumph by David, after that "the Lord had given him rest round about from all his enemies" (2 Samuel, 6; 7, 1; 1 Chronicles, 15.). St. Paul quotes it of CHRIST ascending to heaven, who is therefore GOD, captivity—i.e., a band of captives. In the Psalm, the captive foes of David. In the antitypical meaning, the foes of Christ the Son of David, the devil, death, the curse, and sin (Colossians, 2, 15; 2 Peter, 2, 4), led as it were in triumphal procession as a sign of the destruction of the foe, gave gifts unto men—In the Psalm, "Received gifts for men," Hebrew, "among men," i.e., Thou hast received gifts to distribute among men. As a conqueror distributes in token of his triumph the spoils of foes, as donatives among his people. The impartation of the gifts and graces of the Spirit depended on Christ's ascension (John, 7, 39; 14, 12). St. Paul stops short in the middle of the verse, and does not quote "that the Lord God might dwell among them." This, it is true, is partly fulfilled in Christians being "an habitation of God through the Spirit" (ch. 2, 22). But the Psalm (v. 16) refers to "the Lord dwelling in Zion for ever" the ascension amidst attendant angels, having as its counterpart the Second advent amidst "thousands of angels" (v. 17), accompanied by the restoration of Israel (v. 22), the destruction of God's enemies and the resurrection (v. 20, 21, 28), the conversion of the kingdoms of the world to the Lord at Jerusalem (v. 29-34). 9. St. Paul reasons that assuming Him to be God: His ascent implies a previous descent; and that the language of the Psalm can only refer to Christ, who first descended, then ascended. For God the Father does not ascend or descend. Yet the Psalm plainly refers to God (v. 8, 17, 18). It must therefore be GOD THE SON (John, 6, 33, 62). As He declares (John, 3, 13), "No man hath ascended up to heaven, but He that came down from heaven." Others, though they did not previously descend, have ascended; but none save Christ can be referred to in the Psalm as having done so; for it is of God it speaks. lower parts of the earth—The antithesis or contrast to "far above all heavens," is the argument of ALFORD, &c., to show that this phrase means more than simply the earth, viz., the regions beneath it, even as He ascended not merely to the visible heavens, but "far above" them. Moreover, His design "that He might fill all things" (v. 10, Greek, "the whole universe of things"), may imply the same. But see Note on those words. Also the leading "captive" of the "captive band" ("captivity" of Satanic powers, may imply that the warfare reached to their habitation itself (Psalm 63, 9). Christ, as Lord of all, took possession first of the earth and the unseen world beneath it (some conjecture that the region of the lost is in the central parts of our globe, then of heaven (Acts, 2, 27, 28). However, all we surely know is, that His soul at death descended to Hades, i.e., underwent the ordinary condition of departed spirits of men. The leading captive of Satanic powers here, is not said to be at His descent, but at His ascension; so that no argument can be drawn from it for a descent to the abodes of Satan. Acts, 2, 27, 28, and Romans, 10, 7, favour the view of the reference being simply to His descent to Hades. So PEARSON on Creed (Philippians, 2, 10), all heavens—Greek, "all the heavens" (Hebrew, 7, 26; 4, 14), Greek, "passed through the heavens" to the throne of God itself, might fill—in Greek, the actions continued to the present time, both "might" and "may fill," viz., with His Divine presence and Spirit, not with His glorified body. "Christ, as God, is present every where; as glorified man, He can be present every where." [ELLCOTT.] 11. Greek, emphatical, "Himself" by His supreme power. "It is He that gave," &c. gave some, apostles—translate, "...some to be apostles, and some to be prophets," &c. The men who filled the office, no less than the office itself, were a divine gift. [EADIE.] Ministers did not give themselves. Cf. with the list here, 1 Corinthians, 12, 10, 28. As the apostles, prophets, and evangelists, were special and extraordinary ministers; so "pastors and teachers" are the ordinary stated ministers of a particular flock, including, probably, the bishops, presbyters, and deacons. Evangelists were itinerant preachers like our missionaries, as Philip the deacon (Acts, 21, 8); as contrasted with stationary "pastors and teachers" (2 Timothy, 4, 5). The evangelist founded the church; the teacher built it up in the faith already received. The "pastor" had the outward rule and guidance of the church; the bishop, as to revelation, the evangelist testified infallibly of the past; "the prophet," infallibly of the future. No prophet derived all from the Spirit; the evangelist, in the special case of the Four, recorded matter of fact, cognizable to the senses, under the Spirit's guidance. No one form of church polity as permanently unalterable is laid down in the New Testament, though the apostolical order of bishops, or presbyters, and deacons, superintended by higher overseers (called bishops after the apostolic times), has the highest sanction of primitive usage. In the case of the Jews, a fixed model of hierarchy and ceremonial unalterably bound the people, most minutely detailed in the law. In the New Testament, the absence of minute directions for church government and ceremonies, shows that a fixed model was not designed; the general in the vail, etc.—as their element: opposed to "in the Lord." "Vanity of mind" is the waste of the rational powers on worthless objects, of which idleness is one of the more glaring instances. The root of it is departure from the knowledge of the true God (v. 15, 18; Romans, 1, 21; 1 Thessalonians, 4, 5). 18. More fit, "Being darkened in their understanding," i. e., their intelligence, or perceptions (cf. ch. 5, 8; Acts, 26, 18; ened," imply that before the fall they (in the person of their first father) had been partakers of life and light; and that they had revolted from the primitive revelation (cf. ch. 2, 12). life of God—that life whereby God lives in His own people; as He was the life and light in Adam before the irruption of death and darkness into human nature; and as He is the life in the regenerate (Galatians, 2, 20). "Spiritual life in believers is kindled from the life itself of God." (BENOIX.) through—rather as Greek, "on account of the ignorance," vis., of God. Willful ignorance in the first instance, their fathers not "choosing to retain God in their knowledge." This is the beginning point of their misery (Acts, 17, 30; Romans, 1, 21, 23, 28; 1 Peter, 1, 14). because of—"on account of," blindness—Greek, "hardness," i. e., the hardening of the skin so as not to be sensible of touch. Hence a soul's callousness to feeling (Mark, 3, 6). Where there is spiritual "life" ("the life of God") there is feeling; where there is not, there is "hardness." 19. past feeling—senseless, shameless, hopeless: the ultimate result of a long process of "hardening," or habit of sin (v. 18). "Being past hope," or despairing, is the reading of the Vulgate; though not so well supported as English Version reading, "past feeling," which includes the absence of hope (Jeremiah, 2, 25; 18, 19). given themselves over—in Romans, 1, 24 it is, "God gave them up to uncleanness." Their giving themselves to it was punished in kind, God giving them up to it by withdrawing His preventing grace; their sin thus was made their punishment. They gave themselves up of their own accord to the slavery of their lust, to do all its pleasure, as captives who have ceased to strive with the foe. God gave them up to it, but not against their will; for they give themselves up to it. [ZANCHIUS.] lasciviousness —"wantonness." [ALFORD.] So it is translated, Romans, 13, 13; 2 Peter, 2, 18. It does not necessarily include lasciviousness; but it means intemperate, reckless, readiness for it, and for every self-indulgence.

 "The first beginnings of unchastity." [GROTIUS.]
 "Lawless insolence, and wanton caprice." [TRENCH.] to work all uncleanness—The Greek implies, "with a deliberate view to the working (as if it were their work or business, not a mere accidental fall into sin) of uncleanness of every kind." with greediness—Greek, "in greediness." Uncleanness and greediness of gain often go hand in hand (ch. 5, 3, 5; Colossians, 3, 6); though "greediness" here includes all kinds of self-seeking. 20. learned Christ—(Philippians, 3, 10.) To know Christ Himself, is the great lesson of the Christian life: this the Ephesians began to learn at their conversion. "Christ," in reference to His office, is here specified as the object of learning. "Jesus," in the following verse, as the person. 21. If so be that—Not implying doubt; assuming what I have no reason to doubt, that, &c. heard him—The Him is emphatic; heard Himself, not merely heard about Him. taught by him—Greek, "taught by Him," i.e., being in vital union with Him (Romans, 16, 7), as the truth is, &c.—translate in connexion with "taught;" "And in Him have been taught, according as is truth in Jesus." There is no artifice in the Greek. "Truth" is therefore used in the most comprehensive sense, truth in its essence, and highest perfection, in Jesus; "if according as it is thus in Him, ye have been so taught in Him" in contrast to "the vanity of mind of the Gentiles" (v. 17; cf. John, 1, 14, 17; 18, 37). Contrast John, c. 44. 22. That ye—Following "Ye have been taught" (v. 21), concerning the former conversation—"in respect to your former way of life," the old man—your old unconverted nature (Romans, 6, 6). is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts—rather, "which is being corrupted ('perisheth,' cf. Galatians, 6, 8, 'corruption,' i.e., destruction) according to (i.e., as might be expected from) the lusts of deceit." Deceit is personified: lusts are its servants and tools. In contrast to "the holiness of the truth," v. 24, and "truth in Jesus," v. 21; and answering to Gentile "vanity," v. 17. Corruption and destruction are inseparably associated together. The man's old-nature-lusts are his own executioners, fitting him more and more for eternal corruption and death. 23. be renewed—The Greek (anakainousthai) implies "the continued renewal in the youth of the new man." A different Greek word (anakainousthai) implies "renewal from the old state," in the spirit of your mind—As there is no Greek for "in," which there is at v. 17, "in the vanity of their mind," it is better to translate, "By the Spirit of your mind," i.e., by your new spiritual nature; the restored and divinely-informed leading principle of the mind. The "spirit" of man in New Testament, is only then used in its proper sense, as worthy of its place and governing functions, when it is one Spirit with the Lord. The natural, or animal, man, is described as "not having the Spirit" (Jude, 19). [ALFORD.] Spirit is not in this sense attributed to the unregenerate (1 Thessalonians, 5, 23). 24. put on the new man—Opposed to "the old man," which is to be "put off" (v. 22). The Greek here (kainon) is different from that for "renew-ed" (v. 23). Put on not merely a renovated nature, but a new, i.e., altogether different nature, a changed nature (cf. Colossians, 3, 10, Note). after God, &c.—translate, "Which hath been created (once for all; so the Greek aorist means: in Christ, ch. 2, 10; so that in each believer it has not to be created again, but to be put on) after the (image of) God" (Genesis, 1, 27; Colossians, 3, 10, 1 Peter, 1, 15). &c., God's image in which the first Adam was originally created, is restored to us far more gloriously in the second Adam, the image of the invisible God (2 Corinthians, 4, 4; Colossians, 1, 15; Hebrews, 1, 3). in righteousness—"in" it as the element of the renewed man. true holiness—rather, as the Greek, "holiness of the truth; holiness flowing from sincere following of "the truth of God" (Romans, 1, 25; 3, 7; 15, 8). in relation to "the lusts of deceit" (Greek, v. 22); cf. also v. 21, "truth is in Jesus." "Righteousness" is in relation to our fellow-men, the second table of the law; "Holiness," in relation to God, the first table: the religious observance of offices of piety (cf. Luke, 1, 75). In the parallel (Colossians, 3, 10) it is, "renewed in knowledge after the image," &c. As at Colosse the danger was from false pretenders to knowledge, the true "knowledge" which flows from renewal of the heart is dwelt on; so at Ephesus the danger being from the corrupt morals prevalent around, the renewal in "holiness," contrasted with the Gentile "uncleanness" (v. 19), and "righteousness," in contrast to "greediness," is made prominent. 25. Wherefore—From the general character of "the new man," there will necessarily result the particular features which he now details, putting away—Greek, "having put away" once for all, lying—"falsehood," the abstract. "Speak ye truth each one with his neighbour," is quoted, slightly changed from Zechariah, 8, 16. For "so," he quotes it "with," to mark our inner connexion with one another, as "members one of another." [STIER.] Not merely members of one body. Union to one another in Christ, not merely the external command, instinctively leads Christians to fulfil mutual duties. One member could not injure or deceive another, without injuring himself, as all have a mutual and common interest. 26. Be ye angry, and sin not—So the LXX., Psalm 4, 4. Should circumstances arise to call for anger on your part, let it be as Christ's "anger" (Mark, 3, 5, without sin. Our natural feelings are not wrong when directed to their legitimate object, and when not exceeding due bounds. As in the future literal, so in the present spiritual, resurrection, no essential constituent is annihilated, but all that is a perversion of the original design is removed. Thus indignation at dishonour done to God and wrong to man, is justifiable anger. Passion is sinful (derived from "passio," suffering; implying that amidst seeming energy, a man is really passive, the slave of his anger, instead of ruling it). Let not the sun go down upon your wrath—"wrath" is absolutely forbidden; "anger" not so, though like poison sometimes used as medicine, it is to be used with extreme caution. The sense is not, Your anger shall not be imputed to you if you put it away before nightfall; but "let no wrath (i.e., as the Greek, personal 'irritation' or 'exasperation') mingle with your anger, even though the latter be righteous." [TRENCH, Synonymus.] "Put it away before sunset" (when the Jewish day began), is proverbial for put it away at once before another day begins. (Deuteronomy, 24, 15; also before you part with your brother for the night, perhaps never in this world to meet again. So Jona, "Let not night and anger against any one sleep with you, but go and conciliate the other party though he have been the first to commit the offence." Let not your "anger" at another's wickedness verge into hatred, or contempt, or revenge. [VATABLUS.] 27. Neither give place—i.e., occasion, or scope, to the devil, by continuing in "wrath." The keeping of anger through the darkness of night, is giving place to the devil, the prince of darkness (ch. 6, 12). 28. Greek, "Let him that stealeth." The imperfect or past tense is, however, mainly meant, though not to the exclusion of the present. "Let the stealing person steal no more." Bandits frequented the mountains near Ephesus. Such are meant by those called "thieves" in the New Testament, but rather—For it is not enough to cease from a sin, but the sinner must also enter on the path that is its very opposite. [CHRYSOSTOM.] The stealer, when repentant, should labour more than he would be called on to do, if he had never stolen. Let him labour—Thrift and idleness go together. The thing which is good—in contrast with theft, the thing which is evil in his past character. with his hands—in contrast with his former thievish use of his hands. that he may have to give—"that he may have whereof to impart." He who has stolen should exercise liberality beyond the restitution of what he has taken. Christians in general should make not selfish gain their aim in honest the acquisition of the means of greater their fellow-men; and the being indeed aims of others. So St. Paul himself (2 Thessalonians, 3, 8) acted as he taught (vs. 4, 11). 29. corrupt—lit., "insipid," salt of grace" (Colossians, 4, 6), so worth-becoming corrupt; included in "foolish" (1, 4). Its opposite is "that which is good" (at which, &c.—Greek, "whatever is good," -lit., "for edifying of the need," i.e., for it is needed. Seasonably edifying; occasion and present needs of the hearers censure, at another time consolation, God in themselves must be introduced by our fault they prove injurious instead. TRENCH explains. EXHORTATIONS TO LOVE; AND AGAINST TIES AND COMMUNICATIONS. CIRCUMWALK: REDEMPTING THE TIME: BEING THE SPIRIT: SINGING TO THE LORD

WITH THANKFULNESS: THE WIFE'S DUTY TO HER HUSBAND RESTS ON THAT OF THE CHURCH TO CHRIST. 1. therefore—seeing that "God in Christ forgave you" (ch. 4, 32). followers—Greek, "imitators" of God, in respect to "love" (v. 2); God's essential character (1 John, 4, 16). as dear children—Greek, "as children beloved;" to which v. 2 refers. "As Christ also loved us" (1 John, 4, 19). "We are sons of men, when we do ill; sons of God, when we do well" (AUGUSTINE, Psalm 52.) (cf. Matthew, 5, 44, 45, 48). Sonship infers an absolute necessity of imitation, it being vain to assume the title of son without any similitude of the Father. [PEARSON.] 2. And—In proof that you are so. walk—Resuming ch. 4, 1, "walk worthy of the vocation," &c. as Christ...loved us—From the love of the Father he passes to the love of the Son, in whom God most endearingly manifests His love to us, given himself for us—Greek, "given Himself up (viz., to death, Galatians, 2, 20) for us," i.e., in our behalf; not here vicarious substitution, though that is indirectly implied "in our stead." The offering, and the offering that He offered, were one and the same (John, 15, 13; Romans, 6, 8). offering and sacrifice—"Offering" expresses generally His presenting Himself to the Father, as the Representative undertaking the cause of the whole of our lost race (Psalm 40, 6-8), including His life of obedience; though not excluding His offering of His body for us (Hebrews, 10, 10). It is usually an unbloody offering, in the more limited sense. "Sacrifice" refers to His death for us exclusively. Christ is here, in reference to Psalm 40, 6 (quoted again in Hebrews, 10, 5), represented as the antitype of all the offerings of the law, whether the unbloody or bloody, eucharistical or propitiatory, for a sweet-smelling savour—Greek, "for an odour of a sweet smell," i.e., God is well pleased with the offering on the ground of its sweetness, and so is reconciled to us (ch. 1, 6; Matthew, 3, 17; 2 Corinthians, 5, 18, 19; Hebrews, 10, 6-17). The ointment compounded of principal spices, poured upon Aaron's head, answers to the variety of the graces by which He was enabled to "offer Himself a sacrifice for a sweet-smelling savour." Another type, or prophecy by figure, was "the sweet savour" (savour of rest, Margin) which God smelled in Noah's sacrifice (Genesis, 8, 21). Again, as what Christ is, believers also are (1 John, 4, 17), and ministers are: St. Paul says (2 Corinthians, 2, 17) "we are unto God a sweet savour of Christ." 3. once named—Greek, "Let it not be even named" (v. 4, 12). "Uncleanness" and "covetousness" are taken up again from ch. 4, 19. The two are so closely allied that the Greek for "covetousness" (pleonexia) is used sometimes in Scripture, and often in the Greek fathers, for sins of impurity. The common principle is the longing to fill one's desire with material objects of sense, outside of God. The expression, "not be even named," applies better to impurity, than to "covetousness." 4. fittiness—obscenity in act or gesture, foolish talking—the talk of fools, which is folly and sin together. The Greek of it, and of "fittiness," occurs nowhere else in the New Testament. nor—rather, "or" (cf. v. 3). jesting—Greek, "eutrapelia": found nowhere else in the New Testament: implying strictly that versatility which turns about and adapts itself, without regard to principle, to the shifting circumstances of the moment, and to the varying moods of those with whom it may deal. Not scurrile buffoonery, but refined "persiflage" and "badinage," for which Ephesus was famed (PLAUTUS, Miles Gloriosus, 3, 1, 42-52), and which, so far from being censured, was and is thought by the world a pleasant accomplishment. In Colossians, 3, 8, "filthy communication" refers to the foulness; "foolish talking," to the folly; "jesting," to the false refinement (and trifling witicism, TITTMANN) of discourse unseasoned with the salt of grace. [TRENCH.] not convenient—"unseemly;" not such "as become saints" (v. 3), rather giving of thanks—A happy play on sounds in Greek, eucharistia contrasted with eutrapelia: refined "jesting" and subtle humour sometimes offend the tender feelings of grace; "giving of thanks" gives that real cheerfulness of spirit to believers which the worldly try to get from "jesting" (v. 10, 20; James, 5. 13). 5. this ye know—The oldest MSS. read, "Of this ye are sure knowing;" or as ALFORD, "This ye know being aware," covetous...idolater—(Colossians, 3. 5.) The best reading may be translated, "That is to say, idolatry, which is (in other words) an idolater. St. Paul himself had forsaken all for Christ (1 Corinthians, 6. 10; 11. 27). Covetousness is worship of the creature instead of the Creator, the highest treason against the King of kings (1 Samuel, 15. 22; Matthew, 6. 24; Philippians, 3. 19; 1 John, 2. 15), bath—the present implies the fixedness of the exclusion, grounded on the eternal verities of that kingdom. [ALFORD.] of Christ and of God—rather, as one Greek article is applied to both, "of Christ and God," implying their perfect oneness, which is consistent only with the doctrine that Christ is God (cf. 2 Thessalonians, 1. 12; 1 Timothy, 5. 21; 6. 13). 6. vain—empty, unreal words, viz., palliations of "uncleanliness," v. 5, 4; Isaiah, 6. 20 (that it is natural to indulge in love), "covetousness" (that it is useful to society that men should pursue gain), and "jesting" (that it is witty and clever, and that God will not so severely punish for such things), because of these things—uncleanliness, covetousness, &c. (v. 3-5). cometh—present, not merely "shall come." Is as sure as if already come. children—rather, "sons of disobedience" (ch. 2. 2, 3). The children of unbelief in doctrine (Deuteronomy, 32. 20), are "children of disobedience" in practice, and these again are "children of wrath." 7. Here fellowship with wicked workers is forbidden; in v. 11, with their wicked works. 8, sometimes—"once." The emphasis is on "were." Ye ought to have no fellowship with sin, which is darkness, for your state as darkness is now PAST. Stronger than "in darkness" (Romans, 2. 19), light—not merely "enlightened;" but light enlightening others (v. 13), in—union with the Lord, who is THE LIGHT, children of light—not merely "of the light;" just as "children of disobedience" is used on the opposite side; those whose distinguishing characteristic is light. Pliny, a heathen writing to Trajan, bears unwilling testimony to the extraordinary purity of Christians' lives, contrasted with the people around them. 9. fruit of the Spirit—taken by transcribers from Galatians, 5. 22. The true reading is that of the oldest MSS., &c., "The fruit of THE LIGHT;" in contrast with "the unfruitful works of darkness" (v. 11). This verse is parenthetical. Walk as children of light, i.e., in all good works and words ("FOR the fruit of the light is [borne] in [ALFORD], but BENGLI, 'consists in'] all goodness [opposed to 'malice,' ch. 4. 31], righteousness [opposed to 'covetousness,' v. 3] and truth" [opposed to "lying," ch. 4. 25]). 10. Proving—construed with "walk" (v. 8; Romans, 12. 1, 2). As we prove a coin by the eye and the ear, and by using it, so by accurate and continued study, and above all by practice and experimental trial we may prove or test "what is acceptable unto the Lord." This is the office of "light," of which believers are "children," to manifest what each thing is, whether rightly or unsightly. 11. unfruitful works of darkness—Sins are terminated in themselves, and therefore are called "works," not "fruits" (Galatians, 5. 19, 22). Their only fruit is that which is not in a true sense fruit (Deuteronomy, 32. 32), viz., "death" (Romans, 6. 21; Galatians, 6. 8). Plants cannot bear "fruit" in the absence of light. Sin is "darkness," and its parent is the prince of darkness (ch. 6. 12). Graces, on the other hand, as flourishing in "the light," are reproductive, and abound in fruits; which, as harmoniously combining in one whole, are termed (in the singular) "the FRUIT of the Spirit" (v. 9), rather, &c.—translate as Greek, "Rather even reprove them" (cf. Matthew, 5. 14-16). Not only "have no fellowship, but even reprove them," viz., in words, and in your deeds, which, shining with "the light," virtually reprove all that is contrary to light (v. 13; Jobu, 3. 19-21). "Have no fellowship," does not imply that we can avoid all intercourse (1 Corinthians, 5. 10), but "avoid such fellowship as will defile yourselves;" just as light, though it touch filth, is not soiled by it; nay, as light detects it, so, "even reprove sin." 12. The Greek order is, "For the things done in secret by them, it is a shame even to speak of." The "for" gives his reason for "not naming" (cf. v. 3) in detail the works of darkness, whereas he describes definitely (v. 9) "the fruit of the light." [BENGLI.] "Speak of," I think, is used here as "speaking of without reproof," in contrast to "even reprove them." Thus the "for" expresses this, Reprove them, for to speak of them without reproof them, is a shame (v. 3). Thus "works of darkness" answers to "things done in secret," viz., that are reprov'd—rather, "when they are reprov'd," viz., by you (v. 11), whatever dark acts manifest—rather, "every thing that is (i.e., suffers itself to be) made manifest (or 'shone upon,' viz., by your 'reproving,' v. 11) is (thenceforth no longer 'darkness,' v. 5, but) light." The devil and the wicked will not suffer themselves to be made manifest by the light, but love darkness, though outwardly the light shines round them. Therefore, "light" has no transforming effect on them, so that they do not become light (John, 3. 19, 20). But, says the apostle, you being now light yourselves (v. 8), by bringing to light through reproof those who are in darkness, will convert them to light. Your consistent lives and faithful reproofs will be your "armour of light" (Romans, 13. 13) in making an inroad on the kingdom of darkness. 14. Wherefore—Referring to the whole foregoing argument (v. 8, 11, 13), Seeing that light (spiritual) dispels the pre-existing darkness, He (God) saith, &c. (cf. the same phrase, ch. 4. 8). Awake—The reading of all the oldest MSS. is, "Up" or "Rouse thee!" a phrase used in stirring men to activity. The words are a phrase of Isaiah, 60. 1, 2, not an exact quotation. The word "Christ," shows that in quoting the prophecy, he views it in the light thrown on it by the gospel fulfillment. As Israel is called on to "awake" from its previous state of "darkness" and "death" (Isaiah, 59. 10; 60. 2), for that her Light is come; so the church, and each individual is similarly called to awake. Believers are called on to "awake" out of sleep; unbelievers, to "arise" from the dead (cf. Matthew, 28. 5; Romans, 13. 11; 1 Thessalonians, 5. 6, with ch. 2. 1). Christ—"the true light," "the sun of righteousness;" give the light—rather as Greek, "Shall shine upon thee" (so enabling thee by being "made manifest" to become, and be, by the very fact, "light," v. 13; then being so "enlightened," ch. 1. 15, thou shalt be able, by "reproving," to enlighten others). 15. that—rather as Greek, "See how ye walk," &c. The double idea is compressed into one sentence: "See (take heed) how ye walk," and "See that ye walk circumspectly." The manner, as well as the act itself, is included. See how ye are walking, with a view to your being circumspect (i.e., accurate, exact) in your walk. Cf. Colossians, 4. 5, "Walk in wisdom (answering to 'as wise' here) toward them that are without" (answering to "circumspectly," i.e., correctly, in relation to the unbelievers around, not giving occasion of stumbling to any, but edifying all by a consistent walk), not as fools—Greek, "not as unwise, but as wise." 16. Redeeming the time—(Colossians, 4. 5.) Greek, "Buying up for yourselves the reasonable time" (whenever it occurs) of good to yourselves and to others. Buying off from the vanities of "them that are without" (Colossians, 4. 5), and of the "unwise" (here in Ephesians), the opportune time afforded to work of God. In a narrower sense, special seasons for good, occasionally presenting, are referred to, of which believers ought to avail themselves. This constitutes true (v. 16). In a larger sense, the whole season that one is spiritually awakened, is to "redeem" from vanity for God (cf. 3 Corinthians, II, 4, 9-11). "Redeem" implies the precious opportunity season, a jewel to be bought at WARE explains, "Redeeming for yourselves yourselves of) the opportunity (offered me right), and commanding the time as a servant." TRIMAN, "Watch the make it your own so as to control it; as look out for opportunities, and accurately the best goods; serve not the time, but it, and it shall do what you approve." Besides, there are many special evil days tion, sickness, &c.) when the Christian is silence, therefore he needs the more to im- reasonable times afforded to him (Amos, 5. 8. The contrast is between n and the Christian practice. "Let your y) the drinking songs of heathen feasts, but l hymns; and their accompaniment, not the music of the lyre, but the melody of the heart." [CUR- rians & HOWARD.] to the Lord—See Piny's letter quoted above: "To Christ as God." 20, thank...for all things—even for adversities; also for blessings, un- known as well as known (Colossians, 3. 17; 1 Thessalo- nians, 5. 18), unto God and the Father—the Fountain of every blessing in Creation, Providence, Election, and Redemption. Lord Jesus Christ—by whom all things, even distresses, become ours (Romans, 8. 28-27; 1 Co- rinthians, 3. 20-22). 21. (Philippians, 2. 3; 1 Peter, 5. 4.) Here he passes from our relations to God, to those which concern our fellow-men, in the fear of God—All the oldest MSS. and authorities read, "in the fear of Caesar." The believer passes from under the bondage of the law as a sinner, to be "the servants of Christ" (1 Corinthians, 7. 22), which, through the instinct of love to Him, is really to be "the Lord's freeman"; or he is "under the law to Christ" (1 Corinthians, 9. 21; cf. John, 8. 36). Christ, not the Father (John, 4. 22), is to be our Judge. Thus reverential fear of displeasing Him is the motive for discharging our relative duties as Christians (1 Corinthians, 10. 32; 3 Corinthians, 4. 11, 1 Peter, 3. 18). 23—ch. 6. 9. The church's relation to Christ in His everlasting purpose, is the foundation and archetype of the three greatest of earthly relations, that of husband and wife (v. 23-25), parent and child (ch. 6. 1-4), master and servant (ch. 6. 4-6). The oldest MSS. omit "submit yourselves," supplying it from v. 21, "Ye wives (submitting yourselves) unto your own husbands." "Your own" is an argument for sub- missiveness on the part of the wives: it is not a stranger, but your own husbands whom you are called on to submit unto (cf. Genesis, 3. 16; 1 Corinthians, 7. 2; 14. 34; Colossians, 3. 18; Titus, 2. 5; 1 Peter, 3. 1-7). Those subject ought to submit themselves, of what- ever kind their superiors are. "Submit" is the term used of wives; "obey," of children (ch. 6. 1), as there is a greater equality between wives and husbands, than between children and parents, as unto the Lord—Submissiveness is rendered by the wife to the husband under the eye of Christ, and so is rendered to Christ Himself. The husband stands to the wife in the relation that the Lord does to the church, and this is to be the ground of her submission; though that submis- sion is inferior in kind and degree to that which she owes Christ (v. 24). 23. (1 Corinthians, 11. 3.) even as—Greek, "as also," and he is—The oldest MSS. read, "Himself (being Saviour," &c., omitting "and," and "is." In Christ's case, the Headship is united with, nay gained by, His having SAVED the body in the process of redemption; so that (St. Paul implies) I am not alleging Christ's Headship as one entirely identical with that of the Father, for He has a claim to it, and office in it, peculiar to Himself. [ALFORD.] The husband is not saviour of the wife, in which particular Christ excels; hence, "but" (v. 24) follows. [BROOKS.] 24. Therefore—translate, as Greek, "But," or "Neverthe- less," &c., though there be the difference of headship mentioned in v. 23, nevertheless, thus far they are one, viz., in the subjection or submission (the same Greek stands for "is subject," as for "submit," v. 21, 22) of the church to Christ, being the prototype of that of the wife to the husband, their own—Not in most of the oldest MSS., and not needed by the argument. In every thing—appertaining to a husband's legitimate authority: "in the Lord" (Colossians, 3. 18): every thing not contrary to God. 25. "Thou hast seen the measure of obedience; now hear also the measure of love. Do you wish your wife to obey you, as the church is to obey Christ? Then have a solicitude for her as Christ had for the church (v. 23, "Himself the Saviour of the body"); and if it be necessary to give thy life for her, or to be cut in ten thousand pieces, or to endure any other suffering whatever, do not refuse it; and if you suffer there, not even so do you do what Christ has done; for you indeed do so being already united to her, but He did so for one that treated Him with aversion and hatred. As, therefore, He brought to His feet one that so treated Him, and that even wantonly spurned Him, by much tenderness of regard, not by threats, insults, and terror: so also do you act towards your wife, and though you see her disdainful and wantonly forward, you will be able to bring her to your feet by much thoughtfulness for her, by love, by kindness. For no bond is more sovereign in binding than such bonds, especially in the case of husband and wife. For one may constrain a servant by fear, though not even he is so to be bound to you; for he may readily run away. But the companion of your life, the mother of your children, the basis of all your joy, you ought to bind to you, not by fear and threats, but by love and attachment. (CONVERSION.) gave himself—Greek, "gave Himself up," for it—(vERBA), "for her." The relation of the church to Christ is the ground of Christianity's having raised woman to her due place in the social scale, from which she was, and is, excluded in heathen lands. 26. sanctify—i.e., consecrate her to God. Cf. John, 17, 19, meaning, "I devote myself as a holy sacrifice, that my disciples also may be devoted or consecrated as holy in (through) the truth" (NEANDER) (Hebrews, 2, 11; 10, 10, Note; 13, 12, and cleanse—rather as Greek, "cleansing," without the "and," with the washing of water—rather as Greek, "with," or "by the laver of the water," viz., the baptismal water. So it ought to be translated, Titus, 3, 5, the only other passage in the New Testament where it occurs. As the bride passed through a purifying bath before marriage, so the church: cf. Revelation, 21, 2. He speaks of baptism according to its high ideal and desire; as if the inward grace accompanied the outward rite; hence he asserts of outward baptism whatever is involved in a believing appropriation of the divine truths it symbolizes, and says that Christ, by baptism, has purified the church (NEANDER) "I Peter, 3, 21, by the word—Greek, "in the word." To be joined with "cleansing it," or "her." The "word of faith," Romans, 10, 8, 9, 17, of which confession is made in baptism, and which carries the real cleansing (John, 15, 3; 17, 17) and regenerating power (I Peter, 1, 2; 3, 2; ALFORD.) So AUGUSTINE, Treat, 50, in John, "Take away the word, and what is the water save water? And the word to the element, and it becomes a sacrament, being itself as it were the visible word." The regenerating efficacy of baptism is conveyed in, and by, the Divine word alone, 27. he—The oldest MSS, and authorities read, "That He might Himself present unto Himself the church glorious," viz., as a bride (2 Corinthians, 11, 2). Holiness and glory are inseparable. "Cleansing" is the necessary preliminary to both. Holiness is glory internal; glory is holiness shining forth outwardly. The latter of baptism is the vehicle, but the word is the nobler and the true instrument of the cleansing. [BENEDICT.] It is Christ that prepares the church with the necessary ornaments of grace, for presentation to Himself, as the Bridegroom at His coming: again (Matthew, 25, 1, &c.; Revelation, 19, 7; 21, 2, 3) having spot—Song of Solomon, 4, 7.) The visible church now contains clean and unclean together, like Noah's ark; like the wedding room which contained some that had, and others that had not, the wedding garment (Matthew, 22, 10-14; cf. 2 Timothy, 2, 20); or as the good and bad fish are taken in the same net, because it cannot discern the bad from the good, the fishermen being unable to know what kind of fish the nets have taken under the waves. Still the church is termed "holy" in the creed, in reference to her ideal and ultimate destination. When the Bridegroom comes, the bride shall be presented to Him wholly without spot, the evil being cut off from the body for ever (Matthew, 13, 47-50). Not that there are two churches, one with bad and good intermingled, another in which there are good alone; but one and the same church in relation to different times, now with good and evil together, hereafter with good alone. [FRANCK.] 28. Translate, "So ought husbands also (then the oldest MSS, read) to love their own (cf. Note, a. 27 wives as their own bodies." "He that loveth his own wife," &c. (v. 31). So there is the same love and the same union of body between Christ and the church (v. 30, 32. 29. For—Supply, and we all love ourselves: "For no man," &c. his own flesh—(v. 31, and.) nourisheth—Greek, "nourisheth it up," etc., to sustenance; "Nourisheth," refers to food and internal sustenance; "cherisheth," to clothing and external fostering, even so—translate, even as also, the Lord—The oldest MSS, read, "Christ," Exodus, 21, 10, prescribes three duties to the husband. The two former (food and raiment) are here alluded to in a spiritual sense, by "nourisheth and cherisheth;" the third "duty of marriage" is not added in consonance with the holy propriety of Scripture language: its antitype is, "know the Lord" (Hosea, 2, 19, 20. [BENEDICT.] 29. For—Greek, "Because" (1 Corinthians, 6, 15). Christ nourisheth and cherisheth the church as being of one flesh with Him. Translate, "Because we are members of His body (His literal body), being of His flesh and of His bones" (ALFORD) (Genesis, 2, 23, 24). The Greek expresses, "Being formed out of," or "of the substance of His flesh," &c. Adam's deep sleep, wherein Eve was formed from out of his opened side, is an emblem of Christ's death, which was the birth of the Spouse, the church. John, 12, 24; 19, 34, 35, to which verses 25, 26, 27, allude, as implying atonement by His blood, and sanctification by the "water," answering to that which flowed from His side (cf. also John, 7, 38, 39; 1 Corinthians, 6, 11). As Adam gave Eve a new name, He gave, Revelation, 2, 17; 3, 12. Genesis, 2, 21, 23, 24, puts the bones first, because the reference there is to the natural structure. But St. Paul is referring to the flesh of Christ. It is not our bones and flesh, but "we" that are spiritually propagated (in our soul and spirit now, and in the body hereafter, regenerated) from the marriage of Christ, which has flesh and bones. We are members of His glorified body (John, 6, 53). The two oldest existing MSS, and Coptic or Memphitic version, omit "of His flesh and of His bones" the words may have crept into the text through the Margin, from Genesis, 2, 23; LXX. However, Irenaeus, 294, and the old Latin and Vulgate versions, with some good old MSS, have them. 31. For this cause—The propagation of the church from Christ, as that of Eve from Adam, is the foundation of the spiritual marriage. The natural marriage, wherein "a man leaves father and mother the oldest MSS, omit 'his') and is joined unto his wife," is not the principal thing meant here, but the spiritual marriage represented by it, and on which it rests, whereby Christ left the Father's bosom to woo to Himself the church out of a lost world: a. 27 proves this: His earthly mother as such, also, He holds in secondary account as compared with His Spiritual Bride (Luke, 2, 48, 49; 8, 19-21; 11, 27, 28). He shall again leave His Father's abode to consummate the union (Matthew, 25, 1-10; Revelation, 19, 7, they two shall be one flesh—So the Samaritan Pentateuch, LXX, &c., read (Genesis, 2, 24), instead of "they shall be one flesh." So Matthew, 19, 6. In natural marriage, husband and wife combine the elements of one perfect human being: the one being incomplete without the other. So Christ, as God-man, is pleased to make the church, the body, a necessary adjunct to Himself, the Head. He is the archetype of the church, from whom, and according to whom, as the pattern, she is formed. He is her Head, as the husband is of the ans. 2. 5; 1 Corinthians, 11. 3; 12. 45). Christ allow any power to sever Himself and His inseparably joined (Matthew, 19. 6; John, 10. J. 23. Rather, "This mystery is a great one." and truth, beyond man's power of discovery revealed, viz., of the spiritual union of 1 the church, represented by the marriage a great one, of deep import. See Note, v. 20. ery is used of a divine truth not to be discovered by revelation of God (Romans, 11. 25; ans, 12. 51). The Fulgiate wrongly translates, great sacrament, "which is made the plea by the church (in spite of the blunder having ago exposed by their own commentators, id Estius) for making marriage a sacrament; not marriage in general, but that of Christ urch, is what is pronounced to be a "great as the words following prove, "I (emphatic) ard to Christ and to the church" (so the Greek related). "I, while I quote these words out re, use them in a higher sense." (CONY-HOWSON.) 33. Nevertheless—Not to pursue a mystical meaning of marriage. Translate "Do ye also (as Christ does) severally each 1, &c. The words, "severally each one," refer 1, their individual capacity, contrasted with us collective view of the members of the the bride of Christ.

Servants—lit., "slaves," masters ac- cording to the flesh—in contrast to your true and heavenly Master (v. 4). A consolatory hint that the mastership to which they were subject, was but for a time (CHRISTOSTOM); and that their real liberty was still their own (1 Corinthians, 7. 23). fear and trem- bling—not slavish terror, but (1 Corinthians, 2. 3. Note; 2 Corinthians, 7. 15) an anxious eagerness to do your duty, and a fear of displeasing, as great as is produced in the ordinary slave by "threatenings" (v. 9). single- ness—without double-mindedness, or "eye-service" (v. 6), which seeks to please outwardly, without the sincere desire to make the master's interest at all times the first consideration (1 Chronicles, 22. 17; Matthew, 6. 23, 23; Luke, 11. 34). "Simplicity," 6. (Colossians, 3. 22.) Seeking to please their masters only so long as these have their eyes on them: as Gehazi was a very different man in his master's presence from what he was in his absence (2 Kings, 6.). men-pleasers—not Christ-pleasers (cf. Galatians, 1. 10; 1 Thessalonians, 2. 4). doing the will of God—the unseen but ever present Master: the best guarantee for your serving faithfully your earthly master alike when present and when absent, from the heart—lit., soul (Psalm 111. 1; Ro- mans, 13. 6). 7. good will—expressing his feeling to- wards his master: as "doing the will of God from the heart" expresses the source of that feeling (Colossians, 3. 23). "Good will" is stated by Xenophon (Economics) to be the principal virtue of a slave towards his master: a real regard to his master's interest as if his own, a good will which not even a master's severity can extinguish. 8. any man doeth—Greek, "any man shall have done," i.e., shall be found at the Lord's coming to have done, the same—in full payment, in heaven's currency, shall... receive—(2 Corinthians, 5. 10; Colossians, 3. 25; but all of grace, Luke, 17. 10.) bond or free—(1 Corinthians, 7. 22; 12. 13; Galatians, 3. 28; Colossians, 3. 11.) Christ does not regard such distinctions in His present dealings of grace, or in His future judgment. The slave that has acted faithfully for the Lord's sake in his master, though the latter may not repay his faithfulness, shall have the Lord for his Paymaster. So the freeman who has done good for the Lord's sake, though man may not repay him, has the Lord for his Debtor (Proverbs, 19. 17). 9. the same things—Mutatis mutandis. Show the sameness of God's will, and of your servant's well-being, in your relation to them: as they ought to have in their relation to you. Love regulates the duties both of servants and masters, as one and the same light attempts various colours. Equality of nature and faith is superior to distinctions of rank. [BENCKE.] Christianity makes all men brothers: cf. Leviticus, 25. 42, 43; Deuteronomy, 15. 12; Jeremiah, 34. 14, as to how the Hebrews were bound to treat their brethren in service: much more ought Christians to act with love. threatening—Greek, "the threatening" which masters commonly use. "Masters" in the Greek, is not so strong a term as "despots": it implies authority, but not absolute domination. your Master also—The oldest MSS. read, "the Master both of them and you": "their Master and yours." This more forcibly brings out the equality of slaves and masters in the sight of God. Seneca, Thyestes, 607, says, "Whatever an inferior dreads from you, this a superior Master threatens himself."

with; every authority here is under a higher above." As you treat your servants, so will He treat you, neither...respect of persons—He will not, in judging, acquit thee because thou art a master, or condemn him because he is a servant (Acts, 10. 34; Romans, 2. 11; Galatians, 2. 6; Colossians, 3. 25; 1 Peter, 1. 17). Derived from Deuteronomy, 10. 17; 2 Chronicles, 19. 7. 10. my brethren—Some of the oldest MSS. omit these words. Some with Fulgate retain them. The phrase occurs nowhere else in the epistle (see, however, v. 23): If genuine, it is appropriate here in the close of the epistle, where he is urging his fellow-soldiers to the good fight in the Christian armour. Most of the oldest MSS. for "finally," read, "henceforward," or "from henceforth" (Galatians, 6. 17). be strong—Greek, "be strengthened," in the power of his might—Christ's might: as in ch. 1. 19, it is the Father's might. 11. the whole armour—The armour of light (Romans, 13. 12); on the right hand and left (2 Corinthians, 6. 7). The panoply offensive and defensive. An image readily suggested by the Roman armoury, St. Paul being now in Rome. Repeated emphatically, v. 13. In Romans, 13. 14, it is, "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ;" in putting on Him, and the new man in Him, we put on "the whole armour of God." No opening at the head, the feet, the heart, the belly, the eye, the ear, or the tongue, is to be given to Satan. Believers have once for all overcome him; but on the ground of this fundamental victory gained over him, they are ever again to fight against and overcome him, even as they who once die with Christ, have continually to mortify their members upon earth (Romans, 6. 2-14; Colossians, 3. 8, 9). of God—furnished by God; not our own, else it would not stand (Psalm 35. 1-3). Spiritual, therefore, and mighty through God, not carnal (2 Corinthians, 10. 4). wiles—i.e., "schemes sought out" for deceiving (cf. 2 Corinthians, 11. 10). the devil—the ruling chief of the foes (v. 12) organized into a kingdom of darkness (Matthew, 12. 26), opposed to the kingdom of light. 12. Greek, "For our wrestling" ("the wrestling" in which we are engaged) is not against flesh," &c. Flesh and blood foes are Satan's mere tools, the real foe lurking behind them is Satan himself, with whom our conflict is. "Wrestling" implies that it is a hand to hand and foot to foot struggle for the mastery: to wrestle successfully with Satan, we must wrestle with God in irremissible prayer like Jacob (Genesis, 32. 24-29; Hosea, 12. 4). Translate, "The principalities...the powers" (ch. 1. 21, Note; 3. 10; Colossians, 1. 16). The same grades of power are specified in the case of the demons here, as in that of angels there (cf. Romans, 8. 28; 1 Corinthians, 15. 24; Colossians, 2. 15). The Ephesians had practised sorcery (Acts, 19. 19), so that he appropriately treats of evil spirits in addressing them. The more clearly any book of Scripture, as this, treats of the economy of the kingdom of light, the more clearly does it set forth the kingdom of darkness. Hence, nowhere does the Satanic kingdom come more clearly into view than in the gospels which treat of Christ, the true Light, rulers of the darkness of this world—Greek, "age," or "course of the world." But the oldest MSS. omit "of world." Translate, "Against the world-rulers of this [present] darkness" (ch. 2. 2; 5. 8; Luke, 22. 63; Colossians, 1. 13). On Satan and his demons being "world-rulers" cf. John, 12. 31; 14. 30; 16. 11; Luke, 4. 6; 2 Corinthians, 4. 4; 1 John, 5. 19. Greek, "Heth in the wicked one." Though they be "world-rulers," they are not the ruler of the universe; and their usurped rule of the world is soon to cease, when He shall "come whose right it is" (Ezekiel, 21. 27). Two cases prove Satan not to be a mere subjective fancy: (1.) Christ's temptation; (2.) the entrance of demons into the swine (for these are incapable of such fancies). Satan tries to parody, or imitate in a perverted way, God's working (2 Corinthians, 11. 13, 14). So when God became incarnate, Satan, by his demons, took forcible possession of human bodies. Thus the demoniacally possessed were not peculiarly wicked, but miserable, and so fit subjects for Jesus' pity. St. Paul makes no mention of demoniacal possession, so that in the time he wrote, it seems to have ceased; it probably was restricted to the period of the Lord's incarnation, and of the foundation of His church. spiritual wickedness—rather as Greek, "The spiritual hosts of wickedness." As three of the clauses describe the power, so this fourth, the wickedness of our spiritual foes (Matthew, 12. 45). in high places—Greek, "heavenly places" in ch. 2. 2, "the air," where see the Note. The alteration of expression to "in heavenly places," is in order to mark the higher range of their powers than ours, they having been, up to the ascension (Revelation, 12. 5, 9, 10), dwellers "in the heavenly places" (Job, 1. 7), and being now in the regions of the air which are called the heavens. Moreover, pride and presumption are the sins in heavenly places to which they tempt especially, being those by which they themselves fell from heavenly places (Isaiah, 14. 12-15). But believers have nought to fear, being "blessed with all spiritual blessings in the heavenly places" (ch. 1. 3). 13. take... of God—not "make;" God has done that: we have only to "take up" and put it on. The Ephesians were familiar with the idea of the gods giving armour to mythical heroes: thus St. Paul's allusion would be appropriate. the evil day—the day of Satan's special assaults (v. 12, 16) in life and at the dying hour (cf. Revelation, 3. 10). We must have our armour always on, to be ready against the evil day which may come at any moment, the war being perpetual (Psalm 41. 1, Margin). done all—rather, "accomplished all things," viz., necessary to the fight, and becoming a good soldier. stand—the repetition in v. 11, 14, shows that standing, i.e., maintaining our ground, not yielding or fleeing, is the grand aim of the Christian soldier. 14. Translate as Greek, "Having girt about your loins with truth," i.e., with truthfulness, sincerity, a good conscience (2 Corinthians, 1. 12; 1 Timothy, 1. 5, 18; 3. 9). Truth is the band that girds up and keeps together the flowing robes, so as that the Christian soldier may be unencumbered for action. So the Passover was eaten with the loins girt, and the shoes on the feet (Exodus, 12. 11; cf. Isaiah, 5. 27; Luke, 12. 35). Faithfulness (LXX., "truth") is the girdle of Messiah (Isaiah, 11. 5; so truth, of His followers, having on—Greek, "having put on," breastplate of righteousness—Isaiah, 59. 17, similarly of Messiah. "Righteousness" is here joined with "truth," as in ch. 5. 9; righteousness in works, truth in words [Estrus] (1 John, 3. 7). Christ's righteousness inwrought in us by the Spirit. "Faith and love," i.e., faith working righteousness by love, are "the breastplate" in 1 Thessalonians, 5. 8. 15. Translate, "Having shod your feet" referring to the sandals, or to the military shoes then used. the preparation—rather, "the preparedness," or "readiness of," i.e., arising from the "gospel" (Psalm 10. 17). Preparedness to do and suffer all that God wills; readiness for march, as a Christian soldier, gospel of peace—cf. Luke, 1. 7; Romans, 10. 15. The "peace" within forms a beautiful contrast to the raging of the outward conflict (Isaiah, 26. 3; Philipians, 4. 7). 16. Above all—rather, "Over all," so as to cover all that has been put on before. Three integuments are specified, the breastplate, girdle, and shoes; two defences, the helmet and shield; and two offensive weapons, the sword and the spear (prayer). ALFORD translates, "Besides all," as the Greek is translated, Luke, 3. 20. But if it meant this, it would have come last in the list (cf. Colossians, 3. 14). shield—the large oblong oval door-like shield of the Romans, four feet long by two and a half feet broad; not the small round buckler. ye shall be able—not merely "ye may." The shield of faith will certainly intercept, and as "quench, all the fiery darts" (an image from the ancient fire-darts, formed of cane, with tow and combustibles ignited on the head of the shaft, so as to set fire to wood-work, tents, &c.) of the wicked—rather "of the evil ORK." Faith conquers him (1 Peter, 5. 9), and his darts of temptation to wrath, lust, revenge, despair, &c. It overcomes the world (1 John, 4. 4), and so the prince of the world (1 John, 5. 18). 17. take—A different Greek word from that in v. 13, 16; translata, therefore. "Receive," "accept" viz., the helmet offered by the Lord, viz., "salvation" appropriated, as 1 Thessalonians, 5. 8, "Helmet, the hope of salvation," not an uncertain hope, but one that brings with it no shame of disappointment (Romans, 5. 4). It is subjoined to the shield of faith, as being its inseparable accompaniment (cf. Romans, 5. 1, 6). The head of the soldier was among the principal parts to be defended, as on it the deadliest strokes might fall, and it is the head that commands the whole body. The head is the seat of the mind, which, when it has laid hold of the sure gospel "hope" of eternal life, will not receive false doctrine, or give way to Satan's temptations to despise God, by this hope, "lifts up the head" (Psalm 3. 3; Luke, 21. 26). sword of the Spirit—i.e., furnished by the Spirit, who inspired the writers of the word of God (3 Peter, 1. 21). Again the Trinity is implied: the Spirit here; and Christ in "salvation," and God the Father, v. 13 (cf. Hebrews, 4. 12; Revelation, 1. 16; 2. 12). The two-edged sword, cutting both ways (Psalm 46. 3, 6), striking some with conviction and conversion, and others with condemnation (Isaiah, 11. 4; Revelation, 19. 15), is in the mouth of Christ (Isaiah, 49. 2), in the hand of His saints (Psalm 149. 6). Christ's use of this sword in the temptation is our pattern as to how we are to wield it against Satan (Matthew, 4. 4, 7, 10). There is no armour specified for the back, but only for the front of the body; implying that we must never turn our back to the foe (Luke, 9. 62): our only safety is in resisting ceaselessly (Matthew, 4. 11; James, 4. 7). 18. always—Greek, "in every season," implying opportunity and expediency (Colossians, 4. 2). St. Paul uses the very words of Jesus in Luke, 21. 36 (a gospel which he quotes elsewhere, in undesigned consonance with the fact of St. Luke being his associate in travel, 1 Corinthians, 11. 23, &c.; 1 Timothy, 5. 18). Cf. Luke, 18. 1; Romans, 12. 12; 1 Thessalonians, 5. 17. with all—i.e., every kind of prayer—a sacred term for prayer in general, application—a common term for a special kind of prayer (HARLEIGH), an imploving request. "Prayer" for obtaining blessings, "supplication" for averting evils which we fear. [GROTIUS.] It is He in us, as the Spirit of adoption, who prays, and enables us to pray (Romans, 8. 15, 26; Galatians, 4. 6; Jude, 20). watching—not sleeping (ch. 5. 14; Psalm 68. 13; Matthew, 26. 41). So in the temple a perpetual watch was maintained (cf. Anna, Luke, 2. 37). therunto—"watching unto" (with a view to) prayer and supplication, with—Greek, "in." Persevering constancy ("perseverance") and (i.e., exhibited in) supplication are to be the element in which our watchfulness is to be exercised, for all saints—as none is so perfect as not to need the intercessions of his fellow-Christians. 19. for me—A different Greek preposition from that in v. 13: translata, therefore, "on my behalf."

that I may open my mouth boldly—rather, "That there may be given to me 'utterance,' or 'speech' 'in the opening of my mouth' (when I undertake to speak: a formula used in set and solemn speech, Job, 3. 1; Daniel, 10. 16), so as with boldness to make known," &c. Bold plainness of speech was the more needed, as the gospel is a "mystery" indiscoverable by mere reason, and only known by revelation. Paul looked for utterance to be given him; he did not depend on his natural or acquired power. The shortest road to any heart is round by heaven: pray to God to open the door and to open your mouth, so as to avail yourself of every opening (Jeremiah, 1. 7, 8; Ezekiel, 2. 8, 9, 11; 2 Corinthians, 4. 13). 20. For—Greek, as in v. 19, "On behalf of which," an ambassador in bonds—A paradox. Ambassadors were held inviolable by the law of nations, and could not, without outrage to every sacred right, be put in chains. Yet Christ's "ambassador is in a chain." The Greek is singular. The Romans used to bind a prisoner to a soldier by a single chain, in a kind of free custody. So Acts, 28. 16, 20, "I am bound with this chain." The term, "bonds" (plural), on the other hand, is used when the prisoner's hands or feet were bound together (Acts, 28. 20); cf. Acts, 12. 6, where the plural marks the distinction. The singular is only used of the particular kind of custody described above: an undesigned coincidence. [PALMER.] 21. that ye also—as I have been discussing things relating to you, so that ye also may know about me (cf. Colossians, 4. 7, 8). NEANDER takes it, "Ye also," as well as the Colossians (Colossians; 4. 7.) (2) my affairs—Greek, "the things concerning me," how I do—how I fare. Tycheus—an Asiatic, and so a fit messenger bearing the respective epistles to Ephesus and Colosse (Acts, 20. 4; 2 Timothy, 4. 12). a—Greek, "the beloved brother." &c.; the same epithet as in Colossians, 4. 7. minister—i.e., servant. in the Lord—in the Lord's work. 22. for the same purpose—Greek, "for this very purpose. Colossians, 4. 8, is almost word for word the same as this verse. our affairs—Greek, "the things concerning us," viz., concerning myself, "Aristarchus, my fellow-prisoner, and Marcus, sister's son to Barnabas" (Colossians, 4. 10). 23. love with faith—Faith is pre-supposed as theirs: he prays that love may accompany it (Galatians, 5. 6). 24. Contrast the malediction on all who love Him not (1 Corinthians, 16. 22), in sincerity—Greek, "in incorruption," i.e., not as English Version, but "with an immortal (constant) love." [WAHL.] Cf. "that which is not corruptible" (1 Peter, 3. 4). Not a fleeting earthly love, but a spiritual and eternal one. [ALFORD.] Contrast Colossians, 3. 22, worldly things "which perish with the using." Cf. 1 Corinthians, 9. 26, "corruptible...in-corruptible crown." "Purely," "holly" (ESTIUS), without the corruption of sin (Note, 1 Corinthians, 3. 17; 2 Peter, 1. 4; Jude, 10). Where the Lord Jesus has a true believer, there I have a brother. [BISHOP M'ILWAIN.] He who is good enough for Christ, is good enough for me. [R. HALL.] The differences of opinion among real Christians are comparatively small, and show that they are not following one another like silly sheep, each trusting the one before him. Their agreement in the main, whilst showing their independence as witnesses by differing in non-essentials, can only be accounted for by their being all in the right direction (Acts, 16. 8, 9; 1 Corinthians, 1. 2; 12. 3).

PHILIPPIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

THE INTERNAL EVIDENCE for the authenticity of this epistle is strong. The style, manner of thought, and doctrine, accord with St. Paul's. The incidental allusions also establish his authorship. Paley (Herm. Philoan. ch. 7) substantiates the mention of the object of Epaphroditus' journey to Rome, the Philippian contribution to St. Paul's cause, Epaphroditus sickness (ch. 1. 7; 2. 25-30; 4. 10-18), the fact that Timothy had been long with St. Paul at Philippi (ch. 1. 1; 2. 19), the reference to his being a prisoner at Rome now for a long time (ch. 1. 13-14. 2. 17-20), his willingness to die (cf. on 1. 25, with 2 Corinthians, 5. 8), the reference to the Philippian having seen his maltreatment at Philippi (ch. 1. 12, 20; 2. 1, 2).

The EXTERNAL EVIDENCE is equally decisive. POLYDOR of Philippiensis, sec. 3, and II. IRENEUS, Against Heresies, 4. 18, sec. 4. CLEMENT of Alexandria, Pedagogus I. 1, p. 107. The epistle of the churches of Lyons and Vienne, in Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History, 5. 2. Tertullian, Resurrectio carnis, c. 23. ORIGEN, Celsus, I. 2, p. 122. CYRILLUS of Jerusalem Against the Jews, 2. 30.

Philippi was the first (i.e., the farthest from Rome, and first which met Paul in entering Macedonia) Macedonian city of the district, called Macedonia Prima (so called as lying furthest eastward). The Greek (Acts, 16. 12) should not be translated "the chief city," as English Version, but as above. [Aldford.] Not it, but Thessalonica, was the chief city of the province, and Amphipolis, of the district called Macedonia Prima. It was a Roman "colony" (Acts, 16. 12), made so by Augustus, to commemorate his famous victory over Brutus and Cassius. A colony was in fact a portion of Rome itself transplanted to the province, an offshoot from Rome, and as it were a portrait of the mother city on a small scale. [Lactantius Divinus, 16. 12.] Its inhabitants were Roman citizens, having the right of voting in the Roman tribes, governed by their own senate and magistrates, and not by the governor of the province, with the Roman law, and Latin language.

Paul, with Silas and Timothy, planted the gospel there (Acts, 16. 12, &c.), in his second missionary journey, A.D. 49. Doubtless he visited it again on his journey from Ephesus into Macedonia (Acts, 20. 1; and Acts, 20. 5, 6, expressly mentions his third visit on his return from Greece (Corinth) to Syria by way of Macedonia). His sufferings at Philippi (Acts, 16. 19, &c.) strengthened the Christian bond of union between him and his Philippian converts, who also, like him, were exposed to trials for the gospel's sake (1 Thessalonians, 2. 2). They alone sent supplies for his temporal wants, twice shortly after he had left them (Philippians, 4. 15, 16), and again a third time shortly before writing this epistle (Philippians, 4. 16, 18; 2 Corinthians, 11. 9). This fervent attachment on their part was, perhaps, also in part due to the fact that few Jews were in Philippi, as in other scenes of his labours, to sow the seeds of distrust and suspicion. There was no synagogue, but merely a Jewish Proseucha, or oratory, by the river side. So that there only do we read of his meeting no opposition from Jews, but only from the masters of the divining dæmons, whose gains had been put an end to by her being dispossessed.

Though the Philippian church was as yet free from Judaizing influence, yet it needed to be forewarned of that danger which might at any time assail it from without (ch. 3. 2); even as such evil influences had crept into the Galatian church (ch. 4. 2, 3, we find a trace of the fact recorded in the history (Acts, 16. 23, 24), that female converts were among the first to receive the gospel at Philippi).

As to the state of the church, we gather from 2 Corinthians, 8. 1, 2, that its members were poor, yet most liberally and from Philippians, 1. 28-30, that they were undergoing persecution. The only blemish referred to in their character was, on the part of some members, a tendency to dissension. Hence arise his admonitions against disputings (ch. 1. 17; 2. 1-4, 12, 14; 4. 2).

The OBJECT of the epistle is general: not only to thank the Philippian for their contribution sent by Epaphroditus who was now in return to take back the apostle's letter, but to express his Christian love and sympathy, and to exhort them to a life consonant with that of Christ, and to warn them against existing dissensions, and future possible assaults of Judaizers from without. It is remarkable in this epistle alone, as compared with the others, that, amidst many commendations, there are no express censures of those to whom it is addressed. No doctrinal error, or schism, had as yet sprung up; the only blemish hinted at is, that some of the Philippian church were somewhat wanting in lowliness of mind, the result of which went was dissension. Two women, Euodia and Syntyche, are mentioned as having erred in this respect. The epistle may be divided into three parts: I. Affectionate address to the Philippian; reference to his own state as a prisoner at Rome, and to theirs, and to his mission of Epaphroditus to them (chs. 1. and 2.). Epaphroditus probably held a leading office in the Philippian church, perhaps as a presbyter. After Tychicus and Onesimus had departed (A. D. 62), carrying the epistles to the Ephesian, Colossian, and Philemon, St. Paul was cheered in his imprisonment by the arrival of Epaphroditus with the Philippian contribution. "That faithful" brother, companion in labour, and fellow-soldier" (ch. 2. 25), had brought on himself by the fatigues of the journey a dangerous sickness (ch. 2. 26, 30). But now that he was recovered, he "longed" (ch. 2. 26) to return to his Philippian flock, and in person to relieve their anxiety on his behalf, in respect to his sickness; and the apostle gladly availed himself of the opportunity of writing to them a letter of grateful acknowledgments and Christian exhortations. II. Caution against Judaizing teachers, supported by reference to his own former and present feelings towards Jewish legalism (ch. 3.). III. Admonitions to individuals, and to the church in general, thanks for their reasonable aid, and concluding benedictions and salutations.

This epistle was written from Rome during the imprisonment, the beginning of which is related in Acts, 28. 16, 20, 30, &c. The reference to "Cæsar's household" (ch. 4. 22), and to the "palace" (ch. 1. 13, Greek, Prætorium, probably the barrack of the Prætorian body-guard, attached to the palace of Nero) confirms this. It must have been during his first imprisonment at Rome, for the mention of the Prætorium agrees with the fact that it was during his first imprisonment he was in the custody of the Prætorian Prefect, and his situation described in ch. 1. 13-14, agrees with his situation in the first two years of his imprisonment (Acts, 28. 30, 31). The following reasons show, moreover, that it was written towards the close of that imprisonment: (1.) He, in it, expresses his expectation of the immediate decision of his cause (ch. 2. 23). (2.) Enough time had elapsed for the Philippian to hear of his imprisonment, to send Epaphroditus to him, to hear of Epaphroditus arrival and sickness, and send back word to Rome of their distress (ch. 2. 26). (3.) It must have been written after the three other epistles sent from Rome, viz., Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon; for Luke is no longer with him (ch. 2. 23), otherwise he would have been specified as saluting them, having formerly laboured among them, whereas he is mentioned as with him, Colossians, 4. 14; Philemon, 24. Again, in Ephesians, 6. 19, 20, his freedom to preach is implied; but in ch. 1. 13-18, his bondage is dwelt on, and it is implied that, not himself, but others, preached, and made his imprisonment known. Again, in Philemon, 22, he confidently anticipates his release, which contrasts with the more depressed anticipations of this epistle. (4.) A considerable time had elapsed since the beginning of his imprisonment, for "his bonds" to have become so widely known, and to have produced such good effects for the gospel (ch. 1. 12). (5.) There is evidently an increase in the rigour of his imprisonment implied now, as compared with the early stage of it, as described in Acts, 28.; cf. ch. 1. 29, 30; 2. 27. History furnishes a probable clue to account for this increase of rigour. In the second year of St. Paul's imprisonment (A. D. 62), Burrus, the Prætorian Prefect, to whose custody he had been committed (Acts, 28. 16, "the captain of the guard"), died; and Nero the emperor having divorced Octavia, and married Poppæa, a Jewish proselyte (who then caused her rival, Octavia, to be murdered, and gloated over the head of her victim), exalted Tigellinus, the chief promoter of the marriage, a monster of wickedness, to the Prætorian Prefecture. It was then he seems to have been removed from his own beams into the Praetorian, or barracks of the Praetorian guards, attached to the palace, for sinister custody; and hence he writes with less hopeful anticipations as to the result of his trial (ch. 1. 17; 2. 11). Some of the Praetorian guards who had the custody of him before, would then naturally make known his "bonds," in accordance with ch. 1. 13; from the smaller Praetorian body-guard at the palace, the report would spread to the general permanent Praetorian camp, which Tiberius had established North of the city, outside of the walls. He had arrived in Rome, February, 61; the "two whole years (Acts, 28. 30) in his own hired houses" ended February, 63, so that the date of this epistle, written shortly after, evidently whilst the danger was imminent, would be about spring or summer, 63. The providence of God averted the danger. He probably was thought beneath the notice of Tigellinus, who was more intent on court intrigues. The death of Nero's favourite, Pallas, the brother of Felix, this same year, also took out of the way another source of danger.

The STYLE is abrupt and discontinuous, his fervour of affection leading him to pass rapidly from one theme to another (ch. 2. 12, 19-24, 28-30; 3. 1-2, 3, 4-14, 18). In no epistle does he use so warm expressions of love. In ch. 4. 1, he seems at a loss for words sufficient to express all the extent and ardour of his affection for the Philippians, "My brethren dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, so stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved." The mention of bishops and deacons in ch. 1. 1, is due to the late date of the epistle, at a time when the church had begun to assume that order which is laid down in the Pastoral Epistles, and which continued the prevalent one in the first and purest age of the church.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-36. INSCRIPTION. THANKSGIVING AND PRAYERS for the Flourishing Spiritual State of the Philippians, His Own State at Rome, and the Result of his Imprisonment in Spreading the Gospel. Exhortation to Christian Consistency. 1. Timothy—mentioned as being well known to the Philippians (Acts, 16. 2, 10-12, and now present with Paul. Not that Timothy had any share in writing the epistle; for St. Paul presently uses the first person singular, "I," not "we" (v. 3). The mention of his name implies merely that Timothy joined in affectionate remembrances to them, servants of Jesus Christ.—The oldest MSS. read the order, "Christ Jesus." St. Paul does not call himself "an apostle," as in the inscriptions of other epistles; for the Philippians needed not to be reminded of his apostolic authority. He writes rather in a tone of affectionate familiarity. all—So v. 4, 7, 8, 23; ch. 2. 17, 20. It implies comprehensive affection which desired not to forget any one among them "all" bishops—Synonymous with "presbyters" in the apostolical churches; as appears from the same persons being called "elders of the church" at Ephesus (Acts, 20. 17), and "overscers" (Acts, 20. 28. Greek, "bishops." And Titus, 1. 5, cf. with v. 7. This is the earliest letter of St. Paul where bishops and deacons are mentioned, and the only one where they are separately addressed in the salutation. This accords with the probable course of events, deduced alike from the letters and history. Whilst the apostles were constantly visiting the churches in person or by messengers, regular pastors would be less needed; but when some were removed by various causes, provision for the permanent order of the churches would be needed. Hence the three pastoral letters, subsequent to this epistle, give instructions as to the due appointment of bishops and deacons. It agrees with this new want of the church, when other apostles were dead or far away, and Paul long in prison, that bishops and deacons should be prominent for the first time in the opening salutation. The Spirit thus intimated that the churches were to look up to their own pastors, now that the miraculous gifts were passing into God's ordinary providence, and the presence of the inspired apostles, the dispensers of those gifts, was to be withdrawn. [PALMY'S Horæ Paulinæ.] "Presbyter," implied the rank; "bishop," the duties of the office. [NEANDER.] Naturally, when the apostles who had the chief supervision were no more, one among the presbyters presided and received the name "Bishop," in the more restricted and modern sense; just as in the Jewish synagogues one of the elders presided as "ruler of the synagogue." Observe, the apostle addresses the church (i.e., the congregation) more directly than its presiding ministers (Colossians, 4. 17; 1 Thessalonians, 5. 12; Hebrews, 13. 24; Revelation, 1. 4, 11). The bishops more managed the internal, the deacons the external, affairs of the church. The plural number shows there was more than one bishop or presbyter, and more than one deacon in the church at Philippi. 2. Græc...peace—The very form of this salutation implies the union of Jew, Greek, and Roman. The Greek salutation was "joy" (χαίρειν), akin to the Greek for "grace" (χαρις). The Roman was "health," the intermediate term between grace and peace. The Hebrew was "peace," including both temporal and spiritual prosperity. Græc must come first if we are to have true peace, from...from—Omit the second "from;" as in the Greek, "God our Father" and "the Lord Jesus Christ," are most closely connected. 3. Translate, "In all my remembrance of you." 4. making request—translate, "making my request," for you all—The frequent repetition in this epistle of "all" with "you," marks that Paul desires to declare his love for all alike, and will not recognise any divisions among them. with joy—The characteristic feature in this epistle, as love is in that to the Ephesians (cf. v. 18; ch. 2. 19, 23; 3. 1; 4. 1, 4). Love and joy are the two first fruits of the Spirit. Joy gives especial animation to prayers. It marked his high opinion of them, that there was almost every thing in them to give him joy, and almost nothing to give him pain. 5. Ground of his "thanking God" (v. 3): "For your (continued) fellowship (i.e., real spiritual participation) in dit. (in regard to) the gospel from the first: day (of your becoming partakers in it) until now." Believers have the fellowship of the Son of God (1 Corinthians, 1. 9) and of the Father (1 John, 1. 3; in the gospel, by becoming partakers of "the fellowship of the Holy Ghost" (2 Corinthians, 13. 14), and exercise that fellowship by acts of communion, not only the communion of the Lord's supper, but holy liberality to brethren and ministers (ch. 4. 10, 15, "communicated... concerning giving;" 2 Corinthians, 9. 13; Galatians, 6. 6; Hebrews, 13. 16, "To communicate forget not"). 6. confident—This confidence nerves prayers and thanksgivings (v. 3, 4). this very thing—the very thing which he prays for (v. 4, 1) is the matter of his believing "confidence" (Mark, 11. 24; 1 John, 6. 14, 15). Hence the result is sure. he which hath begun—God (ch. 2. 13). a good work—Any work that God begins, He will surely finish (1 Samuel, 3. 12). Not even men begin a work at random. Much more the fact of His beginning the work is a pledge of its completion (Isaiah, 38. 12). So as to the particular work here meant, the perfecting of their fellowship in the gospel (v. 5; Psalm 37. 21; 89. 33; 135. 8; John, 10. 25, 29; Romans, 8. 20, 35-50; 11. 1, 2; Hebrews, 6. 17-19; James, 1. 17; Jude, 24). As God cast not off Israel for ever, though chastening them for a time, so He will not cast off the spiritual Israel (Deuteronomy, 33. 3; Isaiah, 27. 8; 1 Peter, 1. 6). perform it until—"perfect it up to." [ALFORD, ELLICOTT, &c.] the day of...Christ—(v. 10.) The Lord's coming, designed by God in every age of the church to be regarded as near, is to be the goal set before believers minds, rather than their own death. 7. meek—Greek, "just," to think this—to have the prayerful confidence I expressed (v. 4-6), of you—lit., "in behalf of you." Paul's confident prayer in their behalf was, that God would perfect His own good work of grace in them. because, &c. — Punctuate and translate, "Because I have you in my heart (so v. 6; otherwise the Greek and the words immediately following in the verse, favour Margin, 'Ye have me in your heart...being partakers of my grace' (both, in my bonds, and in my defence and confirmation of the gospel, you (I say) all being fellow-partakers of my grace." This last clause thus assigns the reason why he has them in his heart (i.e., cherished in his love, 2 Corinthians, 3: 2; 7: 3), even in his bonds, and in his defence and confirmation of the gospel such as he was constantly making in private, Acts, 28: 17-23; his self-defence and confirmation of the gospel being necessarily conjoined, as the Greek implies, cf. v. 17, etc., "inasmuch as ye are fellow-partakers of my grace: inasmuch as ye share with me in 'the fellowship of the gospel' (v. 6), and have manifested this, both by suffering as I do for the gospel's sake (v. 28-30), and by imparting to me of your substance (ch. 4: 15). It is natural and right for me thus confidently to pray in your behalf (ELLIOTT, &c., translate, "To be thus minded for you all"), because of my having you in your warmest remembrances even in my bonds, since you are sharers with me in the gospel grace. Bonds do not bind love. 8. Confirmation of v. 7. record—i.e., witness, in the bowels of Jesus Christ—"Christ Jesus" is the order in the oldest MSS. My yearning love (so the Greek implies) to you is not merely from natural affection, but from devotedness to Christ Jesus. "Not Paul, but Jesus Christ lives in Paul; wherefore Paul is not moved in the bowels [i.e., the tender love, Jeremiah, 31: 20] of Paul, but of Jesus Christ." [BAXTER.] All real spiritual love is but a portion of Christ's love which yearns in all who are united to Him. [ALFORD.] 9. The subject of his prayer for them (v. 4), your love—to Christ, producing love not only to Paul, Christ's minister, as it did, but also to one another, which it did not altogether as much as it ought (ch. 2: 2; 4: 2). knowledge—of doctrinal and practical truth. judgment—rather, "perception;" "perceptive sense." Spiritual perceptions: spiritual sight, spiritual hearing, spiritual feeling, spiritual taste. Christianity is a vigorous plant, not the hotbed growth of enthusiasm. "Knowledge" and "perception" guard love from being ill-judged. 10. Lit., "With a view to your proving (and so approving and embracing) the things that excel" (Romans, 2: 18; not merely things not bad, but the things best among those that are good: the things of more advanced excellence. Ask as to things, not merely, is there no harm, but is there any good, and which is the best? sincere—from a Greek root, Examined in the sunlight and found pure, without offences—Not stumbling: running the Christian race without falling through any stumblingblock, i.e., temptation in your way, till—rather, "unto," "against," so that when the day of Christ comes, ye may be found pure and without offence. 11. The oldest MSS. read the singular, "fruit." So Galatians, 5: 22 (see Note: regarding the works of righteousness, however manifold, as one harmonious whole, "the fruit of the Spirit" (Ephesians, 5: 9; James, 3: 18, "the fruit of righteousness" (Hebrews, 12: 11); Romans, 6: 22, "fruit unto holiness" which are—"which is by Greek, through Jesus Christ." Through His sending to us the Spirit from the Father. "We are wild and useless olive trees till we are grafted into Christ, who, by His living root, makes us fruit-bearing branches." [CALVIN.] 12. understand—Greek, "know." The Philippians probably had feared that his imprisonment would hinder the spread of the gospel; he therefore removes this fear, the things which happened unto me—Greek,

"the things concerning me." rather—so far as my imprisonment from hindering the gospel. Faith takes in a favourable light even what seems adverse (BAXTER) (v. 12, 28; ch. 2: 17). 13. my bonds in Christ—rather as Greek, "So that my bonds have become manifest in Christ," i.e., as endured in Christ's cause, palace—lit., "Prætorium," i.e., the barrack of the Prætorian guards attached to the palace of Nero, on the Palatine hill at Rome; not the general Prætorian camp outside the city; for this was not connected with "Cæsar's household," which ch. 4: 22 shows the Prætorium here meant was, The Emperor was "Prætor," or Commander-in-Chief, naturally then the barrack of his body-guard was called the Prætorium. Paul seems now not to have been at large in his own hired house, though chained to a soldier, as in Acts, 28: 16, 20, 31, but in strict custody in the Prætorium: a change which probably took place on Tullianus becoming Prætorian Prefect. See my Introduction. in all other places—So CHRYSOSTOM. Or else, "to all the rest," i.e., "manifest to all the other" Prætorian soldiers stationed elsewhere, through the instrumentality of the Prætorian household guards who might for the time be attached to the Emperor's palace, and who relieved one another in succession. Paul had been now upwards of two years a prisoner, so that there was time for his case and the gospel having become widely known at Rome. 14. Translate as Greek, "And that (v. 13) most of the brethren in the Lord," &c. "In the Lord," distinguishes them from "brethren after the flesh," Jewish fellow-countrymen. ELLIOTT, &c., translate, "Trusting in the Lord," by my bonds—encouraged by my patience in bearing my bonds, much more bold—translate as Greek, "are more abundantly bold." 15. "Some indeed are preaching Christ even for envy, i.e., to envy out the envy which they felt towards Paul, on account of the success of the gospel in the capital of the world, owing to his steadfastness in his imprisonment: they wished through envy to transfer the credit of its progress from him to themselves. Probably Judaizing teachers (Romans, 14: 1; 1 Corinthians, 3: 10-15; 1 Peter, 2: 1, &c.; 2 Corinthians, 11: 1-4). some also of [rather, for] good will—answering to "the brethren" (v. 14): some being well-disposed to him. 16, 17. The oldest MSS. transpose these verses, and read, "These [last] indeed out of love (to Christ and me), knowing (the opposite of 'thinking' below) that I am set (i.e., appointed by God, 1 Thessalonians, 3: 3) for the defence of the gospel (v. 7, not on my own account). But the others out of contention (or rather, 'a factious spirit'; 'cabal'; a spirit of intrigue, using unscrupulous means to compass their end; Note, Galatians, 5: 20; 'self-seeking' [ALFORD] proclaim (the Greek is not the same as that for 'preach,' but, 'announce') Christ, not sincerely (answering to 'out of a spirit of intrigue, or 'self-seeking.' Lit., 'not purely'; not with a pure intention: the Jewish leaders they tried to introduce, was in order to glorify themselves, Galatians, 6: 12, 13; see, however, Note, v. 18, thinking (but in vain) to raise up (so the oldest MSS. read) tribulation to my bonds." Their thought was, that taking the opportunity of my being laid aside, they would exalt themselves by their Judaizing preaching, and depreciate me and my preaching, and so cause me trouble of spirit in my bonds; they thought that I, like themselves, sought my own glory, and so would be mortified at their success over mine. But they are utterly mistaken: "I rejoice" at it (v. 18), so far am I from being troubled at it. 18. "What then?" what follows from this? Does this trouble me as they thought it would? "Notwithstanding" their unkind thought to me, and self-seeking intention, the cause I have at heart is furthered "every way" of preaching, "whether in pretence (with a by motive, v. 16) or in truth (out of true 'love' to Christ, v. 17), Christ is proclaimed; and therein I do rejoice, yea, and I will rejoice." From this it would seem that these self-seeking teachers in the main "proclaimed Christ," not "another gospel," such as the Judaizers in Galatia taught (Galatians, 1. 6-8); though probably having some of the Jewish leaven (Note, v. 15, 16, 17), their chief error was their self-seeking envious motive, not so much error of doctrine: had there been vital error, Paul would not have rejoiced. The proclamation of CHRIST, however done, roused attention, and so was sure to be of service. Paul could thus rejoice at the good result of their bad intentions (Psalm 78. 10; Isaiah, 55. 7). 18. turn to my salvations—"turn out to me for (or unto) salvation." This proclamation of Christ every way will turn out to my spiritual good. Christ, whose interests are my interests, being glorified thereby; and so the coming of His kingdom being furthered, which, when it does come, will bring completed "SALVATION" (Hebrews, 9. 28) to me, and all whose "earnest expectation" (v. 26) is that Christ may be magnified in them. So far is their preaching from causing me, as they thought, tribulation to my bonds (v. 16). Paul plainly quotes and applies to himself the very words of the LXX. (Job, 13. 16, "This shall turn out to my salvation," which belongs to all God's people of every age, in their tribulation (cf. Job, 13. 18). through your prayer and the supply.—The Greek intimately joins the two nouns together, by having but one preposition and one article: "Through your prayer and (the consequent) supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ" (obtained for me through your prayer). 20. According to my earnest expectation.—The Greek expresses, "expectation with upstretched hand (Luke, 21. 28) and outstretched neck." Romans, 8. 19, the only other place in the New Testament that the word occurs. TRITMANN says, in both places it implies not mere expectation, but the anxious desire of an anticipated prosperous issue in afflictive circumstances. The subject of his earnest expectation which follows, answers to "my salvation" (v. 16). in nothing I shall be ashamed—"in nothing have reason to be ashamed of" "my work for God, or His work in me." [ALFORD.] Or, "In nothing be disappointed in my hope, but that I may fully obtain it." [ESTIUS.] So "ashamed" is used Romans, 9. 33. "all boldness—" all is opposed to "in nothing," as "boldness" is the opposite to "ashamed." so now also—when "my body" is "in bonds" (v. 17). Christ—not Paul, "shall be magnified," life, or by death—Whatever be the issue, I cannot lose, I must be the gainer by the event. Paul was not conscientious: in the issue of things pertaining to themselves, the apostles underwent the same probation of faith and patience as we. 21. For—in either event (v. 20) I must be the gainer. "For to me," &c. to live is Christ—whatever life, time, and strength, I have, is Christ's: Christ is the sole object for which I live (Galatians, 2. 20). to die is gain—Not the act of dying, but as the Greek ("to have died") expresses, the state after death. Besides the glorification of Christ by my death, which is my primary object (v. 20), the change of state caused by death, so far from being a matter of shame (v. 20) or loss, as my enemies suppose, will be a positive "gain" to me. 22. Rather as Greek. "But if to live in the flesh, (if this (I say) the continuance in life which I am undervaluing) be the fruit of my labour (i.e., be the condition in which the fruit of my ministerial labour is involved), then what I shall choose I know not" (I cannot determine with myself, if the choice were given me, both alternatives being great goods alike). So ALFORD & ELLICOTT. BENGL takes it as English Version, which the Greek will bear by supposing an ellipsis. "If to live in the flesh (be my portion), this (continuing to live) is the fruit of my labour," i.e., this continuance in life will be the occasion of my bringing in "the fruit of labour," i.e., will be the occasion of "labours" which are their own "fruit" or reward; or, this my continuing "to live" will have this "fruit," viz., "labours" for Christ. GROTIIUS explains "the fruit of labour" as an idiom for "worth while;" If I live in the flesh, this is worth my while, for thus Christ's interests will be advanced, "For to me to live is Christ" (v. 21; cf. ch. 2. 20; Romans, 1. 13). The second alternative, viz., dying, is taken up and handled, ch. 2. 17, "If I be offered." 23. For.—The oldest MSS. read, "But," "I know not (v. 22) BUT am in a strait (am perplexed) betwixt the two (viz., 'to live' and 'to die'), having the desire for departing (Nt., to loose anchor, 2 Timothy, 4. 6) and being with Christ; FOR (so the oldest MSS.) it is by far better," or as the Greek, more forcibly, "by far the more preferable;" a double comparative. This refutes the notion of the soul being dormant during its separation from the body. It also shows that, whilst he regarded the Lord's advent as at all times near, yet that his death before it was a very possible contingency. The partial life eternal is in the interval between death and Christ's second advent: the perfectio, at that advent. [BISHOP PARSONS.] To depart is better than to remain in the flesh; to be with Christ is far for better: a New Testament hope (Hebrews, 11. 26). [BENGL.] 24. to abide—to continue somewhat longer. for you—Greek, "on your account;" "for your sake." In order to be of service to you, I am willing to forego my entrance a little sooner into blessedness; heaven will not fail to be mine at last. 25. Translate, "And being confident of this," I know, &c.—by prophetic intimations of the Spirit. He did not yet know the issue, as far as human appearances were concerned (ch. 2. 23). He doubtless returned from his first captivity to Philippi (Hebrews, 13. 19; Philemon, 22. Joy of faith—Greek, "joy in your faith." 26. Translate, "That your matter of glorying (or rejoicing) may abound in Christ Jesus in me (i.e., in my case: in respect to me, or for me who have been granted to your prayers, v. 19) through my presence again among you." ALFORD makes the "matter of glorying," the possession of the gospel, received from Paul, which would abound, be assured and increased, by his presence among them; thus, "in me," implies that Paul is the worker of the material of abounding in Christ Jesus. But "my rejoicing over you" (ch. 2. 16), answers plainly to "your rejoicing in respect to me" here. 27. Only—Whatever happens as to my coming to you, or not, make this your one only care. By supposing this or that future contingency, many persuade themselves they will be such as they ought to be, but it is better always without evasion to perform present duties under present circumstances. [BENGL.] let your conversation be—(cf. ch. 3. 20). The Greek implies, "Let your walk as citizens (viz., of the heavenly state: 'the city of the living God,' Hebrews, 12. 22. 'the heavenly Jerusalem,' 'fellow-citizens of the saints,' Ephesians, 2. 19) be," &c. I... see... hear—So v. 30. "Hear" in order to include both alternatives, must include the meaning know, your affairs—your state. is one spirit—the fruit of partaking of the Holy Spirit (Ephesians, 4. 3, 4). with one mind—rather as Greek, "soul," the sphere of the affections; subordinate to the "Spirit," man's higher and heavenly nature. "There is sometimes natural antipathies among believers; but these are overcome, when there is not only unity of spirit, but also of soul." [BENGL.] striving together—with united effort. 28. terrified—i.e., said of horses or other animals startled or suddenly scared; so of sudden consternation in general, which—your not being terrified, evident token of perdition—if they would only perceive it (2 Thessalonians, 1. 6). It attests this, that in contending hopelessly against you, they are only rushing on their own perdition, not shaking your united faith and constancy. to you of salvation—The oldest MSS. read, "Of your salvation;" not merely your temporal safety. 29. For—rather, a proof that this is an evident token from God of your salvation, "Because," &c. it is given—Greek, "It has been granted as a favour, or" "gift of grace." Faith is the gift of God (Ephesians, 2, 8, not wrought in the soul by the will of man, but by the Holy Ghost John, 1, 13, 12). believe on him—"To believe Him," would merely mean to believe He speaks the truth. "To believe on Him," is to believe in, and trust through Him to obtain eternal salvation. Suffering for Christ is not only not a mark of God's anger, but a gift of His grace. 30. ye saw in me—(Acts, 16, 12, 13, &c., 1 Thessalonians, 2, 2.) I am "in nothing terrified by mine adversaries" (e. 19), so ought not ye. The words here, "ye saw...and...hear," answer to "I come and see you, or else...hear" (e. 27).

CHAPTER II.

VER. 1-30. CONTINUED EXHORTATION: TO UNITY: TO HUMILITY AFTER CHRIST'S EXAMPLE, WHOSE GLORY FOLLOWED HIS HUMILIATION; TO EARNESTNESS IN SEEKING PERFECTION, THAT THEY MAY BE HIS JOY IN THE DAY OF CHRIST; HIS JOYFUL READINESS TO BE OFFERED NOW BY DEATH, SO AS TO PROMOTE THEIR FAITH. HIS INTENTION TO SEND TIMOTHY: HIS SENDING EPAPHRODITUS MEANTIME. 1. The "therefore" implies that he is here expanding on the exhortation (ch. 1, 27). "In one Spirit, with one mind" (soul). He urges four influencing motives in this verse, to inculcate the four Christian duties corresponding respectively to them (e. 2). That ye be like-minded, having the same love, of one accord, of one mind: (1.) "If there be (with you) any consolation in Christ," &c., any consolation of which Christ is the source, leading you to wish to console me in my afflictions borne for Christ's sake, ye owe it to me to grant my request "that ye be like-minded" (CHRYSOSTOM & ESTIUS); (2.) "If there be any comfort of (i.e., flowing from) love," the adjunct of "consolation in Christ" (3.) "If any fellowship of communion together as Christians, flowing from joint participation in the Spirit" (2 Corinthians, 13, 14). As Pagans meant, ut, those who were of one village, and drank of one fountain, how much greater is the union which conjoins those who drink of the same Spirit (1 Corinthians, 12, 4, 13) (GROTIUS); (4.) "If any bowels (tender emotions) and mercies" (compassions), the adjuncts of "fellowship of the Spirit." The opposites of the two pairs, into which the four fall, are reprobat, e. 3, 4. 2. Faithful—lit., "that ye be of the same mind;" more general than the following "of one mind," having the same love—equally disposed to love and be loved. being of one accord—lit., "with united souls." This pairs with the following clause, thus, "With united souls, being of one mind?" as the former two also pair together. "That ye be like-minded, having the same love." 3. Let nothing be done—The italicised words are not in the Greek. Perhaps the ellipsis had better be supplied from the Greek (v. 2), "Thinking nothing in the way of strife" for rather, "factious intrigue," "self-seeking," Note, ch. 1, 16. It is the thought which characterises the action as good or bad before God. lowliness of mind—The direct relation of this grace is to God alone; it is the sense of dependence of the creature on the Creator as such, and it places all created beings in this respect on a level. The man "lowly of mind" as to his spiritual life, is independent of men, and free from all slavish feeling, while sensible of his continual dependence on God. Still it INDIRECTLY affects his behaviour towards his fellow-men; for, conscious of his entire dependence on God for all his abilities, even as they are dependent on God for theirs, he will not pride himself on his abilities, or exalt self in his conduct towards others (Ephesians, 4, 2; Colossians, 3, 12). (NANDER.) let each esteem—translate as Greek, "esteeming each other superior to yourselves." Instead of fixing your eyes on those points in which you excel, fix them on those in which your neighbour excels you: this is true "humility." 4. The oldest MSS. read, "Not looking each of you (plural Greek on his own things &c., not having regard solely to them), but each of you on the things of others" also. Cf. v. 11; also Paul's own example (ch. 1, 24). 5. The oldest MSS. read, "Have this mind in you," &c. He does not put forward himself (see Note, v. 4, and ch. 1, 24) as an example, but Christ, THE ONE pre-eminently who sought not His own, but "humbled Himself" (e. 8), first in taking on Him our nature, secondly, in humbling Himself further in that nature (Romans, 16, 3). 6. Translate, "Who subsisting (or existing, viz., originally: the Greek is not the simple substantive verb, to be) in the form of God (the Divine essence is not meant; but the external self-manifesting characteristics of God, the form shining forth from His glorious essence. The Divine nature had infinite beauty in itself, even without any creature contemplating that beauty; that beauty was 'the form of God,' as 'the form of a servant' (e. 7), which is in contrasted opposition to it, takes for granted the existence of His human nature, so 'the form of God' takes for granted His Divine nature (BENGE). cf. John, 5, 27; 17, 6; Colossians, 1, 15, 'Who is the IMAGE of the invisible God' at a time before 'every creature,' 2 Corinthians, 4, 4), esteemed (the same Greek verb as in v. 3) His being on an equality with God no (act of robbery" or self-arrogation; claiming to one's self what does not belong to him. ELLICOTT, WAHL, &c., have translated, "A thing to be grasped at," which would require the Greek to be harpagma, whereas harpagmos means the act of seizing. So harpagmos means in the only passage where else it occurs, PLUTARCH de educatione puerorum, 10. The same insuperable objection lies against ALFORD'S translation. He regarded not as self-enrichment &c., an opportunity for self-exaltation. His equality with God." His argument is that the antithesis (v. 7) requires it. "He used His equality with God as an opportunity, not for self-exaltation, but for self-abasement, or emptying Himself. But the antithesis is not between His being on an equality with God, and His emptying Himself; for He never emptied Himself of the fulness of His Godhead, or His "BEING on an equality with God;" but between His being "in the form (i.e., the outward glorious self-manifestation) of God," and His "taking on Him the form of a servant," whereby He in a great measure emptied Himself of His precedent "form," or outward self-manifesting glory as God. Not "looking on His own things" (e. 4). He, though existing in the form of God, He esteemed it no robbery to be on an equality with God, yet made Himself of no reputation. "Being on an equality with God," is not identical with "subsisting in the form of God;" the latter expresses the external characteristics, majesty, and beauty of the Deity, which "He emptied Himself of," to assume "the form of a servant," the former, "His BEING," or NATURE, His already existing STATE OF EQUALITY with God, both the Father and the Son having the same ESSENCE. A glimpse of Him "in the form of God," previous to His incarnation, was given to Moses (Exodus, 24, 10, 11), Aaron, &c. 7. made himself of no reputation, and—rather as the Greek, "Emptied Himself, taking upon him the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men." The latter clauses there being no conjunctions, "and—and," in the Greek; expresses in what Christ's "emptying of Himself" consists, viz., in "taking the form of a servant" (Note, Hebrews, 10, 5; cf. Exodus, 21, 5, 6, and Psalm 40, 6, proving that it was at the time when He assumed a body, He took "the form of a servant"), and in order to explain how He took "the form of a servant," there is added, by "being made in the likeness of men." His subjection to the law (Luke, 2, 21; Galatians, 4, 4) and to His parents (Luke, 2, 51), His low state as a carpenter, and carpenter's reputed son (Matthew, 13. 55; Mark, 6. 3). His betrayal for the price of a bond servant (Mark, 14. 10), and slave-like death to relieve us from the slavery of sin and death, finally and chiefly, His servant-like dependence as man on God, whilst His Divinity was not outwardly manifested (Isaiah, 49. 3, 7), are all marks of His "form as a servant." This proves (1.) He was in the form of a servant, as soon as He was made man. (2.) He was "in the form of God," before He was "in the form of a servant." (3.) He did as really subsist in the Divine nature, as in the form of a servant, or in the nature of man. For He was as much "in the form of God," as "in the form of a servant," and was so in the form of God, as "to be on an equality with God." He therefore could have been none other than God; for God saith, "To whom will ye liken me and make me equal" (Isaiah, 46. 6). (BISHOP FRANKLIN.) His emptying Himself pre-supposes His previous plenitude of Godhead (John, 1. 14; Colossians, 1. 19; 2. 9). He remained full of this; yet He bore Himself as if He were empty, being found in fashion as a man—being already, by His "emptying Himself," in the form of a servant, or likeness of man (Romans, 8. 3). "He humbled Himself (still further) by becoming obedient even unto death not as an English Fervor." He humbled Himself and became; &c.: the Greek has no "and," and has the participle, not the verb, and that the death of the cross." "Fashion" expresses that He had the outward graces, speech, and look. In v. 7, in the Greek, the emphasis is on Himself (which stands before the Greek verb), "He emptied Himself," His Divine self, viewed in respect to what He had heretofore been; in v. 8, the emphasis is on "humbled" (which stands before the Greek "Himself"); He not only "emptied Himself" of His previous "form of God," but submitted to positive HUMILIATION. He "became obedient," viz., to God, as His "servant" (Romans, 8. 19; Hebrews, 5. 8). Therefore "God" is said to "exalt" Him (v. 9), even as it was God to whom He became voluntarily "obedient." "Even unto death" expresses the climax of His obedience (John, 10. 16). 9. Wherefore—As the just consequence of His self-humiliation and obedience (Paulus 5. 6, 6; 110. 1. 7; Matthew, 28. 19; Luke, 24. 20; John, 6. 27; 10. 17; Romans, 14. 9; Ephesians, 1. 20-22; Hebrews, 2. 9). An intimation, that if we would heretofore be ourselves, we too must, after His example, now humble ourselves (v. 3. 5; ch. 3. 21; 1 Peter, 5. 6, 6). Christ emptied Christ; God exalted Christ as man to equality with God. (BENNETT.) highly exalted—Greek, "supereminently exalted"; Ephesians, 4. 10. Given him—Greek, "bestowed on Him," a name—along with the corresponding reality, glory and majesty, which—translate, "(viz., that which is above every name." The name "Jesus" (v. 10), which is even now in glory His name of honour (Acts, 3. 6). "Above" not only men, but angels (Ephesians, 1. 21). 10. at the name—rather as Greek, "in the name." bow—rather, "bend," in token of worship. Referring to Isaiah, 45. 23; quoted also in Romans, 14. 11. To worship "in the name of Jesus," is to worship Jesus Himself (cf. v. 11; Proverbs, 15. 10, or God in Christ (John, 16. 23; Ephesians, 3. 14). Cf. "Whoever shall call upon the name of the Lord (i.e., whoever shall call on the Lord in His revealed character) shall be saved" (Romans, 10. 13; 1 Corinthians, 1. 2. "all that call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord" (cf. 2 Timothy, 2. 22; "call on the Lord" Acts, 7. 59, "calling upon...and saying, Lord Jesus" (Acts, 9. 14, 21; 22. 16). of things in heaven—angels. They worship Him not only as God, but as the ascended God-man. "Jesus" (Ephesians, 1. 21; Hebrews, 1. 6; 1 Peter, 3. 22). in earth—men; among whom He tabernacled for a time. under the earth—the dead; among whom He was numbered once (Romans, 14. 9, 11; Ephesians, 4. 9, 10; Revelation, 6. 13). The demons and the lost may be included indirectly, as even they give homage, though one of fear, not love, to Jesus (Mark, 3. 11; Luke, 8. 31; James, 2. 19; see Note, v. 11). 11. every tongue—Cf. "every knee" (v. 10). In every way He shall be acknowledged as Lord (no longer as "servant," v. 7). As none can fully do so "but by the Holy Ghost" (1 Corinthians, 12. 3), the spirits of good men who are dead, must be the class directly meant, v. 10, "under the earth." to the glory of God the Father—the grand end of Christ's mediatorial office and kingdom, which shall cease when this end shall have been fully realised (John, 6. 19-23, 30; 17. 1, 4-7; 1 Corinthians, 15. 24-28). 12. Wherefore—Seeing that we have in Christ such a specimen of glory resulting from "obedience" (v. 8) and humiliation, see that ye also be "obedient," and so "your salvation" shall follow your obedience, as ye have... obeyed—"even as ye have been obedient," viz., to God, as Jesus was "obedient" unto God (Note, v. 8). not as, &c.—"not as if" it were a matter to be done "in my presence only, but now (as things are) much more (with more earnestness) in my absence" (because my help is withdrawn from you). (ALFORD.) work out—carry out to its full perfection. "Salvation" is "worked in" (v. 13; Ephesians, 1. 11) believers by the Spirit, who enables them through faith to be justified once for all; but it needs, as a progressive work, to be "worked out" by obedience, through the help of the same Spirit, unto perfection (2 Peter, 1. 4, 5). The sound Christian neither, like the formalist, rests in the means, without looking to the end, and to the Holy Spirit who alone can make the means effectual; nor, like the fanatic, hopes to attain the end without the means. your own—The emphasis is on this. Now that I am not present to further the work of your salvation, "work out your own salvation" yourselves the more carefully. Do not think this work cannot go on because I am absent; "for (v. 13) it is God that worketh in you." &c. In this case adopt a rule different from the former (v. 4), but resting on the same principle of "lowliness of mind" (v. 3), viz., "look each on his own things," instead of "disputings" with others (v. 14). salvation—which is in "Jesus" (v. 10), as His name (meaning God-Saviour) implies. with fear and trembling—the very feeling enjoined on "servants," as to what ought to accompany their "obedience" (Ephesians, 6. 5). So here, See that, as "servants" to God, after the example of Christ, ye be so "with the fear and trembling" which becomes servants: not slavish fear, but trembling anxiety not to fall short of the goal (1 Corinthians, 9. 26, 27; Hebrews, 4. 1. "Let us fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any should come short of it", resulting from a sense of our human insufficiency, and from the consciousness that all depends on the power of God, "who worketh both to will and to do" (Romans, 11. 20). "Paul, though joyous, writes seriously." [J. J. WOLF.] 13. For—Encouragement to work: "For it is God who worketh in you," always present with you, though I be absent. It is not said, "Work out your own salvation, though it is God," &c. but, "because it is God who," &c. The will, and the power to work, being first instalments of His grace, encourage us to make full proof of, and carry out to the end, the "salvation" which He has first "worked," and is still "working in" us, enabling us to "work it out." "Our will does nothing therewithout without grace, but grace is inactive without our will." [ST. BERNARD.] Man is, in different senses, entirely active, and entirely passive: God producing all, and we acting all. What He produced is our own acts. It is not that God does some, and we the rest. God does all, and we do all. God is the only proper author, we the only proper actors. Thus the same things in Scripture are represented as from God, and from us. God makes a new heart, and we are commanded to make it a new heart, not merely because we must use the means in order to the effect, but the effect itself is our act and our duty (Ezekiel, 11, 19, 21; 33, 26). [EDWARDS.] worked—rather as Greek, "worketh effectually." We cannot of ourselves embrace the gospel of grace: "the will" (Psalm 110, 3; 2 Corinthians, 3, 5) comes solely of God's gift to whom He will (John, 6, 44, 65); so also the power "to do" (rather, "to work effectually," as the Greek is the same as that for "worketh in"), i.e., effectual perseverance to the end, is wholly of God's gift (John, 1, 6; Hebrews, 12, 21), of His good pleasure—rather as Greek, "for His good pleasure"; in order to carry out His sovereign gracious purpose towards you (Ephesians, 1, 5, 9). 14. murmurings—secret murmurings and complaints against your fellow-men, arising from selfishness: opposed to the example of Jesus just mentioned (cf. the use of the word, John, 7, 12, 13; Acts, 6, 1; 1 Peter, 4, 9; Jude, 16). disputings—The Greek is translated "doubting" in 1 Timothy, 2, 8. But here referring to profitless "disputings" with our fellow-men, in relation to whom we are called on to be "blameless and harmless" (v. 15); so the Greek is translated, Mark, 9, 33, 34. These disputings flow from "vain glory" reprobated (v. 3); and abounded among the Aristotelian philosophers in Macedon where Philippi was. 15. blameless and harmless—Without either the repute of mischief, or the inclination to do it. [ALFORD.] sons—rather as Greek, "the children of God" (Romans, 8, 14-16). Imitation of our heavenly Father is the instinctive guide to our duty as His children, more than any external law (Matthew, 5, 44, 45, 48). without rebuke—without giving handle for reproach. The whole verse tacitly refers by contrast to Deuteronomy, 32, 5, "Their spot... not... of His children... a perverse and crooked generation" (cf. 1 Peter, 2, 12). ye shine—lit., "appear." [FRENCH.] "Show yourselves" (cf. Matthew, 5, 14-16; Ephesians, 5, 8-13). as lights in the world—The Greek expresses "as luminaries in the world," as the sun and moon, "the lights," or "great lights," in the material world or in the firmament. LXX. in the very same Greek word in the passage, Genesis, 1, 14, 16; cf. Note, Revelation, 21, 11. 16. Holding forth—to them, and so applying it (the common meaning of the Greek; perhaps here including also the other meaning, "holding fast"). The image of light-bearers or luminaries is carried on from v. 15. As the heavenly luminaries' light is closely connected with the life of animals, so ye hold forth the light of Christ's "word" (received from me) which is the "life" of the Gentiles (John, 1, 4; 1 John, 1, 1, 5-7). Christ is "the Light of the world" (John, 8, 12); believers are only "light-bearers" reflecting His light, that I may rejoice in—lit., "with a view to (your being) a subject of rejoicing to me against the day of Christ" (ch. 4, 12; 2 Corinthians, 1, 14; 1 Thessalonians, 2, 19). that I have not run in vain—that it was not in vain that I laboured for your spiritual good. 17. Yea, and if—rather as Greek, "Yea, if even:" implying that he regarded the contingency as not unlikely. He had assumed the possibility of his being found alive at Christ's coming (for in every age Christ destined Christians to stand in preparedness for His coming as at hand): he here puts a supposition which he regards as more likely, viz., his own death before Christ's coming. It is offered—rather as Greek, "I am poured out." "I am made a libation." Present, not future, as the danger is threatening him now. As in sacrifices libations of wine were "poured upon" the offerings; so he represents his Philippian converts, offered through faith (or else their faith itself, as the sacrifice, and his blood as the libation "poured upon" it (cf. Romans, 15, 16; 2 Timothy, 4, 6). service—Greek, "priest's ministration" carrying out the image of a sacrifice. I rejoice—for myself (ch. 1, 21, 23). His expectation of release from prison is much fainter, than in the epistles to Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon, written somewhat earlier from Rome. The appointment of Titellinus to be Pretorian Prefect, was probably the cause of this change. See Introduction. rejoice with you all—ALFORD translates, "I congratulate you all," viz., on the honour occurring to you by my blood being poured out on the sacrifice of your faith. If they rejoiced already (as English Version represents), what need of his urging them. "Do ye also joy," &c. 18. "Do ye also rejoice" at this honour to you, "and congratulate me" on my blessed "gain" (ch. 1, 21). 19. Ver. 22, "Ye know the proof of him... he hath served with me," implies that Timothy had been long with Paul at Philippi. Accordingly, in the history (Acts, 16, 1-4; 17, 10, 14), we find them setting out together from Berbe in Lyconia, and together again at Berea in Macedonia, near the conclusion of St. Paul's missionary journey: an undesigned coincidence between the epistle and history, a mark of genuineness. [PALEY.] From v. 19-30, it appears Epaphroditus was to set out once to allay the anxiety of the Philippians on his account, and at the same time bearing the epistle; Timothy was to follow after the apostle's liberation was decided, when they could arrange their plans more definitely as to where Timothy should, on his return with tidings from Philippi, meet Paul, who was designing by a wider circuit, and slower progress, to reach that city. Paul's reason for sending Timothy so soon after having heard of the Philippians from Epaphroditus was, that they were now suffering persecutions (ch. 1, 28-30); and besides, Epaphroditus' delay through sickness on his journey to Rome from Philippi, made the tidings he brought to be of less recent date than Paul desired. St. Paul himself also hoped to visit them shortly. But I trust—Yet my death is by no means certain; yea, "I hope (Greek) in the Lord" (i.e., by the Lord's help). unto you—lit., "for you," i.e., to your satisfaction, not merely motion, to you. I also—that not only you "may be of good courage" (so Greek; on hearing of me (v. 23), but "I also, when I know your state." 20. His reason for sending Timothy above all others: I have none so "like-minded," lit., "like-souled," with myself as is Timothy. Cf. Deuteronomy, 13, 6, "Thy friend which is as thine own soul" (Psalm 55, 14). Paul's second self, naturally—Greek, "genuinely;" "with sincere solicitude." A case wherein the Spirit of God so changed man's nature, that to be natural was with him to be spiritual: the great point to be aimed at. 21. Translate as Greek, "They all" (viz., who are now with me, ch. 1, 14, 17; ch. 4, 21): such Demas, then with him, proved to be, Colossians, 4, 14; cf. 2 Timothy, 4, 10; Philemon, 24. seek their own—Opposed to Paul's precept (v. 4; 1 Corinthians, 10, 24, 33; 13, 5). This is spoken, by comparison with Timothy; for ch. 1, 16, 17, implies that some of those with Paul at Rome were genuine Christians, though not so self-sacrificing as Timothy. Few come to the help of the Lord's cause, where ease, fame, and gain, have to be sacrificed. Most help only when Christ's gain is compatible with their own (Judges, 6, 17, 23). 22. Rare praise (Nehemiah, 7, 2), as a son with the father—translate, "as a child serveth) a father," served with me—When we might expect the sentence to run thus, "As a child serveth a father, so he served me;" he changes it to "served with me" in modesty; as Christians are not servants to one another, but servants of God with one another (cf. ch. 3, 17). in the gospel—Greek, "unto," or "for the gospel." 23. so soon as I shall see—i.e., so soon as I shall have known for certain. 24. also myself—as well as Timothy. 25. I suppose—I thought it necessary. to send—It was properly a sending Epaphroditus back (ch. 4, 18). But as he had come intending to stay some time with Paul, the latter uses the word "send" (cf. v. 30). fellow-soldier—in the "good fight" of faith (ch. 1, 27, 30; 2 Timothy, 2, 3; 4, 7). your messenger—lit., "apostle." "The evil workmen," i. e., bad teachers (cf. 2 Timothy, spiritual significance, and was now become to those who rested on it as any ground of justification, a senseless mutilation. Christians have the only true circumcision, viz., that of the heart; legalists have only "circumcision," i. e., the cutting off of the flesh. To make "cuttings in the flesh" was expressly prohibited by the law (Leviticus, 19. 28); it was a Gentile-heathenish practice (1 Kings, 18. 28); yet this, writes Paul indignantly, is what these legalists are virtually doing in violation of the law. There is a remarkable gradation, says BURKS (Horæ Apologeticæ), in St. Paul's language as to circumcision. In his first recorded discourse (Acts, 13. 39), circumcision is not named, but implied as included in the law of Moses which cannot justify.

Six or seven years later, in epistle to Galatians (3. 2), the first epistle in which it is named, its spiritual insufficiency is maintained against those Gentiles who, beginning in the Spirit, thought to be perfected in the flesh. Later, in epistle to Romans (2. 28, 29), he goes further, and claims the substance of it for every believer, assigning the shadow only of it to the unbelieving Jew. In epistle to Colossians (2. 11; 3. 11), still later, he expounds more fully the true circumcision as the exclusive privilege of the believer. Last of all here, the very name is denied to the legalist, and a term of reproach is substituted, "circumcision," or flesh-cutting.
Once obligatory on all the covenant people, then reduced to a mere national distinction, it was more and more associated in the apostle's experience with the open hostility of the Jews, and the perverse teaching of false brethren. 3. "We are the real circumcision" (Romans, 2. 28-29; Colossians, 2. 11), worship God in the Spirit—The oldest MSS. read, "Worship by the Spirit of God:" our religious service is renewed by the Spirit (John, 4. 23, 24). Legal worship was outward, and consisted in outward acts, restricted to certain times and places. Christian worship is spiritual, flowing from the inworking of the Holy Spirit, not relating to certain isolated acts, but embracing the whole life (Romans, 12. 1). In the former, men trusted in something human, whether descent from the theocratic nation, or the righteousness of the law, or mortification of "the flesh" ("Having confidence," or "glorying in the flesh") [NEANDER.] (Romans, 1. 9), rejoice in Christ Jesus—"make our boast in Christ Jesus," not in the law: the ground of their boasting, have no confidence in the flesh—but in the Spirit. 4. "Although I (emphatical) might have confidence even in the flesh." Lit., "I having," &c., but not using "confidence in the flesh." I more—I have more "whereof I might have confidence in the flesh." 5. In three particulars he shows how he "might have confidence in the flesh" (v. 4): (1.) His pure Jewish blood. (2.) His legal preciseness, and high status as such. (3.) His zeal for the law. The Greek is lit., "Being in circumcision an eighth day himself a Hebrew. A "Grecian" or Hellenist, on the other hand, in the New Testament, is the term used for a Greek-speaking Jew. [TRICHR.] touching the Acts, 21, 3; 26, 9). blameless—Greek, "Having become blameless" as to ceremonial righteousness; having attained in the eyes of man blameless legal perfection. As to the holiness before God, which is the inner and truest spirit of the law, and which flows from "the righteousness of God by faith," he on the contrary declares (v. 12-14) that he has not attained perfection. 7. gain—rather as Greek, "gains;" including all possible advantages of outward status which he had heretofore enjoyed. I counted—Greek, "I have counted for Christ's sake loss." He no longer uses the plural as in "gains;" for he counts them all but one great "loss" (Matthew, 10, 26; Luke, 9, 25). 8. Yes doubtless—The oldest MSS. omit "doubtless" (Greek, "ye"); translate, "nay more." Not only "have I counted" those things just mentioned "loss for Christ's sake, but, moreover, I even do count ALL things but loss, &c. for the excellency—Greek, "On account of the surpassing excellency (the super-eminence above them all) of the knowledge of Christ Jesus," my Lord—Believing and loving appropriation of Him (Psalm 63, 1; John, 20, 28), for whom—"on account of whom." I have suffered the loss—Not merely have I "counted" them "loss," but have actually lost them, all things—The Greek has the article, referring to the preceding "all things;" "I have suffered the loss of them all." dung—Greek, "refuse (such as excrements, dregs, dross) cast to the dogs," as the derivation expresses. A man cannot make other things his "gain" or chief confidence, and at the same time "gain Christ." He who loses all things, and even himself, on account of Christ, gains Christ; Christ is His, and He is Christ's (Song of Solomon, 2, 16; 6, 3; Luke, 9, 23, 24; 1 Corinthians, 3, 23). 9. be found in him—"be found" at His coming again, living spiritually "in Him" as the element of my life. Once lost, I have been "found," and I hope to be perfectly "found" by Him (Luke, 15, 8). own righteousness...of the law—(v. 6; Romans, 10, 3, 5) "Of," i.e., from, righteousness...of God by faith—Greek, "which is from God (resting) upon faith." Paul was transferred from legal bondage into Christian freedom at once, and without any gradual transition. Hence, the bands of Pharisaism were loosed instantaneously; and opposition to Pharisaic Judaism took the place of opposition to the gospel. Thus God's providence fitly prepared him for the work of overthrowing all idea of legal justification. "The righteousness of faith," in Paul's sense, is the righteousness or perfect holiness of Christ appropriated by faith, as the objective ground of confidence for the believer, and also as a new subjective principle of life. Hence it includes the essence of a new disposition, and may easily pass into the idea of sanctification, though the two ideas are originally distinct. It is not any arbitrary act of God, as if he treated as sinless a man persisting in sin, simply because he believes in Christ; but the objective on the part of God corresponds to the subjective on the part of man, viz., faith. The realization of the archetype of holiness through Christ, contains the pledge that this shall be realized in all who are one with Him by faith, and are become the organs of His Spirit. Its germ is imparted to them in believing, although the fruit of a life perfectly conformed to the Redeemer, can only be gradually developed in this life. [KANDLER.] 10. That I may know him—experimentally. The aim of the "righteousness" just mentioned. This verse resumes, and more fully explains, "the excellency of the knowledge of Christ" (v. 8). To know Him is more than merely to know a doctrine about Him. Believers are brought not only to redemption, but to the Redeemer Himself, the power of His resurrection—assuring believers of their justification (Romans, 4, 25; 1 Corinthians, 15, 17), and raising them up spiritually with Him, by virtue of their identification with Him in this, as in all the acts of His redeeming work for us (Romans, 6, 4; Colossians, 2, 11; 3, 1). The power of the Divine Spirit which raised Him from literal death, is the same which raises believers from spiritual death now (Ephesians, 1, 19, 20, and shall raise their bodies from literal death hereafter (Romans, 8, 11), the fellowship of His sufferings—by identification with Him in His sufferings and death, by imputation; also, in actually bearing the cross whatever is laid on us, after His example, and so "filling up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ" (Colossians, 1, 24); and in the will to bear aught for His sake (Matthew, 10, 38; 16, 24; 2 Timothy, 2, 11). As He bore all our sufferings (Isaiah, 53, 4), so we participate in His, made conformable unto His death—"conformed to the likeness of His death," viz., by continued sufferings for His sake, and mortifying of the carnal self (Romans, 6, 29; 1 Corinthians, 15, 31; 2 Corinthians, 4, 10-12; Galatians, 2, 20). 11. If by any means—Not implying uncertainty of the issue, but the earnestness of the struggle of faith (1 Corinthians, 9, 26, 27), and the urgent need of jealous self-watchfulness (1 Corinthians, 13, 14), attain unto the resurrection of the dead—The oldest MSS. read, "...the resurrection from out of the dead," viz., the first resurrection; that of believers at Christ's coming (1 Corinthians, 15, 23; 1 Thessalonians, 4, 13; Revelation, 20, 5, 6). The Greek word occurs nowhere else in the New Testament. "The power of Christ's resurrection" (Romans, 1, 4) ensures the believer's attainment of the "resurrection from the rest of the dead" (cf. v. 20, 21). Cf., "Accounted worthy to obtain the resurrection from the dead" (Luke, 20, 35). "The resurrection of the just" (Luke, 14, 14). 12. Translate, "Not that I," &c. (I do not wish to be understood assuring that, &c.), attained—"obtained," viz., a perfect knowledge of Christ, and of the power of His death, and fellowship of His sufferings, and a conformity to His death, either were already perfect—"Or am already perfected," i.e., crowned with the garland of victory, my course completed, and perfection absolutely reached. The image is that of a race-course throughout. See 1 Corinthians, 9, 24; Hebrews, 12, 23. See TRISTAN, Synonyms of New Testament. I follow after—"I press on," apprehend...apprehended—"If so be that I may lay hold on that (viz., the prize, v. 14) for which also I seem laid hold on by Christ" (viz., at my conversion, Song of Solomon, 1, 4; 1 Corinthians, 13, 12). Jesus—Omitted in the oldest MSS. Paul was close to "apprehending" the prize (2 Timothy, 4, 7, 8). Christ the Author, is also the Finisher of His people's "race," 13, I-whatever others count as to themselves. He who counts himself perfect, must deceive himself by calling sin infirmity (1 John, 1, 8); at the same time, each must aim at perfection, to be a Christian at all (Matthew, 5, 48), forgetting these things...behind—Looking back is sure to end in going back (Luke, 9, 62); so Lot's wife (Luke, 17, 32). If in stemming a current we cease pulling the oar against it, we are carried back. God's word to us is as it was to Israel, "Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward" (Exodus, 14, 10). The Bible is our landmark to show us whether we are progressing or retrograding, reaching forth—with hand and foot, like a runner in a race, and the body bent forward. The Christian is always humbled by the contrast between what he is and what he desires to be. The eye reaches before and draws on the hand, the hand reaches before and draws on the foot. [BENGLI.] unto-towards (Hebrews, 6, 1), 14, high calling—id., "the calling that is above" (Galatians, 4, 26; Colossians, 3, 1); "the heavenly calling" (Hebrews, 3, 1).  is the Old Testament term contemptuously given to an idol (Judges, 2, 23, Margin). Hosea, 4, 7, seems to be referred to by St. Paul (cf. Romans, 1, 23). There seems no allusion to circumcision, as no longer glorious, but a shame to them (v. 2). The reference of the im-above every name, assures our expectation (ch. 2, 9-11).

 Our High Priest is gone up into the Holy of Holies not made with hands, there to atone for us; and as the Israelites stood outside the tabernacle, expecting Aaron's return (cf. Luke, 1, 31), so must we look unto the heavens expecting Christ thence. 21, Grek. "Who which our humiliation has place, 2 Corinthians, 4, 10; Ephesians, 2, 19; 2 Timothy, 2, 12), that it may be conformed unto the body of His glory (viz., in which His glory is manifested), according to the effectual working whereby," &c. Not only shall He con-e as our gave a sample of the coming transfiguration, on the mount (Matthew, 17, 1, &c.). Not a change of identity, but of fashion or form (1 Samuel 17, 15; 1 Corinthians, 15, 51). Our spiritual resurrection now is the pledge of our bodily resurrection to glory hereafter (v. 20; Romans, 8, 1). As Christ's glorified body was essentially identical with His body of humiliation; so our resurrection bodies as believers, since they shall be like His, shall be identical essentially with our present bodies, and yet "spiritual bodies" (1 Corinthians, 15, 42-44). Our "hope" is, that Christ, by His rising from the dead, hath obtained the power, and is become the pattern, of our resurrection (Micah, 2, 13).

... as a great person, of course not in public preaching, but in a less prominent sphere (1 Timothy, 2. 11, 12). Clement—Bishop of Rome—shortly after the death of Peter and Paul. His epistle from the church of Rome to the church of Corinth is extant. It makes no mention of the supremacy of the See of Peter. He was the most eminent of the apostolical fathers. ALFORD thinks that the Clement here was a Philippian, and not necessarily Clement, Bishop of Rome. But OAKLEY (Comment. John. 1. 20) identifies the Clement here with the Bishop of Rome. in the book of life—the register-book of those whose “citizenship is in heaven” (Luke, 10. 20; Philippian, 3. 20). Anciently, free cities had a roll-book containing the names of all those having the right of citizenship (cf. Exodus, 32. 32; Psalm 69. 28; Ezekiel, 13. 9; Daniel, 12. 1; Revelation, 20. 12; 21. 27). 4. I say—Greek, rather, “I will say.” 5. moderation—From a Greek root, “to yield,” whence yieldingness [TRENCH]; or from a root, “it is fitting,” whence “reasonableness of dealing” [ALFORD]; that consideration for others, not urging one’s own rights to the uttermost, but waiving a part, and thereby rectifying the injustices of justice. The archetype of this grace is God, who presses not the strictness of His law against us as we deserve (Psalm 130. 3, 4); though having exacted the fullest payment for us from our Divine Surety. There are included in “moderation,” candour and kindliness. Joy in the Lord raises us above rickorism towards others (v. 8), and carefulness (v. 6) as to one’s own affairs. Sadness produces worse harshness towards others, and a carking spirit in ourselves. Let ... be known—i.e., in your conduct to others, let nothing inconsistent with “moderation” be seen. citizens of the mother city, and those of the colony;
especially between those of both cities who were Christians, converted as many of them were by the same apostle, and under like circumstances, he having been imprisoned at Philippi, as he now is at Rome. 23.

COLOSSIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

GENUINENESS of this epistle is attested by Justin Martyr, contra Tryphonem, p. 311, h., who quotes "the first every creature," in reference to Christ, from ch. 1, 15. Theophilus of Antioch, de Autolochis, 2, p. 160. Irenæus notes expressly from this "Epistle to the Colossians" (ch. 4, 14). Clement of Alexandria, Stromata, 1, p. 225, quotes ; also elsewhere he quotes ch. 1, 9-11, 28; 2, 2, &c.; 2, 8; 3, 13, 14; 4, 2, 3, &c. Tertullian, de prescriptioum, ch. 7., quotes ch. 2, 8; and de Resurrectione carnis, ch. 23., he quotes ch. 3, 12, 20, and ch. 3, 1, 2. Origen, sus, 5, 8, quotes ch. 3, 12, 13. n (or, as it is spelt in the best MSS., "Colassæ") was a city of Phrygia, on the river Lycus, a branch of the
The church there was mainly composed of Gentiles (cf. ch. 2, 12). Alford infers from ch. 2, 1 (see note there), that probability that Epaphras was the first founder of the church there. The date of its foundation must have been subsequent to Paul's visitation. "strengthening in order" all the churches of Galatia and Phrygia (Acts, 18, 24); for otherwise he must have visited the Colossians, which ch. 2, 1 implies he had not. Had Paul been their father in the faith, he would doubtless have alluded to the fact, as in 1 Corinthians, 3, 6, 10; 4, 15; 1 Thessalonians, 1, 5; 3, 1. It is only in the epistles, Romans and Ephesians, and this epistle, such allusions are wanting; in that to the Romans, because, as in this church of Colosse, he had not been the instrument of their conversion; in that to the Ephesians, owing to the general nature of the epistle. Probably during the "two years" of Paul's stay at Ephesus, when "all which dwell in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus" (Acts, 19, 10, 26), Epaphras, Philemon, Archippus, Apphia (Philemon, 2, 13, 19), and other natives of Colosse, becoming converted at Ephesus, were subsequently the first sowers of the gospel seed in their own city. This will account for their personal acquaintance with, and attachment to, Paul and his fellow-ministers, and for his loving language as to them, and their counter salutations to him. So also with respect to "them at Laodicea" (ch. 2, 1).

The OBJECT of the epistle is to counteract Jewish false teaching, by setting before the Colossians their true standing in Christ alone (exclusive of all other heavenly beings), the majesty of His person, and the completeness of the redemption wrought by Him; hence they ought to be conformed to their risen Lord, and to exhibit that conformity in all the relations of ordinary life. Ch. 2, 16, "new moon, sabbath days," shows that the false teaching opposed in this epistle is that of Judaizing Christians. These mixed up with pure Christianity Oriental theosophy and angel worship, and the asceticism of certain sections of the Jews, especially the Essenes. Cf. Josephus, Jell. Jud., ii. 8, 9-13. These theosophists promised to their followers a deeper insight into the world of spirits, and a nearer approach to heavenly purity and intelligence, than the simple gospel affords. Cyphars & Hosen think that some Alexandrian Jew had appeared at Colosse, imbued with the Greek philosophy of Philo's school, combining with it the Rabbinical theosophy and angelology which afterwards was embodied in the Cabbala. Cf. Josephus, Antiquities, xii. 3, 4, from which we know that Alexander the Great had garrisoned the towns of Lydia and Phrygia with 2000 Mesopotamian and Babylonian Jews in the time of a threatened revolt. The Phrygians themselves had a mystic tendency in their worship of Cybele, which inclined them to receive the more readily the incipient Gnosticism of Judaizers, which afterward developed itself into the strangest heresies. In the Pastoral Epistles, the evil is spoken of as having reached a more deadly phase (1 Timothy, 4, 1-3; 6, 5), whereas he brings no charge of immorality in this epistle: a proof of its being much earlier in date.

The PLACE from which it was written seems to have been Rome, during his first imprisonment there (Acts, 28). In my Introduction to the epistle to the Ephesians, it was shown that the three epistles, Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon, were sent at the same time, via, during the freer portion of his imprisonment, before the death of Burrus. Ch. 4, 3, 4; Ephesians, 6, 19, 20, imply greater freedom than he had whilst writing to the Philippians, after the promotion of Tigellinus to be Pretorian Prefect. See Introduction to Philippians.

This epistle, though carried by the same bearer, Tychicus, who bore that to the Ephesians, was written previously to that epistle; for many phrases similar in both, appear in the more expanded form in the epistle to the Ephesians (cf. also Note, Ephesians, 6, 21). The epistle to the Laodiceans (ch. 4, 16) was written before that to the Colossians, but probably was sent by him to Laodicea at the same time with that to the church at Colosse.

The STYLE is peculiar: many Greek phrases occur here, found nowhere else. Cf. ch. 2, 5, "spoke you;" "making a show of them openly" (ch. 2, 18); "beguile of your reward," and "intruding" (v. 18); "will-worship;" "satisfying" (v. 23); "filthy communication" (ch. 2, 8); "rule" (ch. 2, 13); "comfort" (ch. 4, 11). The loftiness and artificial elaboration of style correspond to the majestic nature of his theme, the majesty of Christ's person and office, in contrast to the beggarly system of the Judaizers, the discussion of which was forced on him by the controversy. Hence arises his use of unusual phraseology. On the other hand, in the epistle to the Ephesians, subsequently written, in which he was not so hampered by the exigencies of controversy, he dilates on the same glorious truths, so coarsenal to him, more at large, freely and uncontroversially, in the fuller outpouring of His spirit, with less of the elaborate and antithetical language of system, such as was needed in cautioning the Colossians against the particular errors threatening them. Hence arises the striking similarity of many of the phrases in the two epistles written about the same time, and generally in the same vein of spiritual thought; whilst the peculiar phrases of the epistle to the Colossians are such as are natural, considering the controversial purpose of that epistle.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-29. ADDRESS: INTRODUCTION: CONFIRMING EPIAPHRAS' TEACHING: THE GLORIES OF CHRIST: THANKSGIVING AND PRAYER FOR THE COLOSSIANS: HIS OWN MINISTRY OF THE MYSTERY. 1. by the will of God—Greek, "through," &c. (cf. Note, 1 Corinthians, 1, 1). Timothy—(Cf. Notes, 2 Corinthians, 1, 1; Philippians, 1, 1). He was with Paul at the time of writing in Rome. He had been companion of Paul in his first tour through Phrygia, in which Colosse was. Hence the Colossians seem to have associated him with Paul in their affections, and the apostle joins him with himself in the address. Neither, probably, had seen the Colossian church (cf. ch. 2, 1); but had seen, during their tour through Phrygia, individual Colossians, as Epaphras, Philemon, Archippus, and Apphia (Philemon, 2, who when converted brought the gospel to their native city. 2. Colosse—Written in the oldest MSS., "Colosse." As "saints" implies union with God, so "the faithful brethren," union with Christian men. [BENCKL.] and the Lord Jesus Christ—Supported by some oldest MSS., omitted by others of equal antiquity. 3, &c.—Thanksgiving for the "faith, hope, and love" of the Colossians. So in the twin epistle sent at the same time, and by the same bearer, Tychicus

(Ephesians, 1, 15, 16). We—I and Timothy, and the Father—So some of the oldest MSS. read. But others better omit the "and," which probably crept in from Ephesians, 1, 3, praying always for you—with thanksgiving (Philippians, 4, 6). See next verse. 4. Since we heard—lit., "Having heard," &c. The language implies that he had only heard of, and not seen them (ch. 2, 1). Cf. Romans, 1, 8, where like language is used of a church which he had not at the time visited. love, is all—the absent, as well as those present. [BENCKL.] 5. For—to be joined with the words immediately preceding: "The love which ye have to all the saints because of lit., on account of the hope," &c. The hope of eternal life will never be in us an inactive principle, but will always produce "love." This passage is abused by Romanists, as if the hope of salvation depended upon works. A false argument. It does not follow that our hope is founded on our works because we are strongly stimulated to live well; since nothing is more effectual for this purpose than the sense of God's free grace. [CALVIN.] laid up—a treasure laid up so as to be out of danger of being lost (2 Timothy, 4, 8). Faith, love, and hope (v. 4, 5), comprise the sum of Christianity. Cf. v. 23, "the hope of the gospel," is heaven—Greek, "in the heavens," wherof ye heard be fore—viz., at the time when it was preached to you. in the word, &c.—That "hope" formed part of "the word of the truth of the gospel" (cf. Ephesians, 1. 13, i.e., part of the gospel truth preached unto you. 6. Which is come unto you—Greek, "Which is present among you," i.e., which has come to, and remains with, you. He speaks of the word as a living person present among them; as it is in all the world—virtually, as it was by this time preached in the leading parts of the then known world; potentially, as Christ's command was that the gospel should be preached to all nations, and not be limited, as the law was, to the Jews [Matthew, 13. 38; 24. 14; 28. 19]. However, the true reading, and that of the oldest MSS., is that which omits the following "and," thus [the "it is" of English Version is not in the original Greek]: "As in all the world it is bringing forth fruit and growing (so the oldest MSS. read: English Version omits 'and growing,' without good authority), even as it doth in you also." Then what is asserted is not that the gospel has been preached in all the world, but that it is bearing fruits of righteousness, and (like a tree grows) at the same time that it is bearing fruit growing in numbers of its converts in, or throughout, all the world, heard of it—rather, "heard it," and knew—rather, "came to know" became fully experimentally acquainted with, the grace of God in truth—i.e., in its truth, and with true knowledge. [ALFORD.] 7. As ye also learned—Also is omitted in the oldest MSS. The insertion implied, that those inserting it thought that Paul had preached the gospel to the Colossians, as well as Epaphras. Whereas the omission in the oldest MSS. implies that Epaphras alone was the founder of the church at Colosse. of—from Epaphras. gear—Greek, "beloved," fellow-servant—viz., of Christ, in Philemon, 23, he calls him "my fellow-prisoner." It is possible that Epaphras may have been apprehended for his zealous labours in Asia Minor; but more probable that Paul gave him the title, as his faithful companion in his imprisonment (cf. Note, ch. 4. 10, as to MEYER'S conjecture), who is for you, &c.—translate, "who is faithful in your behalf as a minister of Christ;" hinting that he is one not to be set aside for the new and erroneous teachers (ch. 2.). Most of the oldest MSS. read, "for (or in behalf of) vs. Vulgate, however, with one of the oldest MSS., supports English Version. 8. your love—(v. 4)—to all the saints." in the Spirit—the sphere or element in which alone true love is found; as distinguished from the state of those "in the flesh" (Romans, 8. 9). Yet even they needed to be stirred up to greater love (ch. 3. 12-14). Love is the first and chief fruit of the Spirit (Galatians, 5. 22). 9. we also—on our part, heard it—(v. 4) pray—Here he states what in particular he prays for; as in v. 3 he stated generally the fact of his praying for them, to desire—"to make request," might be filled—rather, "may be filled" a verb often found in this epistle (ch. 4. 12, 17). knowledge—Greek, "full and accurate knowledge." Akin to the Greek for "knew" (Note, v. 6), of his will—as to how ye ought to walk (Ephesians, 5. 17); as well as chiefly that "mystery of His will, according to His good pleasure which He purposed in Himself: that in the fulness of times He might gather together in one all things in Christ" (Ephesians, 1. 9, 10: God's "will," whereby He eternally purposed to reconcile to Himself, and save men by Christ, not by angels, as the false teachers in some degree taught (ch. 2. 18). [ESTIUS.] There seems to have been a want of knowledge among the Colossians, notwithstanding their general excellencies; hence he so often dwells on this subject (v. 28; ch. 2. 2, 3; 3. 10, 15; 4. 5, 6). On the contrary he less extols wisdom to the Corinthians, who were puffed up with the conceit of knowledge, wisdom—often mentioned in this epistle, as opposed to the (false) "philosophy" and "show of wisdom" (ch. 2. 8, 23; cf. Ephesians, 1. 8).

understanding—agacly to discern what on each occasion is suited to the place and the time: its seat is "the understanding" or intellect; wisdom is more general, and has its seat in the whole compass of the faculties of the soul. [BENJEL.] "Wouldst thou know that the matters in the word of Christ are real things? Then never read them for mere knowledge's sake." [Quoted by GAUSSEN.] Knowledge is desirable only when seasoned by "spiritual understanding." 10. Greek, "So as to walk," &c.: so that ye may walk. True knowledge of God's will is inseparable from walking conformably to it. worthy of the Lord—(Ephesians, 4. 1) unto—so as in every way to be well-pleasing to God, pleasing—lit., "desire of pleasing," being fruitful—Greek, "bearing fruit." This is the first manifestation of their "walking worthy of the Lord." The second is, "increasing (growing) in the knowledge of God" (or as the oldest MSS. read, "growing by the full knowledge of God"); thus, as the gospel word (v. 6) was said to "bring forth fruit," and to "grow" in all the world, even as it did in the Colossians, ever since the day they knew the grace of God, so here it is Paul's prayer that they might continue to "bring forth fruit," and "grow" more and more by the full knowledge of God, the more of that "knowledge" (v. 9) was imparted to them. The full knowledge of God is the real instrument of enlargement in soul and life of the believer. [ALFORD.] The third manifestation of their walk is (v. 11), "Being strengthened with all might," &c. The fourth is (v. 12), "Giving thanks unto the Father," &c. 11. Greek, "Being made mighty with (it, viz) all might," according to his glorious power—rather, "according to the power (the characteristic of) His glory," here appropriate to St. Paul's argument, Ephesians, 1. 19; 6. 10: as its exuberant 'riches,' in Ephesians, 3. 16) of His glory.' His power is inseparable from His glory (Romans, 8. 4), unto all patience—so as to attain to all patient endurance; persevering, enduring continuance in the faith, in spite of trials of persecutors, and seductions of false teachers, long-suffering—towards those whom one could repel. "Patience," or "endurance," is exercised in respect to those whom one cannot repel. [CHRYSOSTOM.] with joyfulness—joyful endurance (Acts, 16. 25; Romans, 5. 3, 11). 12. You "giving thanks unto the Father." See Note, v. 10: this clause is connected with "that ye may be filled" (v. 9), and "that ye may walk" (v. 10). The connexion is not, "We do not cease to pray for you (v. 9) giving thanks," unto the Father—of Jesus Christ, and so our Father by adoption (Galatians, 3. 26; 4. 4, 5, 6), which hath made us meet—Greek, "who made us meet." Not "is making us meet" by progressive growth in holiness; but once for all made us meet. It is not primarily the Spirit's work that is meant here, as the text is often used; but the Father's work in putting us by adoption, once for all, in a new standing, viz., that of children. The believers meant here were in different stages of progressive sanctification; but in respect to the meekness specified here, they all alike had it from the Father, in Christ His Son, being "complete in Him" (ch. 2. 10). Cf. John, 17. 17; Jude, 1, "sanctified by God the Father," 1 Corinthians, 1. 30. Still, secondarily, this once-for-all meekness contains in it the germ of sanctification, afterwards developed progressively in the life by the Father's Spirit in the believer. The Christian life of heavenliness is the first stage of heaven itself. There must, and will be a personal meekness for heaven, where there is a judicial meekness. to be partakers, &c.—Greek, "for the (or our) portion of the inheritance (Acts, 20. 32; 26. 18; Ephesians, 1. 11) of the saints in light." "Light" begins in the believer here, descending from "the Father of lights" by Jesus, "the true light," and is perfected in the kingdom of light, which includes knowledge, purity, love, and joy. It is contrasted here with the "darkness" of the unconverted state (v. 13; cf. 1 CORINTH.

2. 9. 13. from—Greek, "out of the power," out of the sphere in which his power is exercised. translated—those thus translated as to state, are also transformed as to character. Satan has an organized dominion with various orders of powers of evil (Ephesians, 2. 2; 6. 12). But the term "kingdom" is rarely applied to his usurped rule (Matthew, 12. 26); it is generally restricted to the kingdom of God. darkness—blindness, hatred, misery. [BENGE.] his dear Son—rather as Greek, "the Son of His love," the Son on whom His love rests (John, 17. 26; Ephesians, 1. 6): contrasted with the "darkness" where all is hatred and hateful. 14. (Ephesians, 1. 7.) redemption—rather as Greek, "our redemption," through his blood—(Omitted in the oldest MSS. Probably inserted from Ephesians, 1. 7. transfradate as Greek, "our sins," the more general term; for which Ephesians, 1. 7. Greek, has, "our transgressions," the more special term. 15. They who have experienced in themselves "redemption" (e. 14), know Christ in the glorious character here described, as above the highest angels to whom the false teachers (ch. 2. 18) taught worship was to be paid. Paul describes Him (1.) in relation to God and creation (e. 15-17); (2.) in relation to the church (e. 18-20). As the former regards Him as the Creator (e. 15, 16) and the Sustainer (e. 17) of the natural world; so the latter, as the source and stay of the new moral creation. image—exact likeness and perfect Representative. Adam was made "in the image of God" (Genesis, 1. 27). But Christ, the second Adam, perfectly reflected visibly "the invisible God" (1 Timothy, 1. 17), whose glories the first Adam only in part represented. "Image" (eikon) involves "likeness" (homoiosis); but "likeness" does not involve "image." "Image" always supposes a prototype, which it not merely resembles, but from which it is drawn: the exact counterpart, as the reflection of the sun in the water; the child the living image of the parent. "Likeness" implies mere resemblance, not the exact counterpart and derivation as "image" expresses; hence it is nowhere applied to the Son, whilst "image" is here, cf. 1 Corinthians, 11. 7 [TRENCH] (John, 1. 18; 14. 9; 2 Corinthians, 4. 4; 1 Timothy, 3. 16; Hebrews, 1. 3). Even before His incarnation He was the image of the invisible God, as the Word (John, 1. 1-3) by whom God created the worlds, and by whom God appeared to the patriarchs. Thus His essential character as always "the image of God," (1.) before the incarnation, (2.) in the days of His flesh, and (3.) now in His glorified state, is, I think, contemplated here by the verb "is." First-born of every creature—Hebrews, 1. 6, "the first-begotten;" begotten of His Father before all worlds" [NICENE Creed.] Priority and superlative dignity is implied (Psalm 89. 27). English Version might seem to favour Arianism, as if Christ were a creature. Translate, "Begotten (i.e., born) before every creature," as the context shows, which gives the reason why He is also designated: "For," &c. (e. 16, 17). [TRENCH.] This expression is understood by ORIGEN (so far as the Greek from favouring Socinian or Arian views) as declaring the Godhead of Christ, and is used by Him as a phrase to mark that Godhead, in contrast with His manhood (B. 2., sec. contra Celsum). The Greek does not strictly admit ALFORD'S translation, "the first-born of all creation." 16. For—Greek, "Because." This gives the proof that He is not included in the things created, but is the "first-begotten" before "every creature" (e. 15), begotten as "the Son of God's love" (e. 13), antecedently to all other emanations; "for" all these other emanations came from Him, and whatever was created, was created by Him. by him—rather as Greek, "in Him": as the conditional element, pre-existent and all-including: the creation of all things BY Him is expressed afterwards, and is a different fact from the present one, though implied in it. [ALFORD.] God revealed Himself in the Son, the Word of the Father, before all created existence (e. 15). That Divine Word carries in Himself the archetypes of all existences, so that "in Him" all things that are in heaven and earth have been created. The "in Him" indicates that the Word is the ideal ground of all existence; the "by Him," below, that He is the instrument of actually realizing the Divine ideas. [NEANDER.] His essential nature as the Word of the Father, is not a mere appendage of His incarnation, but is the ground of it. The original relation of the Eternal Word to men "made in His image" (Genesis, 1. 27), is the source of the new relation to them by redemption, formed in His incarnation, whereby He restores them to His lost image. "In Him" implies something prior to "by" and "for Him" presently after; the three prepositions mark in succession the beginning, the progress, and the end. [BENGE.] all things—Greek, "the universe of things." That the new creation is not meant in this verse (as Socinians interpret, is plain; for angels, who are included in the catalogue, were not newly created by Christ; and he does not speak of the new creation till e. 18. The creation "of the things that are in the heavens" (so Greek) includes the creation of the heavens themselves: the former are rather named, since the inhabitants are more noble than their dwellings. Heaven and earth and all that is in them (1 Chronicles, 29. 11; Nehemiah, 9. 6; Revelation, 10. 4), invisible—the world of spirits, thrones, or dominions—lordships: the "thrones" are the greater of the two "principalities, or powers"—rather, "rules, or authorities": the former are stronger than the latter (cf. Note, Ephesians, 1. 21). The latter pair refer to offices in respect to God's creatures: "thrones and dominions" express exalted relation to God, they being the chariots on which He rides displaying His glory (Psalm 68. 17). The existence of various orders of angels is established by this passage. all things—Greek, "the whole universe of things," were—rather, to distinguish the Greek cosmos, which precedes from the perfect tense here, "have been created." In the former case the creation was viewed as a past act at a point of time, or as done once for all; here it is viewed, not merely as one historic act of creation in the past, but as the permanent result now and eternally continuing, by him—as the instrumental Agent (John, 1. 3). for him—as the grand End of creation; containing in Himself the reason why creation is at all, and why it is as it is. [ALFORD.] He is the final cause as well as the efficient cause. LACHMANN'S punctuation of e. 15-18, is best, whereby "the first-born of every creature" (e. 15) answers to "the first-born from the dead" (e. 18), the whole forming one sentence with the words ("All things were created by Him and for Him, and He is before all things, and by Him all things consist, and He is the Head of the body, the church") intervening as a parenthesis. Thus Paul puts first, the origin by Him of the natural creation; secondly, of the new creation. The parenthesis falls into four clauses, two and two: the former two support the first assertion, "the first-born of every creature;" the latter two prepare us for "the first-born from the dead:" the former two correspond to the latter two in their form—"All things by Him...and He is," and "By Him all things...and He is." 17. John, 8. 58. Translate as Greek, "And He Himself (the great He) is (implying Divine essential being) before all things," in time, as well as in dignity. Since He is before all things, He is before even time, i.e., from eternity. Cf. "the first-born of every creature" (e. 15) by him—Greek, "in Him" (as the conditional element of existence, e. 16). [ALFORD.] consist—"subsist." Not only are called into being from nothing, but are maintained in their present state. The Son of God is the Conservator, as well as the Creator of all things. [PEARSON.] BENGE less probably explains, "All things in Him come together into one system: the universe found its completion in Him" (Isaiah, 41, 4; Revelation, 21, 17). Cf. as to God, Romans, 11, 36; similar language; therefore Christ must be God. 13. Relation of Christ to the church and the new creation, as the originator of both, is—Emphatical. Not angels, in opposition to the false teachers' doctrine concerning angel-worship, and the power of ORAS or (imaginary) spirit-emanations from God (ch. 2, 19, 18). head of the city, the church—The church is His body by virtue of His entering into communion corporally with human nature [N. KÄLLER.] (Ephesians, 1, 23). The same One who is the Head of all things and beings by creation, is also, by virtue of being "the first-born from the dead," and so "the first fruits" of the new creation among men, the Head of the church, who is—i. e., in that He is the Beginning. [ALFORD.] Rather, this is the beginning of a new paragraph. As the former paragraph, which related to His originating the physical creation, began with "Who is" (v. 16); so this, which relates to His originating the new creation, begins with "Who is;" a parenthesis preceding, which closes the former paragraph, that parenthesis (see Note, v. 14), subsiding from "all things were created by Him," to "Head of the body, the church." The head of kings and high priests was anointed, as the seat of the soulities, the fountain of dignity, and original of all he members according to Hebrew etymology). So Jesus by His anction was designated as the Head of his body, the church, the beginning—viz., of the new creation, as of the old (Proverbs, 8, 23; John, 1, 1; cf. Revelation, 1, 5; the beginning of the church of the first-born (Hebrews, 12, 23), as being Himself "the first-born from the dead" (Acts, 26, 23; 1 Corinthians, 5, 20, 23). Christ's primogeniture is three-fold: (1.) From eternity the "first-begotten" of the Father (v. 16); 2.) As the first-born of His mother (Matthew, 1, 25); 3.) As the Head of the church, mystically begotten of the Father, as it were to a new life, on the day of His resurrection, which is His "regeneration," even as His people's coming resurrection will be their "regeneration" (i. e., the resurrection which was begun in the soul, extended to the body and to the whole creation, Romans, 8, 21, 23; Matthew, 19, 28; Acts, 13, 33; Revelation, 1, 5). Sonship and resurrection are inseparably connected, Luke, 20, 36; Romans, 1, 4; 8, 23; John, 3, 2. Christ by rising from the dead is the efficient cause (1 Corinthians, 15, 23, as having obtained the power, and the exemplary cause, as being the pattern (Micah, 2, 13; Romans, 6, 6; Philipians, 3, 21), of our resurrection: the resurrection of "the Head" involves consequentially that of the members, that in all things—He resumes the "all things" (v. 20). he might have the pre-eminence—Greek, "He HIMSELF may thus) become the One holding the first place," or, "take the precedence." Both ideas are included, priority in time and priority in dignity: now in the regenerated world, as before in the world of creation (v. 16). "Begotten before every creature, or "first-born of every creature" (Psalm 89, 27; John, 3, 13). 19. Greek, "(God) was well pleased," &c. in him—i. e., in the Son (Matthew, 3, 17). all fulness—rather as Greek, "all the fulness," viz., of God, whatever divine excellence is in God the Father (ch. 2, 9; Ephesians, 3, 19; cf. John, 1, 16; 3, 34). The Gnostics used the term "fulness," for the assemblage of emanations, or angelic powers, coming from God. The spirit presently by Paul warns the church, that the true "fulness" dwells in Christ alone. This assigns the reason why Christ takes precedence of every creature (v. 16). For two reasons Christ is Lord of the church: (1.) Because the fulness of the Divine attributes (v. 19) dwells in Him, and so He has the power to govern the universe; (2.) Because (v. 20) what He has done for the church gives Him the right to praise over it. should

...dwell—as in a temple (John, 2, 21). This indwelling of the Godhead in Christ is the foundation of the reconciliation by Him. [BENNETT.] Hence the "and" (v. 20) connects as cause and effect the two things, the Godhead in Christ, and the reconciliation by Christ. 20. The Greek order is, "And through Him (Christ) to reconcile again completely (see Note, Ephesians, 2, 16) all things (Greek, "the whole universe of things") unto Himself (unto God the Father, 2 Corinthians, 5, 19), having made peace (God the Father having made peace) through the blood of His (Christ's) cross," i. e., shed by Christ on the cross: the price and pledge of our reconciliation with God. The Scripture phrase, "God reconciles man to Himself," implies that He takes away by the blood of Jesus the barrier which God's justice interposes against man's being in union with God (cf. Note, Romans, 5, 10; 2 Corinthians, 5, 18). So the LXX., 1 Samuel, 28, 4, "Wherewith should He reconcile himself unto his master," i. e., reconcile his master unto him by appeasing his wrath. So Matthew, 5, 23, 24, by him—"through Him" (the instrumental agent in the new creation, as in the original creation): emphatically repeated, to bring the person of Christ, as the Head of both creations alike, into prominence. things in earth ...in heaven—Good angels, in one sense, do not need reconciliation to God; fallen angels are excluded from it (Jude, 6). But probably redemption has effects on the world of spirits unknown to us. Of course, His reconciling us, and His reconciling them, must be by a different process, as He took not on Him the nature of angels, so as to offer a propitiation for them. But the effect of redemption on them, as He is their Head as well as ours, is that they are thereby brought nearer God, and so gain an increase of blessedness [ALFORD], and larger views of the love and wisdom of God (Ephesians, 3, 10). All creation subsists in Christ, all creation is therefore affected by his propitiation: sinful creation, comparatively distant from His unapproachable purity (Job, 4, 18; 15, 15; 25, 6), is lifted into nearer participation of Him, and in this wider sense is reconciled. Doubtless, too, man's fall, following on Satan's fall, is a segment of a larger circle of evil, so that the remedy of the former affects the standing of angels, from among whom Satan and his host fell. Angels thereby having seen the magnitude of sin, and the infinite cost of redemption, and the exclusion of the fallen angels from it, and the inability of any creature to stand morally in his own strength, are now past beyond the reach of falling. Thus BACON'S definition of Christ's Headship holds good: "The Head of redemption to man; the Head of preservation to angels." Some conjecture that Satan, when unfallen, ruled this earth and the pre-Adamic animal kingdom; hence his malice against man who succeeded to the lordship of this earth and its animals, and hence, too, his assumption of the form of a serpent, the subtlest of the animal tribes. Luke, 19, 38 states expressly "peace in heaven" as the result of finished redemption, as "peace on earth" was the result of its beginning at Jesus' birth (Luke, 2, 14). BENNETT explains the reconciliation to be that of not only God, but also angels, estranged from men, because of man's enmity against God. Ephesians, 1, 10, accords with this. This is true, but only part of the truth: so ALFORD'S view also is but part of the truth. An actual reconciliation, or restoration of peace in heaven, as well as on earth, is expressed by Paul. As long as that blood of reconciliation was not actually shed, which is opposed, Zechariah, 3, 8, 9) to the accusations of Satan, but was only in promise, Satan could plead his right against men before God day and night (Job, 1, 6; Revelation, 12, 10); hence he was in heaven till the ban on man was broken (cf. Luke, 10, 18). So here; the world of earth and heaven owe to Christ alone the restoration of harmony after the conflict and the subjugation of all things under one Head (cf. Hebrews, 11, 23). Sin introduced discord not only on earth, but also in heaven, by the fall of demons; it brought into the abodes of holy angels, though not positive, yet privative loss, a retardation of their highest and most perfect development, harmonious gradation, and perfect consummation. Angels were no more able than men by themselves to overcome the peace-disturbers, and cast out the devils; it is only "by," or "through HIM," and "the blood of His cross," that peace was restored even in heaven; it is only after Christ has obtained the victory fully and legally, that Michael (Revelation, 12, 7-10) and his angels can cast out the heaven Satan and his demons (cf. ch. 2, 15). Thus the point of Paul's argument against angel-worship is, that angels themselves, like men, wholly depend on Christ, the sole and true object of worship. [AUBRELLS.] 21. The Colossians are included in this general reconciliation (cf. Ephesians, 2, 1, 12). sometime—"once," alienated—from God and salvation; objectively banished from God, through the barrier which God's justice interposed against your sin; subjectively estranged through the alienation of your own wills from God. The former is the prominent thought (cf. Romans, 6, 10), as the second follows, "enemies in your mind." "Actual alienation makes habitual 'enemies.'" [BESOGEL.] is your mind—Greek, "in your understanding" or "thought" (Ephesians, 2, 3; 4, 18). by wicked works—rather as Greek, "in your wicked works" (wicked works were the element in which your enmity subsisted). yet now—Notwithstanding the former alienation, now that Christ has come, God hath completely reconciled, or restored to His friendship again (so the Greek, cf. Note, v. 20). 22. In the body of His flesh—the element in which His reconciling sufferings had place. Cf. v. 24, "afflictions of Christ in my flesh" (1 Peter, 2, 24). Angels who have not a "body of flesh" are not in any way our reconciling mediators, as your false teachers assert, but He, the Lord of angels, who has taken our flesh, that in it He might atone for our fallen manhood, through death—rather as Greek, "through His death" (which could only take place in a body like ours, of flesh, Hebrews, 2, 14). This implies He took on Him our true and entire manhood. Flesh is the sphere in which His human sufferings could have place (cf. v. 24; Ephesians, 2, 15). to present you—(Ephesians, 5, 27). The end of His reconciling atonement by death, holy—positively; and in relation to God, unblameable, unrepreeable—negatively, "Without blemish" (as the former Greek word is translated as to Jesus, our Head, 1 Peter, 1, 19) in one's self. Irreproachable (the Greek for the second word, one who gives no occasion for his being brought to a law court) is in relation to the world without. Sanctification, as the fruit, is here treated of; justification, by Christ's reconciliation, as the tree, having preceded (Ephesians, 1, 4; 5, 26, 27; Titus, 2, 14). At the same time, our sanctification is regarded here as perfect in Christ, into whom we are grafted at regeneration or conversion, and who is "made of God unto us (perfect) sanctification" (1 Corinthians, 1, 30; 1 Peter, 1, 2; Jude, 1); not merely progressive sanctification, which is the gradual development of the sanctification which Christ is made to the believer from the first, in his sight—in God's sight, at Christ's appearing. 23. If—"Assuming that," &c.: not otherwise shall ye be so presented at His appearing (v. 22). grounded—Greek, "founded," "fixed on the foundation" (cf. Note, Ephesians, 3, 17; Luke, 6, 48, 49). settled—"steadfast." "Grounded" respects the foundation on which believers rest; "settled," their own steadfastness (1 Peter, 5, 10). 1 Corinthians, 15, 58, has the same Greek, not moved away—by the false teachers, the hope of the gospel—(Ephesians, 1, 18.) which ye have heard... which was preached to every creature... whosoever of I... a minister—Three arguments against their being "moved away from the gospel": (1.) Their having heard it; (2.) the universality of the preaching of it; (3.) Paul's ministry in it. For "to (Greek, 'in') every creature," the oldest MSS. read, "in all creation." Cf. "in all the world," v. 6; "all things... in earth," v. 20 (Mark, 16, 16); thus he implies that the gospel from which he urges them not to be moved, has this mark of truth, viz., the universality of its announcement, which accords with the command and prophecy of Christ Himself (Matthew, 24, 14). By "was preached," he means not merely "is being preached," but has been actually, as an accomplished fact, preached. Pliny, not many years subsequently, in his famous letter to the Emperor Trajan (B. X., Ep. 97), writes, "Many of every age, rank, and sex, are being brought to trial. For the contagion of that superstition (Christianity) has spread over not only cities, but villages and the country," whosoever I Paul am—rather as Greek, "was made a minister." Respect for me, the minister of this world-wide gospel, should lead you not to be moved from it. Moreover (he implies), the gospel which ye heard from Epaphras, your "minister" (v. 7), is the same of which "I was made a minister" (v. 25; Ephesians, 3, 7): if you be moved from it, ye will desert the teaching of the recognised ministers of the gospel for unauthorised false teachers. 24. Who—The oldest MSS. omit "who;" then translate, "Now I rejoice." Some very old MSS., and the best of the Latin versions, and Vulgate, read as English Version. To enhance the glory of Christ as paramount to all, he mentions his own sufferings for the church of Christ. "Now" stands in contrast to "I was made," in the past time (v. 23). for you—"on your behalf," that ye may be confirmed in resting solely on Christ (to the exclusion of angel-worship) by the glorification of Christ in my sufferings (Ephesians, 3, 1, 2). fill up that which is behind—it, "the deficiencies"—all that are lacking of the afflictions of Christ (cf. Note, 2 Corinthians, 1, 5). Christ is "afflicted in all His people's afflictions" (Isaiah, 63, 9). "The church is His body in which He is, dwells, lives, and therefore also suffers." [VITRINGA.] Christ was destined to endure certain afflictions in this figurative body, as well as in His literal; these were "that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ," which Paul "filled up." His own meritorious sufferings in expiation for sin, were once for all completely filled up on the cross. But His church (His second Self) has her whole measure of afflictions fixed. The more St. Paul, a member, endured, the less remain for the rest of the church to endure; the communion of saints thus giving them an interest in his sufferings. It is in reference to the church's afflictions, which are "Christ's afflictions," that Paul here saith, "I fill up the deficiencies," or "what remain behind of the afflictions of Christ." She is afflicted to promote her growth in holiness, and her completeness in Christ. Not one suffering is lost (Psalm 66, 8). All her members have thus a mutual interest in one another's sufferings (1 Corinthians, 12, 26). But Rome's inference hence, is utterly false that the church has a stock treasury of the merits and satisfactions of Christ and His apostles, out of which she may dispense indulgences; the context has no reference to sufferings in expiation of sin and productive of merit. Believers should regard their sufferings less in relation to themselves as individuals, and more as parts of a grand whole, carrying out God's perfect plan. 25. am—Greek, "I was made a minister;" resuming v. 23, "whosoever I Paul was made a minister." dispensation—the stewardship committed to me to dispense in the house of God, the church, to the whole family of believers, the goods of my master (Luke, 12, 42; 1 Corinthians, 4, 1, 2; 9, 17; Ephesians, 3, 2). which is given—Greek, "which was given" for you—with a view to you, Gentiles (v. 27; Romans, 15, 16). to fulfill—to bring it fully to all; the end of his stewardship: "that preached" (Romans, 15, 16). "The fulness of Christ" (v. 19), and of the times (Ephesians, 1, 10) required him so to do." [BENNETT.] 26. the mystery—(Notes, Ephesians, 1, 9, 10; 3, 5-9.) The mystery, once hidden, now revealed, is redemption for the whole Gentile world, as well as for the Jews, "Christ in you (Gentiles) the hope of glory" (v. 27), from ages—from, according to ALFORD, refers to time, not "hidden from:" from the time of the ages; still what is meant is, that the mystery was hidden from the beings living in those "ages." The "ages" are the vast successive periods marked by successive orders of beings and stages of creation. Greek, "(Eons), a word used by the Gnostics for angelic beings emanating from God. The Spirit by Paul presciently, in opposition to Gnostic error already beginning (ch. 2, 18), teaches, that the mystery of redemption was hidden in God's purposes in Christ, alike from the angelic beings (cf. Ephesians, 3, 10) of the pre-Adamic "ages," and from the subsequent human "generations." Translate as Greek, "the ages... the generations." made manifest to his saints—to His apostles and prophets primarily (Ephesians, 3, 5), and through them to all His saints. 27. would—rather as Greek, "willed," or "was pleased to make known." He resolves all into God's good pleasure and will, that man should not glory save in God's grace. will—How full and inexhaustible! the riches of the glory of this mystery—He accumulates phrase on phrase to enhance the greatness of the blessing in Christ bestowed by God on the Gentiles. Cf. ch. 2, 3, "all the treasures of wisdom." Ephesians, 3, 8, "the unsearchable riches of Christ;" Ephesians, 1, 7, "riches of His grace." "The glory of this mystery" must be the glory which this once hidden, and now revealed, truth makes you Gentiles partakers of, partly now, but mainly when Christ shall come (ch. 3; 4; Romans, 6, 2; 8, 17, 18; Ephesians, 1, 18). This sense is proved by the following: "Christ in you the hope of the (so Greek) glory." The lower was the degradation of you Gentiles, the higher is the richness of the glory to which the mystery revealed now raises you. You were "without Christ, and having no hope" (Ephesians, 2, 12). Now you have "Christ in you the hope of the glory" just mentioned. ALFORD translates, "Christ among you," to answer to "this mystery among the Gentiles." But the whole clause, Christ IN you (Ephesians, 3, 17) the hope of glory," answers to "this mystery," and not to the whole sentence. "this mystery among the Gentiles." What is made known "among you Gentiles" is, "Christ in you (now by faith as your hidden life, ch. 3; 3; Galatians, 2, 20) the hope of glory" (your manifested life). The contrast (antithesis) between "Christ IN YOU" now as your hidden life, and "the hope of glory" hereafter to be manifested, requires this translation. 28. preach—rather as Greek, "announce" or "proclaim." warning...teaching—"Warning" is connected with repentance, refers to one's conduct, and is addressed primarily to the heart. "Teaching" is connected with faith, refers to doctrines, and is addressed primarily to the intellect. These are the two heads of evangelical teaching. every...every man—without distinction of Jew or Gentile, great or small (Romans, 10, 12, 13). in all wisdom—with all the wisdom in our method of teaching that we possess: v. 3 ALFORD. But v. 9, and ch. 3, 16, favour EUSTIUS' view, which refers it to the wisdom communicated to those being taught: keeping back nothing, but instructing all in the perfect knowledge of the mysteries of faith which is the true wisdom (cf. 1 Corinthians, 2, 6, 7; 12, 8; Ephesians, 1, 17). present—(Note, v. 22—at Christ's coming. every man—Paul is zealous lest the false teachers should seduce one single soul of Christ's people at Colosse. So each individual among them should be zealous for himself and his neighbour. Even one soul is of incalculable value. perfect in Christ—who is the element in living union with whom alone each believer can find perfection; perfectly instructed (Ephesians, 4, 13) in doctrine, and full grown or matured in faith and practice. "Jesus" is omitted in all the oldest MSS. 29. Whereunto—viz., "to present every man perfect in Christ." I also labour—rather, "I labour also." I not only "proclaim" (English Version, "preach") Christ, but I labour also. striving—in "conflict" (ch. 2, 1) of spirit (cf. Romans, 8, 26). The same Greek word is used of Epaphras (ch. 4, 12), "labouring fervently for you in prayers;" lit., "agonizing," "striving as in the agony of a contest." So Jesus in Gethsemane when praying (Luke, 22, 44); so "strive" the same Greek word, "agonize" (Luke, 13, 24. So Jacob "wrestled" in prayer (Genesis, 32, 24-29). Cf. "contention," Greek, "agony," or "striving earnestness," 1 Thessalonians, 2, 2. according to his working—Paul avers that he has power to "strive" in spirit for his converts, so far only as Christ works in him and by him (Ephesians, 3, 20; Philippians, 4, 13). mightily—viz., "in power."

CHAPTER II.

VET. 1-25. HIS STRIVINGS IN PRAYER FOR THEIR STEADFASTNESS IN CHRIST: FROM WHOM HE WARNS THEM NOT TO BE LED AWAY BY FALSE WISDOM. 1. For—He explains in what respect he "laboured striving" (ch. 1, 29). Translate as Greek, "I wish you to know how great a conflict (the same Greek word as in ch. 1, 29, "agony of a conflict") of fervent, anxious prayer; not conflict with the false teachers, which would have been impossible for him now in prison! I have for you," them at Laodicea—exposed to the same danger from false teachers, as the Colossians (cf. ch. 1, 10). This danger was probably the cause of his writing to Laodicea, as well as to Colosse. not seen my face in the flesh—including those in Hierapolis (ch. 4, 13). Paul considered himself a "debtor" to all the Gentiles (Romans, 1, 14). "His face" and presence would have been a "comfort" (v. 2; Acts, 20, 38). Cf. ch. 1, 4, 7, 8, in proof that he had not seen, but only heard of the Colossians. Hence he strives by earnest conflict with God in anxious prayer for them, to make up for the loss of his bodily presence among them. Though "absent in the flesh, I am with you in the Spirit" (v. 6). 1. Translate, "That their hearts may be comforted." The "their," compared with "you" (v. 4), proves that in v. 1, the words, "have not seen my face in the flesh," is a general designation of those for whom Paul declares he has "conflict," including the particular species, you (Colossians) and them at Laodicea. For it is plain, the prayer "that their hearts may be comforted," must include in it the Colossians for whom he expressly says, "I have conflict." Thus it is an abbreviated mode of expression for, "That you and their hearts may be comforted." ALFORD translates, "conformed," or allows "comforted" in its original radical sense strengthened. But the Greek supports English Version; the sense, too, is clear: comforted with the consolation of those whom Paul had not seen, and for whom, in consequence, he strove in prayerful conflict the more fervently; inasmuch as we are more anxious in behalf of absent, than present, friends. [DAVENANT.] Their hearts would be comforted by "knowing what conflict he had for them, and how much he is interested for their welfare; and also by being released from doubts on learning from the apostle, that the doctrine which they had heard from Epaphras was true and certain. In writing to churches which he had instructed face to face, he enters into particular details concerning them, as a father directing his children. But to those among whom he had not been in person, he treats of the more general truths of salvation. being—translate as Greek in oldest MSS., "They being knit together." in love—the bond and element of perfect knitting together; the antidote to the dividing schismatic effect of false doctrine. Love to GOD and to each another in Christ, unto—the object and end of their being "knit together." All riches—Greek, "all the riches of the full assurance" (1 Thessalonians, 1. 5; Hebrews, 6. 11; 10. 22) of the (Christian) understanding." The accumulation of phrases, not only "understanding," but "the full assurance of understanding," not only this, but "the riches of," &c.; not only this, but "all the riches of," &c., implies how he desires to impress them with the momentous importance of the subject in hand, to—transl., "unto," acknowledgment.—The Greek implies, "full and accurate knowledge." It is a distinct Greek word from "knowledge," v. 3. ALFORD translates, "thorough...knowledge." Acknowledgment hardly is strong enough: they did in a measure acknowledge the truth; what they wanted was the full and accurate knowledge of it (cf. Notes, ch. 1. 9, 10; Philipians, 1. 9). of God, and of the Father, and of Christ.—The oldest MSS. omit "and of the Father, and of:" then translate, "Of God (viz.) Christ." Two very old MSS. and Vulgate read, "Of God the Father of Christ." 3. Translate in the Greek order, "In whom (not as ALFORD, 'in which' mystery; Christ is Himself the 'mystery' (v. 2; 1 Timothy, 3. 16), and to Christ the relative refers) are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden." The "all" here, answers to "all" in v. 2; as "treasures" answer to the "riches;" it is from the "treasures that the riches (v. 2) are derived." "Are" is the predicate of the sentence; all the treasures ARE in Him; hidden is predicated of the state or manner in which they are in Him. Like a mine of unknown and inexhaustible wealth, the treasures of wisdom are all in Him hidden, but not in order to remain so: they only need to be explored for you to attain "unto the riches" in them (v. 2); but until you, Colossians, press after attaining the full knowledge (see Note, v. 2) of them, they remain "hidden." Cf. the parable, Matthew, 13. 44, "treasure hid." This sense suits the scope of the apostle, and sets aside ALFORD's objection that "the treasures are not hidden, but revealed." "Hidden" plainly answers to "mystery" (v. 2), which is designed by God, if we be faithful to our privileges, not to remain hidden, but to be revealed (cf. 1 Corinthians, 2. 7, 8). Still as the mine is unfathomable, there will, through eternity, be always fresh treasures in Him to be drawn forth from their hidden state, wisdom—general, and as to experimental and practical truth: whence comes "understanding" (v. 2), knowledge—special and intellectual, in regard to doctrinal truth: whence comes "the full knowledge" (v. 2). 4. And—"Now." Cf. with "lest any man," &c., v. 8, 16, 18. He refers to the blending of Judaism with Oriental philosophy, and the combination of this mixture with Christianity, enticing words—plausible as wearing the guise of wisdom and humility (v. 18, 23). 5. For—Argument against their suffering themselves to be beguiled, drawn from a regard to his personal authority as though he were present. Joying and beholding—beholding with joy, order—your good order: answering to "knit together" (v. 2) as a well organized body; the same Greek as that for "knit together," is used of "the body" of the church "compact," in Ephesians, 4. 16. Cf. 1 Corinthians, 14. 33, 40, steadfastness—Greek, "the firm (or solid) foundation." As "order" expresses the outward aspect of the church; so "steadfastness" expresses the inner basis on which their church rested. The Greek lit. implies not an abstract quality, but the thing in the concrete; thus their "faith" here is the solid thing which constituted the basis of their church. 6. "As therefore ye received (once for all: the aorist tense: from Epaphras) Jesus the Christ as your Lord (cf. 1 Corinthians, 12. 3; 2 Corinthians, 4. 6; Philipians, 3. 8), so walk in Him." He says not merely, "Ye received" the doctrine of Christ, but "Jesus" Himself: this is the essence of faith (John, 14. 21, 23; Galatians, 1. 16). Ye have received once for all the Spirit of life in Christ; carry into practice that life in your souls (Galatians, 5. 25). This is the main scope of the epistle. 7. Rooted—(Ephesians, 3. 17.) built up—Greek, "being builded up." As "rooted" implies their vitality; so "builded up," massive solidity. As in the Song of Solomon, when one image is not sufficient to express the varied aspects of Divine truth, another is employed to supply the ideas required. Thus "walking," a third image (v. 6), expresses the thought which "rooted" and "built," though each suggesting a thought peculiar to itself, could not express, viz., outward motion. "Rooted" is in the past tense, implying their first conversion and vital grafting "in Him." Builded up is present (in the Greek, implying their progressive increase in religion by union with Him. Ephesians, 2. 20 refers to the church; but the passage here to their individual progress in edification (Acts, 20. 32), established—confirmed, as—"even as," abounding therewith with thanksgiving—advancing to fuller maturity (cf. v. 2) in the faith, "with thanksgiving" to God as the gracious Author of this whole blessing, 8. Translate, "Beware (lit., 'Look' well) lest there shall be (as I fear there is: the Greek indicative expresses this) any man (pointing to some known emissary of evil, Galatians, 1. 7) leading you away as his spoil (not merely gaining spoil out of you, but making powerless his spoil) through (by means of) his philosophy," &c. The apostle does not condemn all philosophy, but "the philosophy" (so Greeks) of the Judaic-oriental heretics at Colosse, which afterwards was developed into Gnosticism. You who may have "the riches of full assurance" and "the treasures of wisdom," should not suffer yourselves to be led away as a spoil by empty, deceitful philosophy: "riches" are contrasted with spoil; "full" with "vain," or empty (v. 2, 3, 9), after—"according to," tradition of men—opposed to "the fulness of the Godhead." Applied to Rabbinical traditions, Mark, 7. 8. When men could not make revelation even seem to tell about deep mysteries which they were curious to pry into, they brought in human philosophy and pretended traditions to help it, as if one should bring a lamp to the sun-dial to find the hour. [Cautions for times, p. 85.] The false teachers boasted of a higher wisdom in theory, transmitted by tradition among the initiated; in practice they enjoined asceticism, as though matter and the body were the sources of evil. Phrygia (in which was Colosse) had a propensity for the mystical and magical, which appeared in their worship of Cybele and subsequent Montanism. [NEANDER.] rudiments of the world—(Note, Galatians, 4. 3.) "The rudiments" or elementary lessons "of the (outward) world," such as legal ordinances; our Judea childhood's lessons (v. 11, 16, 20; Galatians, 4. 1-5). But NEANDER, "the elements of the world," in the sense, what is earthly, carnal, and outward, not "the rudiments of religion," in Judaism and heathenism, not after Christ—Their boasted higher "philosophy" is but human tradition, and a cleaving to the carnal and worldly, and not to Christ. Though acknowledging Christ nominally, in spirit they by their doctrine deny him. 9. For—"Because." Their "philosophy" (v. 8), is not "after Christ," as all true philosophy is, every thing which comes not from, and tends not to, Him, being a delusion; "For in Him (alone) dwelleth" as in a temple, &c. the fulness—(ch. 1. 19; John, 14. 16) of the Godhead—The Greek (Theotes) means the ESSENCE and NATURE of the Godhead, not merely the divine perfections and attributes of Divinity (Greek, "theotes"). He, as man, was not merely God-like, but in the fullest sense, God. bodily—not merely as before His incarnation, but now "bodily in Him" as the incarnate word (John, 1. 14, 18).  for "faith in" (Ephesians, 3. 12; Philippians, 3. 9). Faith in God's mighty operation in raising again Jesus, is saving faith (Romans, 4. 24; 10. 9); and it is wrought in the soul by His same "mighty working" whereby He "raised Jesus from the dead" (Ephesians, 1. 10, 20).

BENGEL seems to me (not as ALFORD understands Ephesians, 1. 19, 20, accords with this: the same mighty power of God is exercised in raising one spiritually there is no grammatical impropriety in understanding it "the faith which is the effect of the operation of God" (Ephesians, 2. 8; 1 Thessalonians, 2. 13). As His literal ened—GOD "quickened together with Him" (CHRIST).

 Just as Christ's resurrection proved that He was delivered from the sin laid on Him, so our spiritual quickening proves that we have been forgiven our sins (1 Peter, 3. 22; 4. 1, 2). forgiven you—So Vulgate and HILARY. But the oldest MSS. read, "us," passing from the particular persons, the Colossians, to the general church (ch. 1. 14; Ephesians, 1. 7). all trespasses—Greek, "all our trespasses." 14. Blotting out—Greek, "Having wiped out;" coincident in time with "having forgiven you" (v. 13); hereby having cancelled the law's indictment against you. The law (including especially the moral law, wherein lay the chief difficulty in obeying) is abrogated to the believer, as far as it was a compulsory, accusing code, and as far as "righteousness" (justification) and "life" were sought for by it.

 It can only produce outward works, not inward obedience of the will, which in the believer flows from the Holy Spirit in Him (Romans, 3. 21; 7. 2, 4; Galatians, 2. 19). the hand-writing of ordinances—rather,
 "IN ordinances" (Note, Ephesians, 2. 15); "the law of commandments contained in ordinances." "The handwriting" (alluding to the Decalogue, the representative of the law, written by the hand of God) is the Jewish law, the obligatory bond, under which all lay; the Jews primarily were under the bond, but they in this respect were the representative people of the world (Romans, 3. 19); and in their inability to keep the law was involved the inability of the Gentiles also, in whose hearts "the work of the law was written" (Romans, 2. 15); and as they did not keep this, they were condemned by it, that was against us, contrary to us—Greek, "adversary to us;" so it is translated, Hebrews, 10. 27. "Not only was the law against us by its demands, but also an adversary to us by its accusations." [BENGEL.] TITTMANN explains the Greek, "having a latent contrariety to us;" not open designed hostility, but virtual unintentional opposition through our frailty; not through any opposition in the law itself to our good (Romans, 7. 7-12, 14; 1 Corinthians, 15. 56; Galatians, 3. 21; Hebrews, 10. 26). The "WRIT-ING" is part of "that which was contrary to us;" for "the letter killeth" (Note, 2 Corinthians, 3. 6), and took it—Greek, "and hath taken it out of the way" (so as to be no longer a hindrance to us), by "nailing it to the cross." Christ, by bearing the curse of the broken law, has redeemed us from its curse (Galatians, 3. 13). In His person nailed to the cross, the law itself was nailed to it. One ancient mode of cancelling bonds, was by striking a nail through the writing: this seems at that time to have existed in Asia. [GROTIUS.] The bond cancelled in the present case was the obligation lying against the Jews as representatives of the world, and attested by their amen, to keep the whole law under penalty of the curse (Deuteronomy, 27. 26; Nehemiah, 10. 29). 15. ALFORD, ELLICOTT, &c., translate the Greek to accord with the translation of the same Greek, ch. 3. 9, "Stripping off from Himself the principalities and the powers?" God put off from Himself the angels, i.e., their ministry, not employing them to be promulgators of the gospel in the way that He had given the law by their "disposition" or ministry (Acts, 7. 52; Galatians, 2. 19; Hebrews, 2. 2, 5); God manifested Himself without a veil in Jesus. "The principalities and THE powers?" refers back to v. 10, Jesus, "the Head of all principality and power," and ch. 1. 16. In the sacrifice of Jesus on the cross, God subjected all the principalities, &c., to Jesus, declaring them to be powerless as to His work and His people (Ephesians, 1. 21). Thus Paul's argument against those grafting on Christianity Jewish observances, along with angel-worship, is, whatever part angels may be supposed to have had under the law, now at an end, God having put the legal dispensation itself away. But the objection is, that the context seems to refer to a triumph over bad angels: in 2 Corinthians, 2. 14, however, Christ's triumph over those subjected to Him, is not a triumph for destruction, but for their salvation, so that good angels may be referred to (ch. 1. 20). But the Greek middle is susceptible of English Version, "Having spoiled," or, lit. [TITTMANN], "having completely stripped," or "despoiled" for Himself (cf. Romans, 8. 38; 1 Corinthians, 13. 24; Ephesians, 6. 12). English Version accords with Matthew, 12. 29; Luke, 11. 22; Hebrews, 2. 14. Translate as the Greek, "The rules and authorities" made a show of them open up—at His ascension (Notes, Ephesians, 4. 8; confirming English Version of this verse, openly—John, 7. 4; 11. 54, supports English Version against ALFORD's translation, "in openness of speech," in it—viz., His cross, or crucifixion: so the Greek fathers translate. Many of the Latins, "In Himself," or "in Him." Ephesians, 2. 16, favours English Version, "Reconcile... by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby." If "in Him," i.e., Christ, be read, still the cross will be the place and means of God's triumph in Christ over the principalities (Ephesians, 1. 20; 2. 5). Demons, like other angels, were in heaven up to Christ's ascension, and influenced earth from their heavenly abodes. As heaven was not yet opened to man before Christ John, 3. 13, so it was not yet shut against demons (John, 1. 6; 2. 1). But at the ascension Satan and his demons were "judged" and "cast out" by Christ's obedience unto death (John, 12. 31; 16. 11; Hebrews, 2. 14; Revelation, 12. 5-10), and the Son of man was raised to the throne of God; thus His resurrection and ascension are a public solemn triumph over the principalities and powers of death. It is striking, that the heathen oracles were silenced soon after Christ's ascension. 16. therefore—Because ye are complete in Christ, and God in Him has dispensed with all subordinate means as essential to acceptance with Him. meat... drink—Greek, "eating... drinking" (Romans, 14. 1-17). Pay no regard to any one who sits in judgment on you as to legal observances in respect to foods. holidays—a feast yearly. Cf. the three, 1 Chronicles, 23. 31. new moon—monthly. the sabbath—Omit "THE," which is not in the Greek (cf. Note, Galatians, 4. 10). "SABBATHS" (not "the Sabbaths") of the day of atonement and feast of tabernacles have come to an end with the Jewish services to which they belonged (Leviticus, 23. 32, 37-39). The weekly Sabbath rests on a more permanent foundation, having been instituted in Paradise to commemorate the completion of creation in six days. Leviticus, 23. 38, expressly distinguishes "the Sabbath of the Lord" from the other Sabbaths. A positive precept is right because it is commanded, and ceases to be obligatory when abrogated; a moral precept is commanded eternally, because it is eternally right. If we could keep a perpetual Sabbath, as we shall hereafter, the positive precept of the Sabbath, one in each week, would be not needed. Hebrews, 4. 9, "rest," Greek, "keeping of Sabbath" (Isaiah, 66. 23). But we cannot, since even Adam, in innocence, needed one amidst his earthly employments; therefore the Sabbath is still needed, and is therefore still linked with the other nine commandments, as obligatory in the Spirit, though the letter of the law has been superseded by that higher Spirit of love, which is the essence of law and gospel alike (Romans, 13. 8-10, 17. things to come—the blessings of the Christian covenant, the substance of which Jewish ordinances were but the type. Cf. "ages to come," i.e., the gospel dispensation (Ephesians, 2. 7; Hebrews, 2. 5," the world to come. the body is of Christ—The real substance of the blessings typified by the law) belongs to Christ (Hebrews, 8. 5; 10. 1). 18. beguile—translate, "Defraud you of your prize," lit., "to adjudge a prize out of hostility away from him who deserves it." [TRENER.] "To be unimpire in a contest to the detriment of one." This defrauding of their prize the Colossians would suffer, by letting any self-constituted arbitrator or judge (i.e., false teacher) draw them away from Christ, "the righteous Judge" and Awarder of the prize (2 Timothy, 4. 8; James, 1. 12; 1 Peter, 5. 4), to angel-worship. in a voluntary humility—So "will-worship" (v. 23). lit., "Delighting [WARR] in humility?" loving (so the Greek is translated, Mark, 12. 38, "love to go in long clothing"; to indulge himself in a humility of his own imposing: a volunteer in humility. [DALLEUS.] Not as ALFORD, "Let no one of purpose defraud you," &c. Nor as GROTIUS, "If he ever so much wish" (to defraud you). For the participle "wishing," or "delighting," is one of the series, and stands in the same category as "intruding," "puffed up," "not holding," and the self-pleasing implied in it stands in happy contrast to the mock humility with which it seems to me, therefore, to be connected. His "humility," so-called, is a pleasing of self; thus it stands in parallelism to "his fleshy mind" (its real name, though he styles it "humility"), as "wishing" or "delighting" does to "puffed up." The Greek for "humility" is lit., "lowliness of mind," which forms a clearer parallel to "puffed up by his fleshy mind." Under pretext of humility, as if they durst not come directly to God and Christ (like the modern church of Rome), they invoked angels: as Judaizers, they justified this on the ground that the law was given by angels. This error continued long in Phrygia (where Colosse and Laodicea were), so that the council of Laodicea (A. D. 360) expressly framed its 35th canon against the "Angels" (as AUGUSTINE, Hereses, 39, calls them) or "invokers of angels." Even as late as THEODORE'S time, there were oratories to Michael the archangel. The modern Greeks have a legend that Michael opened a chasm to draw off an inundation threatening the Colossian Christians. Once men admit the inferior powers to share invocation with the Supreme, the former gradually engross all our serious worship, almost to the exclusion of the latter; thus the heathen, beginning with adding the worship of other deities to that of the Supreme, ended with ceasing to worship Him at all. Nor does it signify much, whether we regard such as directly controlling us (the Pagan view), or as only influencing the Supreme in our behalf (the church of Rome's view); because he from whom I expect happiness or misery, becomes the uppermost object in my mind, whether he sees, or only perceives it. [Cautions for him.] Scripture opposes the idea of "patrons" or "intercessors" (1 Timothy, 1. 4, 6). True Christian humility joins consciousness of utter personal demerit, with a sense of participation in the divine life through Christ, and in the dignity of our adoption by God. Without the latter being realised, a false self-humiliation results, which displays itself in ceremonies and ascetic self-abasement (v. 23), which after all is but spiritual pride under the mock guise of humility. Content "glorying in the Lord" (1 Corinthians, 1. 31), intruding into things which he hath not seen—So very old MSS. and Vulgate and ORIGEN read. But the oldest MSS. and Lucifer omit "not," then translate, "Haughtily treading on ('standing on') [ALFORD] the things which he hath seen." TREVELLIS refers this to fanatical visions of angels. But if St. Paul had meant a fanatical seeing, he would have used some qualifying word, as, "which he seemed to see," not "which he hath seen." Plainly the things were actually seen by him, whether of demoniacal origination (1 Samuel, 28. 11-20), or phenomena resulting from natural causation, mistaken by him as if supernatural. Paul not stopping to discuss the nature of the things so seen, fixes on the radical error, the tendency of such a one in all this to walk by SENSE (i.e., what he haughtily prides himself on having seen), rather than by FAITH IN THE UNKNOWN "Head" (v. 19; cf. John, 20. 29; 2 Corinthians, 5. 7; Hebrews, 11. 1). Thus in the parallelism, "vainly puffed up" answers to "haughtily treading on," or "setting his foot on;" "his fleshly mind" answers to "the things which he hath seen," since his fleshiness betrays itself in priding himself on what he hath seen, rather than on the unseen objects of faith. That the things seen may have been of demoniacal origination, appears from 1 Timothy, 4. 1, "Some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils" (Greek, "demons"). A warning to modern spiritualists, puffed up—implying that the previous so-called "humility" (Greek, "lowliness of mind") was really a "putting up," fleshly mind—Greek, "By the mind of his own flesh." The flesh, or sensuous principle, is the fountain head whence his mind draws its craving after religious objects of sight, instead of, in true Humility as a member, "holding fast the (unseen) Head." 19. Translate, "Not holding fast the Head." He who does not hold Christ solely and supremely above all others, does not hold Him at all. [BUNGE.] The want of firm holding of Christ has set him loose to pry into, and so "tread haughtily on (pride himself on) things which he hath seen." Each must hold fast the Head for himself, not merely be attached to the other members, however high in the body. [ALFORD.] from which—rather, "from whom," all the body—i.e., all the members of the body (Ephesians, 4. 16), joints—the points of union where the supply of nourishment passes to the different members, furnishing the body with the materials of growth, bands—the sinews and nerves which bind together limb and limb. Faith, love, and peace, are the spiritual bands. Cf. "knit together in love" (v. 2; ch. 3. 14; Ephesians, 4. 3), having nourishment ministered—i.e., supplied to it continually. "Receiving ministrations," knit together—The Greek is translated "compact" Ephesians, 4. 16; implying firm consolidation, with the increase of God—(Ephesians, 4. 16)—i.e., wrought by God, the Author and sustainer of the believer's spiritual life, in union with Christ, the Head (1 Corinthians, 3. 6); and tending to the honour of God, being worthy of Him, its Author. 20. Wherefore—The oldest MSS. omit "Wherefore." If ye be dead—Greek, "If ye died (so as to be freed from,)" &c. (cf. Romans, 6. 2; 7. 2, 3; Galatians, 2. 19), rudiments of the world—(v. 8.) Carnal, outward, worldly, legal ordinances, as though living—as though you were not dead to the world like your crucified Lord, into whose death ye were buried (Galatians, 6. 14; 1 Peter, 4. 1, 2), are ye subject to ordinances—why do ye submit to be made subject to ordinances? Referring to v. 14: you are again being made subject to "ordinances," the "handwriting" of which had been "blotted out" (v. 14). 21. Cf. v. 16, "meat...drink." He gives instances of the "ordinances" (v. 20) in the words of their imposers. There is an ascending climax of superstitious prohibitions. The first Greek word (Aspeis) is distinguished from the third (thipes), in that the former means close contact and retention; the latter, momentary contact (cf. 1 Corinthians, 7. 1; John, 20. 17, Greek, "Hold me not;" "cling not to me"). Translate, "Handle not, neither taste, nor even touch." The three refer to meats. "Handle not" (a stronger term than "nor even touch"), "nor taste" with the tongue, "nor even touch," however slight the contact. 23. Whethings, viz., the things handled, touched, and tasted, are to perish—id., "are (constituted by their very nature) for perishing (or destruction by corruption) in (or with) their using up" (consumption). Therefore they cannot really and lastingly defile a man (Matthew, 16. 17; 1 Corinthians, 6. 12), after—according to. Referring to v. 20, 21. All these "ordinances" are according to human, not divine, injunction, doctrines—Greek, "teachings." ALFORD translates, (doctrinal) "systems." 23. have—Greek, "are having" implying the permanent characteristic which these ordinances are supposed to have, show of wisdom—rather, "a reputation of wisdom." [ALFORD.] will-worship—arbitrarily-invented worship: would-be-worship, devised by man's own will, not God's. So jealous is God of human will-worship, that He struck Nadab and Abihu dead for burning strange incense (Leviticus, 10. 1-3). So Uzziah was stricken with leprosy for usurping the office of priest (2 Chronicles, 26. 16-21). Cf. the will-worship of Saul (1 Samuel, 13. 8-14) for which he was doomed to lose his throne. This "voluntary worship" is the counterpart to their "voluntary humility" (v. 18): both specious in appearance, the former seeming in religion to do even more than God requires (as in the dogmas of the Roman and Greek churches), but really setting aside God's will for man's own; the latter seemingly self-abasing, but really proud of man's self-willed "humility" (Greek, "lowliness of mind"), whilst virtually rejecting the dignity of direct communion with Christ, the Head, by worshipping of angels, neglecting of the body—Greek, "not sparing of the body." This asceticism seems to have rested on the Oriental theory that matter is the source of evil. This also looked plausible (cf. 1 Corinthians, 9. 37), not in any honour—of the body. As "neglecting of the body" describes asceticism positively, so this clause, negatively. Not paying any of that "honour" which is due to the body as redeemed by such a price as the blood of Christ. We should not degrade, but have a just estimation of ourselves, not in ourselves, but in Christ (Acts, 13. 46; 1 Corinthians, 3. 21; 6. 15; 7. 23; 12. 23, 24; 1 Thessalonians, 4. 4). True self-denial regards the spirit, and not the forms of ascetical self-mortification in "meats which profit not those occupied therein" (Hebrews, 13. 9), and is consistent with Christian self-respect, the "honour" which belongs to the believer as dedicated to the Lord. Cf. "vainly," v. 18, to the satisfying of the flesh—This expresses the real tendency of their human ordinances of bodily asceticism, voluntary-humility, and will-worship of angels. Whilst seeming to deny self and the body, they really are pampering the flesh. Thus "satisfying of the flesh" answers to "puffed up by his fleshly mind" (v. 18), so that "flesh" is used in its ethical sense, "the carnal nature" as opposed to the spiritual; not in the sense, "body." The Greek for "satisfying," implies satisfying to repletion, or to excess. "A surfeit of the carnal sense is human tradition." [HILARY THE DEACON, in [BENGL.] Tradition puffs up; it cloes the heavenly perceptions. They put away true "honour" that they may "adulate to the full the flesh." Self-imposed ordinances gratify the flesh (viz., self-righteousness), though seeming to mortify it.

CHAPTER III.

VER. 1-25. EXHORTATIONS TO HEAVENLY AIMS, AS OPPOSED TO EARTHLY, ON THE GROUND OF UNION TO THE RISEN SAVIOUR: TO MORTIFY AND PUT OFF THE OLD MAN, AND TO PUT ON THE NEW: IN CHARITY, HUMILITY, WORDS OF EDIFICATION, THANKFULNESS; RELATIVE DUTIES. 1. It, then—The connexion with ch. 2, 15, 23, is, he had condemned the "fleshy mind" and the "satiating to the full the flesh;" in contrast to this he now says, "If then ye have been once for all raised up [Greek aorist] together with Christ" (viz., at your conversion and baptism, Romans, 6, 4), seek those things...above.—(Matthew, 6, 33; Philipians, 3, 20.) sitteth—rather as Greek, "Where Christ is, sitting on the right hand of God" (Ephesians, 1, 20). The Head being quickened, the members are also quickened with Him. Where the Head is, there the members must be. The contrast is between the believer's former state, alive to the world but dead to God, and his present state, dead to the world but alive to God; and between the earthly abode of the unbeliever and the heavenly abode of the believer (1 Corinthians, 15, 47, 48). We are already seated there in Him as our Head; and hereafter shall be seated by Him, as the Bestower of our bliss. As Elisha (2 Kings, 2, 2) said to Elijah when about to ascend, "As the Lord liveth...I will not leave thee;" so we must follow the ascended Saviour with the wings of our meditations and the chariots of our affections. We should trample upon and subdue our lusts, that our conversation may correspond to our Saviour's condition; that where the eyes of apostles were forced to leave Him, thither our thoughts may follow Him (Matthew, 6, 21; John, 12, 32). [PEARSON.] Of ourselves we can no more ascend than a bar of iron lift itself up from the earth. But the love of Christ is a powerful magnet to draw us up (Ephesians, 2, 5, 6). The design of the gospel is not merely to give rules, but mainly to supply motives to holiness. 2. Translate.—"set your mind on the things above, not on the things," &c. (ch. 2, 20). Contrast "who mind earthly things" (Philipians, 3, 19). Whatever we make an idol of, will either be a cross to us if we be believers, or a curse to us if unbelievers. 3. The Greek aorist implies, "For ye have died once for all" (ch. 2, 12; Romans, 6, 4-7). It is not said, Ye must die practically to the world in order to become dead with Christ; but the latter is assumed as once for all having taken place in the regeneration: what believers are told is, Develop this spiritual life in practice. "No one longs for eternal, incorruptible, and immortal life, unless he be wearied of this temporal, corruptible, and mortal life." [AUGUSTINE.] your life...hid—Psalm 83, 3—like a seed buried in the earth; cf. "planted" Romans, 6, 5. Cf. Matthew, 13, 31 and 33, "like...leaven...hid." As the glory of Christ now is hid from the world, so also the glory of believers' inner life, proceeding from communion with Him, is still hidden with Christ in God; but (v. 4) when Christ, the Source of this life, shall manifest Himself in glory, then shall their hidden glory be manifested, and correspond in appearance to its original. [NEANDER.] The Christian's secret communion with God will now at times make itself seen without his intending it (Matthew, 5, 14, 16); but his full manifestation is at Christ's manifestation (Matthew, 13, 43; Romans, 8, 19-23). "It doth not yet appear [Greek, 'is not yet manifested'] what we shall be" (1 John, 3, 2; 1 Peter, 1, 7). As yet Christians do not always recognise the "life of one another, so hidden is it, and even at times doubt as to their own life so weak is it, and so harassed with temptations" (Psalm 51; Romans, 7, 1).

in God—to whom Christ has ascended. Our "life" is "laid up for us in God" (ch. 1, 5), and is secured by the decree of Him who is invisible to the world (1 Timothy, 4, 8). 4. Translate, "When Christ shall be manifested who is our life" (John, 11, 25; 14, 6, 19). Then shall ye also with Him be manifested in glory" (1 Peter, 4, 13). The spiritual life our souls have now in Him, shall be extended to our bodies (Romans, 8, 11). then—and not till then. Those err who think to find a perfect church before then. The true Church is now militant. Rome errs in trying to set up a church now resurgent and triumphant. The true Church shall be visible as a perfect and reigning Church, when Christ shall be visibly manifested as her reigning Head. Rome having ceased to look for Him in patient faith, has set up a visible mock-head, a false anticipation of the millennial kingdom. The papacy took to itself by robbery that glory which is an object of hope, and can only be reached by bearing the cross now. When the Church became a harlot, she ceased to be a bride who goes to meet her Bridegroom. Hence the millennial kingdom ceased to be looked for. [AUBRELEN.] 5. Mortify—Greek, "Make a corpse of," "make dead," "put to death," therefore—(Note, v. 3.) Follow out to its necessary consequence the fact of your having once for all died with Christ spiritually at your regeneration, by daily "deadening your members," of which united "the body of the sins of the flesh" consists (ch. 2, 11). "The members" to be mortified are the fleshly instruments of lust, in so far as the members of the body are abused to such purposes. Habitually repress and do violence to corrupt desires of which the members are the instruments of. Romans, 6, 19; 8, 13; Galatians, 5, 24, 25. upon the earth—where they find their support [BENGL.] (cf. v. 2, "things on earth"). See Ephesians, 5, 3, 4. inordinate affection—"Injust passion," evil concupiscence—more general than the last [ALFORD], the disorder of the external senses; "Injust passion," lust within. [BENGL.] covetousness—marked off by the Greek article as forming a whole genus by itself, distinct from the genus containing the various species just enumerated. It implies a self-idolizing, grasping spirit; far worse than another Greek term translated "the love of money" (1 Timothy, 6, 10). which is—i.e., inasmuch as it is "idolatry." Cf. Note, Ephesians, 4, 19, on its connexion with sins of impurity. Self and members are defiled in the heart instead of God (Matthew, 6, 24; Note, Ephesians, 5, 5). 6. (Note, Ephesians, 5, 6) 7. sometimes—"once," walked—when ye lived in them—These sins were the very element in which ye "lived" (before ye became once for all dead with Christ to them); no wonder, then, that ye "walked" in them. Cf. on the opposite side, "living in the Spirit," having as its legitimate consequence, "walking in the Spirit" (Galatians, 5, 25). The living comes first in both cases, the walking follows. 8. But now—that ye are no longer living in them, ye also—like other believers answering to "ye also" (v. 7) like other unbelievers formerly, put off—"Do ye also put away all these," viz., those just enumerated, and those which all follow. [ALFORD.] anger, wrath—(Note, Ephesians, 4, 11) blasphemy—rather "reviling," "evil-speaking," as it is translated Ephesians, 4, 31. filthy communication—The context favours the translation, "abusive language," rather than impure conversation. "Foul language" best retains the ambiguity of the original. 9. Ephesians, 4, 22, 25. put off—Greek, "wholly put off," utterly renounced. [TITMANN.] the old man—the unregenerate nature which ye had before conversion, its deeds—habits of acting, 10. the new man—(Note, Ephesians, 4, 23.) Here (neon) the Greek, means "the recently-put-on nature," that lately received at regeneration (see Note, Ephesians, 4, 23, 24). which is renewed—Greek, "which is being renewed" [anakinonomenos]; viz., its development into a perfectly renewed nature is Christ is all—Christ absorbs distinctions, being to all alike, every need for justification, sanctification, n (1 Corinthians, 1. 30; 3. 21-23; Gala- all—who believe and are renewed, with- of person; the sole distinction now is, draws from Christ. The unity of the ed in by all believers, counterbalances even as great as that between the ek and the rude "Scythian." Chris- to the most uncivilized the only spring , and moral culture. 12. the elect of God "the" in the Greek, "God's elect" (cf. Thessalonians, 1. 4). The order of the oly, beloved," answers to the order of ction from eternity precedes sanctifica- ie sanctified, feeling God's love, imitate

it. [BENGL.] bowels of mercies—Some of the oldest MSS. read singular, "mercy." Bowels express the yearning compassion, which has its seat in the heart, and which we feel to act on our inward parts (Genesis, 43. 30; Jeremiah, 31. 20; Luke, 1. 78, Margin). humbleness of mind—True "lowliness of mind" not the mock "humility" of the false teachers (ch. 2. 23; Ephesians, 4. 2. 32). 13. Forbearing—as to present offences, forgiving—as to past offences, quarrel—rather as Greek, "cause of blame," "cause of complaint." Christ—who had so infinitely greater cause of complaint against us. The oldest MSS. and Vulgate read "the Lord." English Version is supported by one very old MS. and old versions. It seems to have crept in from Ephesians, 4. 32. 14. above—rather "over," as in Ephesians, 6. 16. Charity, which is the crowning grace, covering the multitude of others' sins (1 Peter, 4. 8), must override all the other graces enumerated, which is—i.e., for it is; lit., "which thing is," bond of perfectness—An upper garment which completes and keeps together the rest, which, without it, would be loose and disconnected. Seeming graces, where love is wanting, are mere hypocrisy. Justification by faith, is assumed as already having taken place in those whom Paul addresses, v. 12, "elect of God, holy... beloved," and ch. 2. 12; so that there is no plea here for Rome's view of justification by works. Love and its works "perfect," i.e., manifest the full maturity of faith developed (Matthew, 5. 44. 48). Love...be ye perfect, &c. (James, 2. 21, 22; 1 John, 2. 5). "If we love one another, God's love is perfected in us" (Romans, 13. 8; 1 Corinthians, 13; 1 Timothy, 1. 5; 1 John, 4. 12). As to "Bond," cf. ch. 2. 3, "knit together in love" (Ephesians, 4. 3), "keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." 15. peace of God—The oldest MSS. and versions read, "The peace of CHRIST" (cf. Philippians, 4. 7). "The peace of GOD." Therefore Christ is God. Peace was His legacy to His disciples before He left them (John, 14. 27). "MY peace I give unto you." Peace is peculiarly His to give. Peace follows love (v. 14; Ephesians, 4. 2, 3). rule—lit., "sit as umpire;" the same Greek verb simple, as appears compounded (ch. 2. 18). The false teacher, as a self-constituted umpire, defrauds you of your prize; but if the peace of Christ be your umpire ruling in your hearts, your reward is sure. "Let the peace of Christ act as umpire when anger, envy, and such passions arise, and restrain them." Let not those passions give the award, so that you should be swayed by them, but let Christ's peace be the decider of every thing. in your hearts—Many wear a peaceful countenance and speak peace with the mouth, whilst war is in their hearts (Psalm 28. 3; 55. 21). to the which—i.e., with a view to which state of Christian peace (Isaiah, 32. 3; 1 Corinthians, 7. 15, "God hath called us to peace," ye are called—Greek, "ye were also called." The "also" implies that besides Paul's exhortation, they have also as a motive to "peace," their having been once for all called. in one body—(Ephesians, 4. 4)—The unity of the body is a strong argument for "peace" among the members. be ye thankful—for your "calling." Not to have "peace ruling in your hearts" would be inconsistent with the "calling in one body," and would be practical unthankfulness to God who called us (Ephesians, 5. 4, 19, 20). 16. The form which "thankfulness" (v. 15) ought to take. Let the word of Christ—The gospel word by which ye have been called. richly—(ch. 2. 2; Romans, 15. 14)—in all wisdom—ALFORD joins this clause with "teaching," &c., not with "dwell in you," as English Version, for so we find in ch. 1. 28, "teaching in all wisdom," and the two clauses will thus correspond, "In all wisdom teaching," and "in grace singing in your hearts" (so the Greek order). and... and—The oldest MSS. read "psalms, hymns, spiritual songs" (Note, Ephesians, 5. 19). At the Agapæ or Love feasts, and in Week family circles, they were to be so full of the Word of Christ in the heart, that the mouth should give utterance in hymns of instruction, admonition, and praise (cf. Deuteronomy, 6. 7). TERTULLIAN, Apology 39, records that at the Love-feasts, after the water had been furnished for the hands and the lights had been lit, according as any had the power, whether by his remembrance of Scripture, or by his powers of composition, he used to be invited to sing praises to God for the common good. Paul contrasts (as in Ephesians, 5. 18, 19) the songs of Christians at their social meetings, with the bacchanalian and licentious songs of heathen feasts. Singing usually formed part of the entertainment at Greek banquets (cf. James, 5. 13. with grace-Greek, "in grace," the element in which your singing is to be: "the grace" of the indwelling holy spirit. This clause expresses the seat and source of true psalmody, whether in private or public, viz. the heart as well as the voice; singing (cf. v. 15, "peace...rule in your hearts") the psalm of love and praise being in the heart before it finds vent by the lips, and even when it is not actually expressed by the voice, as in closet-worship. The Greek order forbids English Version, "with grace in your hearts"; rather, "singing in your hearts" to the Lord—The oldest MSS. read, "to God." 17. Lit., "And every thing whatsoever ye do... do all, &c.; this includes words as well as deeds, in the name of the Lord Jesus—as disciples called by His name as His, seeking His guidance and help, and desiring to act so as to gain His approval (Romans, 14. 8; 1 Corinthians, 10. 31; 2 Corinthians, 5. 15; 1 Peter, 4. 11). Cf. "in the Lord" v. 18, and v. 11, "Christ is all," God and the Father—The oldest MSS. omit "and," which seems to have crept in from Ephesians, 6. 20. by him—Greek, "through Him" as the channel of His grace to us, and of our thanksgiving to Him (John, 14. 6, end). 18. to your own husbands—The oldest MSS. omit "own," which crept in from Ephesians, 5. 22, as it is fit in the Lord—Greek, "was fit," implying that there was at Colosse some degree of failure in fulfilling this duty, "as it was your duty to have done as disciples of the Lord." 19. (Ephesians, 5. 22-23.) be not bitter—ill-tempered, and provoking. Many who are polite abroad, are rude and bitter at home because they are not afraid to be so there. 20. (Ephesians, 6. 1.) unto the Lord—The oldest MSS. read, "in the Lord," i.e., this is acceptable to God when it is done in the Lord, viz., from the principle of faith, and as disciples in union with the Lord. 21. (Ephesians, 6. 4.) It is a different Greek verb, therefore translate here, "Irritate not." By perpetual fault-finding "children" are "discouraged" or "disheartened." A broken down spirit is fatal to youth. [BENGL.] 22. (Ephesians, 6. 5, 6.) This is to fear God, when, though none sees us, we do no evil; but if we do evil, it is not God, but men, whom we fear. singleness—"simplicity of heart," fearing God—The oldest MSS. read, "the Lord." 23. And—Omitted in the oldest MSS. (cf. Ephesians, 6. 7. 8.). Cf. the same principle in the case of all men, Hezekiah (2 Chronicles, 31. 21; Romans, 12. 11). do, do it—Two distinct Greek verbs, "Whatever ye do, work at it" (or labour at it, heartily—not from servile constraint, but with hearty good will. 24. the reward of the inheritance—"Knowing that it is from the Lord the ultimate source of reward) ye shall receive the compensation (or recompense, which will make ample amends for your having no earthly possession, as slaves now) consisting of the inheritance," (a term excluding the notion of meriting it by works: it is all of grace, Romans, 4. 14; Galatians, 3. 18.) for ye serve—The oldest MSS. omit "for," then translate as Vulgate, "Serve ye the Lord Christ," cf. v. 23, "To the Lord and not unto men" (1 Corinthians, 7. 22, 23). 25. But—The oldest MSS. read, "for," which accords with "serve ye" &c. (v. 24), the oldest reading; the for here gives a motive for obey-ing the precept. He addresses the slaves: Serve ye the Lord Christ, and leave your wrongs in His hands to put to rights; (translate) "For he that doeth wrong shall receive back the wrong which he hath done (by just retribution in kind), and there is no respect of persons" with the Great Judge in the day of the Lord. He favours the master no more than the slave (Revelation, 6. 15).

CHAPTER IV.

VER. 1-15. EXHORTATIONS CONTINUED. TO PRAYER: WISDOM IN RELATION TO THE UNCONVERTED: AS TO THE BEARERS OF THE EPISTLE TYRCHICUS AND ONESIMUS: CLOSING SALUTATIONS. 1. give—Greek, "render" lit., "afford" equal—i.e., as the slaves owe their duties to you, so you equally owe to them your duties as masters. Cf. "ye masters do the same things" (Note, Ephesians, 6. 9). ALFORD translates, "fairness," "equity," which gives a large and liberal interpretation of justice in common matters (Philemon, 16, knowing—(ch. 3. 24.) ye also—as well as they. 2. Continue—Greek, "Continue perseveringly," "persevere" (Ephesians, 6. 18, "watching therustis," here, "watch in the same," or "in it," i.e., in prayer: watching against the indolence as to prayer, and in prayer, of our corrupt wills, with thanksgiving—for every thing, whether joyful, or sorrowful, mercies temporal and spiritual, national, family, and individual (1 Corinthians, 14. 17; Philippiana, 4. 6; 1 Thessalonians, 5. 18. 3. for us—myself and Timothy (ch. 1. 1), a door of utterance—translate, "a door for the word." Not as in Ephesians, 6. 19, where power of "utterance" is his petition. Here it is an opportunity for preaching the word, which would be best afforded by his release from prison (1 Corinthians, 16. 9; 2 Corinthians, 2. 12; Philemon, 22; Revelation, 3. 8). to speak—so that we may speak the mystery of Christ—(ch. 1. 27.) for which also—on account of which I am (not only "an ambassador," Ephesians, 6. 20, but) also in bonds. 4. ALFORD thinks that Paul asks their prayers for his release as if it were the only way by which he could "make it (the gospel) manifest" as he ought. But whilst this is included in their subject of prayer, Philippiana, 1. 12, 13, written somewhat later in his imprisonment, clearly shows that "a door for the word" could be opened, and was opened, for its manifestation even whilst he remained imprisoned (cf. 2 Timothy, 2. 9). 5. (Notes, Ephesians, 5. 15, 16.) in wisdom—Practical Christian prudence, them...without—Those not in the Christian brotherhood (1 Corinthians, 5. 12; 1 Thessalonians, 4. 12). The brethren, through love, will make allowances for an indiscreet act or word of a brother; the world will make none. Therefore be the more on your guard in your intercourse with the latter, lest you be a stumblingblock to their conversion, redeeming the time—The Greek expresses, buying up for yourselves, and buying off from worldly vanities the opportunity, whenever it is afforded you, of good to yourselves and others. "Forestall the opportunity, i.e., to buy up an article out of the market, so as to make the largest profit from it." [CONYBEARE & HOWSON.] 6. with grace—Greek, "in grace" as its element (ch. 3. 16; Ephesians, 4. 29). Contrast the case of those "of the world" who "therefore speak of the world" (1 John, 4. 5). Even the smallest leaf of the believer should be full of the sap of the Holy Spirit (Jeremiah, 17. 7, 8). His conversation should be cheerful without levity, serious without gloom. Cf. Luke, 4. 22; John, 7. 46, as to Jesus' speech, seasoned with salt—i.e., the savour of fresh and lively spiritual wisdom and earnestness, excluding all "corrupt communication," and also tasteless insipidity (Matthew, 5. 13; Mark, 9. 50; Ephesians, 4. 29). Cf. all the sacrifices seasoned with salt (Leviticus, 2. 13). Not far from Colosse, in Phrygia, there was a salt lake, which gives to the image here the more appropriateness, how ye ought to answer every man—(1 Peter, 3. 15)

So one very old MS. ade read. But the oldest MSS. and the old sions, "that ye may know our state." How-latter reading seems likely to have crept in saians, 6. 22. He was now at h Paul (cf. Philemon, 23, 24). As he is here as Paul's "fellow-prisoner," but in Philemon, is "fellow-labourer;" and vice versa, Epaphras ion, 23, as his "fellow-prisoner," but here "fellow-servant." St. ection of him on his second missionary because he had turned back at Perga on the ney (Acts, 13. 13; 15. 37-39), had caused an i between himself and Barnabas. Christian i healed the breach: for here he implies his confidence in Mark, makes honourable allu- arnabas, and desires that those at Colosse who had regarded Mark in consequence of that past error with suspicion, should now "receive" him with kindness. Colosse is only about 110 miles from Perga, and less than 20 from the confines of Pisidia, through which province Paul and Barnabas preached on their return during the same journey. Hence, though Paul had not personally visited the Colossian church, they knew of the past unfaithfulness of Mark; and needed this recommendation of him, after the temporary cloud on him, so as to receive him, now that he was about to visit them as an Evangelist. Again, in Paul's last imprisonment, he, for the last time, speaks of Mark (2 Timothy, 4. 11). 11. Justus—i.e., righteous; a common name among the Jews; Hebrew, tsadik (Acts, 1. 23), of the circumcision—This implies that Epaphras, Luke, and Demas (v. 13, 14), were not of the circumcision. This agrees with Luke's Gentile name (the same as Lucanus, and the Gentile aspect of his gospel. These only, &c.—viz., of the Jews. Epaphras, &c., were also fellow-labourers, but Gentiles, unto—i.e., in promoting the gospel kingdom, which have been—Greek, "which have been made," or "have become," i.e., inasmuch as they have become a comfort to me. The Greek implies comfort in forensic dangers; a different Greek word expresses comfort in domestic affliction. [BENNETT.] 12. Christ—The oldest MSS. add "Jesus," labouring fervently—As the Greek is the same, translate, "striving earnestly" (Note, c. 1. 29; 2. 1), lit., striving as in the agony of a contest. in prayers—translate as Greek, "in his prayers," complete—The oldest MSS. read "fully assured." It is translated "fully persuaded," Romans, 4. 21; 14. 5. In the expression "perfect," he refers to what he has already said, ch. 1. 25; 2. 2; 3. 14. "Perfect" implies the attainment of the full maturity of a Christian. BENNETT joins "in all the will of God" with "stand." 13. a great zeal—The oldest MSS. and Vulgate have "much labour," for you—lest you should be seduced (ch. 2. 4); a motive why you should be anxious for yourselves, them that are in Laodicea... Hierapolis—churches probably founded by Epaphras, as the church in Colosse was. Laodicea, called from Laodice, queen of Antiochus II., on the river Lycus, was, according to the subscription to 1 Timothy, "the chiefest city of Phrygia Pacatiana." All the three cities were destroyed by an earthquake in A.D. 62. [TACITUS, Annals, 14. 27.] Hierapolis was six Roman miles North of Laodicea. 14. It is conjectured that Luke, "the beloved physician" (the same as the Evangelist), may have first become connected with Paul in professionally attending on him in the sickness under which he laboured in Phrygia and Galatia (in which latter place he was detained by sickness, in the early part of that journey wherein Luke first is found in his company (Acts, 16. 10; cf. Note, Galatians, 4. 13). Thus the allusion to his medical profession is appropriate in writing to men of Phrygia. Luke ministered to Paul in his last imprisonment (2 Timothy, 4. 11). Demas—included among his "fellow-labourers" (Philemon, 24), but afterwards a deserter from him through love of this world (2 Timothy, 4. 10). He alone has here no honourable or descriptive epithet attached to his name. Perhaps, already, his real character was betraying itself. 15. Nymphas—of Laodicea, church... in his house—So old MSS. and Vulgate read. The oldest read, "THEIR house;" and one MS., "HER house," which makes Nymphas a woman. 16. the epistle from Laodicea—viz., the epistle which I wrote to the Laodiceans, and which you will get from them on applying to them. Not the epistle to the Ephesians. See INTRODUCTIONS to the epistles to Ephesians and Colossians. The epistles from the apostles were publicly read in the church assemblies. IONATIUS ad Ephesum 12; POLYCARP ad Philippenses 3. 14, 15,

CLEMENT ad Corinthios 1. 47; 1 Thessalonians, 5. 27; Revelation, 1. 3. "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear." Thus, the Old and the gospels were put on a level with the Old Testament, which was similarly read (Deuteronomy, 31. 11). The Holy Spirit inspired St. Paul to write, besides those extant, other epistles which he saw necessary for that day, and for particular churches; and which were not so for the church of all ages and places. It is possible that as the epistle to the Colossians was to be read for the edification of other churches besides that of Colosse; so the epistle to the Ephesians was to be read in various churches besides Ephesus, and that Laodicea was the last of such churches before Colosse, whence he might designate the epistle to the Ephesians here as "the epistle from Laodicea." But it is equally possible that the epistle meant was one to the Laodiceans themselves. 17. say to Archippus—the Colossians (not merely the clergy, but the laymen) are directed, "Speak ye to Archippus." This proves that Scripture belongs to the laity as well as the clergy; and that laymen may profitably admonish the clergy in particular cases when they do so in meekness. BENOEL suggests, that Archippus was perhaps prevented from going to the church assembly by weak health or age. The word "fulfil," accords with his ministry being near its close (ch. 1. 25; cf. Philemon, 2). However, "fulfil" may mean, as in 2 Timothy, 4. 5, "make full proof of thy ministry." "Give all diligence to follow it out fully;" a monition perhaps needed by Archippus, in the Lord—the element in which every work of the Christian, and especially the Christian minister, is to be done (v. 7; 1 Corinthians, 7. 29; Philippians, 4. 2). 15. St. Paul's autograph salutation (so 1 Corinthians, 16. 21; 2 Thessalonians, 3. 17), attesting that the preceding letter, though written by an amanuensis, is from himself. Remember my bonds—Already in this chapter he had mentioned his "bonds" (v. 3), and again v. 10, an incentive why they should love and pray (v. 3) for him; and still more, that they should, in reverential obedience to his monitions in this epistle, shrink from the false teaching herein stigmatized, remembering what a conflict (ch. 2. 7) he had in their behalf amidst his bonds. "When we read of his chains, we should not forget that they moved over the paper as he wrote; his [right] hand was chained to the [left] hand of the soldier who kept him." [ALFORD.] Grace be with you—Greek. "THE GRACE" which every Christian enjoys in some degree, and which flows from God in Christ by the Holy Ghost (Titus, 3. 15; Hebrews, 13. 25).

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

THE AUTHENTICITY of this epistle is attested by Irenæus, adværsus Hæreses, 5. 6. 1. quoting ch. 5. 23; Clement of Alexandria, Pedagogus, 1. 88, quoting ch. 2. 7; Tertullian de Resurrectione carnis, sec. 24, quoting ch. 5. 1; Celsus in Eusebii Ecclæsiastical History, 6. 20; Origen, contra Celsum, 3.

THE OBJECT OF THE EPISTLE.—Thessalonica was at this time capital of the Roman second district of Macedonia (Livy, 45. 29). It lay on the Bay of Therme, and has always been, and still is, under its modern name Saloniki, a place of considerable commerce. After his imprisonment and scourging at Philippi, St. Paul (ch. 2. 3) passed on to Thessalonica; and in company with Silas (Acts, 17. 1-9) and Timothy (Acts, 16. 3; 17. 14, of. with ch. 1. 1; 3. 1-6; 2 Thessalonians, 1. 1) founded the church there. The Jews, as a body, rejected the gospel when preached for three successive Sabbaths (Acts, 17. 3); but some few "believed and consorted with Paul and Silas, and of the devout (i.e., proselytes to Judaism) Greeks a great multitude, and of the chief women not a few." The believers received the word joyfully, notwithstanding trials and persecutions (ch. 1. 6; 2. 13) from their own countrymen and from the Jews (ch. 2. 14-16). His stay at Thessalonica was doubtless not limited to the three weeks in the three Sabbaths, specified in Acts, 17. 3; for his labouring there with his hands for his support (ch. 2. 9; 3 Thessalonians, 3. 8), his receiving supplies there more than once from Philippi (Philippians, 4. 16), his making many converts from the Gentiles (ch. 1. 9; and as two oldest MSS. read, Acts, 17. 4, "of the devout and of the Greeks a great multitude," Acts, 17. 4), and his appointing ministers,—all imply a longer residence. Probably as at Pheidian Antioch (Acts, 13. 46), at Corinth (Acts, 18. 6, 7), and at Ephesus (Acts, 19. 8, 9), having preached the gospel to the Jews, when they rejected it, he turned to the Gentiles. He probably therefore held the Christian meetings in the house of Jason (Acts, 17. 5), perhaps "the kinman" of Paul mentioned in Romans 16. 21. His great subject of teaching to them seems to have been the coming and kingdom of Christ, as we may infer from ch. 1. 10; 2. 12, 13; 3. 13; 4. 13-16; 5. 1-11, 23, 24; and that they should walk worthy of it (ch. 2. 12; 4. 1). And it is an undesigned coincidence between the two epistles and Acts, 17. 5-9, that the very charge which the assaillants of Jason's house brought against him and other brethren was, "These do contrary to the decrees of Cæsar, saying that there is another King, one Jesus." As in the case of the Lord Jesus Himself (John, 18. 33-37; 19. 12; cf. Matthew, 26. 64), they perverted the doctrine of the coming kingdom of Christ into a ground for the charge of treason against Cæsar. The result was, Paul and Silas were obliged to flee under the cover of night to Berea; Timothy had probably preceded him (Acts, 17. 10, 14). But the church had been planted, and ministers appointed; nay, more, they virtually became missionaries themselves, for which they possessed facilities in the extensive commerce of their city, and both by word and example were extending the gospel in Macedonia, Achaia, and elsewhere (ch. 1. 7, 8). From Berea also, Paul, after having planted a Scripture-loving church, was obliged to flee by the Thessalonian Jews who followed him thither. Timothy (who seems to have come to Berea separately from Paul and Silas, cf. Acts, 17. 10, with 14) and Silas remained there still, when Paul proceeded by sea to Athens. Whilst there he more than once longed to visit the Thessalonians again, and see personally their spiritual state, and "perfect that which was lacking in their faith" (ch. 3. 10); but "Satan (probably using the Thessalonian Jews as his instruments, John, 13. 27) hindered" him (ch. 2. 18; cf. Acts, 17. 13). He therefore sent Timothy, who seems to have followed him to Athens from Berea (A. 17. 15), immediately on his arrival to Thessalonica (ch. 3. 1); glad as he would have been of Timothy's help in the midst of the cavils of Athenian opponents, he felt he must forego that help for the sake of the Thessalonian church. Silas does not seem to have come to Paul at Athens at all, though Paul had desired him and Timothy to "come to him with all speed" (Acts, 17. 15); but seems with Timothy (who from Thessalonica called for him at Berea) to have joined Paul at Corinth first; cf. Acts, 18. 1, 5. "When Silas and Timothy were come from Macedonia." The epistle makes no mention of Silas of Athens, as it does of Timothy (ch. 3. 1).

Paul's account of the Thessalonian church was highly favourable. They abounded in faith and charity, and reciprocal to see them (ch. 2, 6-10). Still, as nothing human on earth is perfect, there were some defects. Some had only dwelt on the doctrine of Christ's coming Kingdom, so as to neglect the sober-minded discharge of present duty (ch. 2, 12). Some who had lost relatives by death, needed comfort and instruction in their doubts as to whether they had before Christ's coming would have a share with those found alive in His Kingdom then to be revealed. Moreover had been committed among them sins against chastity and sobriety (ch. 5, 5-7), as also against charity (ch. 2, 15). There were, too, symptoms in some of want of respectful love and subordination to their ministers; others strikingly the manifestations of the Spirit in those possessing His gifts (ch. 5, 19). To give spiritual admonition on the one, and at the same time commend what deserved commendation, and to testify his love to them, was the object of the letter.

PLACE OF WRITING IT was doubtless Corinth, where Timothy with Silas rejoined him (Acts, 18, 5) soon after (cf. ch. 2, 17) in the autumn of 52 A.D.

TIME OF WRITING was evidently immediately after having received from Timothy the tidings of their state the winter of 52 A.D., or early in 53. For it was written not long after the conversion of the Thessalonians (ch. 1, 1). St. Paul could speak of himself as only taken from them for a short season (ch. 2, 17). Thus this epistle was one of all St. Paul's extant epistles. The epistle is written in the joint names of Paul, Silas, and Timothy, the leaders of the Thessalonian church. The plural first person "we," is used every where, except in ch. 2, 18; 3, 9; 5, 1; the true reading, ch. 4, 13. The English Version, "I," in ch. 4, 9; 5, 1, 23, is not supported by the original.

STYLE is calm and equable, in accordance with the subject matter, which deals only with Christian duties in which he granted the great doctrinal truths which were not as yet disputed. There was no deadly error as yet in his more vehement bursts of feeling and impassioned argument. The earlier epistles, as we should expect, are not practical. It was not until Judaistic and legalizing errors arose at a later period, that he wrote those epistles (to the Romans and Galatians) which unfold the cardinal doctrines of grace and justification by faith. Still later, the epistles from Roman prison confirm the same truths. And last of all, the Pastoral Epistles are suited to the more developed constitution of the church, and give directions as to bishops and deacons, and correct abuses and errors of later valence of the Gentile element in this church is shown by the fact that these two epistles are among the very few writings, in which no quotation occurs from the Old Testament.

CHAPTER I.

1. ADDRESS: SALUTATION: HIS PRAYERFUL LONGING FOR THEIR FAITH, HOPE, AND LOVE. FIRST RECEPTION OF THE GOSPEL, AND THEIR PERSISTENCE ON ALL AROUND. 1. Paul — He called "an apostle," &c., because in his case, of the Philippians (Note, Philippians, 1, 1). A stolic authority needed not any substantiation familiarly as to faithful friends, nor its apostleship was recognised among them on the other hand, in writing to the Galatians, on some had called in question his apostleship, he asserts it in the superscription. And propriety in the epistles, evincing genuineness — a "chief man among the brethren" (2), and a "prophet" (v. 32), and one of the who carried the decree of the Jerusalem Council. His age and position cause him to be before "Timothy," then a youth (Acts, noth, 4, 12). Silvanus (the Gentile expanded Silas) is called in 1 Peter, 5, 12, "a faithful 2, 3 Corinthians, 1, 19). They both aided in the Thessalonian church, and are therefore in the address. This, the first of St. Paul's being written before various evils crept hatches, is without the censures found in the others. So realizing was their Christian faith, were able hourly to look for the Lord Jesus, church — Not merely as in the epistles to the Romans, Colossians, Philippians, "to the faithful at Thessalonica." Though as to not seem to have had the final church under permanent "bishops" and deacons, ears in the later epistles (Note, Philippians, 2 Timothy). Yet he designates them by the term "church," implying their status as isolated believers, but a corporate body (1st rulers (ch. 5, 12; 2 Corinthians, 1, 1; 1, 2), in — Implying vital union. God the his marks that they were no longer heathens, Jesus — This marks that they were not Jews, tians. Grace be unto you, and peace — that ye in God that favour and peace which men [ANSELMI.] This is the salutation in all the epistles of Paul, except the three pastoral ones, which have "grace, mercy, and peace." Some of the oldest MSS. support, others omit the clause following, "from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." It may have crept in from 1 Corinthians, 1, 3; 2 Corinthians, 1, 2. (Romans, 1, 9; 2 Timothy, 1, 3.) The structure of the sentences in this and the following verses, each successive sentence repeating with greater fulness the preceding, characteristically marks Paul's abounding love and thankfulness in respect to his converts, as if he were seeking by words heaped on words to convey some idea of his exuberant feelings towards them. We — I, Silvanus, and Timotheus. Romans, 1, 9, supports ALFORD in translating, "Making mention of you in our prayers without ceasing" (v. 3). Thus, "without ceasing," in the second clause, answers in parallelism to "always," in the first. 3. work of faith — the working reality of your faith: its alacrity in receiving the truth, and in evincing itself by its fruits. Not an otiose assent; but a realizing, working faith: not "in word only," but in one continuous chain of "work" (singular, not plural, works), v. 5-10; James, 2, 22. So "the work of faith" in 2 Thessalonians, 1, 11, implies its perfected development (cf. James, 1, 4). The other governing substantives similarly mark respectively the characteristic manifestation of the grace which follows each in the genitive. Faith, love, and hope are the three great Christian graces (ch. 5, 8; 1 Corinthians, 13, 13). labour of love — The Greek implies toil, or troublesome labour, which we are stimulated by love to bear (ch. 2, 9; Revelation, 2, 2). For instances of self-denying labours of love, see Acts, 20, 35; Romans, 16, 12. Not here ministerial labours. Those who suffer trouble for others, love little (cf. Hebrews, 6, 10). patience — translate, "endurances of hope; the persevering endurance of trials which flows from "hope." Romans, 15, 4, shows that "patience" also nourishes "hope," hope in our Lord Jesus — lit., "hope of our Lord Jesus," viz., of His coming (v. 10); a hope that looked forward beyond all present things for the manifestation of Christ, in the sight of God — Your faith, hope, and love were not merely such as would pass for genuine before men, but "in the sight of God," the Searcher of hearts. [GOMARUS.] Things see really what they are before God. BENJEL takes this clause with "remembering." Whenever we pray we remember before God your faith, hope, and love. But its separation from "remembering" in the order, and its connection with "your...faith," &c., make me to prefer the former view. and—The Greek implies, "in the sight of Him who is (at once) God and our Father." 4. Knowing—Forasmuch as we know, your election of God—The Greek is, rather, "beloved by God" so Romans, 1, 7; 2 Thessalonians, 2, 13. "Your election" means that God has elected you as individual believers to eternal life (Romans, 11, 5, 7; Colossians, 3, 12; 2 Thessalonians, 2, 13). 5. our gospel—viz, the gospel which we preached. came—Greek, "was made," viz, by God, its Author and Sender. God's having made our preaching among you to be attended with such "power," is the proof that you are "elect of God" (v. 4). In power—in the efficacy of the Holy Spirit clothing us with power (see end of verse; Acts, 1, 8; 4, 33; 6, 5, 8) in preaching the gospel, and making it in you the power of God unto salvation (Romans, 1, 16). As "power" produces faith; so "the Holy Ghost," love; and "much assurance" (Colossians, 2, 2, full persuasion), hope (Hebrews, 6, 11), resting on faith (Hebrews, 10, 22). So faith, love, and hope (v. 3). as ye know—Answering to the "knowing," i.e., as we know (v. 4) your character as the elect of God, so ye know ours as preachers. for your sakes—The purpose herein indicated is not so much that of the apostles, as that of God. "You know what God enabled us to be...how mighty in preaching the word...for your sakes...thereby proving that He had chosen (v. 4) you for His own." [ALFORD.] I think, from ch. 2, 10-12, that, in "what manner of men we were among you," besides the power in preaching, there is included also Paul's and his fellow-missionaries' whole conduct which confirmed their preaching; and in this sense, the "for your sake" will mean "in order to win you." This, though not the sole, yet would be a strong, motive to holy circumspection, viz., so as to win those without (Colossians, 4, 5; cf. 1 Corinthians, 9, 19-23). 6. And ye—Answering to "For our gospel," v. 6. followers—Greek, "imitators." The Thessalonians in their turn became "ensamples" (v. 7) for others to imitate, of the Lord—who was the apostle of the Father, and taught the word, which He brought from heaven, under adversities. [BENJEL.] This was the point in which they imitated Him and His apostles, joyful witness for the word in much affliction: the second proof of their election of God (v. 4); v. 5 is the first (see Note, v. 6). received the word in much affliction—(ch. 2, 14; 3, 2-6; Acts, 17, 5-10.) Joy of—i.e., wrought by "the Holy Ghost." "The oil of gladness" wherewith the Son of God was "anointed above His fellows" (Psalm 45, 7), is the same oil with which He, by the Spirit, anoints His fellows too (Isaiah, 61, 1, 3; Romans, 14, 17; 1 John, 2, 20, 27). 7. ensamples—So some of the oldest MSS. read. Others, "ensample" (singular), the whole church being regarded as one. The Macedonian church of Philippi was the only one in Europe converted before the Thessalonians. Therefore he means their past conduct is an example to all believers now; of whom he specifies those "in Macedonia," because he had been there since the conversion of the Thessalonians, and had left Silvanus and Timothy there; and those in "Achaia," because he was now at Corinth in Achaia. 8. for you sounded...the word of the Lord—Not that they actually became missionaries; but they, by the report which spread abroad of their "faith" (cf. Romans, 1, 8), and by Christian merchants of Thessalonia who travelled in various directions, bearing "the word of the Lord" with them, were virtually missionaries, recommending the gospel to all within the reach of their influence by word and by example (v. 7). In "sounded," the image is that of a trumpet filling with its clear-sounding echo all the surrounding places, to God-ward

—no longer directed to idols, so that we need not to speak any thing—to them in praise of your faith; "for (v. 9) they themselves" (the people in Macedonia, Achaia, and in every place) know it already. 9. Strictly there should follow, "For they themselves show of you," &c.; but, instead, he substitutes that which was the instrumental cause of the Thessalonians' conversion and faith, "For they themselves show of us what manner of entering in we had unto you;" cf. v. 5, which corresponds to this former clause, as v. 6 corresponds to the latter clause. "And how ye turned from idols to serve the living...God," &c. Instead of our having "to speak any thing" to them (in Macedonia and Achaia) in your praise (v. 8), "they themselves" (have the start of us in speaking of you, and) announce concerning us the Greek of "show of" means us, what manner of how effectual an entrance we had unto you" (v. 5; ch. 2, 11) the living and true God—as opposed to the dead and false gods from which they had "turned." In the English Version reading, Acts, 17, 4, "Of the devout Greeks a great multitude," no mention is made, as here, of the conversion of idolatrous Gentiles at Thessalonica; but the reading of some of the oldest MSS. and Vulgate, singularly coincides with the statement here: "Of the devout and of Greeks (viz., idolaters) a great multitude;" so in v. 17, "the devout persons," i.e., Gentile proselytes to Judaism, form a separate class. PALEY and LACHMANN, by distinct lines of argument, support the "AND." 10. This verse distinguishes them from the Jews, as v. 9, from the idolatrous Gentiles. To wait for the Lord's coming is a sure characteristic of a true believer, and was prominent amidst the graces of the Thessalonians (1 Corinthians, 1, 7, 8). His coming is seldom called His return (John, 14, 3); because the two advents are regarded as different phases of the same coming; and the second coming shall have features altogether new connected with it, so that it will not be a mere repetition of the first, or a mere coming back again. His Son...raised from the dead—the grand proof of His Divine Sonship (Romans, 1, 4). delivered—rather as Greek, "Who delivereth us." Christ hath once for all redeemed us; He is our Deliverer ALWAYS, wrath to come—(ch. 3, 8; Colossians, 2, 6.)

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-20. HIS MANNER OF PREACHING, AND THEIRS OF RECEIVING, THE GOSPEL: HIS DESIRE TO HAVE REVISITED THEM FRUSTRATED BY SATAN. 1. For—confirming ch. 1, 9. He discusses the manner of his fellow-missionaries' preaching among them (ch. 1, 5) and former part of v. 9) from v. 1 to 12; and the Thessalonians' reception of the word (cf. ch. 1, 5, 7, and latter part of v. 9) from v. 13 to 16. yourselves—Not only do strangers report it, but you know it to be true [ALFORD.] "yourselves," not in vain—Greek, "not vain;" i.e., it was full of "power" (ch. 1, 5). The Greek for "was," expresses rather "hath been and is," implying the permanent and continuing character of his preaching. 2. even after that we had suffered before—at Philippi (Acts, 16, 1): a circumstance which would have deterred more natural, unspiritual men from further preaching. shamefully entreated—ignominiously scourged (Acts, 16, 22, 23). bold—(Acts, 4, 29; Ephesians, 6, 20.) in our God—The ground of our boldness in speaking was the realizing of God as "our God." with much contention—i.e., lit., as of competitors in a contest: striving earnestness (Colossians, 1, 29; 2, 1). But here outward conflict with persecutors, rather than inward and mental, was what the missionaries had to endure (Acts, 17, 5, 6; Philippians, 1, 30). 3. For—The ground of his "boldness" (v. 2), his freedom from all "deceit, uncleanness, and guile;" quite, before God deceit (Greek, "imposture"), and towards men (cf. 3 Corinthians, 1, 12; 2, 17; Ephesians, 4, 14); uncleanliness, in relation to one's self (impure motives of carnal self-gratification in gain, v. 5, or lust; such as actuated false teachers of the Gentiles (Philippians, 1. 18; 2 Peter, 2. 10, 14; Jude, 2.; Revelation, 2. 14, 15). So Simon Magus and Cerinthus taught. [EUSTATIUS] exhortation—The Greek means "consolation" as well as "exhortation." The same gospel which exhorts comforts. Its first lesson to each is that of peace in believing amidst outward and inward sorrows. It comforts them that mourn (cf. v. 11 Isaiah, 61. 2, 3; 2 Corinthians, 1. 3, 4). of—springing from—having its source in—deceit, &c. 4. as—according as: even as. allowed—Greek, "We have been approved on trial." "deemed fit." This word corresponds to "God which trieth our hearts" below. This approval as to sincerity depends solely on the grace and mercy of God (Acts, 9. 15; 1 Corinthians, 7. 25; 2 Corinthians, 3. 6; 1 Timothy, 1. 11, 12). not as pleasing—not as persons who seek to please men: characteristic of false teachers (Galatians, 1. 10). 5. used we flattering words—id., "become (i.e., have we been found) in the use of language of flattery: the resource of those who try to 'please men.' as ye know—"Ye know" as to whether I flattered you: as to "covetousness." God, the Judge of the heart, alone can be "my witness." cloak of—i.e., any specious guise under which I might cloak "covetousness." 6. Lit., "Nor of men (have we been found, v. 5) seeking glory." The "of" here represents a different Greek word from "of" in the clause "of you...of others." ALFORD makes the former (Greek ex) express the abstract ground of the glory; the latter (apo) the concrete object from which it was to come. The former means originating from: the latter means "on the part of." Many teach heretical novelties, though not for gain, yet for "glory." Paul and his associates were free even from this motive (GROTIUS) John, 5. 44). we might have been burdensome—i.e., by claiming maintenance. v. 9; 2 Corinthians, 11. 9; 12. 16; 2 Thessalonians, 3. 8. As, however, "glory" precedes, as well as "covetousness," the reference cannot be restricted to the latter, though I think it is not excluded. Translate, "When we might have borne heavily upon you," by pressing you with the weight of self-glorifying authority, and with the burden of our sustenance. Thus the antithesis is appropriate in the words following. "But we were gentle (the opposite of pressing weightily) among you" v. 7. On weight being connected with authority, cf. Note, 2 Corinthians, 10. 10. "His letters are weighty" (1 Corinthians, 4. 21). ALFORD'S translation, which excludes reference to his right of claiming maintenance, "when we might have stood on our dignity," seems to me disapproved by v. 9, which uses the same Greek word unequivocally for "chargeable." Twice he received supplies from Philippi whilst at Thessalonica (Philippians, 4. 16), as the apostles—i.e., as being apostles. 7. we were—Greek, "we were made" by God's grace. gentle—Greek, "mild in bearing with the faults of others" [TITMANN]: one, too, who is gentle (though firm) in rejecting the erroneous opinions of others (2 Timothy, 2. 24). Some of the oldest MSS. read, "we became little children" cf. Matthew, 18. 3, 4). Others support the English Version reading, which forms a better antithesis to v. 6, 7, and harmonizes better with what follows; for he would hardly, in the same sentence, compare himself both to the "infants" or "little children," and to "a nurse," or rather, "suckling mother." Gentleness is the fitting characteristic of a nurse. among you—Greek, "in the midst of you," i.e., in our intercourse with you being as one of yourselves, nurse—a suckling mother. her—Greek, "her own children" (cf. v. 11). So Galatians, 4. 19. 8. So—to be joined to "we were willing," &c. As a nurse cherishes, &c., so we were willing, &c. [ALFORD.] But BENGLI, "So," i.e., seeing that we have such affection for you, being affectionately desirous—The oldest reading in the Greek implies, id., to connect one's self with another: to be closely attached to another. willing—The Greek is stronger. "We were well content: " "we would gladly have imparted," &c., "even our own lives" (so the Greek for "souls" ought to be translated); as we showed in the sufferings we endured in giving you the gospel (Acts, 17.). As a nursing mother is ready to impart not only her milk to them, but her life for them, so we not only imparted gladly the spiritual milk of the word to you, but risked our own lives for your spiritual nourishment, imitating Him who laid down His life for His friends, the greatest proof of love (John, 15. 13). ye were—Greek, "ye were become," as having become our spiritual children. dear—Greek, "dearly beloved." 9. labour and travail—The Greek for "labour" means hardship in bearing; that for "travail," hardship in doing: the former, toil with the utmost solicitude; the latter, the being wearied with fatigue. [GROTIUS.] ZAKOHIUS refers the former to spiritual (see ch. 3. 6), the latter to manual, labour. I would translate, "weariness (so the Greek is translated, 3 Corinthians, 11. 27) and travail" (hard labour, toil). Id.—Omitted in the oldest MSS. night and day—The Jews reckoned the day from sunset to sunset, so that night is put before day (cf. Acts, 20. 31). Their labours with their hands for a scanty livelihood had to be engaged in not only by day, but by night also, in the intervals between spiritual labours. labouring—Greek, "working," via, at tent-making (Acts, 18. 3). because we would not be chargeable—Greek, "with a view to not burdening any of you" (2 Corinthians, 11. 9, 10). preached unto you—Greek, "unto and among you." Though but "three sabbaths" are mentioned Acts, 17. 2, these refer merely to the time of his preaching to the Jews in the synagogue. When rejected by them as a body, after having converted a few Jews, he turned to the Gentiles; of these (whom he preached to in a place distinct from the synagogue: "a great multitude believed" Acts, 17. 4, where the oldest MSS. read, "of the devout (proselytes) AND Greeks a great multitude"); then after he had, by labours continued among the Gentiles for some time, gathered in many converts, the Jews, provoked by his success, assailed Jason's house, and drove him away. His receiving "once and again" supplies from Philippi, implies a longer stay at Thessalonica than three weeks (Philippians, 4. 16). 10. Ye are witnesses—as to our outward conduct. God—as to our inner motives. heily—towards God, justly—towards men. unblameable—id. in relation to ourselves, behaved ourselves—Greek, "were made to be," via, by God. among you that believe—rather, "before (i.e., in the eyes of) you that believe:" whatever we may have secured in the eyes of the unbelieving. As v. 9 refers to their outward occupation in the world: so v. 10, to their character among believers. 11. every one of you—in private (Acts, 20. 20), as well as publicly. The minister, if he would be useful, must not deal merely in generalities, but must individualize and particularize, as a father—with mild gravity. The Greek is, "His own children." exhorted and comforted—Exhortation leads one to do a thing willingly: consolation, to do it joyfully [BENGLI] (ch. 5. 14). Even in the former term, "exhortation," the Greek includes the additional idea of comforting and advocating one's cause: "encouragingly exhorted." Appropriate in this case, as the Thessalonians were in sorrow, both through persecutions, and also through deaths of friends (ch. 4. 13). cha god—conjured solemnly, "i.e., testily: "appealing solemnly to you before God. 12. worthy of God—"worthy of the Lord" (Colossians, 1. 10); "worthy of the saints" (Romans, 16. 2, Greek); "...of the gospel" (Philippians, 1. 27); "...of the occasion wherewith ye are called" (Ephesians, 4. 1). Inconsistency would cause God's name to be "blasphemed among the Gentiles" (Romans, 2. 24). The Greek article is emphatical, "Worthy of THE God who is calling you," hath called—So one of the oldest MSS. and Vulgata. Other oldest MSS., "Who callet us," his kingdom—to be set up at the Lord's coming. glory—that ye may share His glory (John, 17, 22; Colossians, 3, 4). 13. For this cause—Seeing ye have had such teachers (v. 10, 11, 12) [BENGL], "we also (as well as 'all that believe' in Macedonia and Achaia) thank God without ceasing 'always'... in our prayers," ch. 1, 2, that when ye received the word of God which ye heard from us (lit., 'God's word of hearing from us,' Romans, 10, 16, 17), ye accepted it not as the word of men, but, even as it is truly, the word of God." ALFORD omits the "as" of English Version. But the "as" is required by the clause, "even as it is truly." "Ye accepted it, not (as) the word of men [which it might have been supposed to be], but (as) the word of God, even as it really is." The Greek for the first "received," implies simply the hearing of it; the Greek of the second is "accepted," or "welcomed" it. The proper object of faith, it hence appears, is the word of God, at first oral, then for security against error, written (John, 20, 30, 31; Romans, 15, 4; Galatians, 4, 30). Also, that faith is the work of divine grace, is implied by St. Paul's thanksgiving, effectually wrought also in you that believe—"Also," besides your accepting it with your hearts, it evidences itself in your lives. It shows its energy in its practical effects on you; for instance, working in you patient endurance in trial (s. 14; cf. Galatians, 3, 5; 5, 6, 14. followers—Greek, "imitators." Divine working is most of all seen and felt in affliction. In Judea—The churches of Judea were naturally the patterns to other churches, as having been the first founded, and that on the very scene of Christ's own ministry. Reference to them is specially appropriate here, as the Thessalonians, with Paul and Silas, had experienced from Jews in their city persecutions (Acts, 17, 5-9) similar to those which "the churches in Judea" experienced from Jews in that country. In Christ Jesus—not merely "in God," for the synagogues of the Jews (one of which the Thessalonians were familiar with, Acts, 17, 1) were also in God. But the Christian churches alone were not only in God, as the Jews in contrast to the Thessalonian idolaters were, but also in Christ, which the Jews were not of your own countrymen—including primarily the Jews settled at Thessalonica, from whom the persecution originated, and also the Gentiles there, instigated by the Jews; thus, "fellow-countrymen" (the Greek term, according to Herodian, implies, not the enduring relation of fellow-citizenship, but sameness of country for the time being), including naturalized Jews and native Thessalonians, stand in contrast to the pure "Jews" in Judea (Matthew, 10, 36). It is an undesigned coincidence, that Paul at this time was suffering persecutions of the Jews at Corinth, whence he writes (Acts, 18, 5, 6, 12): naturally his letter would the more vividly dwell on Jewish bitterness against Christians. even as they—(Hebrews, 10, 33-34.) There was a likeness in respect to the nation from which both suffered, viz., Jews, and those their own countrymen; in the cause for which, and in the evils which, they suffered, and also in the steadfast manner in which they suffered them. Such sameness of fruits, afflictions, and experimental characteristics of believers, in all places and at all times, are a subsidiary evidence of the truth of the gospel. 15. The Lord Jesus—rather as Greek, "Jesus THE LORD." This enhances the glaring enormity of their sin, that in killing Jesus they killed the LORD (cf. Acts, 3, 14, 15), their own—Omitted in the oldest MSS. prophets—(Matthew, 21, 33-41; 23, 31-37; Luke, 13, 33.) persecuted us—rather as Greek (see Margin), "By persecution drove us out" (Luke, 11, 49). please not God—i.e., they do not make it their aim to please God. He implies that with all their boast of being God's peculiar people, they all the while are "no pleasers of God," as certainly as, by the universal voice of the world, which even themselves can not contradict, they are declared to be perversely "contrary to all men." JOSEPHUS, Apion, 2, 14, represents one calling them "Atheists and Misanthropes, the dullest of barbarians; and TACITUS, Histories, 5, 5, "They have a hostile hatred of all other men." However, the contrariety to all men here meant is, in that they "forbid us to speak to the Gentiles that they may be saved" (v. 10). 16. Forbidding—Greek, "Hindering us from speaking," etc. to fill up their sins away—Tending thus "to the filling up (the full measure of, Genesis, 15, 16; Daniel, 8, 23; Matthew, 23, 33) their sins at all times," i.e., now as at all former times. Their hindrance of the gospel-preaching to the Gentiles was the last measure added to their continually accumulating iniquity, which made them fully ripe for vengeance. for—Greek, "but." "But," they shall proceed no further for (2 Timothy, 3, 8) "the" Divine "wrath has (so the Greek) come upon (overtaken unexpectedly; the past tense expressing the speedy certainty of the Divinely destined stroke) them to the uttermost," not merely partial wrath, but wrath to its full extent, "even to the finishing stroke." [EMERSON.] The past tense implies that the fullest violation of wrath was already begun. Already, in A.D. 5, a tumult had occurred at the Passover in Jerusalem, when about 30,000 (according to some) were slain; a foretaste of the whole vengeance which speedily followed (Luke, 19, 43, 44; 21, 24). 17. But we—Remembered from s. 13: in contrast to the Jews, s. 15, 16, taken—rather as Greek, "severed (violently, Acts, 17, 7-10) from you," as parents bereft of their children. So "I will not leave you comfortless," Greek, "organized" (John, 14, 18). for a short time—lit., "for the space of an hour." "When we had been severed from you but a very short time (perhaps alluding to the suddenness of his unexpected departure), we the more abundantly (the shorter was our separation; for the desire of meeting again is the more vivid, the more recent has been the parting) endeavoured," etc. (cf. 2 Timothy, 1, 4). He does not hereby, as many explain, anticipate a short separation from them, which would be a false anticipation; for he did not soon revisit them. The Greek past participle also forbids that view. 18. Wherefore—The oldest MSS. read, "Because," or "inasmuch as," we would—Greek, "we wished to come;" we intended to come. even I Paul—My fellow-missionaries as well as myself wished to come; I can answer for myself that I intended it more than once. His slightly distinguishing himself here from his fellow-missionaries, whom throughout this epistle he associates with himself in the plural, accords with the fact, that Silvanus and Timothy stayed at Berea, when Paul went on to Athens; where subsequently Timothy joined him, and was thence sent by Paul alone to Thessalonica (ch. 3, 1). Satan hindered us—On a different occasion "the Holy Ghost, the Spirit of Jesus" (so the oldest MSS. read, Acts, 16, 6, 7, forbade or hindered them in a missionary design; here it is Satan, acting perhaps by wicked men, some of whom had already driven him out of Thessalonica (Acts, 17, 13, 14; cf. John, 13, 27), or else by some more direct "messenger of Satan—a thorn in the flesh" (2 Corinthians, 12, 7; cf. 11, 14). In any event, the Holy Ghost and the Providence of God overruled Satan's opposition to further His own purpose. We cannot, in each case, define whence hindrances in good undertakings arise; Paul in this case, by inspiration, was enabled to say, the hindrance was from Satan. GENTILE thinks Satan's mode of hindering Paul's journey to Thessalonica was by instigating the Stoic and Epicurean philosophers to cavil, which entailed on Paul the necessity of replying, and so detained him; but he seems to have left Athens leisurely (Acts, 17, 33, 34; 18. 1). The Greek for "hindered" is lit., "to cut a trench between one's self and an advancing foe, to prevent his progress," so Satan opposing the progress of the missionaries. 19. For—Giving the reason for his earnest desire to see them. Are not even ye in the presence of...Christ—"Christ" is omitted in the oldest MSS. Are not even ye (viz. among others; the "oven" or "also," implies that not they alone will be his crown) our hope, joy, and crown of rejoicing before Jesus, when He shall come (1 Corinthians, 1. 14; Philippians, 2. 18; 4. 1)? The "hope" here meant is his hope (in a lower sense), that these his converts might be found in Christ at His advent (ch. 3. 13). Paul's chief "hope" was Jesus's CHRIST (1 Timothy, 1. 1). 20. Emphatical repetition with increased force. Who but ye and our other converts are our hope, &c., hereafter, at Christ's coming! For it is ye who are now our glory and joy.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-13. PROOF OF HIS DESIRE AFTER THEM IN HIS HAVING SENT TIMOTHY: HIS JOY AT THE TIDINGS BROUGHT BACK CONCERNING THEIR FAITH AND CHARITY: PRAYERS FOR THEM. 1. Wherefore—because of our earnest love to you (ch. 2. 17-20). forbear—endure the suspense. The Greek is lit. applied to a watertight vessel. When we could no longer contain ourselves in our yearning desire for you. left at Athens alone—See my Introduction. This implies that he sent Timothy from Athens, whither the latter had followed him. However, the "we" favours ALFORD'S view that the determination to send Timothy was formed during the hasty consultation of Paul, Silas, and Timothy, previous to his departure from Berea, and that then he with them "resolved" to be "left alone" at Athens, when he should arrive there: Timothy and Silas not accompanying him, but remaining at Berea. Thus the "I," v. 5, will express that the act of sending Timothy, when he arrived at Athens, was Paul's, whilst the determination that Paul should be left alone at Athens, was that of the brethren as well as himself, at Berea, whence he uses, v. 1, "we." The non-mention of Silas at Athens implies, that he did not follow Paul to Athens as was at first intended; but Timothy did. Thus the history, Acts, 17. 11, 15, accords with the epistle. The word "left behind" (Greek) implies, that Timothy had been with him at Athens: It was an act of self-denial for their sakes that Paul deprived himself of the presence of Timothy at Athens, which would have been so cheering to him in the midst of philosophic cavillers; but from love to the Thessalonians, he is well content to be left all "alone" in the great city. 2. minister of God, and our fellow-labourer—Some oldest MSS. read, "fellow-workman with God;" others, "minister of God." The former is probably genuine, as copyists probably altered it to the latter to avoid the bold phrase, which, however, is sanctioned by 1 Corinthians, 3. 9; 2 Corinthians, 6. 1. English Version reading is not well supported, and is plainly compounded out of the two other readings. Paul calls Timothy "our brother" here; but in 1 Corinthians, 4. 17, "my son." He speaks thus highly of one so lately ordained, both to impress the Thessalonians with a high respect for the delegate sent to them, and to encourage Timothy, who seems to have been of a timid character (1 Timothy, 4. 12; 5. 23). "Gospel ministers do the work of God with Him, for Him, and under Him." [EDMUNDS.] establish—Greek, "confirm." In 2 Thessalonians, 3. 3, God is said to "establish." He is the true stabilisher; ministers are His "instruments," concerning—Greek, "in behalf of," i.e., for the furtherance of your faith. The Greek for "comfort" includes also the idea "exhort." The Thessalonians in their trials needed both (v. 3; cf. Acts, 14. 22). 3. moved—"shaken," "disturbed." The Greek is lit. said of dogs wagging the tail in fawning on one. Therefore LITTMANN explains it, "That no man should, amidst his calamities, be altered by the flattering hope of a more pleasant life to abandon his duty." So ELIENUS and BRONKI, "cajoled out of his faith." In afflictions, relatives and opponents combine with the ease-loving heart itself in flatteries, which it needs strong faith to overcome. yourselves know—we always candidly told you so (v. 4; Acts, 14. 22). None but a religion from God would have held out such a trying prospect to those who should embrace it, and yet succeed in winning converts. We—Christians, appointed thereto—by God's counsel (ch. 5. 9). 4. that we should suffer—Greek, "that we are about (we are sure) to suffer" according to the appointment of God (v. 3). even as—even (exactly) as it both came to pass, and ye know: ye know both that it came to pass, and that we foretold it (cf. John, 13. 19). The correspondence of the event to the prediction powerfully confirms faith. "Forewarned, forearmed." [EDMUNDS.] The repetition of "ye know," so frequently, is designed as an argument, that being forewarned of coming affliction, they should be less readily "moved" by it. 5. For this cause—Because I know of your "tribulation" having actually begun (v. 4). when I—Greek, "when I also" (as well as Timothy, who, Paul delicately implies, was equally anxious respecting them, cf. "we," v. 1), could no longer contain myself" (endure the suspense). I sent—Paul was the actual sender; hence the "I" here: Paul, Silas, and Timothy himself had agreed on the mission already, before Paul went to Athens: hence the "we," v. 1 (Note). To know—to learn the state of your faith, whether it stood the trial (Colossians, 4. 8). lest...have tempted...and...be.—The indicative is used in the former sentence, the subjunctive in the latter. Translate therefore, "To know...whether haply the tempter has tempted you, the indicative implying that he supposed such was the case, and lest (in that case, our labour may prove to be in vain" (cf. Galatians, 4. 11). Our labour in preaching would in that case be vain, so far as ye are concerned, but not as concerns us so far as we have sincerely laboured (Isaiah, 49. 4; 1 Corinthians, 3. 8). 6. Join "now" with "come." "But Timotheus having just now come from you unto us," [ALFORD.] Thus it appears (cf. Acts, 18. 5) Paul is writing from Corinth. your faith and charity—(ch. 1. 3; cf. 2 Thessalonians, 1. 3, whence it seems their faith subsequently increased still more.) Faith was the solid foundation; charity the cement which held together the superstructure of their practice on that foundation. In that charity was included their "good kindly remembrance" of their teachers, desiring greatly—Greek, "having a yearning desire for." we also—The desires of loving friends for one another's presence are reciprocal. 7. over you—in respect to you. in—in the midst of; notwithstanding "all our distress (Greek, "necessity" and affliction," viz., external trials at Corinth, whence Paul writes (cf. v. 6, with Acts, 18. 5-10). 8. now—as the case is; seeing ye stand fast, we live—we flourish. It rejoices us in our affliction to hear of your steadfastness (Psalm 22. 26; 3 John, 3. 4). if—implying that the vivid joy which the missionaries "now" feel, will continue if the Thessalonians continue steadfast. They still needed exhortation, v. 10; therefore he subjoins the conditional clause, "if ye," &c. (Philippians, 4. 1). 9. what—what sufficient thanks? reader...again—in return for His goodness. Psalm 116. 12; for you—"concerning you," for all the joy—on account of all the joy. It was "comfort," v. 7, now it is more, viz., joy, for your sakes—on your account, before our God—it is a joy which will bear God's searching eye: a joy as in the presence of God, not self-seeking, but disinterested, sincere, and spiritual (cf. ch. 2. 20; John, 15. 11). 10. Night and day—NOTE, ch. 2. 9.) Night is the season for the saints' holiest meditations and prayers (2 Timothy, 1. 3). praying—connected with, "we joy." We joy whilst we pray, or else as ALFORD, What thanks can we render to God whilst we pray? The Greek implies a beseeching request, exceeding—lit., "more than exceeding abundantly" (cf. Ephesians, 3. 20.) that which is lacking—Even the Thessalonians had points in which they needed improvement. [BENGL.] [Luke, 17. 5.] Their doctrinal views as to the nearness of Christ's coming, and as to the state of those who had fallen asleep, and their practice in some points needed correction (ch. 4. 1-9). Paul's method was to begin by commending what was praiseworthy, and then to correct what was amiss; a good pattern to all admonishers of others. 11. Translate, "May God Himself, even our Father (being here being but one article in the Greek, requires this translation, 'He who is at once God and our Father') direct," &c. The "Himself" stands in contrast with "we" (ch. 2. 18); we desired to come, but could not through Satan's hindrance; but if God Himself direct our way as we pray, none can hinder Him (2 Thessalonians, 2. 16, 17). It is a remarkable proof of the unity of the Father and Son, that in the Greek here, and in 2 Thessalonians, 2. 16, 17, the verb is singular, implying that the subject, the Father and Son, are but one in essential Being, not in mere unity of will. Almost all the chapters in both epistles to the Thessalonians are sealed, each with its own prayer (ch. 5. 23; 2 Thessalonians, 1. 11; 2. 16; 3. 6, 16). [BENGL.] St. Paul does not think the prosperous issue of a journey an unfit subject for prayer (Romans, 1. 10; 15. 32). [EDMUNDS.] His prayer, though the answer was deferred, in about five years afterwards was fulfilled in his return to Macedonia. 12. The "you" in the Greek is emphatically put first: "But" (so the Greek for "and") what concerns "you," whether we come or not, "may the Lord make you to increase and abound in love," &c. The Greek for "increase" has a more positive force: that for "abound" a more comparative force, "Make you full (supplying "that which is lacking," v. 10) and even abound." "The Lord" may here be the Holy Spirit: so the Three persons of the Trinity will be appealed to (cf. v. 13), as in 2 Thessalonians, 3. 6. So the Holy Ghost is called "the Lord" (2 Corinthians, 3. 17). "Love" is the fruit of the Spirit (Galatians, 5. 22), and His office is "to establish in holiness" (v. 13; 1 Peter, 1. 2. 13. your hearts—which are naturally the spring and seat of inholiness, before God, even our Father—rather, "before Him who is at once God and our Father." Before not merely men, but Him who will not be deceived by the mere show of holiness, &c., may your holiness be such as will stand His searching scrutiny, coming—Greek, "presence," or "arrival," with all his saints—including both the holy angels and the holy elect of men (ch. 4. 14; Daniel, 7. 10; Zechariah, 14. 5; Matthew, 25. 31; 2 Thessalonians, 1. 7). The saints are "His" (Acts, 9. 13). We must have "holiness" if we are to be numbered with His holy ones or "saints." On "unblameable," cf. Revelation, 14. 5. This verse (cf. v. 13) shows that "love" is the spring of true "holiness" (Matthew, 5. 44-48; Romans, 13. 10; Colossians, 3. 14). God is He who really "establishes," Timothy and other ministers are but instruments (v. 2) in "establishing."

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-18. EXHORTATIONS TO CHASTITY; BROTHERLY LOVE; QUIET INDUSTRY; ABSTINENCE FROM UNPURE SORROW FOR DEPARTED FRIENDS, FOR AT CHRIST'S COMING ALL HIS SAINTS SHALL BE GLORIFIED. 1. Furthermore—Greek, "As to what remains," Generally used towards the close of his epistles (Ephesians, 6. 10; Philippians, 4. 8). Then—with a view to the love and holiness (ch. 3. 12, 13) which we have just prayed for in your behalf, we now give you exhortation, beseech—"ask" as if it were a personal favour, by—rather as Greek, "in the Lord Jesus" in communion with the Lord Jesus, as Christian ministers dealing with Christian people. [EDMUNDS.] as ye...received—when we were with you (ch. 2. 13). how—Greek, the "how," i.e., the manner, walk and...please God—i.e., "and so please God," viz. by your walk; in contrast to the Jews who "please not God" (ch. 2. 15). The oldest MSS. add a clause here, "even as also ye do walk" (cf. ch. 4. 10; 5. 11). These words, which he was able to say of them with truth, conciliate a favourable hearing for the precepts which follow. Also the expression, "abound more and more," implies that there had gone before a recognition of their already in some measure walking so. 2. by the Lord Jesus—by His authority and direction, not by our own. He uses the strong term "commandments," in writing to this church not long founded, knowing that they would take it in a right spirit, and feeling it desirable that they should understand he spoke with Divine authority. He seldom uses the term in writing subsequently, when his authority was established, to other churches. 1 Corinthians, 7. 10, 11, 17; and 1 Timothy, 1. 5 (v. 15, where the subject accounts for the strong expression) are the exceptions. "The Lord" marks His paramount authority, requiring implicit obedience. 3. For—Enforcing the assertion that his "commandments" were "by (the authority of) the Lord Jesus" (v. 2). Since "this is the will of God," let it be your will also, fornication—not regarded as a sin at all among the heathen, and so needing the more to be denounced (Acts, 15. 20). 4. know—by moral self-control, how to possess his vessel—rather as Greek, "how to acquire (get for himself) his own vessel," i.e., that each should have his own wife so as to avoid fornication (v. 3; 1 Corinthians, 7. 2). The emphatical position of "his own" in the Greek, and the use of "vessel" for wife, in 1 Peter, 3. 7, and in common Jewish phraseology, and the correct translation "acquire," all justify this rendering, in sanctification—(Romans, 6. 19; 1 Corinthians, 6. 15, 18.) Thus, "his own" stands in opposition to dishonouring his brother by lusting after his wife (v. 6). honour—(Hebrews, 15. 4)—contrasted with "dishonour their own bodies" (Romans, 1. 24. 5, in the last—Greek, "passion;" which implies that such a one is unconsciously the passive slave of lust, which know not God—and so know no better. Ignorance of true religion is the parent of unchastity (Ephesians, 4. 15, 19). A people's morals are like the objects of their worship (Deuteronomy, 7. 26; Psalm 115. 8; Romans, 1. 23, 24). 6. go beyond—transgress the bounds of rectitude in respect to his brother, defraud—"overreach" (ALFORD); "take advantage of," (EDMUNDS.) in any matter—rather as Greek, "in the matter;" a decorous expression for the matter now in question: the conjugal honour of his neighbour as a husband, v. 4; v. 7 also confirms this view: the word "brother" enhances the enormity of the crime. It is your brother whom you wrong (cf. Proverbs, 6. 27-32). the Lord—the coming Judge (2 Thessalonians, 1. 7, 9, avenger—the Righter, of all such—Greek, "concerning all these things;" in all such cases of wrongs against a neighbour's conjugal honour, testified—Greek, "constantly testified." [ALFORD.] 7. unto—Greek, "for the purpose of," unto—rather as Greek, "in;" marking that "holiness" is the element in which our calling has place: in a sphere of holiness. Saint is another name for Christian. 8. despise—Greek, "setteth at nought" such engagements imposed on him in his calling, v. 7; in relation to his "brother," v. 6. He who doth so, "sets at nought not man (as for instance his brother) but God" (Psalm 51. 4). Or, as the Greek verb (Luke, 10. 16; John, 12. 48) is used of despising or rejecting God's minister, it may mean here, "He who despiseth" or "rejecteth" these our ministerial precepts—who hath also given unto us—So some oldest MSS. read, but most oldest MSS. read, "Who (without 'also') giveth (present) unto you" (not "us"), his Spirit—Greek, n Spirit, the Holy one):" thus emphatically "holiness" (v. 7) as the end for which the it is being given. "Unto you" in the Greek, that the Spirit is being given unto, into (put into it), and among you (cf. ch. 2. 9; Ephesians, with implies that sanctification is not merely for all accomplished in the past, but a progressive work. So the Church of England n. "sanctified (present) all the elect people of His own" implies that as He gives you that essentially identical with Himself, He expects it become like Himself (1 Peter, 1. 16; 2 Peter, 1. 4). brotherly love—referring here to acts of kindness in relieving distressed brethren. MSS. support English Version reading, "Ye are, and those the weightiest, read, "We do need not write, as ye yourselves are taught, by God; etc., in the heart by the Holy Spirit 45; Hebrews, 8. 11; 1 John, 2. 20, 27. to love—with a view to, or "to the end of your loving it." Divine teachings have their confluence [BENJAMIN] 10. And indeed—Greek, "For even," to be quiet—Greek, "make it your ambition it, and to do your own business." In direct to the world's ambition, which is, "to make a," and "to be busybodies" (2 Thessalonians, 3. 11). work with your own hands—The Thessalonians were, it thus seems, chiefly of the workers. Their expectation of the immediate christ led some enthusiasts among them to their daily work, and be dependent on the others. See end of v. 12. The expectation in so far as that the Church should be always for Him; but they were wrong in making it for neglecting their daily work. The evil, consequently became worse, is more strongly (2 Thessalonians, 3. 6-12). 12. honestly—In English sense, "becomingly," as becomes your profession; not bringing discredit on it in the outer world, as if Christianity led to sloth ry (Romans, 13. 13; 1 Peter, 2. 12). them . . . outside the Christian Church (Mark, 4. 11). of nothing—not have to beg from others for it of your wants (cf. Ephesians, 4. 28). So far it from beg from others, we ought to work the means of supplying the need of others. from pecuniary embarrassment is to be for the Christian on account of the liberty which it, 13. The leading topic of Paul's preaching at thea having been the coming kingdom (Acts, 1. 3), it is perverted it into a cause for fear in respect it lately deceased, as if these would be ex-om the glory which those found alive alone are. This error St. Paul here corrects (cf. 1. 10). I would not—All the oldest MSS. and verse "see would not." My fellow-labourers (Silas and myself, desire that ye should not be, then which are asleep—The oldest MSS. read, "them which are sleeping;" the same as it in Christ" (v. 16), to whose bodies (Daniel, their souls; Ecclesiastes, 12. 7; 2 Corinthians, 5. 1) is a calm and holy sleep, from which the Lord shall awake them to glory. The word ye means a sleeping place. Observe, the chief hope of the Church are not to be death, but at the Lord's coming; one is not ate the other, but all are to be glorified to-Christ's coming (Colossians, 3. 4; Hebrews, 12. 22), which affects the mere individual; but the com-ensus the whole Church; at death our souls ably and individually with the Lord; at oming the whole Church, with all its memory and soul, shall be visibly and collectively it. As this is offered as a consolation to relatives, the mutual recognition of the saints at Christ's coming is hereby implied. that ye sorrow not, even as others—Greek, "the rest," all the rest of the world besides Christians. Not all natural mourning for dead friends is forbidden; for the Lord Jesus and Paul sinlessly gave way to it (John, 11. 31, 33, 35; Philippians, 2. 27). But sorrow as though there were "no hope," which indeed the heathen had not (Ephesians, 2. 12); the Christian hope here meant is that of the resurrection. Cf. Psalm 16. 9, 11; 17. 15; 73. 24; Proverbs, 14. 32, show that the Old Testament Church, though not having the hope so bright (Isaiah, 53. 18, 19, yet had this hope. Contrast Catullus, 5. 4, "When once our brief day has set, we must sleep one everlasting night." The sepulchral inscriptions of heathen Thessalonica express the hopeless view taken as to those once dead; as Eschylus writes, "Of one once dead there is no resurrection." Whatever glimpses some heathen philosophers had of the existence of the soul after death, they had none whatever of the body (Acts, 17. 18, 20, 32). 14. For if—Confirmation of his statement, v. 13, that the removal of ignorance as to the sleeping believers would remove undue grief respecting them. See v. 13. "hope." Hence it appears our hope rests on our faith ("if we believe"). "As surely as we all believe that Christ died and rose again (the very doctrine specified as taught at Thessalonica, Acts, 17. 3), so also will God bring those laid to sleep by Jesus with Him" (Jesus). So the order and balance of the members of the Greek sentence require us to translate. Believers are laid in sleep by Jesus, and so will be brought back from sleep with Jesus in His train when He comes. The disembodied souls are not here spoken of; the reference is to the sleeping bodies. The facts of Christ's experience are repeated in the believer's. He died and then rose; so believers shall die and then rise with him. But in His case death is the term used, 1 Corinthians, 15. 3, 6, &c.; in their's, sleep; because His death has taken for them the sting from death. The same hand that shall raise them is that which laid them to sleep. "Laid to sleep by Jesus," answers to "dead in Christ" (v. 10). 15. by the word of the Lord—Greek, "in," i.e., in virtue of a direct revelation from the Lord to me. So 1 Kings, 20. 35. This is the "mystery," a truth once hidden, now revealed, which Paul shows (1 Corinthians, 15. 51, 52), present—i.e., anticipate. So far were the early Christians from regarding their departed brethren as anticipating them in entering glory, that they needed to be assured that those who remain to the coming of the Lord "will not anticipate them that are asleep." The "we" means whichever of us are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord. The Spirit designed that believers in each successive age should live in continued expectation of the Lord's coming, not knowing but that they should be among those found alive at His coming (Matthew, 24. 42). It is a sad fall from this blessed hope, that death is looked for by most men, rather than the coming of our Lord. Each successive generation in its time and place represents the generation which shall actually survive till His coming (Matthew, 25. 13; Romans, 13. 11; 1 Corinthians, 13. 51; James, 5. 9; 1 Peter, 4. 5, 6). The Spirit subsequently revealed by Paul that which is not inconsistent with the expectation here taught of the Lord's coming at any time, etc., that His coming would not be until there should be a "falling away first" (2 Thessalonians, 2. 2, 3); but as symptoms of this soon appeared, none could say but that still this precursory event might be realized, and so the Lord come in His day. Each successive revelation fills in the details of the general outline first given. So Paul subsequently, whilst still looking mainly for the Lord's coming to clothe him with his body from heaven, looks for going to be with Christ in the meanwhile (2 Corinthians, 5. 1-10; Philippians, 1. 6, 23; 3. 20, 21; 4. 6). EDMUNDS well says, The

"we" is an affectionate identifying of ourselves with our fellows of all ages, as members of the same body, under the same Head, Christ Jesus. So Hosea, 12, 4, "God spake with us in Bethel," i.e., with Israel. "We did rejoice," i.e., Israel at the Red sea (Psalm 66, 6). Though neither Hosea, nor David, were alive at the times referred to, yet each identifies himself with those that were present. 16. himself—in all the Majesty of His presence in person, not by deputy. descend—even as He ascended (Acts, 1, 11). with—Greek, "in," implying one concomitant circumstance attending His appearing. shout—Greek, "signal-shout." "war-shout." Jesus is represented as a victorious King, giving the word of command to the hosts of heaven in His train for the last onslaught, at His final triumph over sin, death, and Satan (Revelation, 19, 11-21). the voice of . . . archangel—distinct from the "signal-shout." Michael is perhaps meant (Jude, 9; Revelation, 12, 7), to whom especially is committed the guardianship of the people of God (Daniel, 10, 13). trump of God—the trumpet blast which usually accompanies God's manifestation in glory (Exodus, 19, 16; Psalm 47, 5); here the last of the three accompaniments of His appearing; as the trumpet was used to convene God's people to their solemn convocations (Numbers, 10, 2, 10; 31, 6), so here to summon God's elect together, preparatory to their glorification with Christ (Psalm 50, 1-5; Matthew, 24, 31; 1 Corinthians, 15, 52). shall rise first—previously to the living being "caught up." The "first" here has no reference to the first resurrection, as contrasted with that of "the rest of the dead." That reference occurs elsewhere (Matthew, 13, 41, 42, 50; John, 5, 29; 1 Corinthians, 15, 23, 24; Revelation, 20, 5, 6), it simply stands in opposition to "then," v. 17. First—"the dead in Christ" shall rise, THEN the living shall be caught up. The Lord's people alone are spoken of here. 17. we which are alive, shall be caught up—after having been "changed in a moment" (1 Corinthians, 15, 51, 52). Again he says, "we," recommending thus the expression to Christians of all ages, each generation bequeathing to the succeeding one a continually increasing obligation to look for the coming of the Lord. [EDMUNDS.] together with them—all together: the roused dead, and changed living, forming one joint body, in the clouds—Greek, "in clouds." The same honour is conferred on them as on their Lord. As He was taken in a cloud at His ascension (Acts, 1, 9), so at His return with clouds (Revelation, 1, 7), they shall be caught up in clouds. The clouds are His and their triumphal chariot (Psalm 104, 3; Daniel, 7, 13). ELLICOTT explains the Greek, "robed round by upbearing clouds" (Aids to faith), in the air—rather, "into the air," caught up into the region just above the earth, where the meeting (cf. Matthew, 25, 1, 6) shall take place between them ascending, and their Lord descending towards the earth. Not that the air is to be the place of their lasting abode with Him, and so shall we ever be with the Lord—no more parting, no more going out (Revelation, 3, 12). His point being established, that the dead in Christ shall be on terms of equal advantage with those found alive at Christ's coming, he leaves undefined here the other events foretold elsewhere (as not being necessary to his discussion), Christ's reign on earth with His saints (1 Corinthians, 6, 2, 3), the final judgment and glorification of His saints in the new heaven and earth. 18. comfort one another—in your mourning for the dead (v. 13).

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-28. THE SUDDENNESS OF CHRIST'S COMING A MOTIVE FOR WATCHFULNESS; VARIOUS PRECEPTS; PRAYER FOR THEIR BEING FOUND BLAMELESS, BODY, SOUL, AND SPIRIT, AT CHRIST'S COMING; CONCLUSION. 1. times—the general and indefinite term for chronological periods, seasons—the opportune times

(Daniel, 7, 12; Acts, 1, 7). Time denotes quantity; season, quality. Seasons are parts of times. ye have no need—those who watch do not need to be told when the hour will come, for they are always ready. [BEXON.] 2. as a thief in the night—The apostles in this image follow the parable of their Lord, expressing how the Lord's coming shall take men by surprise (Matthew, 24, 43; 2 Peter, 3, 10). "The night is wherever there is quiet unconcern." [BEXON.] "At midnight" (perhaps figurative: to some parts of the earth it will be literal night), Matthew, 25, 6. The thief not only gives no notice of his approach, but takes all precautions to prevent the household knowing of it. So the Lord (Revelation, 16, 15). Signs will precede the coming, to confirm the patient hope of the watchful believer; but the coming itself shall be sudden at last (Matthew, 24, 32-36; Luke, 21, 29-32, 36). cometh—present: expressing its speedy and awful certainty. 3. they—the men of the world. Verses 5, 6; ch. 4, 13. "others," all the rest of the world save Christians. Peace—(Judges, 18, 7, 9, 27, 28; Jeremiah, 6, 14; Ezekiel, 13, 10.) then—at that very moment when they least expect it. Cf. the case of Belshazzar, Daniel, 5, 1-5, 6, 9, 25-28; Herod, Acts, 12, 21-23, sudden—"unaware" (Luke, 21, 34). as travail—"As the labour pang" comes in an instant on the woman when otherwise engaged (Psalm 48, 6; Isaiah, 13, 8). shall not escape—Greek, "shall not at all escape." Another awful feature of their ruin: there shall be then no possibility of shunning it however they desire it (Amos, 9, 2, 3; Revelation, 6, 15, 16). 4. not in darkness—not in darkness of understanding (i.e., spiritual ignorance) or of the moral nature (i.e., a state of sin), Ephesians, 4, 18. that—Greek, "in order that:" with God results are all proposed. that day—Greek, "the day;" the day of the Lord (Hebrews, 10, 25, "the day"), in contrast to "darkness." overtake—unexpectedly (cf. John, 12, 35). as a thief—The two oldest MSS. read, "as the daylight overtakes thieves" Job, 24, 17. Old MSS. and Wigante read as English Version. 5. The oldest MSS. read, "For ye are all." &c. Ye have no reason for fear, or for being taken by surprise, by the coming of the day of the Lord: "For ye are all sons (so the Greek) of light and sons of day;" a Hebrew idiom, implying that as sons resemble their fathers, so you are in character light (intellectually and morally illuminated in a spiritual point of view), Luke, 16, 8; John, 12, 36. are not of—i.e., belong not to night nor darkness. The change of person from "ye" to "we," implies this: Ye are sons of light because ye are Christians; and we, Christians, are not of night nor darkness. 6. others—Greek, "the rest" of the world: the unconverted (ch. 4, 13). "Sleep" here is worldly apathy to spiritual things (Romans, 13, 11; Ephesians, 5, 14); in v. 7, ordinary sleep; in v. 10, death. watch—for Christ's coming, lit., "be wakeful." The same Greek occurs 1 Corinthians, 15, 34; 2 Timothy, 2, 26. be sober—refraining from carnal indulgence, mental or sensual (1 Peter, 4, 8). 7. This verse is to be taken in the literal sense. Night is the time when sleepers sleep, and drinking men are drunk. To sleep by day would imply great indolence; to be drunken by day, great shamelessness. Now, in a spiritual sense, "we Christians profess to be day people, not night people; therefore our work ought to be day work, not night work; our conduct such as will bear the eye of day, and such has no need of the veil of night" [EDMUNDS] (v. 8). 8. Faith, hope, and love, are the three pre-eminent graces (ch. 1, 3; 1 Corinthians, 13, 13). We must not only be awake and sober, but also armed; not only watchful, but also guarded. The armour here is only defensive; in Ephesians, 6, 13-17, also offensive. Here, therefore, the reference is to the Christian means of being guarded against being surprised by the day of the Lord as a thief in the night. The helmet and breastplate the two vital parts, the head and the heart rely. "With head and heart right, the whole right." [EDMUNDS.] The head needs to be in error, the heart from sin. For "the breast-plate of righteousness," Ephesians, 6, 14, we have here re-plate of faith and love; for the righteousness is imputed to man for justification, is working by love" (Romans, 4, 3, 22-24; Galatians, 6). Faith, as the motive within, and love, as the outward acts, constitute the perfection of usness. In Ephesians, 6, 17, the helmet is iron; here, "the hope of salvation." In one "salvation" is a present possession (John, 3, 36; John, 5, 13); in another, it is a matter of hope (John, 3, 24, 28). Our Head primarily wore the plate of righteousness" and "helmet of salvation" we might, by union with Him, receive both. Assigning the ground of our "hope" (v. 8), and us—translate, "set" (Acts, 13, 47), in His line purpose of love (ch. 3, 3; 2 Timothy, 1, 9). Romans, 9, 2; Jude, 4. to—i.e., unto wrath. —Greek, "to the acquisition of salvation;" said, as to BENEVOLENT, of one saved out of a general when all things else have been lost: so of the saved out of the multitude of the lost (2 Thess., 2, 13, 14). The fact of God's "appointment" race "through Jesus Christ" (Ephesians, 1, 6), way the notion of our being able to "acquire" in of ourselves. Christ "acquired" (so the Greek chased) the church (and its salvation) with His blood" (Acts, 20, 28); each member is said to be ed by God to the "acquiring of salvation." In imary sense, God does the work; in the urse sense, man does it. 10, died for us—Greek, r behalf," whether we wake or sleep—whether found at Christ's coming awake, i.e., alive, or e.e., in our graves. together—all of us together; ng not preceding the dead in their glorification Him" at His coming (ch. 4, 13). 11, comfort es—Greek, "one another." Here he reverts to a consolatory strain as in ch. 4, 18. one another as Greek, "Edify (ye) the one the other;" "lit., "build up," etc., in faith, hope, and love, uring together on such edifying topics as the coming, and the glory of the saints (Malachi, 12, beseech — "Exhort" is the expression in ere, "we beseech you," as if it were a personal (Paul making the cause of the Thessalonian ers, as it were, his own). know—to have a and respect for. Recognise their office, and em accordingly (cf. 1 Corinthians, 16, 18) with ce and with liberality in supplying their needs (ch. 3, 17). The Thessalonian church having wly planted, the ministers were necessarily (2 Timothy, 3, 6), which may have been in part e of the people treating them with less re- Paul's practice seems to have been to ordain in every church soon after its establishment 4, 23). them which labour...are over...admonish t three classes of ministers, but one, as there ne article common to the three in the Greek. ir" expresses their laborious life; "are over ir pre-eminence as presidents or superinten- "bishops," i.e., overseers, Philipians, 1, 1, that have rule over you," lit., leaders, Hebrews, pastors," lit., shepherds, Ephesians, 4, 11; "ad- you," one of their leading functions; the Greek in mind," implying not arbitrary authority, the, though faithful, admonition (2 Timothy, 2, 5; 1 Peter, 5, 3). in the Lord—Their presidency is in divine things; not in worldly affairs, but s appertaining to the Lord. 13, very highy- exceeding abundantly," for their work's sake; nature of their work alone, the furtherance r salvation and of the kingdom of Christ, should be a sufficient motive to claim your reverential love. At the same time, the word "work," teaches ministers that, whilst claiming the reverence due to their office, it is not a sinecure, but a "work;" cf. "labour" (even to weariness; so the Greek), v. 12. be at peace among yourselves—The "and" is not in the original. Let there not only be peace between ministers and their flocks, but also no party rivalries among yourselves, one contending in behalf of some one favourite minister, another in behalf of another (Mark, 9, 50; 1 Corinthians, 1, 12; 4, 6). 14, brethren—This exhortation to "warn (Greek, 'admonish,' as in v. 12) the unruly (those 'disorderly persons,' 2 Thessalonians, 3, 6, 11, who would not work, and yet expected to be maintained, lit., said of soldiers who will not remain in their ranks, cf. ch. 4, 11; also those in subordinate as to church discipline, in relation to those "over" the church, v. 12), comfort the feeble-minded (the faint-hearted, who are ready to sink "without hope" in afflictions, ch. 4, 13, and temptations), &c., applies to all clergy and laity alike, though primarily the duty of the clergy (who are meant in v. 12). support—lit., lay fast hold on so as to support, the weak—spiritually. St. Paul practised what he preached (1 Corinthians, 9, 22). be patient toward all men—There is no believer who needs not the exercise of patience "toward" him; there is none to whom a believer ought not to show it; many show it more to strangers than to their own families, more to the great than to the humble; but we ought to show it "toward all men." [BENGE.] Cf. "the long-suffering of our Lord" (2 Corinthians, 10, 1; 2 Peter, 3, 15). 15. (Romans, 12, 17; 1 Peter, 3, 9.) unto any man—whether unto a Christian, or a heathen, however great the provocation, follow—as a matter of earnest pursuit. 16, 17. In order to "rejoice evermore," we must "pray without ceasing." He who is wont to thank God for all things as happening for the best, will have continuous joy. [THEOPHYLACT.] Ephesians, 6, 18; Philipians, 4, 4, 6, "Rejoice in the Lord..." by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving;" Romans, 14, 17, "in the Holy Ghost;" Romans, 12, 12, "in hope;" Acts, 5, 41, "in being counted worthy to suffer shame for Christ's name;" James, 1, 2, in falling "into divers temptations." The Greek is, "Pray without intermission;" without allowing prayerless gaps to intervene between the times of prayer. 18. In every thing—even what seems adverse: for nothing is really so (cf. Romans, 8, 28; Ephesians, 5, 20). See Christ's example (Matthew, 15, 36; 26, 27; Luke, 10, 21; John, 11, 41). this—That ye should "rejoice evermore, pray without ceasing, (and) in every thing give thanks," "is the will of God in Christ Jesus (as the Mediator and Revealer of that will, observed by those who are in Christ by faith, cf. Philipians, 3, 14) concerning you." God's will is the believer's law. LACHMANN rightly reads commas at the end of the three precepts (v. 16, 17, 18), making "this" refer to all three. 19. Quench not—The Spirit being a holy fire: "where the Spirit is, He burns" (BENGE.) (Matthew, 3, 11; Acts, 2, 3; 7, 51). Do not throw cold water on those who, under extraordinary inspiration of the Spirit, stand up to speak with tongues, or reveal mysteries, or pray in the congregation. The enthusiastic exhibitions of some (perhaps as to the nearness of Christ's coming, exaggerating Paul's statement, 2 Thessalonians, 2, 2, By spirit), led others (probably the presiding ministers, who had not always been treated with due respect by enthusiastic novices, v. 12), from dread of enthusiasm, to discourage the free utterances of those really inspired, in the church assembly. On the other hand, the caution (v. 21) was needed, not to receive "all" pretended revelations as divine, without "proving" them. 20. prophesyings—whether exercised in inspired teaching, or in predicting the future. "Despised" by some, as beneath "tongues," which seemed more miraculous; therefore declared by Paul to be a greater gift than tongues, though the latter were more showy (1 Corinthians, 14, 8). 21, 22. Some of the oldest MSS. insert "But." You ought indeed not to "quench" the manifestations of "the Spirit," nor "despise prophesyings;" "but," at the same time, do not take "all" as genuine which professes to be so: "prove (test) all" such manifestations. The means of testing them existed in the church, in those who had the "discerning of spirits" (1 Corinthians, 12, 10; 14, 29; 1 John, 4, 1). Another sure test, which we also have, is, to try the professed revelation whether it accords with Scripture, as the noble Bereans did (Isaiah, 8, 20; Acts, 17, 11; Galatians, 1, 8, 9). This precept negatives the Romish priest's assumption of infallibly laying down the law, without the laity having the right, in the exercise of private judgment, to test it by Scripture. Locke says, Those who are for laying aside reason in matters of revelation, resemble one who should put out his eyes in order to use a telescope, hold fast that which is good—Join this clause with the next clause (v. 22), not merely with the sentence preceding. As the result of your "proving all things," and especially all prophesyings, "hold fast (Luke, 8, 16; 1 Corinthians, 11, 2; Hebrews, 2, 1) the good, and hold yourselves aloof from every appearance of evil" ("every evil species." [BENNETT & WALKER]). Do not accept even a professedly spirit-inspired communication, if it be at variance with the truth taught you (2 Thessalonians, 2, 2). TITTMANN supports English Version, "from every evil appearance" or "semblance." The context, however, does not refer to evil appearances IN OURSELVES which we ought to abstain from, but to holding ourselves aloof from every evil appearance IN OTHERS; as for instance, in the pretenders to spirit-inspired prophesyings. In many cases the Christian should not abstain from what has the semblance ("appearance") of evil, though really good. Jesus healed on the Sabbath, and ate with publicans and sinners, acts which were the appearance of evil, but which were not to be abstained from on that account, being really good. I agree with TITTMANN rather than with BENNETT, whom ALFORD follows. The context favours this sense: However specious be the form or outward appearance of such would-be prophets and their prophesyings, hold yourselves aloof from every such form when it is evil, lit., "Hold yourselves aloof from every evil appearance" or "form." 23. the very God—rather as the Greek, "the God of peace Himself" who can do for you by His own power what I cannot do by all my monitions, nor you by all your efforts (Romans, 16, 20; Hebrews, 13, 20, viz., keep you from all evil, and give you all that is good, sanctify you—for holiness is the necessary condition of "peace" (Philippians, 4, 6-9). wholly—Greek, [so that you should be] "perfect in every respect." [TITTMANN.] and—i.e., "and so (omit I pray God; not in the Greek) may your spirit and soul and body be preserved," &c. whole—A different Greek word from "wholly." Translate, "Entire," with none of the integral parts wanting. [TITTMANN.] It refers to man in his normal integrity, as originally designed; an ideal which shall be attained by the glorified believer. All three, spirit, soul, and body, each in its due place, constitute man "entire." The "spirit" links man with the higher intelligences of heaven, and is that highest part of man which is receptive of the quickening Holy Spirit (1 Corinthians, 15, 47). In the unspiritual, the spirit is so sunk under the lower animal soul (which it ought to keep under), that such are termed "animal" (English Version, sensual, having merely the body of organised matter, and the soul the immaterial animating essence), having not the Spirit (cf. 1 Corinthians, 2, 14; Notes, 15, 44, 46-48; John, 3, 6). The unbeliever shall rise with an animal (soul-animated) body, but not like the believer with a spiritual (spirit-ended) body like Christ's (Romans, 8, 11). blameless unto—rather as Greek, "blamelessly (so as to be in a blameless state) at the coming of Christ." In Hebrew, "peace" and "wholly" (perfect in every respect) are kindred terms: so that the prayer shows what the title "God of peace" implies. BENNETT takes "wholly" as collectively, all the Thessalonians without exception, so that no one should fail. And "whole" (entire, individually, each one of them entire, with "spirit, soul, and body." The mention of the preservation of the body accords with the subject (ch. 4, 16). TITTMANN better regards "wholly" as meaning "Having perfectly attained the moral end," viz., to be a full grown man in Christ. "Whole," complete, with no grace which ought to be in a Christian wanting. 24. Faithful—to His covenant promises (John, 10, 27-29; 1 Corinthians, 1, 9; 10, 23; Philippians, 1, 6). he that calleth you—God, the caller of His people, will cause His calling not to fall short of its designed end, do it—preserve and present you blameless at the coming of Christ (v. 23; Romans, 8, 30; 1 Peter, 5, 10). You must not look at the foes before and behind, on the right hand and on the left, but to His faithfulness to His promises, God's zeal for His honour, and God's love for those whom He calleth. 24. Some oldest MSS. read, "Pray ye also for (lit., concerning) us;" make us and our work the subject of your prayers, even as we have been just praying for you (v. 23). Others omit the "also." The clergy need much the prayers of their flocks. Paul makes the same request in the epistles to Romans, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Philemon, and 2 Corinthians; not so in the epistles to Timothy and Titus, whose intercessions, as his spiritual sons, he was already sure of; nor in the epistles to 1 Corinthians and Galatians, as these epistles abound in rebuke. 26. Hence it appears this epistle was first handed to the elders, who communicated it to "the brethren," holy kiss—pure and chaste. "A kiss of charity" (1 Peter, 5, 14). A token of Christian fellowship in those days (cf. Luke, 7, 45; Acts, 20, 37), as it is a common mode of salutation in many countries. The custom hence arose in the early church of passing the kiss through the congregation at the holy communion (JUSTIN MARTYR, Apology, 1, 66; Apostolic Constitutions, 2, 57), the men kissing the men, and the women the women, in the Lord. So in the Syrian churches takes his neighbour's right hand, and gives the salutation, "Peace." 27. I charge—Greek, "I adjure you," read unto all—viz., publicly in the congregation at a particular time. The Greek acrostic implies a single act done at a particular time. The earnestness of his adjuration implies how solemnly important he felt this divinely-inspired message to be. Also, as this was the first of the epistles of the New Testament, he makes this the occasion of a solemn charge, that so its being publicly read should be a sample of what should be done in the case of the others, just as the Pentateuch and the Prophets were publicly read under the Old Testament, and are still read in the synagogues. Cf. the same injunction as to the public reading of the Apocalypse, the last of the New Testament canon (Revelation, 1, 3). The "all" includes women and children, and especially those who could not read it themselves (Deuteronomy, 31, 12; Joshua, 8, 33-35). What Paul commands with an adjuration, Rome forbids under a curse. [BENNETT.] Though these epistles had difficulties, the laity were all to hear them read (1 Peter, 4, 11; 2 Peter, 3, 10; even the very young, 2 Timothy, 1, 2 & 3, 16). "Holy" is omitted before "brethren" in most of the oldest MSS., though some of them support it (28. (Note, 2 Corinthians, 13, 14.) Paul ends as he began (ch. 1, 1), with "grace." The oldest MSS. end "Amen," which probably was the response of the church after the public reading of the epistle.

description is a comparatively modern addition; the epistle was not, as it states, written from but from Corinth; for it is written in the names of Silas and Timothy (besides Paul, who did not join the apostle before he reached the latter city (Acts, 18. 6).

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS. INTRODUCTION.

GUINENESS is attested by Polycarp (Epistola ad Philippenses, sec. 11), who alludes to ch. 3. 15. Justin Martyr, in Tryphones (p. 193. 28), alludes to ch. 2. 3. Irenæus (3. ch. 7., sec. 2) quotes ch. 2. 8. Clement of Alexandria (3. 2, as Paul's words (Stromata 1. 5., p. 154; Pedagogus 1. 17). Tertullian (de Resurrectione Carnis, ch. 24) quotes as part of Paul's epistle.

G. N.—The accounts from Thessalonica, after the sending of the first epistle, represented the faith and love of its members as on the increase; and their constancy amidst persecutions unshaken. One error of doctrine, however, in practical evil, had sprung up among them. The apostle's description of Christ's sudden second coming (1 Thess. 4. 13, &c., and 3. 2), and the possibility of its being at any time, led them to believe it was actually at hand. Some to know by "the Spirit" (ch. 2. 2) that it was so; and others alleged that Paul had said so when with them. A spurious letter, rather than to St. Paul's first epistle, appears likely from the statement, ch. 3. 17, as to his salutation being the mark whereby his genuine letters might be known.) Hence some neglected their daily and threw themselves on the charity of others, as if their sole duty was to wait for the coming of the Lord; therefore, needed rectifying, and forms a leading topic of the second epistle. He in it tells them (ch. 3.), that the Lord shall come, there must first be a great apostasy, and the Man of Sin must be revealed; and that the Lord's own practice among them (ch. 3. 7-9), and that the faithful must withdraw themselves from such disorderly (ch. 3. 6, 10-15). Thus, there are three divisions of the epistle: (1.) Ch. 1. 1-12, Commendations of the Thessalonians, and patience amidst persecutions. (2.) Ch. 2. 1-17, The error as to the immediate coming of Christ corrected, serious rise and downfall of the Man of Sin foretold. (3.) Ch. 3. 1-16, Exhortations to orderly conduct in their life, with prayers for them to the God of peace, followed by his autograph salutation and benediction.

E OF WRITING.—As the epistle is written in the joint names of Timothy and Silas, as well as his own, and were with him whilst at Corinth, and not with him for a long time subsequently to his having left that city 18. 28, with 19. 23; indeed, as to Silas, it is doubtful whether he was ever subsequently with Paul, it follows, the writing must have been Corinth, and the date, during the one "year and six months" of his stay there, Acts, 18. 11 ending with the autumn of A. D. 52, and ending with the spring of A. D. 54, say about six months after his first ry in A. D. 53.

E.—The style is not different from that of most of Paul's other writings, except in the prophetic portion of 12), which is distinguished from them in subject matter. As is usual in his more solemn passages (for instance in oratory and prophetic portions of his epistles, e.g., of Colossians, 2. 8, 16, with v. 3; 1 Corinthians, 15. 24-28, with 1. 18, with v. 8, 10), his diction here is more lofty, abrupt, and elliptical. As the former epistle dwells upon the second Advent in its aspect of glory to the sleeping and the living saints (1 Thessalonians, 4. and 5.), so this dwells mostly on it in its aspect of everlasting destruction to the wicked and him who shall be the final consummation, the Man of Sin. So far was Paul from labouring under an erroneous impression as to Christ's speedy when he wrote his first epistle (which rationalists impute to him), that he had distinctly told them, when he was in the same truths as to the apostasy being about first to arise, which he now insists upon in this second epistle.

Several points of coincidence occur between the two epistles, confirming the genuineness of the latter. Thus, of 1 Thessalonians, 2. 15, 16; again, ch. 2. 9, the Man of Sin "coming after the working of Satan," with 1 Thess. 2. 18; 3. 5, where Satan's insidious work as the blower of the gospel, and the tempter, appears; again, mild warning 1 Thessalonians, 5. 14; but, in this second epistle, when the evil had grown worse, stricter discipline 4; "withdraw from" the "company" of such.

probably visited Thessalonica on his way to Asia subsequently (Acts, 20. 4), and took with him thence Aristarchus also. Thessalonians: the former became his "companion in travel," and shared with him his perils at Ephesus, of his shipwreck, and was his "fellow-prisoner" at Rome (Acts, 27. 2; Colossians, 4. 10; Philemon, 24). Accordingly he became bishop of Apamea.

CHAPTER I.

12. ADDRESS AND SALUTATION: INTRODUCTIONS: GIVING FOR THEIR GROWTH IN FAITH, AND FOR THEIR PATIENCE IN PERSECUTION: A TOKEN FOR GOOD EVERLASTING LIFE, AND FOR PARDON TO THEIR ADVERSARIES: CHRIST'S COMING: PRAYER FOR THEIR PERSEVERANCE. 1. In God our Father—still more endearing address. 1 Thessalonians, 1. 1, "In God the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God our Father—So some oldest MSS. omit "our." 3. We are bound—Greek, "We are bound" (ch. 2. 13). They had prayed for the saints (1 Thessalonians, 3. 12) that they might be at home and abound in love; their prayer having been, it is a small but a bounden return for them to make, to thank God for it. Thus, Paul and his fellow-missionaries practise what they preach (1 Thessalonians, 5. 18). In 1 Thessalonians, 1. 3, their thanksgiving was for the Thessalonian "faith, love, and patience;" here, for their exceeding growth in faith, and for their charity abounding, meet—right. "We are bound," expresses the duty of thanksgiving from its subjective side as an inward conviction. "As it is meet," from the objective side as something answering to the state of circumstances. [ALFORD.] Observe the exact correspondence of the prayer (1 Thessalonians, 3. 12, "The Lord make you to abound in love") and the answer, "The love of every one of you all toward each other aboundeth" (cf. 1 Thessalonians, 4. 10). 4. glory in you.—make our boast of you, &c., "in your case." "Glorselves" implies that not merely did they hear others speaking of the Thessalonians' faith, but they, the missionaries themselves, boasted of it. Cf. 1 Thessalonians, 1, 8, wherein the apostle said, their faith was so well known in various places, that he and his fellow-missionaries had no need to speak of it; but here he says, so abounding is their love, combined with faith and patience, that he and his fellow-missionaries themselves, make it a matter of glorying in the various churches elsewhere he was now at Corinth in Achaia, and boasted there of the faith of the Macedonian churches, 2 Corinthians, 10, 15-17; 8, 1, at the same time giving the glory to the Lord, not only looking forward to glorying thereat at Christ's coming (1 Thessalonians, 2, 19), but doing so even now. patience—In 1 Thessalonians, 1, 3, "patience of hope." Here hope is tacitly implied as the ground of their patience; v. 5, 7, state the object of their hope, viz., the kingdom for which they suffer. tribulations—lit., pressures. The Jews were the instigators of the populace and of the magistrates against Christians (Acts, 17, 5, 8, which ye endure—Greek, "are now) enduring." 5. Which—Your enduring these tribulations is "a token of the righteous judgment of God," manifested in your being enabled to endure them, and in your adversaries thereby filling up the measure of their guilt. The judgment is even now begun, but its consummation will be at the Lord's coming. David (Psalm 73, 1-14) and Jeremiah (12, 1-4) were perplexed at the wicked prospering and the godly suffering. But Paul, by the light of the New Testament, makes this very fact a matter of consolation. It is a proof (so the Greek) of the future judgment, which will set to rights the anomalies of the present state, by rewarding the now suffering saint, and by punishing the persecutor. And even now "the Judge of all the earth does right" (Genesis, 18, 25); for the godly are in themselves sinful and need chastisement to amend them. What they suffer unjustly at the hands of cruel men they suffer justly at the hands of God; and they have their evil things here that they may escape condemnation with the world and have their good things hereafter (Luke, 16, 26; 1 Corinthians, 11, 32). [EDMUNDS.] that ye may be counted worthy—expressing the purpose of God's "righteous judgment" as regards you, for which—Greek, "in behalf of" which ye are also suffering" (cf. Acts, 5, 41; 9, 16; Philippians, 1, 29). "Worthy" implies that, though men are justified by faith, they shall be judged "according to their works" (Revelation, 20, 12; cf. 1 Thessalonians, 2, 12; 1 Peter, 1, 6, 7; Revelation, 20, 4). The "also" implies the connection between the suffering for the kingdom and being counted worthy of it. Cf. Romans, 8, 17, 18. 6. Seeing (that) it is a righteous thing—This justifies the assertion above of there being a "righteous judgment" (v. 5), viz., "seeing that it is (lit., "if at least," "if at all events it be) a righteous thing with (i.e., in the estimation of) God" (which, as we all feel, it certainly is). Our own innate feeling of what is just, in this confirms what is revealed. recompense—requite in kind, viz., tribulation to them that trouble you affliction to those that afflict you; and to you who are troubled, rest from trouble. 7. rest—governed by "to recompense" (v. 6). The Greek is lit. relaxation: loosening of the tension which had preceded; relaxing of the strings of endurance now so tightly drawn. The Greek word for "rest," Matthew, 11, 28, is distinct, viz., cessation from labour. Also, Hebrews, 4, 9. "A keeping of Sabbath," with us—viz., Paul, Silas, and Timothy, the writers, who are troubled like yourselves, when—at the time when, &c., not sooner, not later, with his mighty angels—rather as the Greek, "with the angels of His might," or "power," i.e., the angels who are the ministers by whom He makes His might to be recognised (Matthew, 13, 41, 42). It is not their might, but His might, which is the prominent thought. 8. In flaming fire—Greek, "In flame of fire," or, as other oldest MSS. read, in fire of flame. This flame of fire accompanied His manifestation in the bush (Exodus, 3, 2); also His giving of the law at Sinai (Exodus, 19, 18); also it shall accompany His revelation at His advent (Daniel, 7, 9, 10), symbolizing His own bright glory and His consuming vengeance against His foes (Hebrews, 10, 27; 12, 29; 2 Peter, 3, 7, 10, taking—lit., "giving" them, as their portion. "vengeance," know not God—The Gentiles primarily (Psalm 79, 6; Galatians, 4, 8; 1 Thessalonians, 4, 5); not of course those involuntarily not knowing God, but those wilfully not knowing Him, as Pharaoh, who might have known God if he would, but who boasted "I know not the Lord" (Exodus, 5, 2); and as the heathen persecutors who might have known God by the preaching of those whom they persecuted. Secondly, all who "profess to know God but in works deny Him" (Titus, 1, 16), obey not the gospel—Primarily the unbelieving Jews (Romans, 10, 3, 16). Secondly, all who obey not the truth (Romans, 2, 8). Christ—Omitted by some of the oldest MSS., and retained by others. 9. Who—Greek, "Persons who," &c. destruction from the presence of the Lord—driven far from His presence. [ALFORD.] The sentence emanating from Him in person, sitting as Judge (BEXFORD), and driving these far from Him (Matthew, 25, 41; Revelation, 4, 16; 12, 14; cf. 1 Peter, 3, 12; Isaiah, 2, 10, 19). "The presence of the Lord" is the source whence the sentence goes forth; "the glory of His power" is the instrument whereby the sentence is carried into execution. [EDMUNDS.] But ALFORD better interprets the latter clause (see v. 10, driven "from the manifestation of His power in the glorification of his saints." Cast out from the presence of the Lord is the idea at the root of eternal death; the law of evil left to its unrestricted working, without one counteracting influence of the presence of God, who is the source of all light and holiness (Isaiah, 66, 24; Mark, 9, 44). 10. "When He shall have come," glorified in his saints—as the element and mirror in which His glory shall shine brightly (John, 17, 10), admired in all them that believe—Greek, "them that believed." Once they believed, now they see: they had taken His word on trust. Now His word is made good and they need faith no longer. With wonder all celestial intelligences (Ephesians, 3, 10) shall see and admire the Redeemer on account of the excellencies which He has wrought in them. because, &c.—Supply for the sense, among whom (viz., those who shall be found to have believed) you, too, shall be; "because our testimony unto (so the Greek for "among") you was believed" (and was not rejected as by those "who obey not the gospel," v. 8). The early preaching of the gospel was not abstract discussions, but a testimony to facts and truths experimentally known (Luke, 24, 48; Acts, 1, 8). Faith is defined by Dr. PEARSON as "an assent unto truths, credible upon the testimony of God, delivered unto us by the apostles and prophets" (originally delivering their testimony orally, but now in their writings). "Glorified in His saints" reminds us that holiness is glory in the best; glory is holiness manifested. 11. Wherefore—Greek, "With a view to which," viz., His glorification in you as His saints. also—We not only anticipate the coming glorification of our Lord in His saints, but we also pray concerning (so the Greek) you, our God—whom we serve, count you worthy—The prominent position of the "you" in the Greek makes it the emphatic word of the sentence. May you be found among the saints whom God shall count worthy of their calling (Ephesians, 4, 1) There is no dignity in an independent of God's calling of us (2 Timothy, 1, 9). The calling here is not merely the first actual call, but the whole of God's electing act, originating in His "purpose of grace given us in Christ before the world ssesing to have the spirit of prophecy (1 Co-genuine letters (ch. 3, 17). day of Christ—The oldest MSS. read, "day of the Lord." is at hand—rather, "is immediately imminent." lit., "is present;" "is instantly coming." Christ and His apostles always taught that the day of the Lord's coming is at hand; and it is not likely that Paul would imply anything contrary here: what he denies is, that it is so immediately imminent, instant, or present, as to justify the neglect of every day worldly duties. CHRYSOSTOM, and after him ALFORD, translates, "Is (already) present" (cf.

 2 Timothy, 2, 18, a kindred error). But in 2 Timothy, 3, 1, the same Greek verb is translated "come." WAHL supports this view. The Greek is usually used of actual presence; but is quite susceptible of the translation, "is all but present." 3, by any means—Greek, "in any manner." Christ, in Matthew, 24, 4, gives the same warning in connexion with the same event. He had indicated three ways (v. 2) in which they might be deceived (cf. other ways, v. 9, and Matthew, 24, 5, 24), a falling away—rather as the Greek, "the falling away," or "apostasy," viz., the one of which "I told you" before (v. 5), "when I was yet with you," and of which the Lord gave some intimation (Matthew, 24, 10-12; John, 5, 43). That man of sin be revealed—The Greek order is, "And there have been revealed the man of sin." As Christ was first in mystery, and afterwards revealed (1 Timothy, 3, 16), so Antichrist (the term used 1 John, 2, 18; 4, 3) is first in mystery, and afterwards shall be developed and revealed (v. 7-9). As righteousness found its embodiment in Christ, "the Lord our righteousness," so "sin" shall have its embodiment in "the man of sin." The hindering power meanwhile restrains its manifestation: when that shall be removed, then this manifestation shall take place. The articles, "the apostasy," and "the man of sin," may also refer to their being well known as foretold by Daniel, 7, 8, 25, "the little horn speaking great words against the Most High, and thinking to change times and laws;" and 11, 36, the wilful king who "shall exalt and magnify himself above every God, and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods; neither shall he regard any God." the son of perdition—a title applied besides to Judas (the traitor, John, 17, 12), and to none else.
 Antichrist (the second "beast" coming up out of the earth) therefore shall at first be "like a lamb, whilst he speaks as a dragon" (Revelation, 13, 11): "coming in peaceably and by flatteries," "working deceitfully," but "his heart shall be against the holy covenant" (Daniel, 11, 21, 23, 28, 30). Seeds of "the falling away" soon appeared (1 Timothy, 4, 1-3), but the full development and concentration of these anti-Christian elements in one person are still to appear. Contrast the King of Zion's coming as JESUS: (1.) Righteous or just; (2.) having salvation; (3.) lowly: whereas Anti-christ is (1.) "The man of the embodiment of sin," (2.) the son of perdition; (3.) exalting himself above all that is worshipped. He is the son of perdition, as consigning many to it, and finally doomed to it himself (Revelation, 17, 8, 11). "He whose essence and inheritance is perdition." [ALFORD.] As "the kingdom of heaven" is first brought before us in the abstract, then in the concrete, the King, the Lord Jesus; so here, first we have (v. 7) "the mystery of iniquity," then "the iniquitous one" (v. 8). Doubtless "the apostasy" of Romanism (the abstract) is one of the greatest instances of the working of the mystery of iniquity, and its blasphemous claims for the Pope (the concrete) are forerunners of the final concentration of blasphemy in the man of sin, who shall not merely, as the Pope, usurp God's honour as vicegerent of God, but oppose God openly at last. 4. Daniel, 11, 36, 37, is here referred to. The words used there as to Antiochus Epiphanes, St. Paul implies, shall even be more applicable to the man of sin, who is the New Testament actual Antichrist, as Antiochus was power and Jesus and His apostles. Luke, 23: 12; and at Thessalonica, A.D. 542, and was in right connection with the consummation of the world's history. The harlot, as first portrayed by Jesus Himself (Revelation, 19: 20), Anti-Christian tendencies produce different Antichrists: these separate Antichrists shall hereafter find their consummation in an individual exceeding them all in the intensity of his evil character. [AUBERLEN.] But judgment soon overtakes him. He is necessarily a child of death, immediately after his ascent as the beast out of the bottomless pit going into perdition. Revelation, 17: 8, 11. Idolatry of self, spiritual pride, and rebellion against God, are his characteristics; as Christ-worship, humility, and dependence on God, characterize Christianity. He not merely assumes Christ's character, as the "false Christ," Matthew, 24: 24, but "opposes" Christ. The Greek implies one situated on an opposite side cf. 1 John, 2: 22; 2 John, 7. One who, on the destruction of every religion, shall seek to establish his own throne, and for God's great truth, "God is man," to substitute his own lie, "Man is God." [TRENCH] above all that is called God—1 Corinthians, 8: 5. The Pope (for interference has existed for more than twelve centuries) Christ is not come, whereas the prophecy the final Antichrist as short-lived, and so on to the end through the coming of Christ. Revelation, 17: 11. Gregory the Great declared against the arch of Constantinople that whose ever should the title of "universal bishop" would be the for of Antichrist." The Papacy fulfilled this is signed prophecy. The Pope has been called followers, "Our Lord God the Pope" and at an auguration in St. Peter's, seated in his chair; high altar, which is treated as his footstool vividly foreshadowed him who "exalteth above all that is called God." An objection interpreting the temple of God here as the church inthians, 3: 16, 17; 6: 19) is, the apostle won designate the apostate anti-Christian church temple of God." It is likely that, as Messias veiled among the Jews at Jerusalem, so anti shall appear among them when restored to the land, and after they have rebuilt their temple salem. Thus Daniel, 11: 41, 45 (see my note corresponds." He shall enter the glorious land and he shall plant the tabernacles of his palace between the seas in the glorious holy mountains then (Daniel, 12: 1) "Michael, the great prince stand up to deliver God's people. Cf. Note 9: 26, 27. Also the king of Assyria, type of Antichrist, Revelation, 22: 16): "I will my throne above the stars of God." "I will the mount of the congregation (i.e., God's meeting His people of old, the temple, in the north (Psalm 68: 3; I will be like the Mos Revelation, 11: 1, 2, "The temple of God... city" (viz., Jerusalem, Matthew, 4: 5), cf. F 18, 29, referring to a period since Christ's as therefore not yet fulfilled (Isaiah, 2: 1-3; Ezekiel 40-44; Zechariah, 14: 16-20; Malachi, 3: 1). temple of God," implies that it is an internal enemy which shall assail the church

Antichrist, characterized by similar blasphemous arrogance. 5. Remember, &c.—Confuting those who represent Paul as having laboured under error as to Christ's immediate coming, when writing his first epistle, and as now correcting that error. I told you—more than once, lit. "I was telling," or "used to tell," & now ye know—by my having told you. The power must have been one "known" to the Thessalonians, what withholdeth—that which holds him back: "keeps him in check;" the power that has restrained the man of sin from his full and final development, is the moral and conservative influence of political states (OLSHAUSSER): the fabric of human polity as a coercive power; as "he who now letteth" refers to those who rule that polity by which the great upbursting of godlessness is kept down. [ALFORD.] The "what withholdeth" refers to the general hindrance; "he who now letteth," to the person in whom that hindrance is summed up. Romanism, as a forerunner of Antichrist, was thus kept in check by the Roman Emperor (the then representative of the coercive power); until Constantine, having removed the seat of empire to Constantinople, the Roman Bishop by degrees first raised himself to pre-eminence, then to primacy, and then to sole empire above the secular power. The historical fact from which Paul starts in his prediction, was probably the emperor Claudius' expulsion of the Jews, the representative of the anti-Christian adversary in Paul's day, from Rome, thus "withholding" them in some degree in their attacks on Christianity; this suggested the principle holding good to the end of time, and about to find its final fulfilment in the removal of the withholding person or authority, whereupon Antichrist in his worst shape shall start up. that he might be—Greek, "in order that he may be revealed in his own time" (i.e., the time appointed by God to him as his proper time for being manifested), not sooner (cf. Daniel, 11. 35). The removal of the withholding power will be when the civil polity, derived from the Roman empire, which is to be, in its last form, divided into ten kingdoms (Revelation, 17. 3, 11-13); shall, with its leading representative head for the time being ("he who now letteth," Greek, "withholdeth," as in v. 6, yield to the prevalent godless "lawlessness" with "the lawless one" as its embodiment. The elect church and the Spirit cannot well be, as Dr BURTON suggests, the withholding power meant; for both shall never be wholly "taken out of the way" (Matthew, 23. 20). However, the testimony of the elect church, and the Spirit in her, are the great hindrance to the rise of the apostasy; and it is possible that, though the Lord shall have a faithful few even then, yet the full energy of the Spirit in the visible church, counteracting the energy or "working" of "the mystery of lawlessness" by the testimony of the elect, shall have been so far "taken out of the way," or set aside, as to admit the manifestation of "the lawless one;" and so Dr BURTON'S view may be right (Luke, 18. 8; Revelation, 11. 3-12). This was a power of which the Thessalonians might easily "know" through Paul's instruction. 7. the mystery of iniquity—the counterwork to "the mystery of godliness" (1 Timothy, 3. 16). Anti-Christianity latently working, as distinguished from its final open manifestation. "Mystery" in Scripture means, not what remains always a secret, but that which is for a while hidden, but in due time manifested (cf. Ephesians, 3. 4, 5). Satan will resort to a mode of opposition more conformed to the then imminent "appearing" and "presence" of the Saviour, and will anticipate Him with a last effort to maintain the dominion of the world (Dr BURTON), just as at His first advent he rushed into open opposition, by taking possession of the bodies of men. "Iniquity," Greek, lackness: defiant rejection of God's law (cf. Note, Zechariah, 5. 9, 10). "Wickedness" (translated by the LXX. by the same Greek, meaning "lawlessness," which St. Paul employs here), embodied there as a woman, answers to "the mystery of iniquity," here embodied finally in "the man of sin;" as the former was ultimately banished for ever from the Holy land to her own congenial soil, Babylon, so iniquity and the man of sin shall fall before Michael and the Lord Himself, who shall appear as the Deliverer of His people (Daniel, 12. 1-3; Zechariah, 14. 3-9). Cf. Matthew, 12. 43. The Jewish nation dispossessed of the evil spirit, the demon of idolatry being cast out through the Babylonian captivity, receives ultimately a worse form of the evil spirit, Christ-opposing self-righteousness. Also, the Christian church in course of time taken possession of by the demon of Romish idolatry, then dispossessed of it by the Reformation, then its house "garnished" by hypocrisy, secularity, and rationalism, but "swept empty" of living faith, then finally apostatizing and repossessed by "the man of sin," and outwardly destroyed for a brief time (though even then Christ shall have witnesses for him among both the Jews, Zechariah, 13. 9, and Gentiles, Matthew, 23. 20), when Christ shall suddenly come (Daniel, 11. 32-45; Luke, 18. 7, 8). already—3 John, 9, 10; Colossians, 3. 18-45; 1 Timothy, 4. 1)—cf. "even now already" (1 John, 2. 18; 4. 3) as distinguished from "in his own time" of being revealed henceforth. Antiquity, it appears from hence, is not a justification for unscriptural usages or dogmas, since these were "already," even in Paul's time, beginning to spring up: the written word is the only sure test. "Judaism infecting Christianity is the fuel; the mystery of iniquity is the spark." "It is one and the same impurity diffusing itself over many ages." (BENJEL) only he who now letteth will let—The italicised words are not in the Greek. Therefore translate rather, "Only (i.e., the continuance of the mystery of iniquity-working will be only) until he who now withholdeth (the same Greek as in v. 6) be taken out of the way." "Only waiting, Hebrews, 10. 13 until he," &c. Then it will work no longer in mystery, but in open manifestation. 8. Translate, "The lawless one," the embodiment of all the godless "lawlessness" which has been working in "mystery" for ages, &c. : "the man of sin" &c. whom the Lord—Some of the oldest MSS. read, "the Lord Jesus." How awful that He whose very name means God-Saviour, should appear as the Destroyer; but the salvation of the Church requires the destruction of her foe. As the reign of Israel in Canaan was ushered in by judgments on the nations for apostasy, for the Canaanites were originally worshippers of the true God; thus Melchisedek, king of Salem, was the "priest of the most high God," (Genesis, 14. 18; Ammon and Moab came from righteous Lot, so the Son of David's reign in Zion and over the whole earth, is to be ushered in by judgments on the apostate Christian world. consume...and...destroy—So Daniel, 7. 26, "consume and destroy;" Daniel, 11. 45. He shall "consume" him by His mere breath (Isaiah, 11. 4; 30. 33): the sentence of judgment being the sharp sword that goeth out of His mouth (Revelation, 19. 15, 21). Antichrist's manifestation and destruction are declared in the same breath; at his greatest height he is nearest his fall, like Herod his type (Isaiah, 1. 24-27; Acts, 12. 20-23). As the advancing fire, whilst still at a distance consumes little insects (ΧΗΡΥΣΣΟΝ) by its mere heat, so Christ's mere approach is enough to consume antichrist. The mere "appearance of the coming" of the Lord of glory is sufficient to show to antichrist his perfect nothingness. He is seized and "cast alive into the lake of fire" (Revelation, 19. 20). So the world-kingdoms, and the kingdom of the beast, give place to that of the Son of man and His saints. "The Greek for "destroy" means "abolish," the same Greek is so translated, 2 Timothy, 1. 10; i.e., cause every vestige of him to disappear. Cf. as to Gog attacking Israel and destroyed by Jehovah (Ezekiel, 38. and 39.), so as not to leave a vestige of him. with the brightness of his coming—Greek, "the manifestation (or appearance) of His presence;" the first outburst of His advent—the first gleam of His presence—is enough to abolish utterly all traces of antichrist, as darkness disappears before the dawning day. Next, his adherents are "slain with the sword out of his mouth" (Revelation, 19. 21). BENOEL'S distinction between "the appearance of His coming" and the "coming" itself is not justified by 1 Timothy, 6. 14; 2 Timothy, 1. 10; 4. 1. 8; Titus, 2. 13, where the same Greek for appearing (English Version, here "the brightness") plainly refers to the coming itself. The expression, "manifestation (appearing) of His presence," is used in awful contrast to the revelation of the wicked one in the beginning of the verse. 9. whose coming (v. 8), or personal "presence," is—in its essential character, after—according to the working ("energy") of Satan, as opposed to the energy or working of the Holy Spirit in the Church (Note, Ephesians, 1. 19). As Christ is related to God, so is antichrist to Satan, his visible embodiment and manifestation: Satan works through him. Revelation, 13. 2, "The dragon gave him (the beast) his power, seat, great authority," lying wonders—lit., "wonders" or "prodigies of falsehood." His "power, signs, and wonders," all have falsehood for their base, essence, and aim (John, 8. 44). [ALFORD.] In Matthew, 24. 24, Jesus implies that the miracles shall be real, though demonic, such mysterious effects of the powers of darkness, as we read of in the case of the Egyptian sorcerers, not such as Jesus performed in their character, power, or aim; for they are against the revealed Word, and therefore not to be accepted as evidences of truth; nay, on the authority of that sure Word of prophecy here, and Matthew, 24. 24), to be known and rejected as wrought in support of falsehood (Deuteronomy, 13. 1-3, 5; Galatians, 1. 8, 9; Revelation, 13. 11-15; 19. 20). The same three Greek words occur for miracles of Jesus (Acts, 2. 22, and Hebrews, 2. 4); showing that as the Egyptian magician imitated Moses (2 Timothy, 3. 1-8), so antichrist tries to imitate Christ's works as a "sign," or proof of divinity. 10. deceivableness—rather as Greek, "deceit of (to promote) unrighteousness" (v. 12). In—The oldest MSS. and versions omit "in." Translate, "Unto them that are perishing" (2 Corinthians, 2. 15, 16; 4. 3): the victims of him whose very name describes his perishing nature, "the son of perdition;" in contrast to you whom (v. 13) "God hath from the beginning chosen to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth," because—lit., "in requital for;" in just retribution for their having no love for the truth which was within their reach (on account of its putting a check on their bad passions), and for their having pleasure in unrighteousness" (v. 12; Romans, 1. 18); they are lost because they loved not, but rejected, the truth which would have saved them. received not—Greek, "welcomed not;" admitted it not cordially. love of the truth—not merely love of truth, but love of the truth (and of Jesus who is the Truth, in opposition to Satan's "lie" v. 9, 11; John, 8. 42-44), can save (Ephesians, 4. 21). We are required not merely to assent to, but to love the truth (Psalm 119. 97). The Jews rejected Him who came in His Divine Father's name; they will receive antichrist coming in his own name (John, 5. 43). Their pleasant sin shall prove their terrible scourge. 11. for this cause—Because "they received not the love of the truth." The best safeguard against error is "the love of the truth," shall send—Greek, "sends," or "is sending;" the "delusion" is already beginning. God judicially sends hardness of heart on those who have rejected the truth, and gives them up in righteous judgment to Satan's delusions (Isaiah, 6. 9, 10; Romans, 1.

24-26, 28). They first cast off the love of the truth, then God gives them up to Satan's delusions, then they settle down into "believing the lie;" an awful climax (1 Kings, 22. 22, 23; Ezekiel, 14. 9; Job, 12. 19; Matthew, 24. 6, 11; 1 Timothy, 4. 1). strong delusion—Greek, "the powerful working of error," answering to the energizing "working of Satan" (v. 9); the same expression as is applied to the Holy Ghost's operation in believers: "powerful" or "effectual (energising) working" (Ephesians, 1. 19). believe a lie—rather "the lie" which antichrist tells them, appealing to his miracles as proof of it (v. 9). 12. they all...damned—rather as Greek, "that all," &c. He here states the general proposition which applies specially to antichrist's adherents. Not all in the Church of Rome, or other anti-Christian systems, shall be damned, but only "all who believed not the truth" when offered to them, "but had pleasure in unrighteousness" (Romans, 1. 32; 2. 8). Love of unrighteousness being the great obstacle to believing the truth. 13. But—In delightful contrast to the damnation of the lost (v. 12) stands the "salvation" of Paul's converts, are bound—in duty (ch. 1. 3). thanks to God—not to ourselves, your ministers, nor to you, our converts. beloved of the Lord—Jesus (Romans, 8. 37; Galatians, 2. 20; Ephesians, 5. 2. 25). Elsewhere God the Father is said to love us (v. 16; John, 3. 16; Ephesians, 2. 4; Colossians, 3. 12). Therefore Jesus and the Father are one from the beginning—before the foundation of the world" (Ephesians, 1. 4; cf. 1 Corinthians, 4. 7; 2 Timothy, 1. 9); in contrast to those that shall "worship the beast, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world" (Revelation, 13. 8). Some of the oldest MSS. read as English Version, but other oldest MSS. and Vulgate read, "as first-fruits." The Thessalonians were among the first converts in Europe (cf. Romans, 16. 5; 1 Corinthians, 16. 16). In a more general sense, it occurs in James, 1. 18; Revelation, 14. 4; so I understand it here including the more restricted sense chosen you—The Greek is not the ordinary word for "elected," implying His eternal selection; but takes for Himself, implying His having adopted them in His eternal purpose. It is found in the LXX. (Deuteronomy, 7. 7; 10. 15). through—rather as Greek, "is sanctification" as the element in which the choice to salvation had place (cf. 1 Peter, 1. 2), standing in contrast to the "unrighteousness," the element in which antichrist's followers are given over by God to damnation (v. 12). of the Spirit—wrought by the Spirit who sanctifies all the elect people of God, first by eternally consecrating them to perfect holiness in Christ, once for all, next by progressively imparting it. belief of the truth—contrasted with "believed not the truth" (v. 12, 14. you—The oldest MSS. read, "us," by our gospel—through" the gospel which we preach. to...glory—in v. 13, it was "salvation," &c., deliverance from all evil, of body and soul (1 Thessalonians, 5. 9); here it is positive good, even "glory," and that "the glory of our Lord Jesus" Himself, which believers are privileged to share with Him (John, 17. 22, 24; Romans, 5. 17, 20; 2 Timothy, 2. 10). 15. Therefore—God's sovereign choice of believers, so far from being a ground for inaction on their part, is the strongest incentive to action and perseverance in it. Cf. the argument, Philipians, 2. 12, 13, "Work out your own salvation, for it is God which worketh in you," &c. We cannot fully explain this in theory; but to the sincere and humble, the practical acting on the principle is plain. "Privilege first, duty afterwards." [EDMUNDS.] stand fast—so as not to be "shaken or troubled" (v. 2. hold fast—as not to let go. Adding nothing, subtracting nothing. [BENOEL.] The Thessalonians had not held fast his oral instructions, but had suffered themselves to be imposed upon by pretended spirit-revelations, and words and letters pretending to be from Paul (v. 2).

that "the day of the Lord was instantly traditions—truths delivered and transmitted, or in writing (ch. 3. 6; 1 Corinthians, traditions"). The Greek verb from which nos, is used by Paul 1 Corinthians, 11. 23; the three passages in which "tradition" is of sense, Rome has argued for her ad unspired traditions, virtually overword, whilst put forward as of co-ordinate with it. She forgets the few passages (Mat. 6; Mark. 7. 3, 5, 8, 9, 13; Galatians, 1. 14; 5) stigmatizing man's unspired traditions the apostles' sayings were all inspired dissimulation, Galatians, 2. 11-14), but they claimed to be so, as in their words embodied in their canonical writings. Oral as necessary in their case, until the canon word should be complete; they proved long of inspiration by miracles wrought in a new revelation, which revelation, more-ideal with the existing Old Testament revelational test needed besides miracles (cf. 7. 13. 1-6; Acts, 17. 11). When the canon is the infallibility of the living men was the written word, now the sole unerringly interpreted by the Holy Spirit. Little else was to us by the most ancient and unerringly this, the all-sufficiency of Scripture. Therefore, by tradition, we are contrasted off all tradition not contained in, or by, Scripture. The Fathers are valuable historical facts, which give force to the scripture: such as the Christian Lord's-ism of infants, and the genuineness of the rapture. Tradition (in the sense human cannot establish a doctrine, but can authenticate, such as the facts just mentioned. In fact, in St. Paul's sense, is not a supplement tradition completing our written word, with the written word now complete; it is not being complete, the tradition was a part oral, in part written, and continued latter being complete before the death of the last apostle, the former was no longer a part oral, according to Paul, the complete rule in all that appertains to making God perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all (2 Timothy, 3. 16, 17). It is by leaving ad-inspired tradition for human traditions has become the forerunner and parent of it. It is striking that, from this very origin, antichrist, she should draw a her "traditions" by which she fosters unity. Because the apostles' oral word was by as their written word, it by no means the oral word of those not apostles, is as as the written word of those who were inspired evangelists. No tradition of the cept their written word, can be proved satisfactory evidence. We are no more cept implicitly the fathers' interpretations, because we accept the Scripture canon on my, than we are bound to accept the Jews' in of the Old Testament, because we accept statement canon on their testimony. Our istinguished from a "letter as from us," purports to be from us, but is not. He first epistle to the Thessalonians, 16, 17. His own might, as contrasted with our ensuring the efficacy of our prayer. Here she stands first; in 1 Thessalonians, 3. 11, father, "which loved us—in the work of tion." Referring both to our Lord Jesus (7; Galatians, 2. 20) and God our Father, everlasting consolation—Not transitory, as worldly consolations in trials (Romans, 8. 38, 39). This for all time present, and then "good hope" for the future. (ALFORD.) through grace—rather as Greek, "in grace"; to be joined to "hath given." Grace is the element in which the gift was made. comfort your hearts—unsettled as you have been through those who announced the immediate coming of the Lord. good word and work—The oldest MSS. invert the order, "work and word." Establishment in these were what the young converts at Thessalonica needed, not tautological teaching (cf. 1 Corinthians, 15. 58).

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-18. HE ASKS THEIR PRAYERS: HIS CONFIDENCE IN THEM: PRAYER FOR THEM: CHARGE AGAINST DISORDERLY IDLE CONDUCT; HIS OWN EXAMPLE: CONCLUDING PRAYER AND SALUTATION. 1. Finally—lit., "As to what remains," may have free course—lit., "may run;" spread rapidly without a drag on the wheels of its course. That the new-creating word may "run" as "swiftly" as the creative word at the first (Psalm 147. 15). The opposite is the word of God being "bound" (3 Timothy, 2. 9). glorified—by sinners accepting it (Acts, 13. 48; Galatians, 1. 23, 24). Contrast "evil spoken of" (1 Peter, 4. 14). as it is with you—(1 Thessalonians, 1. 6; 4. 10; 5. 11.) 2. that we...be delivered from unreasonable...men—lit., men out of place, except, unseemly; out of the way bad: more than ordinarily bad. An undesigned coincidence with Acts, 18. 6-9. Paul was now at Corinth, where THE JEWS "opposed themselves" to his preaching; in answer to his prayers and those of his converts at Thessalonica and elsewhere, "the Lord, in vision," assured him of exemption from "hurt," and of success in bringing in "much people." On the unreasonable, out-of-the-way perversity of the Jews, as known to the Thessalonians, see 1 Thessalonians, 2. 15, 16. have not faith—as Greek, "the faith" of the Christian: the only antidote to what is "unreasonable and wicked." The Thessalonians, from their ready acceptance of the gospel (1 Thessalonians, 1. 5, 6), might think "all" would similarly receive it; but the Jews were far from having such a readiness to believe the truth. 3. faithful—alluding to "faith" (v. 2); though many will not believe, the Lord (other very old MSS. read, "God") is still to be believed in as faithful to His promises (1 Thessalonians, 5. 24; 2 Timothy, 2. 13). Faith on the part of man, answers to faithfulness on the part of God. establish you—as he had prayed (ch. 2. 17). Though it was on himself that wicked men were making their onset, he turns away from asking the Thessalonians' prayers for his deliverance (v. 2): so unselfish was he, even in religion, to express his assurance of THEIR establishment in the faith, and preservation from evil. This assurance thus exactly answers to his prayer for them, ch. 2. 17. "Our Lord...establish you in every good word and work." He has before his mind the Lord's prayer. "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil:" where, as here, the translation may be, "from the evil one": the great hinderer of "every good word and work." Cf. Matthew, 13. 19, "the wicked one." 4. we have confidence in the Lord—as "faithful" (v. 3). Have confidence in no man when left to himself. (BENJAMIN.) that ye both do—Some of the oldest MSS. insert a clause, "That ye both have done" before, "and are doing, and will do." He means the majority by "ye," not all of them (cf. v. 11; ch. 1. 3; 1 Thessalonians, 3. 6). 5. If "the Lord" be here the Holy Ghost (2 Corinthians, 3. 17), the three Persons of the Trinity will occur in this verse. love of God—love to God. patient waiting for Christ—rather as Greek, "the patience (endurance) of Christ," viz., which Christ showed (ALFORD) (ch. 2. 4; 1 Thessalonians, 1. 3. EUSTATIUS, however, supports English Version (cf. Revelation, 1. 9; 3. 10). At all events, this "patience," or patient endurance, is connected with the "hope" of Thessalonians, 1, 3, 10 of Christ's coming. In ALFORD'S translation we may compare Hebrews, 12, 1, 2. "Run with patience (endurance)... looking to JESUS... who, for the joy that was before Him, endured the cross;" so we are to endure, as looking for the hope to be realized at His coming (Hebrews, 12, 26, 27). 6. We command you—Hereby he puts to a particular test their obedience in general to his commands, which obedience he had recognized in v. 4. withdraw—lit., to furl the sails: as we say, to steer clear of (cf. v. 14). Some had given up labour as though the Lord's day was immediately coming. He had enjoined mild censure of such in 1 Thessalonians, 5, 14. "Warn... the unruly;" but now that the mischief had become more confirmed, he enjoins stricter discipline, viz., withdrawal from their company (cf. 1 Corinthians, 5, 11; 2 John, 10, 11); not a formal sentence of excommunication, such as was subsequently passed on more heinous offenders, as in 1 Corinthians, 5, 6; 1 Timothy, 1, 20. He says "brother," i.e., professing Christian; for in the case of unprofessing heathen, believers needed not be so strict (1 Corinthians, 5, 10-13). disorderly—St. Paul plainly would not have sanctioned the Order of Mendicant friars, who reduce such a "disorderly" and lazy life to a system. Call it not an Order, but a burden to the community (Bengel, alluding to the Greek, v. 8, for "be chargeable," lit., be a burden), the tradition—the oral instruction which he had given to them when present (v. 10), and subsequently committed to writing (1 Thessalonians, 4, 11, 12), which he revived of us—Some oldest MSS. read, "Ye received," others, "they received." The English Version reading has no very old authority. 7. how ye ought to follow us—how ye ought to live so as to "imitate" (so the Greek for "follow") us (cf. Note, 1 Corinthians, 11, 1; 1 Thessalonians, 1, 6). 8. eat say man's bread—Greek, "eat bread from any man," i.e., live at any one's expense. Contrast v. 12. "Eat THEIR OWN BREAD," wrought (Acts, 20, 34). In both epistles they state they maintained themselves by labour; but in this second epistle they do so in order to offer themselves herein as an example to the idle; whereas, in the first, their object in doing so is to vindicate themselves from all imputation of mercenary motives in preaching the gospel (1 Thessalonians, 2, 5, 9). [EDMUNDS.] They preached gratuitously, though they might have claimed maintenance from their converts, labour and travail—"toil and hardship" (Note, 1 Thessalonians, 2, 9). night and day—Scarcely allowing time for repose. chargeable—Greek, "a burden," or "burdensome." The Philippians did not regard it as a burden to contribute to his support (Philippians, 4, 15, 16), sending to him whilst he was in this very Thessalonica (Acts, 16, 15, 34, 40). Many Thessalonians, doubtless, would have felt it a privilege to contribute, but as he saw some idlers among them who would have made a pretext of his example to justify themselves, he waived his right. His reason for the same course at Corinth was to mark how different were his aims from those of the false teachers who sought their own lucre (2 Corinthians, 11, 9, 12, 13). It is at the very time and place of writing these epistles that Paul is expressly said to have wrought at tent-making with Aquila (Acts, 18, 3); an undesigned coincidence. 9. (1 Corinthians, 9, 4-6, &c.; Galatians, 6, 6.) 10. For even—translate, "For also." We not only set you the example, but gave a positive "command." commanded—Greek imperfect, "We were commanding;" we kept charge of you. would not work—Greek, "is unwilling to work." BENGEI makes this to be the argument; not that such a one is to have his food withdrawn from him by others; but he proves from the necessity of eating, the necessity of working; using this pleasantry. Let him who will not work show himself an angel, i.e., do without food as the angels do (but since he cannot do without food, then he ought to be not unwilling to work). It seems to me simpler to take it as a punishment of the idle. Paul often quotes good edges current among the people, stamping them with inspired approval. In the Hebrew, Bereshith Rabba, the same saying is found; and in the book Zeror, "He who will not work before the Sabbath, must not eat on the Sabbath." 11. busybodies—In the Greek the similarity of sound marks the antithesis, "Doing none of their own business, yet overdoing in the business of others." Busy about every one's business but their own. "Nature abhors a vacuum;" so if not doing one's own business, one is apt to meddle with his neighbour's business. Idleness is the parent of busybodies (1 Timothy, 5, 13). Contrast 1 Thessalonians, 4, 11. 12. by—The oldest MSS. read, "In the Lord Jesus." So the Greek, 1 Thessalonians, 4, 1, implying the sphere wherein such conduct is appropriate and consistent. We exhort you thus, as ministers in Christ, exhorting our people to Christ, with quietness—quiet industry; laying aside restless, bustling, intermeddling officiousness (v. 11). their own—Bread earned by themselves, not another's bread (v. 8). 13. be not weary—The oldest MSS. read, "Be not cowardly in;" do not be wanting in strenuousness in doing well. EDMUNDS explains it, Do not culpably neglect to do well, viz., with patient industry to do your duty in your several callings. In contrast to the "disorderly, not-working, busybodies" (v. 11; cf. Galatians, 6, 9). 14. note that man—mark him in your own minds as one to be avoided v. 6. that he may be ashamed—Greek, "made to turn and look into himself, and so be put to shame." Feeling himself shamed by godly brethren he may become ashamed of his course. 15. admonish him as a brother—not yet excommunicated (cf. Leviticus, 19, 17). Do not shun him in contemptuous silence, but tell him why he is so avoided (Matthew, 18, 15; 1 Thessalonians, 5, 14, 16. Lord of peace—Jesus Christ. The same title is given to Him as to the Father, "the God of peace" (Romans, 15, 33; 16, 20; 2 Corinthians, 13, 11). An appropriate title in the prayer here, where the harmony of the Christian community was liable to interruption from the "disorderly." The Greek article requires the translation, "Give you the peace" which it is "His to give." "Peace" outward and inward, here and hereafter (Romans, 14, 17). always—unbroken, not changing with outward circumstances, by all means—Greek, "in every way." Most of the oldest MSS. read, "in every place;" thus he prays for their peace in all times ("always") and places. Lord be with you all—May He bless you not only with peace, but also with His presence (Matthew, 28, 20). Even the disorderly brethren (cf. v. 15, "a brother") are included in this prayer. 17. The epistle was written by an amanuensis (perhaps Silas or Timothy), and only the closing salutation written by Paul's "own hand" (cf. Romans, 16, 22; 1 Corinthians, 16, 21; Colossians, 4, 18). Wherever Paul does not subjoin this autograph salutation, we may presume he wrote the whole epistle himself (Galatians, 6, 11), which—which autograph salutation, the tokens to distinguish genuine epistles from spurious ones put forth in my name ch. 2, 2). an every epistle—Some think he signed his name to every epistle with his own hand, but as there is no trace of this in any MSS. of all the epistles, it is more likely that he alludes to his writing with his own hand in closing every epistle, even in those epistles (Romans, 2 Corinthians, Ephesians, Philippians, 1 Thessalonians) wherein he does not specify his having done so. so I write—so I sign my name: this is a specimen of my handwriting, by which you may distinguish my genuine letters from forgeries. 18. He closes every epistle similarly by praying for GRACE to those whom he addresses. Amen—Omitted in the oldest MSS. It was doubtless the response of the congregation after hearing the epistle read publicly; hence it crept into copies.

The Subscription is spurious, as the epistle was written not "from Athens," but from Corinth.

PASTORAL EPISTLES,

I. & II. TIMOTHY & TITUS.

INTRODUCTION.

HESS.—The ancient church never doubted of their being canonical and written by St. Paul. They are in the Syriac version of the second century. Murator's Fragment on the Canon of Scripture, at the close of which, acknowledges them as such. Irenaeus, adversus Haereseos, I. and III. 2. 3; IV. 26. 3; II. 14. 3; III. 1. quotes, 1 Timothy, 1. 4, 5; 6. 20; 2 Timothy, 4. 9-11; Titus, 2. 10. Clement of Alexandria, Stromata, 2. 667; 56. quotes, 1 Timothy, 4. 1, 20; 2 Timothy, 4. 10; 1 Timothy, 1. 16; 6. 13, 20; 2 Timothy, 2. 2; Titus, 2. 10, 11; and also. Eusebius includes the three in the "universally acknowledged" Scriptures. Also Theophilus of Antioch, 2. 14. quotes, 1 Timothy, 2. 1, 2; Titus, 2. 1; and Celsus (in Eusebius, Eccelesiastical History, 6. 28) recognizes their authority. Clement of Rome, in the end of the first century, in his first Epistle to Corinthians, ch. 21. quotes, 1 Timothy, 4. 10. Ignatius, in the beginning of the second century, in Epistle to Polycarp, sec. 6. alludes to 2 Timothy, 2. 1, in the beginning of the second century (Epistle to Philippians, ch. 4. alludes to 2 Timothy, 2. 4; and in Timothy, 4. 10. Hegesippus, in the end of the second century, in Eusebius, Eccelesiastical History, 2. 20. alludes to 2. 20. Athanasius, in the end of the second century, alludes to 1 Timothy, 4. 10. Justin Martyr, in the second century (Dialogus, contra Tryphonem, 47), alludes to Titus, 2. 4. The Gnostic Marcion alone rejected HERESIES OPPOSED in them form the transition stage from Judaism, in its ascetic form, to Gnosticism, fully developed. The references to Judaism and legalism are clear (1 Timothy, 1. 7; 4. 3; Titus, 1. 10, 14; 2. 9. meaning Gnosticism are also unequivocal (1 Timothy, 1. 4). The Gnostic theory of a twofold principle from the 1 as well as good, appears in germ in 1 Timothy, 4. 3, 8a. In 1 Timothy, 4. 20, the term Gnosis ("wisdom") itself her Gnostic error, viz., that "the resurrection is past," is alluded to in 2 Timothy, 2. 17, 18. The Judaism is not that of the earlier epistles which upheld the law and tried to join it with faith in Christ for justification passed into that phase of it which appears in the epistle to the Colossians, whereby will-worship and angel-worship to Judaism opinions. Then a further stage of the same evil appears in the epistle to the Philippians, whereby immemorial practices accompanied false doctrine as to the resurrection (cf. 2 Timothy, 2. 18, with 1. 18, 20, 33). This descent from legality to superstition, and from superstition to godlessness, appears more by references to it in these pastoral epistles. The false teachers now know not the true use of the law (7. 8), and further, have put away good consciences as well as the faith (1 Timothy, 1. 19; 4. 2); speak lies in a corrupt mind, and regard godliness as a means of earthly gain (1 Timothy, 6. 5; Titus, 1. 11); overthrow heretics eating as a canker, saying the resurrection is past (2 Timothy, 2. 17, 18), leading captives silly women, yet never knowing the truth, reprobate as James and Jambres (2 Timothy, 2. 6-8), despise, unbelieving, profane-God but in words denying Him, abominable, disobedient, reprobate (Titus, 1. 15, 16). This description accords with the catholic epistles of St. John and St. Peter, and in the epistle to the Hebrews. This fact proves the later pastoral epistles as compared with Paul's earlier epistles. The Judaism reprobated herein is not that of an scrupulous as to the law; it was now tending to immorality of practice. On the other hand, the Gnosticism of these epistles is not the anti-Judaic Gnosticism of a later date which arose as a consequence of the overthrow of the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, but it was the intermediate phase between Judaism and Gnosticism the Oriental and Greek elements of the latter were in a kind of amalgam with Judaism, just prior to the Jerusalem.

REFERENCES AS TO CHURCH GOVERNORS and ministers, "bishop-elders, and deacons," are such as for the apostle, in prospect of his own approaching removal, to give to Timothy, the president of the church and to Titus holding the same office in Crete, for securing the due administration of the church when he more, and at a time when heresies were rapidly springing up. Cf. his similar anxiety in his address to the Acts, 20. 21-30). The Presbyterial (elders: priest is a contraction from presbyter) and Diaconate had existed earliest times in the church (Acts, 6. 3; 11. 30; 14. 23). Timothy and Titus, as superintendents or overseers (as frequently meant), were to exercise the same power in ordaining elders of Ephesus, which the apostle had in general supervision of all the Gentile churches.

LIABILITIES OF MODES, OF THOUGHT, AND EXPRESSION, are such as the differences of subject-matter of those addressed and those spoken of in these epistles, as compared with the other epistles, would lead. Some of these peculiar phrases occur also in Galatians, in which, as in the pastoral epistles, he, with his fervour, attacks the false teachers. Cf. 1 Timothy, 2. 6; Titus, 2. 14. "Gave Himself for us," with Galatians, 1. 1, 17; 2 Timothy, 4. 18. "For ever and ever," with Galatians, 1. 5; "Before God," 1 Timothy, 5. 21; 6. 13; 14; 4. 1, with Galatians, 1. 20. "A pillar," 1 Timothy, 3. 15, with Galatians, 2. 9. "Mediator," 1 Timothy, 2. 5, 2. 3, 20. "In due season," Galatians, 6. 9, with 1 Timothy, 3. 6; 6. 15; Titus, 1. 2.

PLACE OF WRITING.—The first epistle to Timothy was written not long after Paul had left Ephesus (ch. 1. 3). Now, as Timothy was in Macedonia with Paul (2 Corinthians, 1. 1) on the occasion of Paul's from Ephesus into that country, as recorded Acts, 19. 22; 20. 1, whereas the first epistle to Timothy contains a stay of Timothy in Ephesus, Mosheim supposes that Paul was nine months at the "three years" stay Jesus (Acts, 20. 31) in Macedonia and elsewhere [perhaps Crete], (the mention of only "three months" Acts, 19. 8, 10, favours this, the remaining nine months being spent elsewhere); and that during these Timothy, in Paul's absence, superintended the church of Ephesus. It is not likely that Ephesus and the churches should have been left long without church officers and church organization, rules respecting which his epistle. Moreover, Timothy was still "a youth" (1 Timothy, 4. 12), which he could hardly be called after imprisonment, when he must have been at least thirty-four years of age. Lastly, in Acts, 20. 26, St. Paul asserts that the Ephesians should not all see his face again, so that 1 Timothy, 1. 2, will thus refer to his sojourn at Acts, 19. 10, whence he passed into Macedonia. But the difficulty is to account for the false teachers to appear almost immediately (according to this theory) after the foundation of the church. However, his visit recorded Acts, 19, was not his first visit. The beginning of the church at Ephesus was probably made at his visit a year before (Acts, 18-19-21). Apollus, Aquila, and Priscilla, carried on the work (Acts, 18-24-26). Thus, as to the sudden growth of false teachers, there was time enough for their springing up, especially considering that the first converts at Ephesus were under Apollus' imperfect Christian teachings at first, inasmuch as he was likely to be with the tenets of Philo of Alexandria, Apollus' native town, combined with John the Baptist's Old Testament teachings (Acts, 18-21-25). Besides Ephesus, from its position in Asia, its notorious voluptuousness and sorcery (Acts, 19, 18, 19), and its lewd worship of Diana (answering to the Phœnician Ashtoreth), was likely from the first to tinge Christianity in some of its converts with Oriental speculations and Asiatic licentiousness of practices. Thus the phenomenon of the phase of error presented in this epistle, being intermediate between Judaism and later Gnosticism (see above), would be such as might occur at an early period in the Ephesian church, as well as later, when we know it had open "apostles" of error (Revelation, 2, 2, 6), and Nicolaitans infamous in practice. As to the close connection between this first epistle and the second epistle (which must have been written at the close of Paul's life), on which Alford relies for his theory of making the first epistle also written at the close of St. Paul's life, the similarity of circumstances, the person addressed being one and the same, and either in Ephesus at the time, or at least connected with Ephesus as its church-overseer, and having heretics to contend with of the same stamp as in the first epistle, would account for the connection. There is not so great identity of tone as to compel us to adopt the theory that some years could not have elapsed between the two epistles.

However, all these arguments against the later date may be answered. This first epistle may refer not to the first organization of the church under its bishops, or elders and deacons, but to the moral qualifications laid down at a later period for those officers when scandals rendered such directions needful. Indeed, the object for which he left Timothy at Ephesus he states (1 Timothy, 1, 3) to be, not to organize the church for the first time, but to restrain the false teachers. The directions as to the choice of fit elders and deacons refers to the filling up of vacancies, not to their first appointment. The fact of there existing an institution for church-widows implies an established organization. As to Timothy's "youth," it may be spoken of comparatively young compared with Paul now "the aged" (Philemon, 9), and with some of the Ephesian elders, senior to Timothy their overseer. As to Acts, 20, 33, we know not but that "all" of the elders of Ephesus called to Miletus "never saw Paul's face" afterwards, as he "knew" (doubtless by inspiration) would be the case, which obviates the need of Alford's last view, that Paul was wrong in this his positive inspired anticipation for such it was, not a mere bold surmise as to the future. He probably visited Ephesus again (1 Timothy, 1, 3; 2 Timothy, 1, 18; 4, 20), he would hardly have been of Miletus, so near Ephesus, without visiting Ephesus after his first imprisonment in Rome, though all the Ephesian elders whom he had addressed formerly at Miletus did not again see him. The general similarity of subject and style, and of the state of the church between the two epistles, favours the view that they were near one another in date. Also, against the theory of the early date is the difficulty of defining, when, during Paul's two or three years' stay at Ephesus, we can insert an absence of Paul from Ephesus long enough for the requirements of the case which imply a lengthened stay and superintendence of Timothy at Ephesus (see, however, 1 Timothy, 3, 14, on the other side after having been "left" by Paul there. Timothy did not stay there when Paul left Ephesus (Acts, 19, 22; 20, 1; 2 Corinthians, 1, 1). (In 1 Timothy, 3, 14, Paul says, "I write, hoping to come unto thee shortly;" but on the earlier occasion of his passing from Ephesus to Macedonia he had no such expectation, but had planned to spend the summer in Macedonia, and the winter in Corinth, 1 Corinthians, 16, 6. The expression "Till I come," etc., 1 Timothy, 4, 13, implies that Timothy was not to leave his post till Paul should arrive; this and the former objection, however, do not hold good against Moshelm's theory.) Moreover, Paul in his farewell address to the Ephesian elders propheticly anticipates the rise of false teachers hereafter of their own evil; therefore this first epistle, which speaks of their actual presence at Ephesus, would naturally seem to be not prior, but subsequent, to the address, i.e., will belong to the later date assigned. In the epistle to the Ephesians no notice is taken of the Judaic-Gnostic errors, which would have been noticed, had they been already in existence; however, they are alluded to in the contemporaneous sister-epistle to Colossians (Colossians, 2).

Whatever doubt must always remain as to the date of the first epistle, there can be hardly any as to that of the second epistle. In 2 Timothy, 4, 13, Paul directs Timothy to bring the books and cloak which the apostle had left at Troas. Assuming that the visit to Troas referred to is the one mentioned in Acts, 20, 5-7, it will follow that the cloak and garments lay for about seven years at Troas, that being the time that elapsed between the visit and Paul's first imprisonment at Rome: a very unlikely supposition, that he should have left either unused for so long. Again, when, during his first Roman imprisonment, he wrote to the Colossians (Colossians, 4, 14) and Philemon (Philemon, 24), Demas was with him; but when he was writing 2 Timothy, 4, 10, Demas had forsaken him from love of this world, and gone to Thessalonica. Again, when he wrote to the Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, and Philemon, he had good hopes of a speedy liberation; but here in 2 Timothy, 4, 6-8, he anticipates immediate death, having been at least once already tried (2 Timothy, 4, 16). Again, he is in this epistle represented as in closer confinement, than he was when writing those former epistles in his first imprisonment (even in the Philippians, which represent him in greater uncertainty as to his life, he cherished the hope of soon being delivered, Philippians, 2, 24; 2 Timothy, 1, 16-18; 2, 9; 4, 6-8, 18). Again (2 Timothy, 4, 20), he speaks of having left Trophimus sick at Miletus. This could not have been on the occasion, Acts, 20, 13. For Trophimus was with Paul at Jerusalem shortly afterwards (Acts, 21, 29). Besides he would thus be made to speak of an event six or seven years after its occurrence, as a recent event; moreover, Timothy was, on that occasion of the apostle being at Miletus, with Paul, and therefore needed not to be informed of Trophimus' sickness there (Acts, 21, 4-17). Also, the statement (ib., 4, 9) "Erastus abode at Corinth," implies that St. Paul had shortly before been at Corinth, and left Erastus there; but Paul had not been at Corinth for several years before his first imprisonment, and in the interval Timothy had been with him, so that he did not need to write subsequently about that visit. He must therefore have been liberated after his first imprisonment (indeed, Hebrews, 13, 23, 24, expressly proves that the writer was in Italy and of liberty), and resumed his apostolic journeyings, and been imprisoned at Rome again, whence shortly before his death he wrote second Timothy.

Eusebius, Chronicles, anno 303 (beginning October, A.D. 67), says, "Nero, to his other crimes, added the persecution of Christians: under him the apostles Peter and Paul consummated their martyrdom at Rome." So Jerome, Catalogus Scripturarum Ecclesiasticarum. "In the fourteenth year of Nero, Paul was beheaded at Rome for Christ's sake, on the same day as Peter, and was buried on the Ostian Road, in the thirty-seventh year after the death of our Lord." Alford reasonably conjectures the pastoral epistles were written near this date. The interval was possibly filled up (so Clement of Rome states that Paul preached as far as "to the extremity of the west") by a journey to Spain (Romans, 15, 24, 28), according to his own original intention. Muratori's Fragment on the Canon (about 170 A.D.) also alleges Paul's journey into Spain. So Eusebius, Chrysostom, and Jerome. Be that as it may, he seems shortly before his second imprisonment to have visited Ephesus, where a new body of elders governed the church (Acts, 20, 22), say in the latter end of 66 A.D., or beginning opposing him thirty at his conversion, he would now be upwards of sixty, and older in constitution than in years, outworn hardship. Even four years before he called himself "Paul the aged" (Philemon, 9).

Epheusus he went into Macedonia (1 Timothy, 1. 3). He may have written the first epistle to Timothy from Crete. But his use of "went," not "came," in 1 Timothy, 1. 3. "When I went into Macedonia," implies he was when writing. Wherever he was, he writes uncertain how long he may be detained from coming to Timothy (1 Timothy, 5. 14, 15). Birks shows the probability that he wrote from Corinth, between which city and Ephesus the course was rapid and easy. His course, as on both former occasions, was from Macedon to Corinth. He finds a collocation 1 Timothy, 5. 11-14, and 1 Corinthians, 14. 34, as to women being silent in church; and 1 Timothy, 5. 17, orinthians, 9. 8-10, as to the maintenance of ministers, on the same principle as the Mosaic law, that the ox should treadeth out the corn; and 1 Timothy, 5. 19, 20, and 2 Corinthians, 12. 1-4, as to charges against elders. It is natural for the apostle in the very place where these directions had been enforced, to reproduce them in his letter. The site of the epistle to Titus must depend on that assigned to first Timothy, with which it is connected in subject, style, and tone. There is no difficulty in the epistle to Titus, written by itself, in assigning it to the earlier date, i. e. Paul's first imprisonment. In Acts, 18. 18, 19, Paul, in journeying from Corinth to Palestine, for some cause ended at Ephesus. Now we find (Titus, 3. 12) that Apollos in going from Ephesus to Corinth, was to touch at Crete, which seems to coincide with Apollos' journey from Ephesus to Corinth, recorded Acts, 18. 24, 27; 19. 1; therefore it is likely that Paul may have taken Crete similarly on his way between Corinth and Ephesus; or, perhaps been driven course to it in one of his three shipwrecks spoken of in 2 Corinthians, 11. 25, 26; this will account for his taking in his way from Corinth to Palestine, though out of his regular course. At Ephesus Paul may have written the epistle (Hug); there he probably met Apollos, and gave the epistle to Titus to his charge, before his departure for Crete, and before the apostle's departure for Jerusalem (Acts, 18. 19-21, 24). Moreover, on Paul's way to Jerusalem and Antioch, he travelled some time in Upper Asia (Acts, 19. 1), and it was then, probably, that he went to "winter at Nicopolis" was realized, there being a town of that name between Antioch and Tarsus, lying route to Galatia (Titus, 3. 12). Thus, first Timothy will, in this theory, be placed two and a half years later; cf. 1 Timothy, 1. 3.

The argument for classing the epistle to Titus with first Timothy, as written after Paul's first Roman imprisonment or falls with his argument for assigning first Timothy to that date. Indeed, Hug's unobjectionable argument for the earlier date of the epistle to Titus, favours the early date assigned to first Timothy, which is so much akin to arguments be not thought to counterbalance this. The church of Crete had been just founded (Titus, 1. 5), and heresies are censured in it as in Ephesus, which shows that no argument, such as Alford alleges against the date of first Timothy, can be drawn from them (Titus, 1. 10, 11, 15, 16; 3. 9, 11). But et cetera, if, as seems likely arguments adduced, the first epistle to Timothy be assigned to the later date, the epistle to Titus must, from similarity, belong to the same period. Alford traces Paul's last journey before his second imprisonment thus: To us, 1. 5), Miletus (2 Timothy, 4. 20), Colosse (fulfilling his intention, Philemon, 20), Ephesus (1 Timothy, 1. 3; 1. 18), from which neighbourhood he wrote the epistle to Titus, Troas, Macedonia, Corinth (2 Timothy, 4. 20), Titus, 3. 12) in Epirus, where he had intended to winter: a place in which, as being a Roman colony, he would in tumultuary violence, and yet would be more open to a direct attack from foes in the Metropolis, Rome. Being Rome as the leader of the Christians, he was probably [Alford] arrested as implicated in causing the fire in tributed by Nero to the Christians, and was sent to Rome by the Duumvirs of Nicopolis. There he was imprisoned a common malefactor (2 Timothy, 3. 9); his Asiatic friends deserted him, except Onesiphorus (2 Timothy, 1. 16), ecess, and Titus, left him. Tychicus he had sent to Ephesus. Luke alone remained with him (2 Timothy, 4. der these circumstances he writes the second epistle to Timothy, most likely whilst Timothy was at Ephesus 1. 3; cf. 1 Timothy, 1. 20; 2 Timothy, 4. 13), begging him to come to him before winter (2 Timothy, 4. 21), and ig his own execution soon (2 Timothy, 4. 6). Tychicus was perhaps the bearer of the second epistle (2 Timothy, s defence was not made before the emperor in person, for the latter was then in Greece (2 Timothy, 4. 16, 17), represents that he was executed by the sword, which accords with the fact that his Roman citizenship would n from torture: probably late in 67 A.D., or 68 A.D., the last year of Nero.

by is first mentioned, Acts, 16. 1, as dwelling in Lystra (not Derbe, of Acts, 20. 4). His mother was a Jewess imice (2 Timothy, 1. 5): his father, "a Greek" (i. e., a Gentile). As Timothy is mentioned as "a disciple" in Acts, must have been converted before, and this by St. Paul (1 Timothy, 1. 3), probably at his former visit to Lystra 3; at the same time, probably, that his Scripture-loving mother, Eunice, and grandmother Lois, were converts 1 from Judaism (2 Timothy, 3. 14, 15). Not only the good report given as to him by the brethren of Lystra, but rigin, partly Jewish, partly Gentile, adapted him specially for being St. Paul's assistant in missionary work, as the apostle did in each place, firstly among the Jews, and then among the Gentiles. In order to obviate Jew-ness, he first circumcised him. He seems to have accompanied Paul in his tour through Macedonia; but when e went forward to Athens, Timothy and Silas remained in Berea. Having been sent back by Paul to visit the an church (1 Thessalonians, 3. 2), he brought his report of it to the apostle at Corinth (1 Thessalonians, 2. 6). find his name joined with St. Paul's in the addresses of both the epistles to Thessalonians, which were written 1. We again find him "ministering to" St. Paul during the lengthened stay at Ephesus (Acts, 19. 22). Hence t before Paul into Macedonia and to Corinth (1 Corinthians, 4. 17; 16. 16). He was with Paul when he wrote the ale to Corinthians (2 Corinthians, 1. 1); and the following winter in Corinth, when Paul sent from thence his Romans (Romans, 16. 21). On Paul's return to Asia through Macedonia, he went forward and waited for the Troas (Acts, 20. 5-6). Next we find him with Paul during his imprisonment at Rome, when the apostle wrote s to Colossians (Colossians, 1. 1), Philemon (Philemon, 1), and Philippians (Philippians, 1. 1). He was imprisoned : liberty about the same time as the writer of the Hebrews (Hebrews, 12. 23). In the pastoral epistles, we find quest as left by the apostle at Ephesus to superintend the church there (1 Timothy, 1. 3). The last notice of him quest which Paul makes to him (2 Timothy, 4. 21) to "come before winter," (i. e., about 67 A.D. [Alford.] Encyclopaedical History, 3. 42, reports that he was first bishop of Ephesus; and Onesiphorus, Encyclopaedical History, 3. 11, that he died by martyrdom. If then, St. John, as tradition represents, resided and died in that city, it must at a later period. Paul himself ordained or consecrated him with laying on of his own hands, and those of the , in accordance with prophetic intimations given respecting him by those possessing the prophetic gift (1 Timothy, 2 Timothy, 1. 6). His self-denying character is shown by his leaving home at once to accompany the apostle, and g to circumlocution for the gospel's sake; and also by his abstemiousness (noticed 1 Timothy, 5. 23) notwithstanding infirmities which would have warranted a more generous diet. Timidity and a want of self-confidence and boldness in dealing with the difficulties of his position, seems to have been a defect in his otherwise beautiful character as Christian minister (1 Corinthians, 13. 10; 1 Timothy, 4. 13; 2 Timothy, 1. 7).

THE DESIGN of the first epistle was (1.) to direct Timothy to charge the false teachers against continuing to teach other doctrine than that of the gospel (1 Timothy, 1. 3-20; cf. Revelation, 2. 1-6); (2.) to give him instructions as to the ordinary conducting of worship, the qualifications of bishops and deacons, and the selection of widows who should, in return for church charity, do appointed service (1 Timothy, 2. to 6. 2); (3.) to warn against covetousness, a sin prevalent at Ephesus, and to urge to good works (1 Timothy, 6. 9-19).

CHAPTER I.

VER. 1-20. ADDRESS: PAUL'S DESIGN IN HAVING LEFT TIMOTHY AT EPHESUS, VIZ., TO CHECK FALSE TEACHERS: TRUE USE OF THE LAW; HARMONIZING WITH THE GOSPEL: GOD'S GRACE IN CALLING PAUL ONCE A BLASPHEMER, TO EXPERIENCE AND TO PREACH IT: CHARGE TO TIMOTHY. 1. by the commandment of God—The authoritative injunction, as well as the commission, of God. In the earlier epistles the phrase is, "By the will of God." Here it is expressed in a manner implying that a necessity was laid on him to act as an apostle, not that it was merely at his option. The same expression occurs in the doxology, probably written long after the epistle itself. [ALFORD.] (ROMANS, 16. 26.) God our Saviour—The Father (ch. 2. 8; 4. 10; LUKE, 1. 47; 1 Timothy, 1. 9; TITUS, 1. 3; 2. 10; 2. 4; JUDE, 25). It was a Jewish expression in devotion, drawn from the Old Testament (cf. Psalms 103. 2), our hope—(Colossians, 1. 27; TITUS, 1. 2; 2. 12; 2. my own son—filii, "a genuine son" (cf. Acts, 13. 1; 1 Corinthians, 4. 14-17). See Introduction. mercy—Added here, in addressing Timothy, to the ordinary salutation, "Grace unto you (Romans, 1. 7; 1 Corinthians, 1. 3, &c.), and peace." In Galatians 6. 18, "peace and mercy" occur. There are many similarities of style between the epistle to the Galatians and the pastoral epistles (see Introduction); perhaps owing to his there, as here, having, as a leading object in writing, the correction of false teachers, especially as to the right and wrong use of the law (v. 9). If the earlier date be assigned to 1 Timothy, it will fall not long after, or before according as the epistle to the Galatians was written at Ephesus or at Corinth, the writing of the epistle to the Galatians, which also would account for some similarity of style. "Mercy" is grace of a more tender kind, exercised towards the miserable, the experience of which in one's own case especially fits for the gospel ministry. (Cf. as to Paul himself v. 14, 16; 1 Corinthians, 7. 25; 2 Corinthians, 4. 1; Hebrews, 2. 17.) [BENGL.] He did not use "mercy" as to the churches because "mercy" in all its fullness already existed towards them; but in the case of an individual minister, fresh measures of it were continually needed. "Grace" has reference to the sins of men; "mercy" to their misery. God extends His grace to men as they are guilty; His mercy to them as they are miserable. [TRENCH.] Jesus Christ—The oldest MSS. read the order, "Christ Jesus." In the pastoral epistles "Christ" is often put before "Jesus," to give prominence to the fact that the Messianic promises of the Old Testament, well known to Timothy (2 Timothy, 3. 15), were fulfilled in Jesus. 3. Timothy's superintendence of the church at Ephesus was as locum tenens for the apostle, and so was temporary. Thus, the office of superintending overseer, needed for a time at Ephesus or Crete, in the absence of the presiding apostle, subsequently became a permanent institution on the removal, by death, of the apostles who heretofore superintended the churches. The first title of these overseers seems to have been "angels" (Revelation, 1. 20. 3. As I besought thee to remain—He meant to have added, "So I still beseech thee," but does not complete the sentence until he does so virtually, not formally, at v. 18. at Ephesus—Paul, in Acts, 20. 25, declared to the Ephesian elders, "I know that ye all shall see my face no more." If, then, as the balance of arguments seems to favour (see Introduction), this epistle was written subsequently to

Paul's first imprisonment, the apparent discrepancy between his prophecy and the event may be reconciled by considering that the terms of the former were not that he should never visit Ephesus again (which this verse implies he did), but that they all should see his face no more." I cannot think with BIERE, that this verse is compatible with his theory, that Paul did not actually visit Ephesus, though in its immediate neighbourhood (cf. ch. 2. 14; 4. 13). The corresponding conjunction to "as" is not given, the sentence not being completed till it is virtually so at v. 18. I besought—A mild word, instead of authoritative command, to Timothy, as a fellow-helper, coadjutor—The indefinite pronoun is slightly contemptuous as to them (Galatians, 1. 15; Jude, 4). [ELLIOTT.] teach no other doctrine—doctrina what I have taught (Galatians, 1. 6-9). His prophetic bodings some years before (Acts, 20. 29, 30) were now being realized (cf. ch. 4. 3). 4. fables—Legend about the origin and propagation of angels, such as the false teachers taught at Colosse (Colossians, 2. 18-20). "Jewish fables" (Titus, 1. 14). "Profane, and old wives' fables" (ch. 4. 7; 2 Timothy, 4. 4). genealogies—Not merely such civil genealogies as were common among the Jews, whereby they traced their descent from the patriarchs, to which Paul would not object, and which he would not as here class with "fables," but Gnostic genealogies of spirits and aëons, as they called them. "Lists of Gnostic emanations." [ALFORD.] So TERTULLIAN adversus Valentinianos, c. 3, and IRENEUS Præf. The Judaizers here alluded to, whilst maintaining the perpetual obligation of the Mosaic law, joined with it a theosophic ascetic tendency, pretending to see in it mysteries deeper than others could see. The seeds, not the full-grown Gnosticism of the post-apostolic ære, then existed. This formed the transition stage between Judaism and Gnosticism. "Endless" refers to the tedious unprofitableness of their lengthy genealogies (cf. Titus, 3. 9). Paul opposes to their "aëons," the "King of the aëons" (so the Greek, v. 17) to whom he glory throughout the aëons of aëons. The word "aëon" was possibly not used in the technical sense of the later Gnostics as yet; but "the only wise God" (v. 17), by anticipation, confutes the subsequently adopted notions in the Gnostics' own phraseology, questions—of mere speculation (Acts, 26. 26), not practical; generating merely curious discussions. "Questions and strifes of words" (ch. 6. 4; "to no profit" 2 Timothy, 2. 14; "gendering strifes" 2 Timothy, 2. 21. "Vain jangling" (v. 6. 7, of would-be "teachers of the law," godly edifying—The oldest MSS. read, "the dispensation of God," the gospel dispensation of God towards man (1 Corinthians, 9. 17), which is his element; in faith." CONYBEARE translates, "The exercising of the stewardship of God" (1 Corinthians, 3. 17). He infers that the false teachers in Ephesus were prebys, which accords with the prophecy Acts, 20. 29. However, the oldest Latin versions, and IRENEUS, and HILARY, support English Version reading. Cf. v. 1 "faith unfeigned." 5. But—in contrast to the doctrine of the false teachers, the end—the aim, the commandment—Greek, "of the charge" which you ought to use on your flock. Referring to the same Greek word as v. 3. 1; here, however, in a larger sense, as including the gospel "dispensation of God" (Note, c. 4 and 11, which was the sum and substance of the "charge" committed to Timothy wherewith he should "charge" his flock. charity—GREEK: the sum and end of the law and el alike, and that wherein the gospel is the of the spirit of the law in its every essential (Romans, 13, 10). The foundation is faith "end" is love (v. 14; Titus, 3, 15). out of a fountain, pure heart—a heart purified (Acts, 15, 9; 2 Timothy, 2, 22; Titus, 1, 15). Law—A conscience cleared from guilt by the and faith in Christ (v. 19; ch. 3, 9; 2 Timothy, r. 3, 21). Contrast 1 Timothy, 4, 2; Titus, 1, 1, 23, 1. St. John uses "heart," where Paul "conscience." In Paul the understanding is f conscience; the heart is the seat of love.

A good conscience is joined with sound d conscience with unsoundness in the faith (s. 9, 14). faith unfeigned—Not a hypocritical, unfruitful faith, but faith working by love 6, 6. The false teachers drew men off from ing, working, real faith, to profitless, speculations" (v. 4) and jangling (v. 6). 8. From a pure heart, good conscience, and ned, the well-spring of love, having answered ing missed the mark (the 'end') to be aimed rounded "erred," ch. 6, 21; 2 Timothy, 2, of aiming at and attaining the graces above y "have turned aside (ch. 5, 15; 2 Timothy, wa, 12, 13) unto vain jangling;" lit. "vain t the law and recondemns of angels (v. 7; 1, 10; 1 Timothy, 6, 20), "vain babblings tions," &c. It is the greatest vanity when s are not truthfully discussed (Romans, 2, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100). [v. 6.] they are would be teachers, not really so, the wish law (Titus, 1, 14; 3, 9). The Judaizers seem to be distinct from those impugned le to the Galatians and Romans, who made of the law necessary to justification in oppo- sel grace. The Judaizers here meant cor- law with "fables," which they pretended it, subversive of morals as well as of truth, was not in maintaining the obligation of t in abusing it by fabulous and immoral in- s of, and additions to it, neither what they reof—neither understanding their own asse- re object itself about which they make them- stand as little about the one as the other.

6. But—"New we know" (Romans, 3, 19; is good—in full agreement with God's hol- iedness. If a man—Primarily, a teacher; Christian, use it lawfully—in its lawful gospel economy, viz., not as a means of a man" attaining higher perfection than could by the gospel alone (ch. 4, 8; Titus, 1, 14), he perverted use to which the false teachers as a means of awakening the sense of sin in (v. 9, 10; cf. Romans, 7, 7-12; Galatians, 3, is not made for a righteous man—Not for one faith in the righteousness of Christ put on stification, and imparted inwardly by the unification. "One not forensically amen- law." [ALFORD.] For sanctification, the o inward power to fulfil it; but ALFORD in speaking of the righteous man as "not dng the law." Doubtless, in proportion as ally led by the Spirit, the justified man needs, which is only an outward rule (Romans, lun, 6, 18, 23). But as the justified man not give himself up wholly to the inward the Spirit, he morally needs the outward him his sin and God's requirements. The the ten commandments have no power to e Christian, is not that they have no autho- m, but because Christ has fulfilled them as (Romans, 10, 4). disobedient—Greek, "not v-ordinate;" it is translated "unruly," 0. "Lawless and disobedient" refer to opposers of the law, for whom it is "enacted" (so the Greek for "is made"); "ungodly and sinners" (Greek, he who does not reverence God, and he who openly sins against Him), the opposers of God, from whom the law comes; "unholy and profane" (those inwardly impure, and those deserving exclusion from the outward participation in services of the sanctuary), sinners against the third and fourth commandments; "murderers (or as the Greek may mean, "smilers") of fathers and... mothers," sinners against the fifth commandment; "manslayers," sinners against the sixth commandment, 10, whoremongers, &c.—sinners against the seventh commandment, men-stealers—i.e., slave-dealers. The most heinous offence against the eighth commandment. No stealing of a man's goods can equal in atrocity the stealing of a man's liberty. Slavery is not directly as- sailed in the New Testament; to have done so would have been to revolutionize violently the existing order of things. But Christianity teaches principles sure to undermine, and at last overthrow it, wherever Christianity has had its natural development (Matthew, 7, 12). Hars...perjured—offenders against the ninth commandment. If there be any other thing, &c.—Answering to the tenth commandment in its widest aspect. He does not particularly specify it, because his object is to bring out the grosser forms of transgression; whereas the tenth is deeply spiritual, so much so indeed, that it was by it that the sense of sin, in its subtlest form of "lust," Paul tells us (Romans, 7, 7, was brought home to his own conscience. Thus, Paul argues, these would- be teachers of the law whilst boasting of a higher perfection through it, really bring themselves down from the gospel elevation to the level of the grossly "lawless," for whom, not for gospel believers, the law was de- signed. And in actual practice the greatest sticklers for the law as the means of moral perfection, as in this case, are those ultimately liable to fall utterly from the morality of the law. Gospel grace is the only true means of sanctification as well as of justification. sound —healthy, spiritually wholesome (ch. 6, 3; 2 Timothy, 1, 13; Titus, 1, 13; 2, 2, as opposed to sickly, morbid as the Greek, of "doting" means, ch. 6, 4); and "canker" (2 Timothy, 2, 17). "The doctrine," or "teaching, which is according to godliness" (ch. 6, 3). 11. According to the glorious gospel—The Christian's freedom from the law as a sanctifier, as well as a justifier, implied in the previous v. 9, 10, is what this v. 11 is connected with. This exemption of the righteous from the law, and assign- ment of it to the lawless as its true objects, is "ac- cording to the gospel of the glory (so the Greek, cf. Note, 2 Corinthians, 4, 4) of the blessed God." The gospel manifests God's glory (Ephesians, 1, 17; 3, 16 in account- ing "righteous" the believer, through the righteousness of Christ, without "the law" (v. 9); and in imparting that righteousness whereby he loathes all those sins against which (v. 9, 10) the law is directed. The term "blessed," indicates at once immortality and supreme happiness. The supremely-blessed One is He from whom all blessedness flows. This term, as applied to God, occurs only here and ch. 6, 15; appropriate in speaking here of the gospel blessedness, in contrast to the curse on those under the law (v. 9; Galatians, 3, 10), committed to my trust—translated as in the Greek order, which brings into prominent emphasis Paul, "com- mitted in trust to ME;" in contrast to the kind of law- teaching which they (who had no gospel-commission), the false teachers, assumed to themselves (v. 8; Titus, 1, 3. 12. The honour done him in having the gospel ministry committed to him suggests the digression to what he once was, no better (v. 13) than those lawless ones described above (v. 9, 10, when the grace of our Lord (v. 14) visited him. and—Omitted in most (not all) of the oldest MSS. I thank—Greek, "I have i.e., feel" gratitude." enabled me—The same Greek verb as in Acts, 9, 22, "Saul increased the more in strength."

An undesigned coincidence between Paul and Luke, his companion. Enabled me, viz., for the ministry. "It is not in my own strength that I bring this doctrine to men, but as strengthened and nerved by Him who saved me." [THEODORET.] Man is by nature "without strength." [Romans, 5, 6.] True conversion and calling confer power. [BENGE.] for that—the main ground of his "thanking Christ," he counted me faithful—He foreordained and foresaw that I would be faithful to the trust committed to me. Paul's thanking God for this, shows that the merit of his faithfulness was due solely to God's grace, not to his own natural strength (1 Corinthians, 7, 25). Faithfulness is the quality required in a steward (1 Corinthians, 4, 2), putting me into—rather as in 1 Thessalonians, 5, 9, "Appointing me (in His sovereign purposes of grace) unto the ministry" (Acts, 20, 28). 13. Who was before—Greek, "Formerly being a blasphemer." "Notwithstanding that I was before a blasphemer." &c. [Acts, 26, 9, 11], persecutor—[Galatians, 1, 13.] injurious—Greek, "insulting": one who acts injuriously from arrogant contempt of others. Translate Romans, 1, 30, "despiteful." One who added insult to injury. BENGE translates, "a despiser." I prefer the idea, contumelious to others. [WAL.] Still I agree with BENGE that "blasphemer" is against God, "persecutor," against holy men, and "insolently-injurious" includes, with the idea of injuring others, that of insolent "uppishness" [DONALDSON] in relation to one's self. This threefold relation to God, to one's neighbour, and to one's self, occurs often in this epistle (v. 5, 9, 14; Titus, 2, 12). I obtained mercy—God's mercy, and Paul's want of it, stand in sharp contrast [ELLCOTT]. Greek, "I was made the object of mercy." The sense of mercy was perpetual in the mind of the apostle (cf. Note, v. 2). Those who have felt mercy can best have mercy on those out of the way (Hebrews, 6, 2, 3), because I did it ignorantly—Ignorance does not in itself deserve pardon; but it is a less culpable cause of unbelief than pride and wilful hardening of one's self against the truth (John, 9, 41; Acts, 28, 9). Hence it is Christ's plea of intercession for His murderers (Luke, 23, 34); and is made by the apostles a mitigating circumstance in the Jew's sin, and one giving a hope of a door of repentance (Acts, 3, 17; Romans, 10, 2). The "because," &c., does not imply that ignorance was a sufficient reason for mercy being bestowed; but shows how it was possible that such a sinner could obtain mercy. The positive ground of mercy being shown to him, lies solely in the compassion of God (Titus, 3, 5). The ground of the ignorance lies in the unbelief, which implies that this ignorance is not unaccompanied with guilt. But there is a great difference between his honest zeal for the law, and a wilful striving against the Spirit of God (Matthew, 12, 24-32; Luke, 11, 52). [WIESINGER.] 14. And—Greek, "But." Not only so (was mercy shown me), but, &c. the grace—by which "I obtained mercy" (v. 13). Was exceeding abundant—Greek, "superabounded." Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound (Romans, 5, 20). with faith—accompanied with faith, the opposite of "unbelief" (v. 13). love—in contrast to "a blasphemer, persecutor, and injurious," which is in Christ—as its element and home [ALFORD]: here as its source whence it flows to us. 15. faithful—worthy of credit, because "God" who says it "is faithful" to His word (1 Corinthians, 1, 9; 1 Thessalonians, 5, 24; 2 Thessalonians, 3, 3; Revelation, 21, 8; 22, 6). This seems to have become an axiomatic saying among Christians; the phrase, faithful saying, is peculiar to the pastoral epistles (ch. 2, 11; 4, 9; Titus, 3, 8). Translate as Greek, "Faithful is the saying." all—all possible; full; to be received by all, and with all the faculties of the soul, mind, and heart. Paul, unlike the false teachers (v. 7), understands what he is saying, and whereof he affirms; and by his simplicity of style and subject, setting forth the grand fundamental truth of salvation through Christ, confutes the false teachers' abstruse and unpractical speculations (1 Corinthians, 1, 18-29; Titus, 2, 1). acceptance—reception (as of a boon) into the heart, as well as the understanding, with all gladness; this is faith acting on the gospel offer, and welcoming and appropriating it (Acts, 2, 41). Christ—as promised, Jesus—as manifested. [BENGE.] came into the world—which was full of sin (John, 1, 29; Romans, 5, 12; 1 John, 2, 2). This implies His pre-existence. John, 1, 9, Greek, "The true Light that, coming into the world, lighteth every man." to save sinners—even notable sinners like Saul of Tarsus. His instance was without a rival since the ascension, in point of the greatness of the sin and the greatness of the mercy: that the consentor to Stephen, the proto-martyr's death, should be the successor of the same! I am—not merely, "I was chief" (1 Corinthians, 15, 9; Ephesians, 3, 5; cf. Luke, 15, 12). To each believer his own sins must always appear, as long as he lives, greater than those of others, which he never can know as he can know his own. chief—The same Greek as in v. 16, "first," which alludes to this 15th v. Translate in both verses, "foremost." Well might he infer where there was mercy for him, there is mercy for all who will come to Christ (Matthew, 18, 11; Luke, 19, 10). 16. Howbeit—Greek, "But," contrasting his own conscious sinfulness with God's gracious visitation of him in mercy. for this cause—for this very purpose, that in me—in my case, first—"foremost." So David made his own case of pardon, notwithstanding the greatness of his sin, a sample to encourage other sinners to seek pardon (Psalm 32, 5, 6). The Greek for "pattern" is sometimes used for "a sketch" or outline—the filling up to take place in each man's own case. believe on him—belief rests on Him as the only foundation on which faith relies. to life everlasting—the ultimate aim which faith always keeps in view (Titus, 1, 2). 17. A suitable conclusion to the beautifully-simple enunciation of the gospel, of which his own history is a living sample or pattern. It is from the experimental sense of grace that the doxology flows. Psalm 145, 13, Margin, "Thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom," lit., "a kingdom of all ages." The "life everlasting" (v. 16) suggested here "the King eternal," or everlasting. It answers also to "for ever and ever" at the close, lit., "to the ages of the ages" (the countless succession of ages made up of ages, immortal—The oldest MSS. read, "incorruptible." Vulgate, however, and one very old MS. read as English Version (Romans, 1, 23), invisible—(ch. 6, 16; Exodus, 33, 20; John, 1, 18; Colossians, 1, 15; Hebrews, 11, 27) the only wise God—The oldest MSS. omit "wise," which probably crept in from Romans, 16, 27, where it is more appropriate to the context than here (cf. CHAPTER II.

VER 1-15. PUBLIC WORSHIP. DIRECTIONS AS TO INTERCESSIONS FOR ALL MEN, SINCE CHRIST IS A RANSOM FOR ALL THE DUTIES OF MEN AND WOMEN RESPECTIVELY IN RESPECT TO PUBLIC PRAYER. WOMAN'S SURRECTION: HER SPHERE OF DUTY. 1. therefore—Taking up again the general subject of the epistle in continuation (2 Timothy, 2. 1). "What I have therefore to say to thee by way of a charge (ch. 1. 3. 18), is," &c. that first of all... be made—ALFORD takes it, "I exhort first of all to make." "First of all," doubtless, is to be connected with "I exhort" what I begin with (for special reasons), Is, &c. As the destruction of Jerusalem drew near, the Jews (including those at Ephesus) were seized with the dream of freedom from every yoke; and so virtually "blasphemed" (cf. ch. 1. 20) God's name by "speaking evil of dignities" (ch. 6. 1; 2 Peter, 2. 10; Jude, 8). Hence Paul, in opposition, gives prominence to the injunction that prayer be made for all men, especially for magistrates and kings (Titus, 3. 1-3). [OLSHAUSEN.] Some professing Christians looked down on all not Christians, as doomed to perdition; but Paul says all men are to be prayed for, as Christ died for all (v. 4-6), supplications—a term implying the suppliant's sense of need, and of his own insufficiency, prayers—implying devotion, intercessions—properly the coming near to God with childlike confidence, generally in behalf of another. The accumulation of terms implies prayer in its every form and aspect, according to all the relations implied in it. 2. For kings—An effectual confutation of the adversaries who accused the Christians of disaffection to the ruling powers (Acts, 17. 7; Romans, 13. 1-7). all... in authority—id., "... in eminence:" in stations of eminence. The "quiet" of Christians was often more dependent on subordinate rulers, than on the supreme king; hence, "all... in authority" are to be prayed for, that we may lead—that we may be blessed with such good government as to lend, &c.; or rather, as Greek, "to pass" or "spend." The prayers of Christians for the government bring down from heaven peace and order in a state, quiet—not troubled from without, peaceable—"tranquil," not troubled from within. [OLSHAUSEN.] "He is peaceable (Greek) who makes no disturbance; he is quiet, Greek, who is himself free from disturbance;" [LITTMAN] in all—in all (passible... requisite) piety." [ALFORD.] A distinct Greek word, v. 10, expresses "godliness," honesty—Greek, "gravity" (Titus, 2. 2. 7, "decorum," or propriety of conduct. As "piety" is in relation to God, "gravity" is propriety of behaviour among men. In the Old Testament the Jews were commanded to pray for their heathen ruler, (Ezra, 6. 10; Jeremiah, 29. 7). The Jews, by Augustus's order, offered a lamb daily for the Roman emperor, till near the destruction of Jerusalem. The Jewish Zealots, instigated by Eleazar, caused this custom to cease (Josephus B. J., 2. 17), whence the war originated according to Josephus. 3. this—] 123122 for all men.

in the sight of God—not merely before men, as if it were their favour that we sought (2 Corinthians, 8. 21). our Saviour—a title appropriate to the matter in hand. He who is "our Saviour" is willing that all should be saved (v. 4; Romans, 5. 18); therefore we should meet the will of God in behalf of others, by praying for the salvation of all men. More would be converted, if we would pray more. He has actually saved us who believe, being "our Saviour"; He is willing that all should be saved, even those who do not as yet believe, if they will believe (cf. ch. 4. 10; Titus, 2. 11). 4. "Imitate God." Since He wishes that all should be saved, do you also wish it; and if you wish it, pray for it. For prayer is the instrument of effecting such things. [CHRYSOSTOM.] St. Paul does not say, "He wishes to save all," for then He would have saved all in matter of fact; but "will have all men to be saved," implies the possibility of man's accepting it (through God's prevenient grace) or rejecting it (through man's own perversity). Our prayers ought to include all, as God's grace included all, to come—They are not forced, unto the knowledge—Greek, "the full knowledge" or "recognition" (Note, 1 Corinthians, 13. 12; Philippians, 1. 9). the truth—the saving truth as it is in, and by, Jesus (John, 17. 3, 17). 5. For there is one God—God's unity in essence and purpose, is a proof of His comprehending all His human children alike (created in His image) in His offer of grace (cf. the same argument from His unity, Romans, 3. 29; Galatians, 3. 20; therefore all are to be prayed for. Verse 4 is proved from v. 5; v. 1. from v. 4. The One God is common to all (Isaiah, 45. 5; Acts, 17. 26). The one mediator is mediator between God and all men potentially (Romans, 3. 29; Ephesians, 4. 5, 6; Hebrews, 8. 6; 9. 15; 12. 24). They who have not the one God by one Mediator, have none: lit., a proboscis. The Greek order is not "and one mediator," but "one mediator also between," &c. Whilst God will have all men to be saved by knowing God and the Mediator, there is a legitimate, holy order in the exercise of that will wherewith men ought to receive it. All mankind constitute, as it were, one MAN before God. [BENOEL.] the man—rather, "man," absolutely and generically; not a mere individual man; the Second Head of humanity, representing and embodying in Himself the whole human race and nature. There is no "the" in the Greek. This epithet is thus the strongest corroboration of his argument, viz., that Christ's mediation affects the whole race, since there is but the one Mediator, designed as the Representative Man for all men alike (cf. Romans, 5. 16; 1 Corinthians, 8. 6; 2 Corinthians, 5. 19; Colossians, 2. 14). His being "man" was necessary to His being a Mediator, sympathizing with us through experimental knowledge of our nature (Isaiah, 50. 4; Hebrews, 2. 14; 4. 15). Even in nature, almost all blessings are conveyed to us from God, not immediately, but through the mediation of various agents. The effectual intercession of Moses for Israel (Numbers, 14.), and Deuteronomy, 9.; of Abraham for Abimelech (Genesis, 20. 7); of Job for his friends (Job, 42. 10), the mediation being PRESCRIBED by God whilst declaring His purpose of forgiveness, all prefigure the grand mediation for all by the One Mediator. On the other hand, ch. 2. 16 asserts that He was also God. 6. gave himself—Titus, 2. 14. Not only the Father gave Him for us (John, 3. 16); but the Son gave Himself (Philippians, 2. 6-8). ransom—property of a captive slave. Man was the captive slave of Satan, sold under sin. He was unable to ransom himself, because absolute obedience is due to God, and therefore no act of ours can satisfy for the least offence. Leviticus, 25. 48 allowed one sold captive to be redeemed by one of his brethren. The Son of God, therefore, became man in order that, being made like unto us in all things, sin only excepted, as our elder brother He should redeem us (Matthew, 20. 28; Ephesians, 1. 7;

1 Peter, 1. 18, 19). The Greek implies not merely ransom, but a substituted or equivalent ransom; the Greek preposition "anti," implying reciprocity and vicarious substitution, for all—Greek, "in behalf of all"; not merely for a privileged few; cf. v. 1: the argument for praying in behalf of all is given here, to be testified—Greek, "the testimony (that which was to be testified of, 1 John, 5. 8-11) in its own due times," or seasons, i.e., in the times appointed by God for its being testified of (ch. 8. 18; Titus, 1. 3). The oneness of the Mediator, involving the universality of redemption [which faith, however, alone appropriates], was the great subject of Christian testimony (ALFORD) (1 Corinthians, 1. 6; 2. 1; 2 Thessalonians, 1. 10; 7. Wherefore —For the giving of which testimony. I am ordained—lit., "I was set;" the same Greek as "putting me," &c. (ch. 1. 12). preacher—lit., "herald" (1 Corinthians, 1. 21; 9. 27; 15. 11; 2 Timothy, 1. 11; Titus, 1. 3). He recurs to himself, as in ch. 1. 16, in himself a living pattern or announcement of the gospel, so here "a herald and teacher of (it to) the Gentiles" (Galatians, 2. 9; Ephesians, 3. 1-12; Colossians, 1. 23). The universality of his commission is an appropriate assertion here, where he is arguing to prove that prayers are to be made "for all men" (v. 1). I speak the truth, and lie not—a strong asseveration of his universal commission, characteristic of the ardour of the apostle, exposed to frequent conflict (Romans, 11. 3; 2 Corinthians, 11. 31). in faith and verity—rather, "in the faith and the truth." The sphere in which his ministry was appointed to be exercised was the faith and the truth (v. 4); the gospel truth, the subject matter of the faith. [WISSENER.] 8. I will—The active wish, or desire, is meant, that men—rather as Greek, "that the men," as distinguished from "the women" to whom he has something different to say from what he said to the men (v. 9-12; 1 Corinthians, 11. 14, 15; 14. 34, 35). The emphasis, however, is not on this, but on the precept of praying, resumed from v. 1 every where—Greek, "in every place," viz., of public prayer. Fulfilling Malachi, 1. 11, "In every place... from the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same... incense shall be offered unto my name;" and Jesus' words, Matthew, 18. 20; John, 4. 21, 23. Lifting up holy hands—The early Christians turned up their palms towards heaven, as those craving help do. So also Solomon (1 Kings, 8. 22; Psalm 141. 2). The Jews washed their hands before prayer (Psalm 26. 6). St. Paul figuratively (cf. Job, 17. 9; James, 4. 8) uses language alluding to this custom here: so Isaiah, 1. 15, 16. The Greek for "holy" means hauds which have committed no impiety, and observed every sacred duty. This (or at least the contrite desire to be so) is a needful qualification for effectual prayer (Psalm 24. 3, 4). without wrath—putting it away (Matthew, 5. 23, 24; 6. 15). debating—rather, "disputing," as the Greek is translated Philippians, 2. 14. Such things hinder prayer (Luke, 9. 46; Romans, 14. 1; 1 Peter, 3. 7. BENOEL supports English Version (cf. an instance, 2 Kings, 7. 2; Matthew, 14. 31; Mark, 11. 23-24; James, 1. 6). 9. 10 The context requires that we understand these directions as to women, in relation to their deportment in public worship, though the rules will hold good on other occasions also, in modest apparel—in seemly guise. [ELLIOTT.] The adjective means properly, orderly, decorous, becoming; the noun in secular writings means conduct, bearing. But here "apparel." Women are apt to love fine dress; and at Ephesus the riches of some (ch. 6. 17) would lead them to dress luxuriously. The Greek in Titus, 1. 3, is a more general term meaning "deportment," shamefastness—TRENCH spells this word according to its true derivation, "shamefastness" (that which is made fast by an honourable shame); as "steadfastness" (cf. v. 11. 12. sobriety—"self-restraint." [ALFORD.] Habitual most self-government. [TRENCH.] I prefer ELLIOTT'S

Such gaud is characteristic of the spiritual harlot (Revelation, 17, 4). 10. professing—Greek, protesis; engaging to follow. with good works—The Greek preposition is not the same as in v. 9: "by means of": "through good works." Their adorning is to be effected by means of good works: not that they are to be clothed in, or with, them (Ephesians, 2, 10). Works, not words in public, is their province (e. g. 11, 12: 1 Peter, 2, 1). Works are often mentioned in the pastoral epistles in order to oppose the loose living, combined with the loose doctrine, of the false teachers. The discharge of everyday duties is honoured with the designation, "Good works." 11. learn—not "teach" (e. 12: 1 Corinthians, 14, 24). She should not even put questions in the public assembly (1 Corinthians, 14, 26), with all subjection—not "usurping authority" (v. 12). She might teach, but not in public (Acts, 18, 26). St. Paul probably wrote this epistle from Corinth, where the precept (1 Corinthians, 14, 34) was in force. 12. usurp authority—"to lord it over the man" [ALFORD]. Ni., "to be an autocrat." 13. For—Reason of the precept: the original order of creation. Adam... first—before Eve, who was created for him (1 Corinthians, 11, 8, 9). 14. Adam was not deceived—as Eve was deceived by the serpent; but was persuaded by his wife. Genesis, 2, 17. "Harkened unto... voice of... wife." But Genesis, 2, 12, Eve says, "The serpent beguiled me." Being more easily deceived, she more easily deceives [SUNNER] (2 Corinthians, 11, 3). Last in being, she was first in sin—indeed, she alone was deceived. The subtle serpent knew that she was "the weaker vessel." He therefore tempted her, not him. She yielded to the temptations of sense and the deceits of Satan; he, to conjugal love. Hence, in the order of God's judicial sentence, the serpent, the prime offender, stands first; the woman, who was deceived, next; and the man, persuaded by his wife, last (Genesis, 3, 14-19). In Romans, 5, 12, Adam is represented as the first transgressor; but there no reference is made to Eve, and Adam is regarded as the head of the sinning race. Hence, as here, v. 11, in Genesis, 3, 16, woman's "subjection" is represented as the consequence of her being deceived, being deceived—The oldest MSS. read the compound Greek verb for the simple, "Having been seduced by deceit:" implying how completely Satan succeeded in deceiving her. was in the transgression—Greek, "came to be in the transgression:" became involved in the existing state of transgression, i.e., "the going beyond a command:" the breach of a positive precept (Romans, 4, 15). 15. be saved in child-bearing—Greek, "in (lit., through) her (lit., the) child-bearing." Through, or by, is often so used to express not the means of her salvation, but the circumstances amidst which it has place. Thus 1 Corinthians, 3, 15, "He... shall be saved; yet so as by (lit., through, i.e., amidst) fire:" in spite of the fiery ordeal which he has necessarily to pass through, he shall be saved. So here, "In spite of the trial of child-bearing which she passes through (as her portion of the curse, Genesis, 3, 16, "in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children"), she shall be saved." Moreover, I think it is implied indirectly that the very curse will be turned into a condition favourable to her salvation, by her faithfully performing her part in doing and suffering what God has assigned to her, viz., child-bearing and home duties, her sphere, as distinguished from public teaching, which is not her's, but man's (e. 11, 12). In this home sphere, not ordinarily in one of active duty for advancing the kingdom of God, which contradicts the position assigned to her by God, she will be saved on the same terms as all others, viz., by living faith. Some think that there is a reference to the Incarnation "through the child-bearing" (Greek, the bearing of the child Jesus. Doubtless this is the ground of women's child-bearing in general becoming to them a blessing, instead of a curse; just as in the original prophecy (Genesis, 2, 15, 16) the promise of "the seed of the woman" (the Saviour) stands in closest connexion with the woman's being doomed to "sorrow" in "bringing forth children." Her very child-bearing, though in sorrow, being the function assigned to her by God whereby the Saviour was born. This may be an ulterior reference of the Holy Spirit in this verse; but the primary reference required by the context is the one above given. "She shall be saved (though) with child-bearing," i.e., though suffering her part of the primeval curse in child-bearing; just as a man shall be saved, though having to bear his part, viz., the sweat of the brow. If they—"If the women (plural, taken out of 'the woman,' v. 14, which is put for the whole and continue, or more Ni., shall be found at the judgment to) have continued faith and charity—the essential way to salvation (ch. 1, 5). Faith is in relation to God. Charity, to our fellow-man. Sobriety, to one's self. sobriety—"sober-mindedness" (Note, v. 9, as contrasted with the unreasonably forwardness reproved in v. 11). Mental receptivity and activity in family life were recognised in Christianity as the destiny of woman. One reason alleged here by Paul, is the greater danger of self-deception in the weaker sex, and the spread of errors arising from it, especially in a class of addresses in which sober reflectiveness is least in exercise. [RENDER.] The case (Acts, 21, 9) was doubtless in private, not in public.

CHAPTER III.

VER. 1-16. RULES AS TO BISHOPS (OVERSEERS) AND DEACONS. THE CHURCH, AND THE GOSPEL-MYSTERY NOW REVEALED TO IT, ARE THE END OF ALL SUCH RULES. 1. Translated as Greek, "Faithful is the saying." A useful preface to what follows: for the office of a bishop or overseer in Paul's day, attended as it was with hardship and often persecution, would not seem to the world generally a desirable and "good work." desire—lit., "stretch one's self forward to grasp;" aim at: a distinct Greek verb from that for "desireth." What one does voluntarily is more esteemed than what he does when asked (1 Corinthians, 15, 15). This is utterly distinct from ambitious desires after office in the church (James, 3, 1). bishop—overseer: as yet identical with "presbyter" (Acts, 20, 17, 28; Titus, 1, 5-7). good work—lit., "honourable work." Not the honour associated with it, but the work, is the prominent thought (Acts, 15, 26; Philipians, 2, 30; cf. 2 Timothy, 4, 6). He who aims at the office must remember the high qualifications needed for the due discharge of its functions. 2. The existence of church organization and presbyters at Ephesus is pre-supposed (ch. 5, 17, 19). The institution of church widows (ch. 5) accords with this. The directions here to Timothy, the president or apostolic delegate, are as to filling up vacancies among the bishops and deacons, or adding to their number. Free churches in the neighbourhood also would require presbyters and deacons. Episcopacy was adopted in apostolic times as the most expedient form of government, being most nearly in accordance with Jewish institutions, and so offering the least obstruction through Jewish prejudices to the progress of Christianity. The synagogue was governed by presbyters, "elders" (Acts, 4, 5; 24, 1), called also bishops or overseers. Three among them presided as "rulers of the synagogue," answering to "bishops" in the modern sense [LIGHTFOOT, Hora.], and one among them took the lead. AMBROSE (in Amularius de Officiis, 2, 13, and BINGHAM, Ecclesiastical Antiquities, 2, 11); says, "They who are now called bishops were originally called apostles. But those who ruled the church after the death of the apostles, had not the testimony of miracles, and were in many respects inferior. Therefore they thought it not decent to assume to themselves the name of apostles; but dividing the names, they left to presbyters the name of the presbyters, and they themselves were called bishops. "Presbyter" refers to the rank; "bishop," to the office or function. Timothy (though not having the name) exercised the power at Ephesus then, which bishops in the modern sense more recently exercised. bishopless—"unexceptionable": giving no just handle for blame. husband of one wife—Confuting the celibacy of Rome's priesthood. Though the Jews practised polygamy, yet as he is writing as to a Gentile church, and as polygamy was never allowed among even laymen in the church, the ancient interpretation that the prohibition here is against polygamy in a candidate bishop is not correct. It must, therefore, mean that, though laymen might lawfully marry again, candidates for the Episcopate or Presbytery were better to have been married only once. As in ch. 5, 9, "wife of one man," implies a woman married but once; so "husband of one wife" here must mean the same. The feeling which prevailed among the Gentiles, as well as the Jews (cf. as to Anna, Luke, 2, 36, 37), against a second marriage would, on the ground of expediency and conciliation in matters indifferent and not involving compromise of principle, account for Paul's prohibition here in the case of one in so prominent a sphere as a bishop or a deacon. Hence the stress that is laid in the context on the repute in which the candidate for orders is held among those over whom he is to preside (Titus, 1, 16). The council of Laodicea and the apostolic canons discountenanced second marriages, especially in the case of candidates for ordination. Of course second marriage being lawful, the undestrainableness of it holds good only under special circumstances. It is implied here also, that he who has a wife and virtuous family, is to be preferred to a bachelor; for he who is himself bound to discharge the domestic duties mentioned here, is likely to be more attractive to those who have similar ties, for he teaches them not only by precept, but also by example (e. 4, 6). The Jews teach, a priest should be neither unmarried nor childless, lest he be unmerciful. [BENGL.] So in the synagogue, "no one shall offer up prayer in public, unless he be married." [In Colbo, ch. 65; VITELINGA, Synagogue.] vigilant—lit., sober: ever on the watch, as sober men alone can be; keenly alive, so as to foresee what ought to be done (1 Thessalonians, 5, 6-8). sober—soberminded, of good behaviour—Greek, "orderly." "Sober" refers to the inward mind; "orderly," to the outward behaviour, tone, look, gait, dress. The new man bears somewhat of a sacred festival character, incompatible with all confusion, disorder, excess, violence, laxity, assumption, harshness, and meanness (Philippians, 4, 8). [BENGL.] apt to teach—2 Timothy, 2, 24. 3. Not given to wine—The Greek includes besides this, not indulging in the braulung, violent conduct towards others, which proceeds from being given to wine. The opposite of "patient" or Greek "forbearing," reasonable to others (Note, Philippians, 4, 9). no striker—with either hand or tongue: not as some teachers pretending a holy zeal (2 Corinthians, 11, 20), answering to "not a brawler" or fighter (cf. 1 Kings, 22, 24; Nehemiah, 13, 25; Isaiah, 58, 4; Acts, 22, 2; 2 Timothy, 2, 24, 26). net covetous—Greek, "not a lover of money," whether he have much or little (Titus, 1, 7). 4. ruling—Greek, "presiding over," his own house—children and servants, as contrasted with "the church (house) of God (v. 5, 15) which he may be called on to preside over, having his children—rather as Greek, "having children (who are) in subjection" (Titus, 1, 6). gravity—propriety: revereat modesty on the part of the children. [ALFORD.] The fact that he has children who are in subjection to him in all gravity, is the recommendation in his favour as one likely to rule well the church. 5. For—Greek, "But," the church—rather, "a church" or congregation. How shall he who cannot perform the less function, perform the greater and more difficult? 6. Not a novice—one just converted. This proves the church of Ephesus was established now for some time. The absence of this rule in the epistle to Titus, accords with the recent planting of the church at Crete. Greek, Neophyte, lit., a young plant: luxuriantly verdant (Romans, 6, 5; 11, 17; 1 Corinthians, 3, 6). The young convert has not yet been disciplined and matured by afflictions and temptations. Contrast Acts, 21, 16, "an old disciple," lifted up with pride—Greek, lit., "wrapt in smoke," so that, inflated with self-conceit and exaggerated ideas of his own importance, he cannot see himself or others in the true light (ch. 6, 4; 2 Timothy, 3, 4). condemnation of the devil—into the same condemnation as Satan fell into (v. 7; 2 Timothy, 2, 26). Pride was the cause of Satan's condemnation (Job, 38, 15; Isaiah, 14, 13-15; John, 12, 31; 16, 11; 2 Peter, 2, 4; Jude, 6). It cannot mean condemnation or accusation on the part of the devil. The devil may bring a reproach on men (v. 7), but he cannot bring them into condemnation, for he does not judge, but is judged. [BENGL.] 7. a good report—Greek, testinony. So Paul was influenced by the good report given of Timothy to choose him as his companion (Acts, 16, 2). of them which are without—from the as yet unconverted Gentiles around (1 Corinthians, 5, 12; Colossians, 4, 4; 1 Thessalonians, 4, 12), that they may be the more readily won to the gospel (1 Peter, 2, 12), and that the name of Christ may be glorified. Not even the former life of a bishop should be open to reproach. [BENGL.] reproach and the snare of the devil—reproach of men (ch. 5, 14) proving the occasion of his falling into the snare of the devil (ch. 6, 9; Matthew, 22, 15; 2 Timothy, 2, 26). The reproach continually surrounding him for former sins might lead him into the snare of becoming as bad as his reputation. Despair of recovering reputation might, in a weak moment, lead some into recklessness of living (Jeremiah, 18, 12). The reason why only moral qualities of a general kind are specified is, he presupposes in candidates for a bishopric the special gifts of the Spirit (ch. 4, 14) and true faith, which he desires to be evidenced outwardly; also he requires qualifications in a bishop not so indispensable in others. 8. The deacons were chosen by the voice of the people. Cyprian, Epistle 2, 5, says that good bishops never departed from the old custom of consulting the people. The deacons answer to the chazan of the synagogue: the attendant ministers, or subordinate coadjutors of the presbyter (as Timothy himself was to Paul, ch. 4, 6; Philemon, 13; and John Mark, Acts, 13, 5). Their duty was to read the Scriptures in the church, to instruct the Catechumens in Christian truths, to assist the presbyters at the sacraments, to receive oblations, as to preach and instruct. As the chazan covered and uncovered the ark in the synagogue, containing the law, so the deacon in the ancient church put the covering on the communion table. (See CHRYSOSTOM, B. Homily on Acts; THEOPHYLACT on Luke 10, 2; and BALSAMAN on Canon 22, Council of Laodicea.) The appointing of "the seven" in Acts, 6, is perhaps meant to describe the first appointment of the deacons of the church. At least the chazan previously suggested the similar order of deacons. double tongue—lit., "of double-speech:" saying one thing to this person, and another to that person. [THEOPHYLACT.] The extensive personal intercourse that deacons would have with the members of the church might prove a temptation to such a fault. Others explain it, "Saying one thing, thinking another" (Proverbs, 26, 28; Galatians, 2, 13). I prefer the former, not greedy of filthy lucre—All gain is filthy (lit., "base") which is not before a man as a by-end in his work for God [ALFORD]

31. The deacon's office of collecting and disseminating would render this a necessary qualification—holding the faith, the natural man remains a mystery, but seen revealed by the Spirit to them (Romans, 12:1-10), in a pure conscience (ch. 1:5), "i.e., in which nothing base or foreign is." [TITMANN.] Though deacons were called on to preach (Stephen and Philip) in addition to this, since it was as evangelists, i.e. as deacons, they preached, yet as being in the church, and having much interest in all the members, they especially needed to be characteristic, which every Christian ought to be. "And moreover," &c. [ALFORD.] by a period of probation, but by a searchy, conducted by Timothy, the ordaining (ch. 5:22), whether they be "blameless," found so, "let them act as deacons," &c. the Greek "unexceptionable:" as the (public) investigation unexcused. [TITMANN.] lives—rather, "the women," i.e., the deaconesses—in no reason that special rules should be made for the wives of the deacons, and not for the wives of the bishops or overseers. More wives of the deacons were meant, the reason for the omission of "their" (not in the iso the Greek for "even so" [the same as iso], v. 8, and "in like manner," ch. 2:9), transition to another class of persons. Further, were doubtless deaconesses at Ephesus, he was at Onesimus (Romans, 16:1, "servant," onesimus), yet no mention is made of them in it if not here; and whereas, supposing them to be so, ch. 3, embraces in due proportion all the service of the church. Naturally after the qualifications of the deacon, Paul passes to the kindred office, the deaconess. "Grave" the case of both. "Not slanderers" here, "not double tongued" in the deacons; so "accusers" (Titus, 2:3). "Sober" here "not given to much wine," in the case of s (v. 8). Thus it appears he requires the qualifications in female deacons as in deacons, such modifications as the difference of sex requires. PLEINY, in his celebrated letter to Trajan, "female ministers," faithful in all things—well as faith. Trustworthy in respect to the allotted to them and their other functions, to "not greedy of filthy lucre." v. 8, in the deacons. 12. husbands of one wife—(Note, regarding their children—There is no article in the ing children: implying that he regarded the idreus to rule as a qualification (v. 4; Titus, 2:4) own houses — as distinguished from "the God" (Note, v. 5). In the case of the deacons, of the bishops, he mentions the first condition of office, rather than the special qualifications here. The practical side of Christianity is not dwelt on in the pastoral epistles, in opposition to the heretical teachers: moreover, as the gifts began to be withdrawn, the safest efficiency would be the previous moral of the candidate, the disposition and talent of being pre-supposed. So in Acts, 6:3, a criterion was applied, "Look ye out among men of honest report." Less stress is laid on dignity in the case of the deacon than in that of (Notes, cf. v. 2, 3). 13. purchase to themselves re—lit., "are acquiring...a...step." Under-stand as "a higher step," i.e., promotion to the office of presbyter. But ambition of rising by the motive to faithfulness which the idreus urge; besides, it would require the candidate a better degree. Then the past scriber participate, "they that used the office of deacon well," implies that the present verb, "are acquiring to themselves boldness," is the result of the completed action of using the diaconate well. Also, St. Paul would not probably hold out to every deacon the prospect of promotion to the presbytery in reward of his service. The idea of moving upwards in church offices was as yet unknown (cf. Romans, 12:7, &c.; 1 Corinthians, 12:4-11). Moreover, there seems little connexion between reference to a higher church rank and the words "great boldness." Therefore, what those who have faithfully discharged the diaconate acquire for themselves is "a good standing place" (ALFORD) (a well-grounded hope of salvation) against the day of judgment, ch. 8:19; 1 Corinthians, 3:13, 14 (the figurative meaning of "degree" or "step," being the degree of worth which one has obtained in the eye of God (WESINGTON); and boldness (resting on that standing place), as well for preaching and admonishing others now (Ephesians, 6:19: a firm standing forth for the truth against error), as also especially in relation to God their coming Judge, before whom they may be boldly confident (Acts, 24:16; 1 John, 2:28; 4:17; 3:21; Hebrews, 4:16). in the faith—rather as Greek, "in faith," i.e., boldness resting on their own faith, which is in Christ Jesus—resting in Christ Jesus. 14. write I, hoping—i.e., "though I hope to come unto thee shortly" (ch. 4:13). As his hope was not very confident (v. 15), he provides for Timothy's lengthened superintendence by giving him the preceding rules to guide him. He now proceeds to give more general instructions to him as an evangelist, having a "gift" committed to him (ch. 4:14). shortly—Greek, "sooner," viz., than is pre-supposed in the preceding directions given to him. See my Introduction on this verse. This verse best suits the theory that this first epistle was not written after Paul's visit and departure from Ephesus (Acts, 19, and 20), when he had resolved to winter at Corinth after passing the summer in Macedonia (1 Corinthians, 16:6), but after his first imprisonment at Rome (Acts, 28.); probably at Corinth, where he might have some thoughts of going on to Ephesus before returning to Ephesus. [BURNS.] 15. But if I tarry long—before coming to thee, that—i.e., I write (v. 14) "that thou mayest know" &c. behave thyself—in directing the church at Ephesus (ch. 4:11), the house of God—the church (Hebrews, 3:2, 5, 6; 10:21; 1 Peter, 4:17; 1 Corinthians, 3:16, "the temple of God," Ephesians, 2:22), which is—i.e., inasmuch as it is, the church—"the congregation." The fact that the sphere of thy functions is "the congregation of the living God" (who is the ever-living Master of the house, 2 Timothy, 2:19, 20, 21), is the strongest motive to faithfulness in this behaviour as president of a department of "the house." The living God forms a striking contrast to the lifeless idol, Diana of Ephesus (1 Thessalonians, 1:9). He is the fountain of "truth," and the foundation of our "trust" (ch. 4:10). Labour directed to a particular church is service to the one great house of God, of which each particular church is a part, and each Christian a lively stone (1 Peter, 2:5). the pillar and ground of the truth—evidently predicated of the church, not of "the mystery of godliness" (an interpretation not started till the 16th century; so BENGEL); for after two weighty predicates, "pillar and ground," and these substantives, the third, a much weaker one, and that an adjective, "confessedly," or "without controversy great," would not come. "Pillar" is so used metaphorically of the three apostles on whom principally the Jewish Christian church depended (Galatians, 2:9; cf. Revelation, 3:12). The church is "the pillar of the truth," as the continued existence (historically) of the truth rests on it; for it supports and preserves the word of truth. He who is of the truth belongs by the very fact to the church. Christ is the alone ground of the truth in the highest sense (1 Corinthians, 3:11).

The apostles are foundations in a secondary sense (Ephesians, 2. 20; Revelation, 21. 14). The church rests on the truth as it is in Christ; not the truth on the church. But the truth as it is in itself is to be distinguished from the truth as it is acknowledged in the world. In the former sense it needs no pillar, but supports itself; in the latter sense, it needs the church as its pillar, i.e., its supporter and preserver. [BAUMGARTEN.] The importance of Timothy's commission is set forth by reminding him of the excellence of "the house" in which he serves; and this in opposition to the coming heresies which Paul precisely forewarns him of immediately after (ch. 4. 1). The church is to be the stay of the truth and its conservator for the world, and God's instrument for securing its continuance on earth, in opposition to those heresies (Matthew, 16. 18; 28. 20). The apostle does not recognise a church which has not the truth, or has it only in part. Rome falsely claims the promise for herself. But it is not historical descent that constitutes a church, but this only, that it has truth for its foundation. The absence of the latter unchurches Rome. The "pillar" is the intermediate; the "ground," or "basement" (similar to "foundation," 2 Timothy, 2. 19), the final support of the building. [ALFORD.] It is no objection that, having called the church before "the house of God," he now calls it the "pillar," for the literal word "church" immediately precedes the new metaphors; so the church, or congregation of believers, which before was regarded as the habitation of God, is now, from a different point of view, regarded as the pillar upholding the truth. 16. And—following up s. 15: The pillar of the truth is the church in which thou art required to minister; "AND (that thou mayest know how grand is that truth which the church so upholds) confessedly (so the Greek for 'without controversy') great is the mystery of godliness: (viz.) He who (so the oldest MSS. and versions read for 'God') was manifested in (the) flesh (He who) was justified in the Spirit," &c. There is set before us the whole dignity of Christ's person. If He were not essentially superhuman (Titus, 2. 13), how could the apostle emphatically declare that He was manifested in (the) flesh. [TRIGELLES, Printed text, Greek New Testament.] (John, 1. 14; Philipians, 2. 7; 1 John, 1. 2; 4. 2.) Christ, in all His aspects, is Himself "the mystery of godliness." He who before was hidden "with God" was made manifest (John, 1. 1, 14; Romans, 16. 25, 26; Colossians, 1. 26; 2 Timothy, 1. 10; Titus, 2. 11; 3. 4; 1 John, 3. 5, 8). "Confessedly," i.e., by the universal confession of the members of "the church," which is in this respect the "pillar" or upholder "of the truth," the mystery—the divine scheme embodied in CHRIST, Colossians, 1. 27) once hidden from, but now revealed to, us who believe, of godliness—rather, "piety;" a different Greek word expresses godliness (ch. 2. 10). In opposition to the ungodliness or impiety inseparable from error (departure from the faith: "doctrines of devils," "profane fables," ch. 4. 1, 7; cf. ch. 6. 3). To the victims of such error, the "mystery of piety" (i.e., Christ Himself) remains a mystery unrevealed (ch. 4. 2). It is accessible only to "piety" (v. 9); in relation to the pious it is termed a "mystery," though revealed (1 Corinthians, 2. 7-14), to imply the surpassing excellence of Him who is the essential subject of it, and who is Himself "wonderful" (Isaiah, 6. 6), surpassing knowledge (Ephesians, 3. 18, 19; cf. Ephesians, 4. 32). The apostle now proceeds to unfold this confessedly great mystery in its details. It is not unlikely that some formula of confession or hymn existed in the church and was generally accepted, to which Paul alludes in the words, "confessedly great is the mystery," &c., (to wit) "He who was manifested," &c. Such hymns were then used (cf. Ephesians, 4. 19; Colossians, 3. 16). PLINY 1. 10, Ep. 97, "They are wont on a fixed day before dawn to meet and sing a hymn in alternate responses to Christ, as being God," and EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 5. 28. The short unconnected sentences with the words similarly arranged, and the number of syllables almost equal, and the ideas antithetically related, are characteristics of a Christian hymn. The clauses stand in parallelism; each two are connected as a pair, and form an antithesis turning on the opposition of heaven to earth: the order of this antithesis is reversed in each new pair of clauses: flesh and spirit, angels and devils, world and glory; and there is a correspondence between the first and the last clause: "manifested in the flesh, received up into glory." [WIESINGER.] Justified—i.e., approved to be righteous. [ALFORD.] Christ, whilst "in the flesh," seemed to be just such a one as men in the flesh, and in fact bore their sin; but by having died to sin, and having risen again, He gained for Himself and His people justifying righteousness (Isaiah, 53. 8; John, 16. 10; Acts, 22. 14; Romans, 4. 25; 6. 7, 10; Hebrews, 9. 28; 1 Peter, 2. 18; 4. 1; John, 2. 1) [BENNETT]; or rather, as the antithesis to "was manifest in the flesh" requires, He was justified in the Spirit at the same time that He was manifest in the flesh, i.e., He was vindicated as Divine "in His Spirit," i.e., in His higher nature; in contrast to "in the flesh," His visible human nature. This contrasted opposition requires "in the Spirit" to be thus explained: not "by the Spirit," as ALFORD explains it. So Romans, 1. 3, 4, "Made of the seed of David according to the flesh, and declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the Spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead." So "justified" is used to mean vindicated in one's true character (Matthew, 11. 19; Luke, 7. 35; Romans, 3. 4). His manifestation "in the flesh" exposed him to misapprehension, as though He were nothing more (John, 6. 41; 7. 27). His justification, or vindication, in respect to His Spirit or higher being, was effected by ALL that manifested that higher being, His words (Matthew, 7. 29; John, 7. 46), His works (John, 2. 11; 3. 2) by His Father's testimony at His baptism (Matthew, 3. 17), and at the transfiguration (Matthew, 17. 5), and especially by His resurrection (Acts, 13. 33; Romans, 1. 4), though not by this exclusively, as EUSEBIUS limits it. seen of angels—Answering to "preached unto the Gentiles" (or rather "among the nations;" including the Jews), on the other hand (Matthew, 28. 19; Romans, 16. 25, 26). "Angels saw the Son of God with us, not having seen Him before" [CHRYSOSTOM]: "not: even they had seen His Divine nature, which is not visible to any creature, but they saw Him incarnate" (THEODORET) [Ephesians, 3. 8, 10; 1 Peter, 1. 12; cf. Colossians, 1. 16, 20]. What angels came to know by seeing, the nations learned by preaching. He is a new message to the one class as well as to the other: in the wondrous union in His person of things most opposite, viz., heaven and earth, lies "the mystery." [WIESINGER.] If the English Version, "Gentiles," be retained, the antithesis will be between the angels who are so near the Son of God, the Lord of angels, and the Gentiles who were so utterly "afar off" (Ephesians, 2. 17), believed on in the world—which lieth in wickedness (1 John, 2. 15; 5. 19). Opposed to "glory" (John, 3. 16, 17). This followed upon His being "preached" (Romans, 10. 14), received up into glory—"Greek," in glory." However, English Version may be retained thus, "Received up (so as now to be in glory," i.e., into glory (Mark, 16. 19; Luke, 24. 51; Acts, 1. 11). His reception in heaven answers to His reception on earth by being "believed on."

CHAPTER IV.

VER. 1-16. PREDICTION OF A COMING DEPARTURE FROM THE FAITH: TIMOTHY'S DUTY AS TO IT: GENERAL DIRECTIONS TO HIM. The "mystery of iniquity" here alluded to, and already working (2 Thessalonians, 2. 7), stands opposed to the "mystery of godliness" just mentioned (1 Timothy, 3. 16). 1. Now-Greek "But." In contrast to the "mystery of godliness," the Spirit—speaking by the prophets then in the church (whose prophecies rested on those of the Old Testament, Daniel, 7. 25; 8. 23, &c.; 11. 30, as also on those of Jesus in the New Testament, Matthew, 24. 11-24), and also by Paul himself, 2 Thessalonians, 2. 3 (with whom accord 2 Peter, 3. 3; 1 John, 2. 18; Jude, 18), expressly—"in plain words." This shows that he refers to prophecies of the Spirit then lying before him. In the latter times—in the times following upon the times in which he is now writing. Not some remote future, but times immediately subsequent, the beginnings of the apostasy being already discernible (Acts, 20. 29; these are the forerunners of "the last days" (2 Timothy, 3. 1), depart from the faith—The apostasy was to be within the church, the faithful one becoming the harlot. In 2 Thessalonians, 2. 3 (written earlier), the apostasy of the Jews from God joining the heathen against Christianity is the ground work on which the prophecy rises; whereas here, in the pastoral epistles, the prophecy is connected with Gnostic errors, the seeds of which had already been sown in the church (AUGERLES) (2 Timothy, 2. 18). Apollonius Tyaneus, a heretic, came to Ephesus in the lifetime of Timothy, giving heed—(ch. 1. 4; Titus, 1. 14), seducing spirits—working in the heretical teachers. 1 John, 4. 2, 3, 6, "the spirit of error," opposed to "the spirit of truth," "the Spirit" which "speaketh" in the true prophets against them. doctrines of devils—lit., "teachings of (i.e., suggested by demons," James, 3. 15, "wisdom-devilish;" 2 Corinthians, 11. 15, "Satan's ministers." 2. Rather translate, "Through (lit., 'in') the element in which the apostasy has placed the hypocrisy of lying-speakers" this expresses the means through which "some shall (be led to) depart from the faith," viz., the feigned sanctity of the seducers (cf., "deceivers," Titus, 1. 10, "having their consciences seared—Greek, "speaking their own consciences," &c., i.e., not only "having lies" to others, but also having their own conscience seared. Professing to lead others to holiness, their own conscience is all the while defiled. But consciences always have recourse to hypocrisy. As faith and a good conscience are joined (ch. 1. 5; Luke, 12. 46) and a bad conscience here. THEODORET explains like English Version, "seared," as implying their extreme insensibility; the effect of cauterising being to deaden sensation. The Greek, however, primarily means "branded" with the consciousness of crimes committed against their better knowledge and conscience, like so many scars burnt in by a branding-iron. Cf. Titus, 1. 15; 3. 11, "condemned of himself." They are conscious of the brand within, and yet with a hypocritical show of sanctity they strive to seduce others. As "a seal" is used in a good sense (2 Timothy, 2. 19), so "a brand" in a bad sense. The image is taken from the branding of criminals. 3. Sensuality leads to false spiritualism. Their own inward impurity is reflected in their eyes in the world without them, and hence their asceticism (Titus, 1. 14, 15). [WIKSINGER.] By a spurious spiritualism (2 Timothy, 2. 18), which made moral perfection consist in abstinence from outward things, they pretended to attain to a higher perfection. Matthew, 19. 10-12; cf. 1 Corinthians, 7. 8, 28, 35, gave a seeming handle to their "forbidding marriage" (contrast ch. 6. 13), and the Old Testament distinction as to clean and unclean, gave a pretext for teaching to "abstain from meats" (cf., Colossians, 2. 16, 17, 20-23). As these Judaizing Gnostics combined the harlot or apostate Old Testament church with the beast (Revelation, 17. 3, or Gnostic spiritualising anti-Christianity, so Rome's Judaizing elements (ch. 4. 3) shall ultimately be combined with the open worldly-wise anti-Christianity of the false prophet or beast (ch. 6. 20, 31; Colossians, 2. 8; 1 John, 4. 1-3; Revelation, 13. 12-18). Austerity gained for them a show of sanctity whilst preaching false doctrine (Colossians, 2. 23). EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 4. 29, quotes from IRENEUS (I. 98), a statement that Saturninus, Marcion, and the Encratites, preached abstinence from marriage and animal meats. Paul prophetically warns against such notions, the seeds of which already were being sown (ch. 6. 20; 2 Timothy, 2. 17, 18), to be received—Greek, "to be partaken of," of them—lit., (created and desired) "for them," &c. Though all (even the unbelieving, Psalm 104. 11; Matthew, 5. 45) are partakers in these foods created by God, "they which believe" alone fulfil God's design in creation by partaking of them with thanksgiving; as opposed to those who abstain from them, or in partaking of them, do not do so with thanksgiving. The unbelieving have not the designed use of such foods by reason of their "conscience being defiled" (Titus, 1. 15). The children of God alone "inherit the earth," for obedience is the necessary qualification (as it was in the original grant of the earth to Adam), which they alone possess, and know the truth—Explanatory and defining who are "they which believe." Translate as Greek, "And have full knowledge of the truth" (Note, Philipplians, 1. 9). Thus he contradicts the assumption of superior knowledge and higher moral perfection, put forward by the heretics, on the ground of their abstinence from marriage and meats. "The truth" stands in opposition to their "lies" (v. 2). 4, 5. Translate as Greek "Because" (expressing a reason resting on an objective fact; or, as here, a Scripture quotation)—"For" (a reason resting on something subjective in the writer's mind). every creature, good—(Genesis, 1. 31; Romans, 14. 14, 20.) A rebuffation by anticipation of the Gnostic opposition to creation; the seeds of which were now lurking latently in the church. Judaism (Acts, 10. 11-16; 1 Corinthians, 10. 25, 27) was the starting-point of the error as to meats; Oriental Gnosis added new elements. The old Gnostic heresy is now almost extinct; but its remains in the celibacy of Rome's priesthood, and in its fasts from animal meats, enjoined under the penalty of mortal sin, remain. I.e., with thanksgiving—Meats, though pure in themselves, become impure by being received with an unthankful mind (Romans, 14. 6; Titus, 1. 15). 5, sanctified—"hallowed" set apart as holy for the use of believing men; separated from "the creature," which is under the bondage of vanity and corruption (Romans, 8. 19, &c.). Just as in the Lord's supper, the thanksgiving prayer sanctifies the elements, separating them from their naturally alien position in relation to the spiritual world, and transferring them to their true relation to the new life. So in every use of the creature, thanksgiving prayer has the same effect, and ought always to be used (1 Corinthians, 10. 30, 31, "by the word of God and prayer—i.e., "by means of intercessory prayer" so the Greek—i.e., consecratory prayer in behalf of "the creature" or food—that prayer mainly consisting of "the word of God." The Apostolic Constitutions, 7. 49, give this ancient grace, almost wholly consisting of scripture. "Blessed art thou, O Lord, who feedest me from my youth, who givest food to all flesh: Fill our hearts with joy and gladness, that we, having all sufficiency, may abound unto every good work in Christ Jesus our Lord, through whom glory, honour, and might, be to thee for ever. Amen." In the case of inspired men, "the word of God" would refer to their inspired prayers (1 Kings, 17. 1); but as Paul speaks in general, including uninspired men's thanksgiving for meats, the "word of God" more probably refers to the Scripture words used in thanksgiving prayers. 6. If thou put... in remembrance—rather as Greek, "If thou suggest to (bring under the notice of) the brethren," &c. These things—viz., the truths stated

In v. 4, 5, in opposition to the errors foretold, v. 1-3, minister—"servant," nourished up—The Greek is present, not past: "Continually being nourished in" (2 Timothy, 1. 5; 3. 14, 15). the words of faith—rather, "...of the faith" (cf. v. 12). good doctrine—"the good teaching." Explanatory of "the faith," in opposition to the "teachings of demons" (English Version, doctrines of devils, v. 1) which Timothy was to counteract. Cf. "sound doctrine" (ch. 1. 10; 2. 2; Titus, 1. 9; 2. 1). whereunto thou hast attained—"the course of which thou hast followed," hast followed along by tracing its course and accompanying it. [ALFORD.] Thou hast begun to follow up. [BENGE.] The same Greek occurs. "Thou hast fully known" (2 Timothy, 3. 16), "having had perfect understanding" (Luke, 1. 3). It is an undesignated coincidence that the Greek verb is used only by Paul and Paul's companion, Luke. 7. refuse—reject, avoid, have nothing to do with (2 Timothy, 2. 23; Titus, 3. 10). old wives' fables—ancient myths (ch. 1. 4, 9; Titus, 1. 14). They are "profane," because leading away from "godliness" or "piety" (ch. 1. 4-7; 6. 20; 2 Timothy, 2. 16; Titus, 1. 1, 2). exercise thyself—lit., "exercise thyself" as one undergoing training in a gymnasium. Let thy self-discipline be not in acetical exercises as the false teachers (v. 3, 8; cf. 2 Timothy, 2. 22, 23; Hebrews, 6. 14; 12. 11), but with a view to godliness or "piety" (ch. 6. 11, 12). 8. but little—Greek, "profiteth to (but) a small extent." Paul does not deny that fasting and abstinence from conjugal intercourse for a time, with a view to reaching the inward man through the outward, do profit somewhat, Acts, 13. 3; 1 Corinthians, 7. 5, 7; 9. 26, 27, though in its degenerate form, asceticism, dwelling solely on what is outward, v. 8, is not only not profitable but injurious. Timothy seems to have had a leaning to such outward self-discipline (cf. ch. 4. 23). Paul, therefore, whilst not disapproving of this in its due proportion and place, shows the vast superiority of godliness or piety, as being profitable not merely "to a small extent," but "unto all things;" for, having its seat within, it extends thence to the whole outward life of a man. Not unto one portion only of his being, but to every portion of it, bodily and spiritual, temporal and eternal. [ALFORD.] "He who has piety (which is) profitable unto all things" wants nothing needful to his well-being, even though he be without those helps which, "to a small extent, bodily exercise furnishes." [CALVIN.] "Piety," which is the end for which thou art to "exercise thyself" (v. 7) is the essential thing; the means are secondary, having promise, &c.—translate as Greek. "Having promise of life, that which now is, and that which is to come." "Life" in its truest and best sense now and hereafter (2 Timothy, 1. 1). Length of life now so far as it is really good for the believer; life in its truest enjoyments and employments now, and life blessed and eternal hereafter (Matthew, 6. 33; Mark, 10. 29, 30). "Now in this time" (Psalm 84. 11; 112; Romans, 8. 25; 1 Corinthians, 3. 21, 22, "all things are yours...the world, life...things present, things to come") Christianity, which seems to aim only at our happiness hereafter, effectually promotes it here (ch. 6. 6; 2 Peter, 1. 3). Cf. Solomon's prayer and the answer (1 Kings, 3. 7-13). 9. [Ch. 1. 15.] This verse (Greek), "faithful is the saying," &c., confirms the assertion as to the "promise" attached to "godliness," v. 8 and forms a prefatory introduction to v. 10, which is joined to v. 9 by "for." So 2 Timothy, 2. 11. Godly men seem to suffer loss as to this life: Paul hereby refutes the notion. [BENGE.] "God is the avenger specially of those that believe" (v. 10), both as to "the life that now is," and also as to "the life which is to come" (v. 8). 10. therefore—Greek, "with a view to this." The reason why "we both" (both is omitted in the oldest MSS.) labour (endure hardship) and suffer reproach (some oldest MSS. read 'strive'), is because we have rested, and do rest our hope, on the living and therefore, life-giving, v. 8 God." Saviour—even in this life (v. 8). specially—those that believe—Their "labour and reproach" are not inconsistent with their having from the living God, their Saviour, even the present life (Mark, 10. 30, "a hundredfold now in this time...with persecutions"), much more the life to come. If God is in a sense "Saviour" of unbelievers (ch. 2. 4, &c.), is willing to be so everlastingly, and is temporally hery their Preserver and Benefactor, much more of believers. He is the Saviour of all men potentially (ch. 1. 15); of believers alone effectually. 11. These truths, to the exclusion of those useless and even injurious teachings (v. 1-8), whilst weighing well thyself, charge also upon others. 12. Let no man despise thy youth—Act so as to be respected in spite of thy youth (1 Corinthians, 16. 11; Titus, 2. 15; cf. "youthful" as to Timothy (2 Timothy, 2. 22). He was but a mere youth when he joined St. Paul (Acts, 16. 1-3). Eleven years had elapsed since then to the time subsequent to Paul's first imprisonment. He was, therefore, still young; especially in comparison with Paul, whose place he was filling; also in relation to elderly presbyters whom he should "entreat as a father" (ch. 5. 1), and generally in respect to his duties in rebuking, exhorting, and ordaining (ch. 3. 1), which ordinarily accord best with an elderly person (ch. 5. 19 be thou an example—Greek, "become a pattern" (Titus, 2. 7). The true way of making men not to despise (slight, or disregard) thy youth, in word—in all that thou sayest in public and private, conversation—i.e., "behaviour," the Old English sense of the word, in charity...faith—the two cardinal principles of the Christian (Galatians, 5. 6). The oldest MSS. omit "in spirit," in purity—simplicity of holy motive followed out in consistency of holy action [ALFORD] (ch. 5. 22; 2 Corinthians, 6. 6; James, 3. 17; 4. 8; 1 Peter, 1. 22). 13. Till I come—when Timothy's commission would be superseded for the time by the presence of the apostle himself (ch. 1. 3; 10. 14). reading—especially in the public congregation. The practice of reading Scripture was transferred from the Jewish synagogue to the Christian church (Luke, 4. 16-20; Acts, 13. 15; 15. 21; 2 Corinthians, 3. 14). The New Testament gospel and epistles being recognised as inspired by those who had the gift of discerning spirits, were from the first, according as they were written, read along with the Old Testament in the church (1 Thessalonians, 5. 21, 27; Colossians, 4. 16). [JUSTIN MARTYR, Apology, 1. 67.] I think that whilst public reading is the prominent thought, the Spirit intended also to teach that Scripture reading in private should be "the fountain of all wisdom from which pastors ought to draw whatever they bring before their flock." [ALFORD.] exhortatus—addressed to the feelings and will with a view to the regulation of the conduct. doctrine—Greek, ministerial "teaching" or instruction. Addressed to the understanding, so as to impart knowledge (ch. 6. 2; Romans, 12. 7, 8). Whether in public or private, exhortation and instruction should be based on Scripture reading. 14. Neglect not the gift—by letting it lie unused. In 2 Timothy, 1. 6, the gift is represented as a spark of the Spirit lying within him, and sure to smoulder by neglect, the stirring up or keeping in lively exercise which depends on the will of him on whom it is bestowed (Matthew, 25. 15, 25, 27, 28). The charism or spiritual gift, is that of the Spirit which qualified him for "the work of an evangelist" (Ephesians, 4. 11; 2 Timothy, 4. 5), or perhaps the gift of discerning spirits, specially needed in his function of ordaining, as overseer. [BISHOP HURT.] given thee—by God (1 Corinthians, 12. 4, 6). by prophecy—i.e., by the Holy Spirit, at his general ordination, or else consecration, to the special see of Ephesus, speaking through the prophet God's will to give him the graces needed to qualify him for his work (ch. 1. 18; Acts, 13. 1-3). with...laying on of hands—So in Joshua's case, Numbers, 27. 18-30; Deuteronomy, 34. 9. The gift was connected with the symbolical act of laying on hands. But the Greek "wrtm," implies that the presbyters laying on hands was the mere accompaniment of the conferring of the gift. "By" (2 Timothy, 1. 6) implies that Paul's laying on his hands was the actual instrument of its being conferred. of the presbytery.—In 2 Timothy, 1. 6, the apostle mentions only his own laying on of hands. But there his aim is to remind Timothy specially of the part he himself took in imparting to him the gift. Here he mentions the fact, quite consistent with the other, that the neighbouring presbyters took part in the ordination or consecration, he, however, taking the foremost part. Paul, though having the general oversight of the elders every where, was an elder himself (1 Peter, 5. 1; 2 John, 1). The Jewish council was composed of the elders of the church (the Presbytery, Luke, 21. 66; Acts, 22. 5), and a presiding Rabbi; so the Christian church was composed of apostles, elders, and a president (Acts, 15. 16). As the president of the synagogue was of the same order as his presbyters, so the bishop was of the same order as his presbyters. At the ordination of the president of the synagogue there were always three presbyters present to lay on hands, so the early church canons required three bishops to be present at the consecration of a bishop. As the president of the synagogue, so the bishop of the church alone could ordain, he acting as the representative, and in the name of the whole Presbytery. [VITINGA.] So, in the Anglican church, the bishop ordains, the presbyters or priest present joining with him in laying on hands. 15. Meditate—Greek, "Meditate CAREFULLY upon" (Psalm, 1. 2; 119. 15; cf. "Isaac," Genesis, 24. 63. these things—[v. 12-14.] As food would not nourish without digestion, which assimilates the food to the substance of the body, so spiritual food, in order to profit us, needs to be appropriated by prayerful meditation. give thyself wholly to it—"Be in these things"; let them engross thee wholly; be wholly absorbed in them. Entire self-dedication, as in other pursuits, so especially in religion, is the secret of proficiency. There are changes as to all other studies, fashionable to-day, out of fashion to-morrow; this study alone is never obsolete, and when made the all-pursuing aim sanctifies all other studies. The exercise of the ministry threatens the spirit of the ministry, unless it be sustained within. The minister must be first his own scholar before he can be another's teacher, profiting—Greek, "progress" towards perfection in the Christian life, and especially towards the fullest realization of the ideal of a Christian minister (v. 12), may appear to all—not for thy glory, but for the winning of souls (Matthew, 5. 16). 16. Take heed—Give heed Acts, 3. 6), thyself, and...doctrine—and unto thy teaching." The two requisites of a good pastor: His teaching will be of no avail, unless his own life accord with it; and his own purity of life is not enough, unless he be diligent in teaching. [CALVIN.] This verse is a summary of v. 12. continue in them—(2 Timothy, 3. 14.) in doing this—not "by doing this," as though he could save himself by works, thou shalt...save thyself, and them, &c.—(Ezekiel, 33. 9; James, 5. 20.) In performing faithfully his duty to others, the minister is promoting his own salvation. Indeed he cannot "give heed unto the teaching" of others, unless he be at the same time "giving heed unto himself."

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-25. GENERAL DIRECTIONS AS TO HOW TIMOTHY SHOULD DEAL WITH DIFFERENT CLASSES IN THE CHURCH. 1. an elder—in age: probably not an elder in the ministry; these latter are not mentioned till v. 17, "the elders that rule." Cf. Acts,

2. 17, "Your old men," lit., "elders." Contrasted with "the younger men." As Timothy was admonished so to conduct himself as to give no man reason to despise his youth (ch. 4. 12); so here he is told to bear in mind his youth, and to behave with the modesty which becomes a young man in relation to his elders. "Rebuke," lit., "Strike hard upon;" Rebuke not sharply: a different word from "rebuke" 2 Timothy, 4. 2. exhort—exhort, as brethren—and therefore equals: not lording it over them (1 Peter, 5. 1-3). 2. with all purity—Respectful treatment of the other sex will promote "purity." 3. Honor—by setting on the church roll, as fit objects of charitable sustenance (v. 9, 17, 18; Acts, 6. 1). So "honour" is used for support with necessities (Matthew, 15. 4, 6; Acts, 28. 10). widows indeed—(v. 16.) Those really desolate: not like those (in v. 4) having children or relations answerable for their support, nor like those (in v. 6) "who live in pleasure;" but such as, from their earthly desolation as to friends, are most likely to trust wholly in God, persevere in continual prayer, and carry out the religious duties assigned to church-widows (v. 8). Care for widows was transferred from the Jewish economy to the Christian (Deuteronomy, 14. 29; 16. 11; 24. 17, 19). 4. if any widow—not "a widow indeed," as having children who ought to support her. nephews—rather as Greek, "descendants," or "grand-children." [HAYCHURCH.] Nephews in old English meant grand-children (HOOKER, Ecclesiastical Polity, 5. 20). Let them—the children and descendants. learn first—ere it falls to the church to support them. to show piety at home—filial piety towards their widowed mother or grandmother, by giving her sustenance. lit., "...towards their own house" "Piety" is applied to the reverential discharge of filial duties; as the parental relation is the earthly representation of God our heavenly Father's relation to us. "Their own" stands in opposition to the church, in relation to which the widow is comparatively a stranger. She has a claim on her own children, prior to her claim on the church: let them fulfil this prior claim which she has on them, by sustaining her and not burdening the church. parents—Greek, (living) "progenitors," i.e., their mother or grandmother, as the case may be. "Let them learn," implies that abuses of this kind had crept into the church, widows claiming church support, though they had children or grandchildren able to support them. good and—The oldest MSS. omit. The words are probably inserted by a transcriber from ch. 2. 3. 5. widow indeed, and desolate—contrasted with her who has children or grand-children to support her (v. 4). trusteth in God—Perfect tense in Greek, "Hath rested, and doth rest her hope in God." This v. 5 adds another qualification in a widow for church maintenance, besides her being "desolate" or destitute of children to support her. She must be not one "that liveth in pleasure" (v. 6), but one making God her main hope (the accusative in Greek expresses that God is the ultimate aim whereto her hope is directed; whereas, ch. 4. 10, it expresses hope resting on God as her present stay [WICKHAMER]), and continuing instantly in prayer. Her destitution of children, and of all ties to earth, would leave her more unencumbered for devoting the rest of her days to God and the church (1 Corinthians, 7. 33, 34). Cf. also "Anna a widow," who remained unmarried after her husband's death, and "departed not from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers day and night" (Luke, 2. 36, 37). Such a one, Paul implies, would be the fittest object for the church's help (v. 3); for such a one is promoting the cause of Christ's church by her prayers for it. "Ardour in prayers flows from hoping confidence in God." [LEO.] in supplications and prayers—Greek, "in her supplications and prayers:" the former signifies asking under a sense of need, the latter, prayer (Notes, ch. 2. 1;

Philippians, 4. 6. night and day—Another coincidence with Luke (Luke, 18. 7. "cry day and night"); contrast Satan's accusations "day and night" (Revelation, 12. 10). 6. she that liveth in pleasure—the opposite of such a widow as is described v. 5, and therefore one utterly undeserving of church charity. The Greek expresses seanton prodigality and excess. [TITTMANN.] The root expresses weaving at a fast rate, and so lavish excess (Note, James, 5. 5). dead while she liveth—dead in the Spirit whilst alive in the flesh (Matthew, 8. 22; Ephesians, 5. 14). 7. these things—just now spoken (v. 5, 6). that they may be blameless—viz., the widows supported by the church. 8. But—Reverting to v. 4. "If any a general proposition; therefore including in its application the widow's children or grand-children) provide not for his own (relations in general), and especially for those of his own house (in particular), he hath practically denied the faith." Faith without love and its works is dead; "for the subject matter of faith is not mere opinion, but the grace and truth of God, to which he that believes gives up his spirit, as he that over gives up his heart." [MACK.] If in any case a duty of love is plain, it is in relation to one's own relatives; to fall in so plain an obligation is a plain proof of want of love, and therefore of want of faith. "Faith does not set aside natural duties, but strengthens them." [BENNETT.] worse than an infidel—because even an infidel (or unbeliever) is taught by nature to provide for his own relatives, and generally recognises the duty: the Christian who does not so, is worse (Matthew, 5. 46, 47). He has less excuse with his greater light, than the infidel who may break the laws of nature. 9. Translate, "As a widow (i.e., of the ecclesiastical order of widowhood: a kind of female presbyteress), let none be enrolled (in the catalogue, who is less than sixty years old." These were not deaconesses, who were chosen at a younger age (forty was the age fixed at the council of Chalcedon), and who had virgins (in a later age called widows) as well as widows among them, but a band of widows set apart, though not yet formally and finally, to the service of God and the church. Traces of such a class appear in Acts, 9. 41. Dorcas herself was such a one. As it was expedient (Note, ch. 3. 2; Titus, 1. 6) that the presbyter or bishop should have been but once married, so also in her case. There is a transition here to a new subject. The reference here cannot be, as in v. 3, to providing church sustentance for them. For the restriction to widows above sixty would then be needless and harsh, since many widows might be in need of help at a much earlier age; as also the rule that the widow must not have been twice married, especially since he himself, below (v. 14), enjoins the younger widows to marry again; as also that she must have brought up children. Moreover, v. 10 pre-supposes some competence, at least in past times, and so poor widows would be excluded, the very class requiring charity. Also, v. 11 would then be senseless, for then their re-marrying would be a benefit, not an injury, to the church, as relieving it of the burden of their sustentance. TERTULLIAN, de virginibus Virginitas, c. 9. HERMAS, Shepherd, B. 1. 2, and CHRYSOSTOM, Homily 31, mention such an order of ecclesiastical widowhood, each one not less than sixty years old, and resembling the presbyters in the respect paid to them, and in some of their duties; they ministered with sympathizing counsel to other widows, and to orphans, a ministry to which their own experimental knowledge of the feelings and sufferings of the bereaved adapted them, and had a general supervision of their sex. Age was doubtless a requisite in presbyters, as it is here stated to have been in presbyteresses, with a view to their influence on the younger persons of their sex. They were supported by the church, but not the only widows so supported (v. 3, 4). wife of one man—in order not to throw a stumbling-block in the way of Jews and heathen, who regarded with disfavour second marriages (Note, ch. 3. 2; Titus, 1. 6). This is the force of "blameless," giving no offence, even in matters indifferent. 10. for good works—Greek, "in honourable (excellent) works:" the sphere or element in which the good report of her had place (Titus, 2. 7). This answers to ch. 3. 7, as to the bishop or presbyter, "He must have a good report of them which are without." There could be no hardship at the age of sixty or upwards in not marrying again (end of v. 9, for the sake of serving better the cause of Christ as presbyteresses; though, to ordinary widows, no barrier existed against re-marriage (1 Corinthians, 7. 26). This is altogether distinct from Rome's unnatural vows of celibacy in the case of young marriageable women. The widow-presbyteresses, moreover, engaged to remain single, not as though single life were holier than married life (according to Rome's teaching), but because the interests of Christ's cause made it desirable (Note, ch. 3. 2). They had pledged "their first faith" to Christ as presbyteress widows: they now wish to transfer their faith to a husband (cf. 1 Corinthians, 7. 32, 34). 13. withal—in the same time, moreover, learn—usually in a good sense. The "therefore" means seeing that young widows are exposed to such temptations, "I will," or "desire," &c. (v. 11-13). The precept here that they should marry again, is not inconsistent with 1 Corinthians, 7. 40; for the circumstances of the two cases were distinct (cf. 1 Corinthians 7. 26). Here re-marriage is recommended as an antidote to sexual passion, idleness, and the other evils noted v. 11-13. Of course, where there was no tendency to these evils, marriage again would not be so requisite: St. Paul speaks of what is generally desirable, and supposing there should be danger of such evils, as was likely "he does not impose a law, but points not—"entertain not." [ALFORD.] but before two or three witnesses—A judicial conviction was not permitted in Deuteronomy, 17. 6; 19. 15, except on the testimony of at least two or three witnesses (cf.

 Matthew, 18. 16; John, 8. 17; 2 Corinthians, 13. 1; 1 John, 5. 6, 7). But Timothy's entertaining an accusation against any one is a different case, where the object was not judicially to punish, but to admonish: here he might ordinarily entertain it without the need of two or three witnesses; but not in the case of an elder, since the more earnest an elder was to convince gainsayers (Titus, 1. 9), the more exposed would he be to vexatious and false accusations. How important then was it that Timothy should not, without strong testimony, entertain a charge against presbyters, who should, in order to be efficient, be "blameless" (ch.
 3. 2; Titus, 1. 6). Verses 21, 24, imply that Timothy had the power of judging in the church. Doubtless he would not condemn any save on the testimony of two or three witnesses, but in ordinary cases he would cite them, as the law of Moses also allowed, though there were only one witness. But in the case of elders, he would require two or three witnesses before even citing them; for both their character for innocence stands higher, and they are exposed to envy and calumny more than others. [BENGL.] "Receive" does not, as ALFORD thinks, include both citation and conviction, but means only the former. 20. Them that sit—angels (2 Peter, 2. 4), but also to mark the excellence of the angels in general (as God's chosen ministers, "holy angels," "angels of light"), and so to give more solemnity to their testimony [CALVIN] as witnesses to Paul's adjuration. Angels take part by action and sympathy in the affairs of the earth (Luke, 15. 10; 1 Corinthians, 4. 9). these things—the injunctions the more probable reading in English Version. 22.

 Lay hands—i.e., ordain (ch. 4. 14; 2 Timothy, 1. 6; Titus, 1. 5). The connexion is with e. 19. The way to guard against scandals occurring in the case of presbyters is, be cautious as to the character of the elec-didate before ordaining him; this will apply to other church officers so ordained, as well as to presbyters. Thus, this clause refers to v. 19, as next clause, "neither be partaker of other men's sins," refers to v. 20. ELLICOTT, WIESINGER, &c., understand it of receiving back into church fellowship or absolution, by laying hands on those who had been "rebuked" (v. 20) and then excommunicated (Matthew, 18, 17); v. 20 favours this. But as in ch. 4, 14, and Acts, 6, 6; 13, 3; I Timothy, 1, 6, the laying on of hands is used of ordination (cf. however as to confirmation, Acts, 8, 17), it seems better to take it so here, suddenly—hastily: v. 24, 25 show that waiting for a time is salutary, neither be partaker of other men's sins—by negligence in ordaining ungodly candidates, and so becoming in some degree responsible for their sins. Or, there is the same transition from the elders to all in general who may sin, as in v. 19, 20. Be not a partaker in other men's sins by not "rebuking them that sin before all," as well as those that are candidates for the Presbytery, as also all "that sin," keep thyself pure—"THYSELF" is emphatic. "Keep THYSELF" clear of participation in OTHER men's sin by not failing to rebuke them that sin (v. 20). Thus the transition is easy to v. 23, which is concerning Timothy personally; cf. also v. 24, 25, no longer—as a habit. This injunction to drink wine occasionally is a modification of the preceding "keep thyself pure." The presbyter and deacon were enjoined to be "not given to wine" (ch. 3, 3, 8). Timothy seems to have had a tendency to undue ascetical strictness on this point (cf. Note, ch. 4, 8; cf. the Nazarene vow, Numbers, 6, 1-4; John Baptist, Luke, 1, 15; Romans, 14.). Paul therefore modifies the preceding words, "keep thyself pure," virtually saying, "Not that I mean to enjoin that kind of purity which consists in asceticism, nay, be no longer a water-drinker," i.e., no longer drink only water, but use a little wine, as much as is needed for thy health. So ELLICOTT and WIESINGER. ALFORD thus: Timothy was of a feeble frame (Note, I Corinthians, 16, 10, 11), and prone to timidity in his duties as overseer where vigorous action was needed; hence Paul exhorts him to take all proper means to raise his bodily condition above these infirmities. God hereby commands believers to use all due means for preserving health, and condemns by anticipation the human traditions which among various sects have denied the use of wine to the faithful. 24. Two kinds of sins are specified: those palpably manifest (so the Greek for "open beforehand" ought to be translated: so in Hebrews, 7, 14, it is translated "evident," lit., "before the eyes," i.e., notorious), further explained as "going before to judgment," and those which follow after the men—"some men they, i.e., their sins, follow after," viz., not going beforehand, loudly accusing, but hidden till they come to the judgment: so v. 23. The good works are of two classes: those palpably manifest (translate so, instead of "manifest beforehand") and "those that are otherwise," i.e., not palpably manifest. Both alike "cannot be hid;" the former class in the case of bad and good are manifest already; the latter class in the case of both are not manifest now, but shall be so at the final judgment, going before to judgment—as heralds: crying sins which accuse their perpetrator. The connection seems to me this: He had enjoined Timothy, v. 20, "Rebuke them that sin before all," and in v. 22, "Neither be partaker of other men's sins," by ordaining ungodly men; having then by a digression at the clause, "keep thyself pure," guarded against an ascetical error of Timothy in fancying purity consisted in asceticism, and having exhorted him to use wine for strengthening him in his work, he returns to the subject of his being vigorous as an overseer in rebuking sin, whether in presbyters or people, and in avoiding participation in men's sins by ordaining ungodly candidates. He says, therefore, there are two classes of sins, as there are two classes of good works: those palpably manifest, and those not so; the former are those on which thou shouldst act decidedly at once when called on, whether to rebuke in general, or to ordain ministers in particular; as to the latter, the final judgment alone can decide; however hidden now they "cannot be hid" then. This could only be said of the final judgment (I Corinthians, 4, 5; therefore, ALFORD's reference of this verse to Timothy's judgment in choosing elders must be wrong); all judgments before then are fallible. Thus he implies, that Timothy can only be responsible if he connive at manifest, or evident sins; not that those that are otherwise shall escape judgment at last; just as in the case of good works, he can only be responsible for taking into account in his judgments those which are patent to all, not those secret good works which nevertheless will not remain hidden at the final judgment.

CHAPTER VI.

VER. 1-21. EXHORTATIONS AS TO DISTINCTIONS OF CIVIL RANK; THE DUTY OF SLAVES, IN OPPOSITION TO THE FALSE TEACHINGS OF GAIN-SEEKERS; TIMOTHY'S PURSUIT IS TO BE GODLINESS, WHICH IS AN EVERLASTING POSSESSION; SOLEMN ADJURATIONS TO DO SO AGAINST CHRIST'S COMING; CHARGE TO BE GIVEN TO THE RICH, CONCERNING EXHORTATION. 1. servants—To be taken as predicate thus, "Let as many as are under the yoke (as) slaves" (TITUS, 2, 9). The exhortation is natural, as there was a danger of Christian slaves inwardly feeling above their heathen masters, their own masters—The phrase their own, is an argument for submissiveness; it is not stronger, but their own masters whom they are required to respect, all honour—all possible and fitting honour; not merely outward subjection, but that inward honour from which will flow spontaneously right outward conduct (Note, Ephesians, 5, 22). that the name of God—by which Christians are called, blasphemed—Heathen masters would say, What kind of God must be the God of the Christians, when such are the fruits of His worship (Romans, 2, 24; TITUS, 2, 5, 10! 2. And—rather. "But." The opposition is between those Christian slaves under the yoke of heathen, and those that have believing masters (he does not use the phrase "under the yoke" in the latter case, for service under believers is not a yoke). Connect the following words thus, "Let them the slaves not, because they (the masters) are brethren and so equals, masters and slave alike being Christians, despite them" the masters, but rather, &c.—"but all the more so much the more with the greater good will do them service, because they (the masters) are faithful (i.e., believers) and beloved who receive in the mutual interchange of relative duties between master and servant; so the Greek; the benefit" English Version violates Greek grammar. This latter clause is parallel to "Because they are brethren," which proves that "they" refers to the masters, not the servants, as TITTMANN takes it, explaining the verb in the common sense (LUKE, 1, 2; Acts, 20, 35), "who sedulously labour for their masters' benefit." The very term "benefit" delicately implies service done with the right motive, Christian "good will" (Ephesians, 6, 7). If the common sense of the Greek verb be urged, the sense must be, "Because they (the masters) are faithful and beloved who are sedulously intent on the benefit" of their servants. But PORPHYRY, de obstin. 1, 46, justifies the sense of the Greek verb given above, which also better accords with the context; for otherwise, the article "the benefit" will have nothing in the preceding words to explain it, whereas in my explanation above, "the benefit" will be that of the slaves' service. worketh." patience—enduring perseverance amidst trials, meekness—The oldest MSS. read, "meek-spiritedness," viz., towards the opponents of the gospel. 12. Fight the good fight—BENGE thinks this epistle was written from Corinth, where contests in the national games recurred at stated seasons, which will account for the allusion here as 1 Corinthians, 9, 24-26. Contrast "strives of words" (v. 4). Cf. ch. 1, 15; 2 Timothy, 4, 7. The "good profession" is connected with the "good fight" (Psalm 60, 4). lay hold on eternal life—the crown, or garland, the prize of victory, laid hold of by the winner in the good fight (2 Timothy, 4, 7, 8; Philip-pians, 3, 12-14). "Fight (lit., 'strive') with such striving earnestness as to lay hold on the prize, eternal life," also—not in the oldest MSS. professed a good profession—Greek, "didst confess this good confession," viz., the Christian confession (as the Greek word is the same in this verse as that for "confession" in v. 13, probably the profession here as the confession that Christ's kingdom is the kingdom of the truth, John, 18, 36, 37), at thy being set apart to thy ministerial function (whether in general, or as overseer at Ephesus): the same occasion as is referred to in ch. 1, 15; 4, 14; 2 Timothy, 1, 4. before many witnesses—who would testify against thee if thou shouldst fall away. (BENGE.) 13. quickeneth all things—i. e., "maketh alive." But the oldest MSS. read, "preserveth alive," as the same Greek means in Acts, 7, 19; cf. Nehemiah, 9, 6. He urges Timothy to faithfulness here by the present manifestation of God's power in preserving all things, as in v. 14, by the future manifestation of God's power at the appearing of Christ. The assurance that "eternal life," v. 12, will be the result of "fighting the good fight," rests on the fulness and power of Him who is the God of all life, present and to come. witnessed—It was the Lord's part to witness, Timothy's part to confess (or "profess," v. 12) "the good confession." (BENGE.) The confession was His testimony that He was King, and His kingdom that of the truth (v. 15; Note, v. 12; Matthew, 27, 11). Christ, in attesting, or bearing witness to this truth, attested the truth of the whole of Christianity. Timothy's profession, or confession, included therefore the whole of the Christian truth. 14. keep this commandment—Greek, "the commandment," i. e., the gospel rule of life (ch. 1, 5; John, 13, 34; 2 Peter, 2, 21; 3, 2). without spot, unrebukeable—agreeing with "thou." Keep the commandment and so be without spot, &c. "Pure" (ch. 5, 22; Ephesians, 5, 27; James, 1, 27; 2 Peter, 3, 14), until the appearing of... Christ—His coming in person (2 Thessalonians, 2, 8; Titus, 2, 13). Believers then used in their practice to set before themselves the day of Christ as near at hand; we, the hour of death. (BENGE.) The fact has in all ages of the church been certain, the time as uncertain to Paul, as it is to us; hence, in v. 15, he says, "in His times;" the church's true attitude is that of continual expectation of her Lord's return (1 Corinthians, 1, 8; Philip-pians, 1, 6, 10, 15. in His times—Greek, "His own [fitting] times" (Acts, 1, 7). The plural implies successive stages in the manifestation of the kingdom of God, each having its own appropriate time, the regulating principle and knowledge of which rest with the Father (ch. 2, 6; 2 Timothy, 1, 9; Titus, 1, 3; Hebrews, 1, 1). he shall show—"display" an expression appropriate in reference to His "APPEARING," which is stronger than His "coming," and implies its visibility: "manifest" make visible (cf. Acts, 3, 20); "He" is the Father (v. 16.) blessed—in Himself; so about to be the source of blessing to His people at Christ appearing, whence flows their "blessed hope" (ch. 1, 11; Titus, 2, 13). only—John, 17, 3; Romans, 16, 27; Revelation, 15, 4.) King of kings—Elsewhere applied also to Jesus (Revelation, 1, 5; 17, 14; 19, 16). 16. Who only hath immortality—in His own essence, not merely at the will of another, as all other immortal beings. (JUSTIN MARTYR, Quæst. ad Orthod., 61.) As He hath immortality, so will He give it to us who believe; to be out of Him is death. It is mere heathen philosophy that attributes to the soul indestructibility in itself, which is to be attributed solely to God's gift. As He hath life in Himself, so hath He given to the Son to have life in Himself (John, 5, 26). The term used in the New Testament for immortal, which does not occur, is "incorruptible." "Immortality" is found 1 Corinthians, 15, 52, 54. dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto—After life comes mention of light, as in John, 1, 4. That light is unapproachable to creatures, except so far as they are admitted by Him, and as He goes forth to them. (BENGE.) It is unapproachable on account of its exceeding brightness. (THEOPHYLACT.) If one cannot gaze steadfastly at the sun, which is but a small part of creation, by reason of its exceeding heat and power, how much less can mortal man gaze at the inexpressible glory of God (THEOPHYLACT ad Autolycos) (Psalm 104, 2; 1 John, 1, 6), no man hath seen—(Exodus, 33, 20; John, 1, 18; Colossians, 1, 15; Hebrews, 11, 27; 1 John, 4, 12.) Perhaps even in the perfect state no creature shall fully see God. Still the saints shall, in some sense, have the blessedness of seeing Him, which is denied to mere man (Matthew, 5, 8; 1 Corinthians, 13, 12; 1 John, 3, 2; Revelation, 22, 4). 17. Resuming the subject from above, v. 5, 10. The immortality of God, alone rich in glory, and of His people through Him, is opposed to the lust of money (cf. v. 14-16). From speaking of the desire to be rich, he here passes to those who are rich: 1. What ought to be their disposition; 2. what use they ought to make of their riches, and, 3. the consequences of their so using them. rich in this world—contrasted with the riches of the future kingdom to be the portion of believers at Christ's "appearing," v. 14. high-minded—often the characteristic of the rich (see Romans, 12, 16). trust—Greek, "to have their trust resting," in...—rather, "upon... upon," as the oldest MSS. uncertain riches—rather as Greek, "the uncertainty of riches." They who rest their trust on riches, rest trust on uncertainty itself (Proverbs, 23, 5). Now they belong to one person, now to another, and that which has many masters is possessed by none. (THEODORET.) living God—The best MSS. and versions omit "living." He who trusts in riches transfers to them the duty he owes to God. (CALVIN.) who giveth—Greek, "affordeth," all things richly—temporal and eternal, for the body and for the soul. In order to be truly rich, seek to be blessed of, and in, God (Proverbs, 10, 22; 2 Peter, 1, 3). to enjoy—Greek, "for enjoyment." Not that the heart may cleave to them as its idol and trust (ch. 4, 3). Enjoyment consists in giving, not in holding fast. Non-employment should be far removed, as from man, so from his resources (James, 5, 2, 3). (BENGE.) 18. do good—like God Himself (Psalm 119, 68; Acts, 14, 17) and Christ (Acts, 10, 28). TITTMANN translates, do, or act well; as the Greek for to be beneficent is a distinct word, agathopoiin. rich in good works—so "rich in faith," which produces good works (James, 2, 6). Contrasted with "rich in this world," v. 17. Lit., rich in rich in honourable (right) works, Greek kaine, ergos, are works good or right in themselves; agathos, good to another, ready to distribute—free-givers (ALFORD); the heart not cleaving to possessions, but ready to impart to others, willing to communicate—ready contributors (ALFORD); liberal in admitting others to share our goods in common with ourselves (Galatians, 6, 6; Hebrews, 12, 16). 19. Laying up in store—therefrom (i. e., by this means (ALFORD)) but BENGE makes the Greek apo mean laying up against a future time, laying up for themselves a treasure (ALFORD) (Matthew, 6, 19, 20). This is a treasure which we act wisely in laying up in store, whereas the wisest thing we can do with earthly treas-

CHRYSOSTOM.] "That entrusted to thee, not found by thee; which received, not invented; a matter not of teaching; not of private usurpation, but addition; a matter brought to thee, not put thee, in which thou oughtest to be not an not a guardian; not an originator, but a discharging, but following. 'Keep,' saith he, 'the reserve intact and inviolate the talent of the gift. What has been entrusted to thee, let remain with thee; let that same be handed thee. Gold thou hast received, gold return. I do not mere appearance of gold, but its actual reality that there is to be no progress in religion Church. Let there be so by all means, and progress; but then let it be real progress, the gift of the faith. Let the intelligence of the rich and its individual members increase provided it be only in its own kind, the doctrine still the same. Let the religion of the soul be the growth of the body, which, though it de-several parts in the progress of years, yet is same as it was essentially." [VINCENTIUS

LEONENSIS, A.D. 434.] avoiding—"turning away from" (cf. 2 Timothy, 3. 4). Even as they have "turned away from the truth" (ch. 1. 6; 5. 15; 2 Timothy, 4. 4), profane—(ch. 4. 7; 2 Timothy, 2. 16.) vain—Greek, "empty" mere "strifes of words," v. 4, producing no moral fruit, oppositions—dialectic antitheses of the false teachers. [ALFORD.] WIMMERER, not so probably, "oppositions to the sound doctrine." I think it likely germs existed already of the heresy of dualistic oppositions, viz., between the good and evil principle, afterwards fully developed in Gnosticism. Contrast Paul's just antithesis (ch. 3. 16; 6. 5, 6; 2 Timothy, 2. 15-23), science falsely so called—where there is not faith, there is not knowledge. (CHRYSOSTOM.) There was a true "knowledge," a special gift of the Spirit, which was abused by some (1 Corinthians, 5. 1; 12. 8; 14. 6). This gift was soon counterfeited by false teachers arrogating to themselves pre-eminently the gift (Colossians, 2. 8, 18, 20). Hence arose the creeds of the church, called symbola, i.e., in Greek watchwords, or a test whereby the orthodox might distinguish one another in opposition to the heretical. Perhaps here, v. 20, and 2 Timothy, 1. 13, 14, imply the existence of some such brief formula of doctrine then existing in the church; if so, we see a good reason for its not being written in Scripture, which is designed not to give dogmatic formularies, but to be the fountain whence all such formularies are to be drawn according to the exigencies of the several churches and ages. Probably thus a portion of the so called apostles' creed may have had their sanction, and been preserved solely by tradition on this account. "The creed, handed down from the apostles, is not written on paper and with ink, but on fleshy tables of the heart." [JEROME, adv. err. Johann. Hieros., ch. 9]. Thus, in the creed, contrary to the "oppositions" (the germs of which probably existed in the church in Paul's latter days) whereby the ones were set off in pairs, God is stated to be "the Father Almighty," or all-governing "maker of heaven and earth." [BISHOP HINDS.] 21. Which some professing—viz., professing these oppositions of science falsely so called. erred—[Note, ch. 1. 6; 2. 18.—lit., missed the mark (2 Timothy, 3. 7, 8). True sagacity is inseparable from faith, grace—Greek, "the grace," viz., of God, for which we Christians look, and in which we stand. [ALFORD.] be with thee—He restricts the salutation to Timothy, as the epistle was not to be read in public. [BENNETT.] But the oldest MSS. read, "be with you;" and the "thee" may be a transcriber's alteration to harmonize with 2 Timothy, 4. 22; Titus, 3. 15. Amen—Omitted in the oldest MSS.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO TIMOTHY.

INTRODUCTION.

OF WRITING.—St. Paul, in the interval between his first and second imprisonment, after having written Timothy from Macedonia or Corinth (Birks) (if we are to adopt the opinion that first Timothy was written after imprisonment), returned to Ephesus, as he intended, by way of Troas, where he left the books, &c. (mentioned with Carpus. From Ephesus he went to Crete for a short visit, and returned, and then wrote to Titus. Next Miletus to Corinth (ch. 4. 20), and thence to Nicopolis (Titus, 2. 12), whence he proceeded to Rome. From his home he wrote the second epistle to Timothy, shortly before his martyrdom. It is not certain where Timothy was at some of the internal evidences favour the view of his having been then at Ephesus; thus the salutation of Aquila, who generally resided there (ch. 4. 19); also that of the household of Onesiphorus, who is stated in it to have ministered to Paul at Ephesus, a circumstance implying his residence there. Also, the Hymeneus of 2 Tim. 1. 18 to be the same as the Hymeneus at Ephesus (1 Timothy, 1. 20); and probably "Alexander the copper-smith" the same as the Alexander joined with Hymeneus (1 Timothy, 1. 20), and possibly the same as the Alexander mentioned by the Jews to clear themselves, not to befriend Paul, at the riot in Ephesus (Acts, 19. 23, 24). The difficulty of opposition, how to account for ch. 4. 13, 20: if Timothy was at Ephesus, why did he need to be told that Paul came to Ephesus; or that Paul had left Trophimus, himself an Ephesian (Acts, 21. 29), sick at Miletus, which was only thirty miles from Ephesus? See, however, the notes, ch. 4, 12, 26. Tross lay on the road to Rome from either Ephesus or Pontus, so that ch. 4, 13 will accord with the theory of either Ephesus or any other place in the North West of Asia Minor, being Timothy's place of sojourn at the time. Probably, he had the general superintendence of the Pauline churches in Asia Minor, in accordance with his mission combining the office of evangelist, or itinerant missionary, with that of presiding overseer. Ephesus was probably his head quarters.

TIME OF WRITING.—(1.) Paul's first imprisonment, described in Acts, 28, was much milder than that in which he was when writing second Timothy. In the former, he had liberty to lodge in his own hired house, and to receive all comers, guarded only by a single soldier; in the latter, he was so closely confined that Onesiphorus with difficulty found him; he was chained, his friends had forsaken him, and he had narrowly escaped sentence of execution from the Roman Emperor. Medieval legends represent the Mamertine prison, or Tullianum, as the scene of his incarceration with Peter. But this is irreconcilable with the fact of Onesiphorus, Linus, Pudens, &c., having access to him. He was probably under military custody, as in his former imprisonment, though of a severer kind (ch. 1, 16-18; 2, 9; 4, 6-8, 16, 17). (2.) The visit to Troas (ch. 4, 13) can hardly have been that mentioned Acts, 20, 5-7, the last before his first imprisonment; for, if it were, the interval between that visit and the first imprisonment would be seven or eight years, a period most unlikely for him to have allowed to pass without sending for his cloak and parchments, when they might have been of service to him in the interim. (3.) Paul's leaving Trophimus sick at Miletus (ch. 4, 20), could not have been on the occasion mentioned Acts, 20, 15; for, subsequent to that, Trophimus was with Paul in Jerusalem (Acts, 21, 29). (4.) The words (ch. 4, 20, "Erastus abode at Corinth," imply that St. Paul had shortly before been at Corinth, where he left Erastus. But before his first imprisonment, Paul had not been at Corinth for several years; and in the interval Timothy had been with him, so that Timothy did not need at a later period to be told about that visit (Acts, 20, 2, 4). For all these reasons the imprisonment, during which he wrote second Timothy, is shown to be his second imprisonment. Moreover, Hebrews, 12, 23, 24, represents the writer (who was probably Paul) as in Italy, and at liberty. So Clement of Rome (D. 1, 5), the disciple of Paul, explicitly states, "In the east and west, Paul, as a preacher, instructed the whole world (i.e., the Roman Empire) in righteousness, and having gone to the extremity of the west, and having borne witness before the rulers (of Rome), he so was removed from the world." This plainly implies that he fulfilled his design (Romans, 15, 24-28) of a missionary journey into Spain. The Canon of the New Testament, compiled about 370 A.D. (called Muratori's Canon), also mentions "the journey of Paul from Rome to Spain." See Kouth, Relig. Soc., vol. 4, p. 1-12.

His martyrdom is universally said to have occurred in Nero's reign. [Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 2, 25; Jerome, Catalagus Scriptorum.] Five years thus seem to have elapsed between the first imprisonment, 63 A.D. (Acts, 28), and his martyrdom, June 68 A.D., the last year of Nero's reign. He was probably arrested by the magistrates in Nicopolis (Thim. 3, 15) in Epirus, in the winter, on a double charge, first, of being one of the Christians who had conspired, it was alleged by Nero's officers, to set fire to Rome, A.D. 64; secondly, of introducing a novel and unlawful religion. His friends all left him, except Luke: Demas from "love of this present world;" the others from various causes (ch. 4, 16, 11). On the first charge he seems to have been acquitted. His liberation from his first imprisonment took place in 63 A.D., the year before the great fire at Rome, which Nero made the pretext for his persecution of the Christians. Every cruelty was heaped on them; some were crucified; some were arrayed in the skins of wild beasts and hunted to death by dogs; some were wrapped in pitch-ropes and set on fire by night to illuminate the circus of the Vatican and gardens of Nero, whilst that monster mixed among the spectators in the garb of a charioteer. But now (67 or 68 A.D.) some years had elapsed since the first excitement which followed the fire. Hence, Paul, being a Roman citizen, was treated in his trial with a greater respect for the forms of law, and hence was acquitted (ch. 4, 17) on the first charge of having incited the Christians to their supposed act of incendiarism before his last departure from Rome. Alexander the coppersmith seems to have been a witness against him (ch. 4, 14). Had he been condemned on the first charge, he would probably have been burnt alive, as the preceding martyrs were, for arson. His judge was the city Prefect. Clemens Romanus specifies that his trial was (not before the emperor, but) "before the rulers." No advocate ventured to plead his cause, no patron appeared for him, such as under ordinary circumstances might have aided him; for instance, one of the powerful Æmilian house, under which his family possibly enjoyed citizenship (ch. 4, 16, 17), whence he may have taken his name Paul. The place of trial was, probably, one of the great basilicas in the Forum, two of which were called the Pauline Basilicas, from L. Æmilius Paulus, who had built one and restored the other. He was remanded for the second stage of his trial. He did not expect this to come on till the following "winter" (ch. 4, 21), whereas it took place about midsummer; if in Nero's reign, not later than June. In the interim Luke was his only constant companion; but one friend from Asia, Onesiphorus, had diligently sought him and visited him in prison, undeterred by the danger. Linus, too, the future bishop of Rome, Pudens, the son of a senator, and Claudia, his bride, perhaps the daughter of a British king (Note, ch. 4, 21), were among his visitors; and Tychicus, before he was sent by Paul to Ephesus (ch. 4, 12); perhaps bearing with him this epistle.

OBJECT OF THE EPISTLE.—He was anxious to see his disciple Timothy, before his death, and that Timothy should bring Mark with him (ch. 1, 4; 4, 9, 11, 21). But feeling how uncertain it was whether Timothy should arrive in time, he felt it necessary, also, to give him by letter a last warning as to the heresies, the germs of which were then being sated in the churches. Hence he writes a series of exhortations to faithfulness, and zeal for sound doctrine, and patience amidst trials: a charge which Timothy seems to have needed, if we are to judge from the apostle's earnestness in urging him to boldness in Christ's cause, as though St. Paul thought he saw in him some signs of constitutional timidity (ch. 2, 9; 4, 1-5; 1 Timothy, 5, 22, 23).

ST. PAUL'S DEATH.—Dionysius, Bishop of Corinth (quoted in Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 2, 25), about A.D. 150 is the earliest authority for the tradition that Peter suffered martyrdom at Rome "about the same time" as Paul, after having laboured for some time there. He calls Peter and Paul "the founders of the Corinthian and Roman churches." The Roman Presbyter, Caius (about A.D. 200), mentions the tradition that Peter suffered martyrdom in the Vatican. But (1.) Peter's work was among the Jews (Galatians, 2, 9), whereas Rome was a Gentile church (Romans, 1, 13). Moreover, (2.) the first epistle of Peter (1, 1; 5, 13) represents him as labouring in Babylon in Mesopotamia. (3.) The silence of St. Paul's epistles written at Rome, negatives the tradition of his having founded, or laboured long at Rome; though it is possible he may have endured martyrdom there. His martyrdom, certainly, was not, as Jerome says, "on the same day" with that of Paul, else Paul would have mentioned Peter's being at Rome in ch. 4, 11. The legend says that Peter, through fear, was fleeing from Rome at early dawn by the Appian way, when he met our Lord, and falling at His feet, asked, Lord, whither goest thou? to which the Lord replied, I go again to be crucified. The disciple returned penitent and abashed, and was martyred. The church of Domine quo vadis, on the Appian way, commemorates the supposed fact. Paul, according to Caius (quoted in Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 2, 25), suffered martyrdom on the Ostian way. So also Jerome, who gives the date, the 14th year of Nero. It was common to send prisoners, whose death might attract too much notice

o some distance from the city, under a military escort, for execution; hence the soldier's sword, not the executioner, was the instrument of his decapitation. (Orosius, Hist., 7. 7.) Paul appears, from Philipians, 1., to have risen even in the palace, and certainly must have exercised such an influence as would excite sympathy in his void which the execution was ordered outside the city. Cf. Tacitus, Hist., 4. 11. The Basilica of St. Paul, first constantine, now stands outside Rome on the road to Ostia; before the Reformation it was under the protection of the kings of England, and the emblem of the order of the Garter is still to be seen among its decorations. The spot of the martyrdom is the tre fontane, not far from the Basilica. [Combe & Hewson.]

a mark of truth, that in Acts, 16. 1 the belief of the mother alone is mentioned, just as here praise is bestowed on the faith of the mother, whilst no notice is taken of the father. (PALCY'S Horn Paulina.) and —Greek, "but," i. e., notwithstanding appearances.
[ALFORD.] persuaded that—it dwells, or it shall dwell "in thee also." The mention of the faith of his mother and grandmother is designed as an incentive to stir up his faith. 6. Wherefore—Greek, "For which cause," viz., because thou hast inherited, didst once possess, and I trust [?" am persuaded"] still dost possess, such unfeigned faith. [ALFORD.] stir up—lit., "rekindle," "revive the spark of" the opposite of "quench" or extinguish (1 Thessalonians, 5. 19). Paul does not doubt the existence of real faith in Timothy, but he desires it to be put into active exercise. Timothy seems to have become somewhat remiss from being so long without Paul (ch. 2. 22). gift of God—the spiritual grace received for his ministerial office, either at his original ordination, or at his consecration to the particular office of superintending the Ephesian church (Note, 1 Timothy, 4. 14). Imparting fearlessness, power, love, and a sound mind (v. 7), by the putting on of my hands.—In 1 Timothy, 4. 14, it is "with (not by) the laying on of the hands of the presbytery." The apostle was chief in the ordination, and to him "by" is applied. The presbytery were his assistants: so "with," implying merely accompaniment, is said of them. Paul was the instrument in Timothy's ordination and reception of the grace then conferred; the presbytery were the concurent participants in the act of ordination: so the Greek, dia and meta. So in ordinations by a bishop in our days, he does the principal act, they join in laying on hands with him. 7. For, &c.—Implying that Timothy needed the exhortation "to stir up the gift of God in him," being constitutionally timid. "For God did not give us (so the Greek, viz., at our ordination or consecration) the spirit of fear." The spirit which He gave us, was not the spirit of timidity [lit., cowardice, which is weakness], but of "power" (exhibited in a fearless "testimony" for Christ, v. 8). "Power" is the invariable accompaniment of the gift of the Holy Ghost. Luke, 24. 49; Acts, 1. 8; cf. 6. 6, "full of faith and of the Holy Ghost," with v. 8, "full of faith and power." Fear is the result of "the spirit of bondage" (Romans, 8. 15).
Fear within exaggerates the causes of fear without.
"The spirit of power" is the spirit of man. ἀνάγει by the Spirit of God imparting power: this power "casteth out fear" from ourselves, and stimulates us to try to cast it out of others (1 John, 4, 18). love—which moves the believer whilst "speaking the truth" with power, when giving his testimony for Christ (v. 8), at the same time to do so "in love" (Ephesians, 4, 15), a sound mind—The Greek is rather, "the bringing of men to a sound mind." [WALL.] BENGEL supports English Version, "a sound mind," or "sobermindedness:" a duty to which a young man like Timothy especially needed to be exhorted to (ch. 2, 22; 1 Timothy, 4, 12; Titus, 2, 4, 6). So Paul urges him, in ch. 2, 4, to give up worldly entanglements, which as thorns (Luke, 8, 14) choke the word. These three gifts are preferable to any miraculous powers whatever. 8, therefore—seeing that God hath given us such a spirit, not that of fear. Be not thou...ashamed—I agree with ELLICOTT, in opposition to ALFORD, that the Greek subjunctive here, with the negative, implies action completed at one time, not continued action, which the present imperative would express: thus implying that Timothy had not decidedly yet evinced such feeling of shame; though I think, Paul, amidst the desertion of others who once promised fair, and from being aware of Timothy's constitutional timidity (Notes, v. 7), felt it necessary to stir him up and guard him against the possibility of unchristian dereliction of duty as to bold confession of Christ. Shame (v. 8) is the companion of fear (v. 7): if fear be overcome, false shame flees. [BENGEL.] Paul himself (v. 12), and Onesiphorus (v. 16), were instances of fearless profession removing false shame. He presents in contrast sad instances of fear and shame (v. 15), of the testimony of our Lord—of the testimony which thou art bound to give in the cause of our Lord: he says "our," to connect Timothy and himself together in the testimony which both should give for their common Lord. The testimony which Christ gave before Pilate (1 Timothy, 6, 12, 13), is an incentive to the believer that he should, after his Lord's example, witness a good testimony or confession, nor of me his prisoner—The cause of God's servants is the cause of God Himself (Ephesians, 4, 1). Timothy might easily be tempted to be ashamed of one in prison, especially as not only worldly shame, but great risk, attended any recognition of Paul the prisoner, be thou partaker—with me, of the gospel—rather as Greek: "for the gospel," i.e., suffered for the gospel (ch. 2, 3-5; Philimon, 13), according to the power of God—exhibited in having saved and called us (v. 9). God who has done the greater act of power (i.e., saved us), will surely do the less (carry us safe through afflictions borne for the gospel). "Think not that thou hast to bear these afflictions by thine own power, nay, it is by the power of God. It was a greater exercise of power than His making the heaven, His persuading the world to embrace salvation." [CHRYSTOSTOM.] 9. Who...called us—viz., God the Father (Galatians, 1, 6). The having "saved us" in His eternal purpose of "grace," given us in Christ before the world began, precedes His actual "calling" of us in due time with a call made effective to us by the Holy Spirit; therefore, "saved us" comes before "called us" (Romans, 8, 28-30). holy calling—the actual call to a life of holiness, Hebrews, 3, 1, "Heavenly calling" [TITMANN, Synonyms]: whereas we were sinners and enemies (Ephesians, 1, 15; 4, 1). The call comes wholly from God, and claims us wholly for God. "Holy" implies the separation of believers from the rest of the world unto God, not according to—not having regard to our works in His election and calling of grace (Romans, 9, 11; Ephesians, 2, 8, 9). His own purpose—The origination of salvation was of His own purpose, flowing from His own goodness, not for works of ours coming first, but wholly because of His own gratuitous, electing love. [THEODORET & CALVIN.] grace...given us—in His everlasting purpose, regarded as the same as when actually accomplished in due time. in Christ—believers being regarded by God as IN HIM, with whom the Father makes the covenant of salvation (Ephesians, 1, 4; 3, 11), before the world began—Greek, "before the times (periods) of ages:" the enduring ages of which no end is contemplated (1 Corinthians, 2, 7; Ephesians, 3, 11). 10. But...now...manifest—In contrast to its concealment heretofore in the eternal purpose of God "before the world began" (v. 9; Colossians, 1, 26; Titus, 1, 2, 3), appearing—the visible manifestation in the flesh, abolished death—Greek, "taken away the power from death." [TITMANN.] The Greek article before "death," implies that Christ abolished death, not only in some particular instance, but in its very essence, being, and idea, as well as in all its aspects and consequences (John, 11, 26; Romans, 8, 2, 38; 1 Corinthians, 15, 26, 55; Hebrews, 2, 14). The carrying out of the abolition of death into full effect is to be at the resurrection (Revelation, 20, 14). The death of the body meanwhile is but temporary, and is made no account of by Christ and the apostles, brought...to light—making visible by the gospel what was before hidden in God's purpose. His—of the Spirit, acting first on the soul here, about to act on the body also at the resurrection, immortality—Greek, "incorruptibility" of the new life, not merely of the risen body [ALFORD] (Romans, 8, 11), through—by means of the gospel, which brings to light the life and immortality purposed by God from eternity, but manifested now first to man by Christ, who, in His own resurrection, has given the pledge of His people's final triumph over death through Him. Before the gospel revelation from God, man, by the light of nature, under the most favourable circumstances, had but a glimmering idea of the possibility of a future being of the soul, but not the faintest idea of the resurrection of the body (Acts, 17, 18, 32). If Christ were not "the life," the dead could never live; if He were not the resurrection, they could never rise; had He not the keys of hell and death (Revelation, 1, 18), we could never break through the bars of death or gates of hell. [BISHOP PEARSON.] 11. Whereunto—For the publication of which gospel, I am appointed—Greek, "I was appointed," preacher—Greek, "herald," teacher of the Gentiles—(1 Timothy, 2, 7.) He brings forward his own example in this verse and v. 12, as a pattern for Timothy, as a public "preacher," an "apostle," or missionary from place to place, and a "teacher" is private instructing His flock with patient perseverance. 12. For the which cause—For the gospel cause of which I was appointed a preacher (v. 10, 11). I also suffer—besides my active work as a missionary. ELLICOTT translates, "I suffer even these things" the sufferings attendant on my being a prisoner (v. 8, 15). I am not ashamed—neither be thou (v. 8), for—Confidence as to the future drives away shame. [BENGEL.] I know—though the world knows Him not (John, 10, 14; 17, 25; whom—I know what a faithful, promise keeping God He is (ch. 2, 13). It is not, I know how I have believed, but, I know whom I have believed: a feeble faith may clasp a strong Saviour, believed—rather, "trusted" carrying out the metaphor of a depositor depositing his pledge with one whom He trusts. I am persuaded—(Romans, 8, 38.) he is able—in spite of so many foes around me, that which I have committed unto him—Greek, "my deposit," the body, soul, and spirit, which I have deposited in God's safe keeping (1 Thessalonians, 5, 23; 1 Peter, 4, 19). So Christ Himself in dying (Luke, 23, 46). "God deposits with us His word; we deposit with God our spirit." [GRORIUS.] There is one deposit (His revelation) committed by God to us, which we ought to keep (v. 13, 14) and transmit to others (ch. 2, 2): there is another committed by God to us, which we should commit to His keeping, viz., ourselves and our heavenly portion, that day—the day of His appearing (v. 15; ch. 4, 8). 13. Hold the form—rather as Greek, "Have (i.e., keep) a firm of sound (Greek, healthy) words which thou hast heard from me, in faith and love." "Keep" suits the sense to a deposit in the context. The secondary sition of the verb in the Greek forbids our taking it strongly as English Version, "Hold fast." The eek for "form" is translated "pattern" in 1 Timothy, 16, the only other passage where it occurs. Have th a pattern drawn from my sound words, in opition to the unsound doctrines so current at hesus, vividly impressed (WAHL translates it "deation" the verb implies to make a lively and last-impres) on thy mind, in faith and love—the element which my sound words had placed, and in which u art to have the vivid impression of them as thy ardly delineated pattern, moulding conformably outward profession. So nearly BENGEL explains, 1 Timothy, 3, v. 14. Translate as Greek, "That goodly skeep keep through the Holy Ghost," viz., "the sound rds which I have committed to thee" (v. 13; ch. 2, 2). us—in all believers, not merely in you and me. The welling Spirit enables us to keep from the robbers the soul the deposit of His word committed to us God. 15. all they which are in Asia—Proconsular it: "All who are there now, when they were in Rome it "be" or are, but) turned from me" then: were shamed of my chain," in contrast to Onesiphorus; I not stand with me but forsook me (ch. 4, 16). It is sible that the occasion of their turning from him s at his apprehension in Nicopolis, whither they had orted him on his way to Rome, but from which y turned back to Asia. A hint to Timothy, now Asia, not to be like them, but to imitate rather esiphorus, and to come to him (ch. 4, 21). Phygelus l Hermogenes—specified perhaps, as being persons m whom such pusillanimous conduct could least be pected; or, as being well known to Timothy, and ken of before in conversations between him and ul, when the latter was in Asia Minor. 16. The Lord e mercy—even as Onesiphorus had abounded in rks of mercy, the house of Onesiphorus—He himself a then absent from Ephesus, which accounts for the m of expression (ch. 4, 19). His household would rldy retain his name after the master was dead, as BENGEL supposes him to have been. Nowhere has Paul ayers for the dead, which is fatal to the theory, faured by ALFORD also, that he was dead. God blesses t only the righteous man himself, but all his houseld, my chain—Paul in the second, as in his first insonment, was bound by a chain to the soldier who arded him. 17. found me—in the crowded metropolis. in turn "may he find mercy of the Lord in that y" when the whole universe shall be assembled. grant unto him—as well as "unto his house" (v. 16). e Lord—who rewards a kindness done to His disles as if done to Himself (Matthew, 25, 45). of-om the Lord: "the Lord" is emphatically put nsad of "from Himself," for solemnity and emphasis (Thessalonians, 3, 5). in how many things—"how ny acts of ministry he rendered," unto me—Omitted the oldest MSS., so that the "ministered" may in- scribe services rendered to others as well as to Paul. y well—rather as Greek, "Thou knowest better" an I can tell thee, seeing that thou art more of a gular resident at Ephesus).

CHAPTER II.

VER. 1-26. EXHORTATIONS: TO FAITHFULNESS AS A OD SOLDIER OF CHRIST: ERRORS TO BE SHUNNED: IE LORD'S SURE FOUNDATION: THE RIGHT SPIRIT E A SERVANT OF CHRIST. 1. Thou therefore—follow; my example (ch. 1, 8, 12), and that of Onesiphorus l. 1, 16-18), and shunning that of those who forsook h (ch. 1, 15). my son—Children ought to imitate their her. be strong—lit., "be invested with power," ve power, and show thyself to have it; implying an

abiding state of power. in the grace—the element IS which the believer's strength has place. Cf. ch. 1, 7, "God hath given us the spirit of power." 2. among —Greek, "through," i.e., with the attestation (lit., intervention) of many witnesses, viz., the presbyters and others present at his ordination or consecration (1 Timothy, 4, 14; 6, 12). commit—in trust, as a deposit (ch. 1, 14). faithful—The quality most needed by those having a trust committed to them. who—Greek, "persons" such as shall be competent to teach (them to) others also." Thus the way is prepared for inculcating the duty of faithful endurance (v. 2-13). Thou shouldst consider as a motive to endurance, that thou hast not only to keep the deposit for thyself, but to transmit it unimpaired to others, who in their turn shall fulfil the same office. This is so far from supporting oral tradition now, that it rather teaches how precarious a mode of preserving revealed truth it was, depending as it did, on the trustworthiness of each individual in the chain of succession; and how thankful we ought to be that God Himself has given the written Word, which is exempt from such risk. 3. Thou therefore endure hardness—The oldest MSS. have no "Thou therefore," and read, "Endure hardship with" (me). "Take thy share in suffering." (CONYBEARE & HOWSON.) 4. "No one whilst serving as a soldier," the affairs, &c. —"the businesses of life" [ALFORD]: mercantile, or other than military. him who hath chosen him—the general who at the first enlisted him as a soldier. Paul himself worked at tent-making (Acts, 18, 3). Therefore what is prohibited here is, not all other save religious occupation, but the becoming entangled, or over-engrossed therewith. 5. And—"Moreover," strive for masteries—"strive in the games" [ALFORD]: viz., the great national games of Greece. yet is he not crowned, except—even though he gain the victory. strive lawfully—observing all the conditions of both the contest (keeping within the bounds of the course and strip of his clothes) and the preparation for it, viz., as to self-denying diet, anointing, exercise, self-restraint, chastity, decorum, &c. (1 Corinthians, 9, 24-27). 6. must be first partaker—The right of first partaking of the fruits belongs to him who is labouring; do not thou, therefore, relax thy labours, as thou wouldst be foremost in partaking of the reward. CONYBEARE explains, "first, before the idler." 7. Consider the force of the illustrations I have given from the soldier, the contender in the games, and the husbandmen, as applying to thyself in thy ministry, and the Lord give thee, &c.—The oldest MSS. read, "for the Lord will give thee understanding." Thou canst understand my meaning so as personally to apply it to thyself; for the Lord will give thee understanding when thou seekest it from Him "in all things." Not intellectual perception, but personal appropriation of the truths metaphorically expressed, was what he needed to be given him by the Lord. 8. Rather as Greek, "Remember Jesus Christ, raised from the dead." Remember Christ risen, so as to follow Him. As He was raised after death, so if thou wouldst share His risen "life," thou must now share His "death" (v. 11). The Greek perfect passive participle, implies a permanent character acquired by Jesus as the risen Saviour, and our permanent interest in Him as such. Christ's resurrection is put prominently forward as being the truth now assailed (v. 18), and the one best calculated to stimulate Timothy to steadfastness in sharing Paul's sufferings for the gospel's sake (Note, v. 3). my gospel—that which I always taught, of the seed of David—The one and only genealogy (as contrasted with the "endless genealogies," 1 Timothy, 1, 4) worth thinking of, for it proves Jesus to be the Messiah. The absence of the article in the Greek, and this formula, "of the seed of David" (cf. Romans, 1, 3), imply, that the words were probably part of a recognised short oral creed. In His death He assured us of His humanity; by His resurrection, of His divinity. That He was not crucified for His own sin, appears from His resurrection; that He was crucified, shows that He bore sin, on Him, though not in Him. 2. Wherein—in proclaiming which gospel, suffer trouble—lit., "evil." I am a sufferer of evil as though I were a doer of evil. bonds—ch. 1. 16, word...not bound—Though my person is bound, my tongue and my pen are not (ch. 4. 17; Acts, 28. 31). Or healludes not merely to his own proclamation of the gospel, though in chains, but to the freedom of its circulation by others, even though his power of circulating it is now prescribed (Philippians, 1. 18). He also hints to Timothy, that he being free ought to be the more earnest in the service of it. 10. Therefore—Because of the anxiety I feel that the gospel should be extended; that anxiety being implied in v. 9. endure—not merely "I passively suffer," but "I actively and perseveringly endure," and "am ready to endure patiently all things," the elect—for the sake of the church: all the members of Christ's spiritual body (Colossians, 1. 24). they...also—as well as myself: both God's elect not yet converted and those already so. salvation...glory—not only salvation from wrath, but glory in reigning with Him eternally (v. 12). Glory is the full expansion of salvation (Acts, 2. 47; Romans, 8. 21-24. 30; Hebrews, 9. 28). So grace and glory Psalm 84. 12. 11. Greek. "Faithful is the saying." For—For the fact is so that, "if we be dead with Him [the Greek aorist tense implies a state once for all entered into in past times at the moment of regeneration, Romans, 6. 3, 4, 8; Colossians, 2. 12], we shall also live with Him." The symmetrical form of "the saying," v. 11-13, and the rhythmical balance of the parallel clauses, make it likely, they formed part of a church hymn (Note, 1 Timothy, 3. 16, or accepted formula, perhaps first uttered by some of the Christian "prophets" in the public assembly (1 Corinthians, 14. 26). The phrase "faithful is the saying," which seems to have been the usual formula (cf. 1 Timothy, 1. 15; 3. 1; 4. 9; Titus, 2. 9) in such cases, favours this. 12. suffer—rather, as the Greek is the same as in v. 10, "If we endure [with Him]," etc. (Romans, 5. 17). reign with him—The peculiar privilege of the elect church now suffering with Christ, then to reign with Him (Note, 1 Corinthians, 6. 2. Reigning is something more than mere salvation (Romans, 5. 17; Revelation, 3. 21; 5. 10; 20. 4, 6). deny—with the mouth. As "believe [with the heart] follows, v. 12. Cf. the opposite, "confess with thy mouth" and "believe in thine heart" (Romans, 10. 9, 10). he also will deny us—(Matthew, 10. 33.) 13. believe not—"If we are unbelievers (lit., unfaithful), He remains faithful" (Deuteronomy, 7. 9, 10). The oldest MSS. read, "For He cannot [it is an impossibility] that He should deny Himself." He cannot be unfaithful to His word that He will deny those who deny Him, though we be not faithful to our profession of faith in Him (Romans, 3. 3). Three things are impossible to God, to die, to lie, and to be deceived (AUGUSTINE, Symbolism ad Catechumenos, 1. 1.) (Hebrews, 6. 18). This impossibility is not one of infirmity, but of infinite power and majesty. Also, indirectly, comfort is suggested to believers, that He is faithful to His promises to them; at the same time that apostates are shaken out of their self-deceiving fancy, that because they change, Christ similarly may change. A warning to Timothy to be steadfast in the faith. 14. them—those over whom thou dost preside (Titus, 3. 1). charging—Greek, "testifying continually," "adjoining them," before the Lord—(1 Timothy, 5. 21.) that they strive not about words—rather, "strive with words," "not to have a mere war of words" (v. 23, 24; 1 Timothy, 6. 4) where the most vital matters are at stake (v. 17, 18; Acts, 18. 15). The oldest MSS. put a stop at "charging them before the Lord" (which clause is thus connected with "put them in remembrance") and read the imperative, "Strive not about words," &c. to as profit—not qualifying "words" but str. nenter, in position with "strive in words," "a thing tending to no profit," lit., "profitable for nothing," the opposite of "meet for the master's use" (v. 21), to the subverting—sure to subvert or overturn the hearers: the opposite of "edifying" (building up) (2 Corinthians, 13. 10). 15. Study—Greek, "Be earnest," or "diligent." to show—Greek, "present," as in Romans, 12. 1. thyself—as distinguished from those whom Timothy was to charge (v. 14). approved—tested by trial: opposed to "reprobate" (Titus, 1. 16). workman—Alluding to Matthew, 20. 1, etc. set to be ashamed—by his work not being "approved" (Philippians, 1. 20). Contrast "deceitful workers" (2 Corinthians, 11. 13). rightly dividing—"rightly handling" [Vulgate]; "rightly administering" [A. V.]; lit., cutting "straight," or "right"; the metaphor being from a father or a steward (1 Corinthians, 4. 1) cutting and distributing bread among his children (VITERBO & CALVIN) (Luke, 12. 42. LXX. Proverbs, 3. 6, and 11. 8, use it of "making one's way." So BENGEL here takes Paul to mean that Timothy may make ready a straight way for "the word of truth," and may himself walk straight forward according to this line, turning neither to the right nor to the left, "teaching no other doctrine" (1 Timothy, 1. 3). The same image of a way appears in the Greek for "increase" (Note, v. 16). The opposite to "rightly handling," or "dispensing" is, 2 Corinthians, 2. 17, "corrupt the word of God. truth—Greek, "the truth" (cf. v. 15, 18. shun—lit., "stand above," separate from, and superior to. vain—opposed to "the truth" (v. 18). babbings—with loud voice; opposed to the temperate "word" (Titus, 3. 9). increase—Greek, "advance" lit., "strike forward," an image from pioneers cutting away all obstacles before an advancing army. They pretend progress; the only kind of progress they make is to a greater pitch of impiety. more ungodliness—Greek, "a greater degree of impiety." 17. will sat—lit., "will have pasture." The consuming progress of mortification is the image. They pretend to give rich spiritual pasture to their disciples: the only pasture is that of a spiritual cancer feeding on their vital cancer—a cancer or gangrene. Hymeneus—(Note, 1 Timothy, 1. 20.) After his excommunication he seems to have been re-admitted into the church and again to have troubled it. 18. erred—Greek, "missed the aim" (Note, 1 Timothy, 6. 21). is past already—has already taken place. The beginnings of the subsequent Gnostic heresy already existed. They "wrested" (2 Peter, 3. 18 Paul's own words (Romans, 6. 4; Ephesians, 2. 6; Colossians, 2. 12), "to their own destruction," as though the resurrection was merely the spiritual raising of souls from the death of sin. Cf. 1 Corinthians, 15. 12, where he shows all our hopes of future glory rest on the literal reality of the resurrection. To believe it past as the Seleucians or Hermians did, according to AUGUSTINE, Ep. 119. 65, ad Januarium, sec. 4.), is to deny it in its true sense. overthrow—trying to subvert "the foundation" on which alone faith can rest secure (v. 13; cf. Titus, 1. 11). 19. Nevertheless—Notwithstanding the subversion of their faith, "the firm foundation of God standeth" fast (so the Greek ought to be translated). The "foundation" here is "the church" [A. V.]; "the ground" or "basement support" of "the truth" (1 Timothy, 3. 16). Christ Himself being the ultimate "foundation" (1 Corinthians, 3. 11). In the studied standing of the church there is involved the studied certainty of the doctrine in question (v. 18). Thus the "house" (v. 20) answers to the "foundation." It is made up of the elect whom "the Lord knoweth" (acknowledged, recognises, Psalm 1. 6; Matthew, 7. 23; John, 10. 14; 1 Corinthians, 8. 3) as "His," and who persevere to the end, though others "err concerning the faith" (Matthew, 24. 24; John, 10. 28; Romans, 16. 28, 29; 1 John, ENQUEL takes "the foundation" to be the impeccability of God (to His promises to His ALVIN). This contrasts well with the erring faith on the part of the reprobate, v. 18. they deny the faith, God abates not His faithfulness (v. 13). having—seeing that it has. It was so with the false teachers, 13). 20. in a great house—i.e., the visible pro- hristian church (1 Timothy, 3. 15). Paul is not of those without, but of the [visible] f God. [CALVIN.] So the parable of the s (Matthew, 13. 47-49) gathering together of d, good and bad: as the good and bad cannot gushed whilst under the waves, but only ight to shore, so believers and unbelievers in the same church, until the judgment makes isting distinction. "The ark of Noah is a type rch: as in the former there were together the nd the kid, the wolf and the lamb; so in the e righteous and sinners, vessels of gold and h vessels of wood and earth" [JEROME, contra nos, 302] (cf. Matthew, 20. 16). vessels of gold reous and able to endure fire, of wood and rthless, fragile, and soon burnt (1 Corinthians, 5. 47). some...some—the former...the latter, to (Proverbs, 16. 4; Romans, 9. 17-23.) 21. If a ge himself from these—The Greek expresses e. gr., thou, Timothy) purify himself (so as e) from among these (vessels unto dishonour). —Set apart as wholly consecrated to the Lord. —Some oldest MSS. omit "and," the master "the house;" the Lord. Paul himself was eel: once one among those of earth, but after- eared by grace one of gold. prepared unto d work—(ch. 3. 17; Titus, 3. 1.) Contrast 16. 22. also—Greek, "But;" in contrast to od work" v. 21. iss—There are many lusts ch our greatest safety is in light (Genesis, void occasions of sin. From the abstemious of Timothy (1 Timothy, 5. 23) it is likely nimal indulgences, but the impetuosity, rash lence, hastiness, strife, and vain glory of s (1 John, 2. 14-16), are what he is here gaint: though the Spirit probably intended ing to include both in its application to the* church in general. youthful—Timothy was a youth (1 Timothy, 4. 12). righteousness—The opposite of "iniquity," i.e., unrighteousness (e. 19; cf. 1 Timothy, 6. 11). peace, with—rather put no comma, "peace with them that call on the Lord out of a pure heart" (1 Timothy, 1. 5; Ephesians, 6. 5; Colossians, 3. 22). We are to love all men, but it is not possible to be at peace with all men; for this needs community of purpose and opinion; they alone who call on the Lord sincerely [as contrasted with the false teachers who had only the form of godliness, ch. 3. 5, 8; Titus, 1. 15, 16] have this community [THEODORET] (Romans, 12. 18). 23. (Titus, 3. 9.) unlearned—Greek, "undisciplined;" not tending to promote the discipline of faith and morals (Proverbs, 5. 23). "Uninstructive;" in contrast with "instructing" (v. 25), and "wise unto salvation" (ch. 3. 15). avoid—"decline." 24. not strive—"The servant of the Lord" must imitate his master in not striving contentiously, though uncompromising in earnestly contending for the faith (Jude, 3; Matthew, 12. 19), gentle unto all men—"patient" (Greek, "patient in bearing wrongs") in respect to adversaries. He is to be gentle so that he may occasion no evils; patient so that he may endure evils. apt to teach—implying not only solid teaching and ease in teaching, but patience and assiduity in it. [BENJEL.] 25. instructing—Greek, "disciplining," instructing with correction, which those who deal in "uninstructive" or "undisciplined" questions need (Notes, v. 23; 1 Timothy, 1. 20). those that oppose themselves—Greek, "oppositely affected;" those of a different opinion. if...peradventure—Greek, "if at any time." repentance—which they need as antecedent to the full knowledge (so the Greek for "acknowledgment") of the truth (1 Timothy, 2. 4), their minds being corrupted (ch. 3. 8), and their lives immoral. The cause of the spiritual ignorance which prompts such "questions" is moral, having its seat in the will, not in the intellect (John, 7. 17). Therefore repentance is their first need. That, not man, but God alone can "give" (Acts, 5. 31). 26. recover themselves—Greek, "awake up to soberness," viz., from the spiritual intoxication whereby they have fallen into the snare of the devil, the snare—(Ephesians, 6. 11, "the wiles of the devil;" 1 Timothy, 3. 7; 6. 9.) *taken captive by him at his will—so as to follow the will of "THAT" (the Greek emphatically marks Satan thus) foe. However, different Greek pronouns stand for "him" and "his;" and the Greek for "taken captive" means not "captivated for destruction," but "for being saved alive," as in Luke, 5. 10, "Thou shalt catch men to save them unto life;" also there is no article before the Greek participle, which the English Version "who are taken captive," would require. Therefore translate, "That they may awake," &c., taken as saved (and willing) captives by him (the servant of the Lord, v. 24), so as to follow the will of HIM (the Lord, v. 24, or "God," v. 25). There are here two evils, "the snare" and sleep, from which they are delivered; and two goods to which they are translated, awaking and deliverance. Instead of Satau's thrall comes the free and willing captivity of obedience to Christ (2 Corinthians, 10. 5). It is God who goes before, giving repentance (e. 25); then the work of His servant following is sure to be crowned with success, leading the convert henceforth to "live to the will of God" (Acts, 22. 14; 1 Peter, 4. 2).*

CHAPTER III.

VER. 1-17. COMING EVIL DAYS: SIGNS OF EVIL ALREADY; CONTRAST IN THE DOCTRINE AND LIFE OF PAUL, WHICH TIMOTHY SHOULD FOLLOW, IN ACCORDANCE WITH HIS EARLY TRAINING IN SCRIPTURE. 1. also—Greek, "but;" last days—preceding Christ's second coming (2 Peter, 2. 3; Jude, 15). "The latter times," 1 Timothy, 4. 1, refer to a period not so remote as "the last days," viz., the long days of Papal and Greek anti-Christianity. *perilous—*lit., "dreadful."

times," in which it is difficult to know what is to be done: "grievous times." shall come—Greek, "shall be imminent;" shall come unexpectedly." [BENGL.] 2. man—in the professing church. Cf. the catalogue, Romans, 1, 29, &c., where much the same sins are attributed to heathen men, it shall be a relapse into virtual heathendom, with all its beast-like propensities, whence the symbol of it is "a beast" (Revelation, 13, 1, 11, 12, &c.; 17, 3, 8, 11). covetous—translate, "money-loving," a distinct Greek word from that for "covetous" (Note, Colossians, 3, 6). The cognate Greek substantive 3 Timothy, 6, 10 is so translated, "the love of money is a Greek, not the root of all evil." boasters—empty boasters [ALFORD]: boasting of having what they have not. proud—overweening; lit., showing themselves above their fellows. blasphemers—rather, "evil-speakers," revilers. disobedient to parents—The character of the times is even to be gathered especially from the manners of the young. [BENGL.] unthankful—The obligation to gratitude is next to that of obedience to parents. saubly—irreligious [ALFORD]; inobservant of the offices of piety. 3. trace-breakers—rather as the Greek is translated Romans, 1, 31, "implacable." false accusers—slanderees (1 Timothy, 3, 11; Titus, 2, 3). incontinent, fierce—at once both soft and hard: incontinently indulging themselves, and inhuman to others. despisers, &c.—"no lovers of good" [ALFORD]; the opposite of "a lover of good" (Titus, 1, 8). 4. heady—precipitate in action and in passion. high-minded—lit., "puffed up" with pride, as with smoke blinding them, lovers of pleasure.—God—Love of pleasure destroys the love and sense of God. 5. form—outward semblance. godliness—piety. denying—rather as Greek, "having denied," i. e., renounced. the power—the living regenerating, sanctifying influence of it. turns away—implying that some of such characters, forerunners of the last days, were already in the church. 6. of this sort—Greek, "of these," such as were described (v. 6). creep into—stealthily, laden with sins—(Isaiah, 1, 4)—applying to the "silly women" whose consciences are burdened with sins, and so are a ready prey to the false teachers who promise ease of conscience if they will follow them. A bad conscience leads easily to shipwreck of faith (1 Timothy, 1, 19). divers lusts—not only animal lusts, but passion for change in doctrine and manner of teaching; the running after fashionable men and fashionable tenets, drawing them in the most opposite directions. [ALFORD.] 7. Ever learning—some new point, for mere curiosity to the disparagement of what they seemed to know before. the knowledge—Greek, "the perfect knowledge;" the only safeguard against further novelties. Gnosticism laid hold especially of the female sex [IRENEUS, 1, 13, 3]; so Roman Jesuitism. 8. Now—Greek, "But;" it is no wonder there should be new such opponents to the truth, for their prototypes existed in ancient times. [ALFORD.] Janes.—Jambres—Traditional names of the Egyptian magicians who resisted Moses (Exodus, 7, 11, 22), derived from "the unwritten teaching of the Jews." [THEODORET.] In a point so immaterial as the names, where Scripture had not recorded them, Paul takes the names which general opinion had assigned the magicians. EUSEBIUS, Preparation Evangelica, quotes from Numenius, "Janes and Jambres were sacred scribes in a lower order of priests in Egypt" skilled in magic. HILLER interprets Janes from the Abyssinian language a trickster, and Jambres a juggler (Acts, 13, 8). resist—"withstand," as before. They did so by trying to rival Moses' miracles. So the false teachers shall exhibit lying wonders in the last days (Matthew, 24, 24; 2 Thessalonians, 2, 9; Revelation, 13, 14, 16). reprobate—incapable of testing the truth (Romans, 1, 28). [BENGL.] ALFORD takes passively, "not abiding the test," rejected on being tested. Jeremiah, 6, 30. 9. they shall proceed no farther—though for a time (ch. 2, 16) "they shall advance or proceed English Version 'increase' unto more ungodliness," yet there is a final limit beyond which they shall not be able to "proceed further" (Job, 38, 11; Revelation, 11, 7, 11). They themselves shall "wax worse and worse" (v. 13), but they shall at last be for ever prevented from seducing others. "Often malice proceeds deeper down, when it cannot extend itself." [BENGL.] their folly—lit., "dementia;" wis though they think themselves, shall be manifest—Greek, "shall be brought forth from concealment into open day" [BENGL.] (1 Corinthians, 4, 6). as theirs...was—as that of those magicians was, when not only could they no longer try to rival Moses in sending boils, but the boils fell upon themselves: so as to the lice (Exodus, 8, 19; 9, 11). 10. fully known—lit., "fully followed up" and traced, viz., with a view to following me as thy pattern, so far as I follow Christ; the same Greek as Luke, 1, 2, "having had perfect understanding of all things." His pious mother Lois, and grandmother Eunice, would recommend him to study fully Paul's Christian course as a pattern. He had not been yet the companion of Paul at the time of the apostle's persecution in Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra (Acts, 13, 50; 14, 3, 19), but is first mentioned as such Acts, 16, 1-3. However, he was "a disciple" already, when introduced to us in Acts, 16, 1-3; and as Paul calls him "my own son in the faith," he must have been converted by the apostle previously; perhaps in the visit to those parts three years before. Hence arose Timothy's knowledge of Paul's persecutions, which were the common talk of the churches in those regions about the time of his conversion. The incidental allusion to them here forms an undesigned coincidence between the history and the epistle indicating genuineness. [PALLEY'S Horæ Paulinæ.] A forger of epistles from the Acts would never allude to Timothy's knowledge of persecutions, when that knowledge is not expressly mentioned in the history, but is only arrived at by indirect inference; also the omission of Derbe here, in the epistle, is in minute accordance with the fact that in Derbe no persecution is mentioned in the history, though Derbe and Lystra are commonly mentioned together. The reason why he mentions his persecutions before Timothy became his companion, and not those subsequent, was because Timothy was familiar with the latter as an eye-witness, and Paul needed not to remind him of them, but the former Timothy had traced up by seeking the information from others, especially as the date and scene of them was the date and scene of his own conversion. doctrine—"teaching," manner of life—"conduct," "behaviour," purpose—The Greek is elsewhere usually used of God's "purpose." But here, as in Acts, 11, 23, of Paul's determined "purpose of heart in cleaving unto the Lord." My set aim, or resolution, in my apostolic function, and in every action is, not my selfish gain, but the glory of God in Christ. long-suffering—towards my adversaries, and the false teachers: towards brethren in bearing their infirmities; towards the unconverted, and the lapsed when penitent (ch. 4, 2; 2 Corinthians, 6, 6; Galatians, 5, 22; Ephesians, 4, 2; Colossians, 3, 12). charity—Love to all men, patience—"endurance;" patient continuance in well-doing amidst adversities (v. 11; Romans, 2, 7). 11. afflictions—"sufferings," which—Greek, "such as," in Antioch—of Pisidia (Acts, 13, 14, 50, 51). Iconium—(Acts, 14, 1-5). Lystra—(Acts, 14, 6, 19.) what—How grievous. out of...all—Lord delivered me—(ch. 4, 17; Psalm 34, 17; 2 Corinthians, 1, 10.) An encouragement to Timothy not to fear persecutions. 12. Yea, and—An additional consideration for Timothy: if he wishes to live godly in Christ, he must make up his mind to encounter persecution, that will—Greek, "all whose will is to live," &c. So far should persecution be from being a stumbling-block to Timothy, he should consider it a mark of the pious. So the same εἰς is used of the same thing, Luke, 14, 28, 33.

"intending (Greek, wishing) to build a tower...counteth the cost." live godly in Christ.—(Galatians, 2. 20; Philippians, 1. 21.) There is no godliness (Greek, "piously") or piety out of Christ. The world easily puts up with the mask of a religion which depends on itself, but the piety which derives its vigour directly from Christ is as odious to modern Christians as it was to the ancient Jews. [BENSON.] shall suffer persecution—and will not decline it (Galatians, 6. 11). BISHOP PARSONS proves the divine origination of Christianity from its success being inexplicable on the supposition of its being of human origin. The nature of its doctrine was no way likely to command success: (1) it condemned all other religions, some established for ages; (2) it enjoins precepts ungrateful to flesh and blood, the mortifying of the flesh, the love of enemies, and the bearing of the cross; (3) it enforces these seemingly unreasonable precepts by promises seemingly incredible; not good things such as afford complacency to our senses, but such as cannot be obtained till after this life, and presuppose what then seemed impossible, the resurrection; (4) it predicts to its followers what would seem sure to keep most of the world from embracing it, persecutions. 13. Reason why persecutions must be expected, and these becoming worse and worse as the end approaches. The breach between light and darkness, so far from being healed, shall be widened.
 [ALFORD.] evil men—in contrast to the "godly" (9. 13). seducers—lit., "conjurers." Magical arts prevailed at Ephesus (Acts, 19. 19), and had been renounced by many Ephesians on embracing Christianity; but now when Paul was writing to Ephesus, symptoms of a return to conjuring tricks appeared: an undesigned coincidence. [BURTON.] Probably sorcery will characterise the final apostasy (Revelation, 13. 15; 18. 23; 22. 15), war worse—lit., "advance in the direction of worse" (Note, 1. 9). Not contradictory to that verse: there the diffusion of the evil was spoken of; here its intensity.
 [ALFORD.] deceiving, and being deceived—He who has once begun to deceive others, is the less easily able to recover himself from error, and the more easily ensnared in turn the errors of others. [BENSON.] 14.
 But...tan—Whatever they may do. Resuming the thread begun at 10. learned—from me and thy mother ture (9. 15). of whom—plural, not singular, in the oldest MSS., "from what teachers." Not only from faith may be made. holy scriptures—The Old Testament taught by his Jessce mother. An undesigned coincidence with ch. 1. 5; Acts, 16. 1-3. able—in them-tion—i.e., wise unto the attainment of salvation. Contrast "folly" (9. 9). Wise also in extending it to others, through faith—as the instrument of this wisdom. Each knows divine things only as far as his own experience in himself extends. He who has not faith, has not wisdom or salvation. which is in—i.e., rests on Christ Jesus. 16. All Scripture—Greek, "Every Scripture," i.e., Scripture in its every part. However, English Version is sustained, though the Greek article be wanting, by the technical use of the term "Scripture" being so notorious as not to need the article (cf. Greek, Epephians, 3. 15; 2. 21). The Greek is never used of writings in general, but only of the sacred Scriptures. The position of the two Greek adjectives closely united by "and," forbids our taking the one as an epithet, the other as predicated and translated as ALFORD and ELLICOTT, "Every Scripture given by inspiration of God is also profitable." Vulgate in the best MSS., favours English Version. Clearly the adjectives are so closely connected, that as surely as one is a predicate, the other must be so too. ALFORD admits his translation to be harsh, though legitimate. It is better with English Version to take it in a construction legiti-mate, and at the same time not harsh. The Greek, "God-inspired," is found nowhere else. Most of the New Testament books were written when Paul wrote this his latest epistle: so he includes in the clause, "All Scripture is God-inspired," not only the Old Testament, in which alone Timothy was taught when a child (9. 15), but the New Testament books according as they were recognised in the churches which had men gifted with "discerning of spirits," and so able to distinguish really inspired utterances, persons, and so their writings, from spurious. St. Paul means, "All scripture is God inspired and therefore useful:" because we see no utility in any words or portion of it, it does not follow it is not God-inspired. It is useful, because God-inspired, not God-inspired, because useful. One reason for the article not being before the Greek, "Scripture," may be that, if it had, it might be supposed that it limited the sense to the hierá grammata, "Holy Scriptures" (9. 15) of the Old Testament, whereas here the assertion is more general: "all Scripture" cf. Greek, 2 Peter, 1. 20. The translation, "all scripture that is God-inspired is also useful," would imply that there is some Scripture which is not God-inspired.

 But this would exclude the appropriated sense of the word "Scripture," and who would need to be told that "all divine Scripture is useful" ("profitable")?
 Hebrews, 4. 13, would, in ALFORD'S view, have to be rendered, "All naked things are also open to the eyes of Him," &c.; so also 1 Timothy, 4. 4, which would be absurd. [FRIGELLES on Daniel.] KNAPP well defines inspiration, "An extraordinary divine agency upon teachers whilst giving instruction, whether oral or written, by which they were taught how and what they should speak or write" (cf. 2 Samuel, 23. 1; Acts, 4. 25; 2 Peter, 1. 21). The inspiration gives the Divine sanction to all the words of Scripture, though those words be the utterances of the individual writer, and only in special cases revealed directly by God (1 Corinthians, 2. 13). Inspiration is here predicated of the writings, "all Scripture," not of the persons. The question is not how God has done it; it is as to the word, not the men who wrote it. What we must believe is that He has done it, and that all the sacred writings are every where inspired, though not all alike matter of special revelation; and that even the very words are stamped with Divine sanction, as Jesus used them (cf. gr., in the temptation, and John, 10. 34, 35), for deciding all questions of doctrine and practice.
 There are degrees of revelation in Scripture, but not of inspiration. The sacred writers did not even always know the full significance of their own God-inspired words (1 Peter, 1. 10, 11, 12). Verbal inspiration does not mean mechanical dictation, but "all Scripture is so inspired by God," that every thing in it, its narratives, prophecies, citations, the whole—ideas, phrases, and words—are such as He saw fit to be there. The present condition of the text is no ground for concluding against the original text being inspired, but is a reason why we should use all critical diligence to restore the original inspired text. Again, inspiration may be accompanied by revelation or not, but it is as much needed for writing known doctrines or facts authoritatively, as for communicating new truths. [FRIGELLES.] The omission here of the substantive verb is,
 I think, designed to mark that, not only the Scripture then existing, but what was still to be written till the canon should be completed, is included as God-inspired. The Old Testament law was the schoolmaster to bring us to Christ; so it is appropriately said to be "able to make wise unto salvation through faith in Jesus Christ;" the term wisdom being appropriated to a knowledge of the relations between the Old and New Testaments, and opposed to the pretended wisdom of the false teachers (1 Timothy, 1. 7, 8). doctrine—Greek, "teaching," i.e., teaching the ignorant dogmatic truths which they cannot otherwise know. He so uses the Old Testament, Romans, 1. 17. reproof—"refutation," convicting the erring of their error. Including potential divinity. As an example of this use of the Old Testament, cf. Galatians, 3. 6, 12, 16. "Doctrines and reproof" comprehend the speculative parts of divinity. Next follow the practical: Scripture is profitable for (1) correction (Greek, "setting one right;" cf. an example, 1 Corinthians, 10. 1-16) and instruction (Greek, "disciplining," as a father does his child, Note, ch. 2. 25; Ephesians, 6. 4; Hebrews, 12. 5, 11, or "training" by instruction, warning, example, kindness, promises, and chastisements: cf. an example, 1 Corinthians, 6. 13). Thus the whole science of theology is complete in Scripture. Since Paul is speaking of Scripture in general and in the notion of it, the only general reason why, in order to perfecting the godly (v. 17), it should extend to every department of revealed truth, must be that it was intended to be the complete and sufficient rule in all things touching perfection. See Article VI., Common Prayer Book. 18—Greek, "instruction which is in righteousness," as contrasted with the "instruction" in worldly rudiments (Colossians, 2. 20, 22, 17. man of God—(Note, 1 Timothy, 6. 11.) perfect, thoroughly furnished—Gr., "thoroughly perfected," and so "perfect." The man of God is perfectly accoutred out of Scripture for his work, whether he be a minister (cf. ch. 4. 2, with ch. 3. 16) or a spiritual layman. No oral tradition is needed to be added.

CHAPTER IV.

VER. 1-22. SOLEMN CHARGE TO TIMOTHY TO DO HIS DUTY ZEALOUSLY, FOR TIMES OF APOSTASY ARE AT HAND, AND THE APOSTLE IS NEAR HIS TRIUMPHANT END: REQUESTS HIM TO COME AND BRING MARK WITH HIM TO ROME, AS LUKE ALONE IS WITH HIM, THE OTHERS HAVING GONE: ALSO HIS CLOAK AND PARCHEMENTS: WARNS HIM AGAINST ALEXANDER: TELLS WHAT BEFELL HIM AT HIS FIRST DEFECE; GREETS: BENEDICTION. 1. charge—Greek, "adjure," therefore—Omitted in the oldest MSS., the Lord Jesus Christ—The oldest MSS. read simply, "Christ Jesus." shall judge—His commission from God is mentioned, Acts, 10. 42; his resolution to do so, 1 Peter, 4. 6; the execution of His commission, here, at His appearing—The oldest MSS. read, "and" for "at;" then translate, "I charge thee before God, &c.) and by His appearing," and his kingdom—to be set up at His appearing, when we hope to reign with him. His kingdom is real now, but not visible. It shall then be both real and visible (Luke, 22. 15, 30; Revelation, 1. 7; 11. 15; 19. 6). Now He reigns in the midst of His enemies expecting till they shall be overthrown (Psalm 110. 2; Hebrews, 10. 13). Then He shall reign with His adversaries prostrate. 2. Preach—lit., "Proclaim as a herald." The term for the discourses in the synagogue was Doraschoth; the corresponding Greek term implying dialectical style, dialogue, and discussion, Acts, 17. 2, 18; 15. 4, 19 is applied in Acts to discourses in the Christian church. JUSTIN MARTYR, Apologetica, 2, describes the order of public worship, "On Sunday all meet, and the writings of the apostles and prophets are read; then the president delivers a discourse: after this all stand up and pray; then there is offered bread and wine and water; the president likewise prays and gives thanks, and the people solemnly assent, saying, Amen." The bishops and presbyters had the right and duty to preach, but they sometimes called on deacons, and even laymen, to preach. EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 6. 19: in this the church imitated the synagogue (Luke, 4. 17-22; Acts 13. 15, 16). be instant—i.e., urgent, earnest, in the whole work of the ministry. in season, out of season—i.e., at all seasons; whether they regard your speaking as seasonable or unseasonable. "Just as the fountains, though none may draw from them, still flow on; and therefore, though none drink of them, still run: so must we do all on our part in speaking, though none give heed to us." (CHRYSOSTOM Homily 30., vol. 5., p. 221.) I think with CHRYSOSTOM, there is included also the idea of times whether reasonable or unseasonable to Timothy himself; not merely when convenient, but when inconvenient to thee, night as well as day (Acts, 20. 31), in danger as well as in safety, in prison and when doomed to death as well as when at large, not only in church, but everywhere and on all occasions, whenever and wherever the Lord's work requires it. reprove—"convict," "confute." with—Greek, "in (the element in which the exhortation ought to have place) all long-suffering (ch. 2. 24, 25; 3. 10) and teaching;" cf. ch. 2. 24. "apt to teach." The Greek for "doctrine" here is didache, but in ch. 3. 16, didascalia. "Didascalia" is what one receives; didache is what is communicated. (TITTMANN.) 3. they—professing Christians. sound doctrine—Greek, "the sound (Note, 1 Timothy, 1. 10) doctrine" (didascalia) or "teaching," vis., of the gospel. Presently follows the concrete, "teachers," after their own taste—instead of regarding the will of God they dislike being interrupted in their lusts by true teachers. heap—one on another: an indiscriminate mass of false teachers. Variety delights itching ears. "He who despises sound teaching, leaves sound teachers; they seek instructors like themselves." (BENSOEL.) It is the corruption of the people in the first instance, that creates priestcraft (Exodus, 32. 1), to themselves—such as will suit their depraved tastes; "populus vult decipi, et decipiat," the people wish to be deceived, so let them be deceived. "Like priest, like people" (1 Kings, 12. 31; Hosea, 4. 9). itching—liking to hear teachers who give them mere pleasure (Acts, 17. 19-21), and do not offend by truths grating to their ears. They, as it were, tickle with pleasure the levity of the multitude (CICERO, who came as to a theatre to hear what will delight their ears, not to learn (SENECA, Ep. 10. 8) what will do them good. "Rich in the ears is as bad as in any other part of the body, and perhaps worse." (SOUTH.) 4. The ear brooks not what is opposed to the man's inst. turned—Greek, "turned aside" (1 Timothy, 1. 6. It is a righteous retribution, that when men turn away from the truth, they should be turned to fables (Jeremiah, 2. 19). fables—(1 Timothy, 1. 4.) 5. I am no longer here to withstand these things: be thou a worthy successor of me, no longer depending on me for counsel, but thine own master, and swimming without the coils (CALVIN); follow my steps, inherit their result, and the honour of their end. (ALFORD.) watch thee—lit., "with the wakefulness of one sober," in all things—on all occasions and under all circumstances (TITM., 2. 5. endure afflictions—suffer hardships. (ALFORD.) struggle—A missionary bishop, preacher, and teacher, make full proof of—fulfil in all its requirements, having nothing undone (Acts, 12. 25; Romans, 15. 19; Colossians, 4. 17). 6. Greek, "For I am already being offered;" lit., as a libation; appropriate to the shedding of his blood. Every sacrifice began with an initiatory libation on the victim's head (Note, cf. Philippians, 2. 17). A motive to stimulate Timothy to faithfulness—the departure and final blessedness of Paul; it is he and that crowns the work. (BENSOEL.) As the time of his departure was indicated to Peter, so to Paul (2 Peter, 1. 14). my departure—lit., "loosing anchor" (Note, Philippians, 1. 23). Dissolution. 7. "I have striven the good strife" the Greek is not restricted to a fight, but includes any competitive contest, et. p. that of the race-course (1 Timothy, 6. 12 (ALFORD); 1 Corinthians, 9. 24, &c.; Hebrews, 12. 1, 2). kept the faith—the Christian faith committed to me as a believer and an apostle (cf. ch. 1. 14; Revelation, 2. 10; 3. 16.) & a crown—rather as Greek, "the crown." The "henc-

forth" marks the decisive moment: he looks to his state in a threefold aspect, (1.) The past, I have fought; (2.) the immediately present, there is laid up for me; (3.) the future, the Lord will give in that day. [BENGL.] crown—A crown, or garland, used to be bestowed at the Greek national games on the successful competitor in wrestling, running &c. (cf. 1 Peter, 5, 4; Revelation, 2, 10.) of righteousness—the reward is in recognition of righteousness wrought in Paul by God's Spirit: the crown is prepared for the righteous: but it is a crown which consists in righteousness. Righteousness will be its own reward (Revelation, 22, 11). Cf. Exodus, 29, 30. A man is justified gratuitously by the merits of Christ through faith; and when he is so justified God accepts his works and honours them with a reward which is not their due, but is given of grace. "So great is God's goodness to men that He wills that their works should be meritorious, though they are merely His own gifts." [EP., POPE CELESTINE I., 12.] give—Greek, "shall award" in righteous requital as "Judge" (Acts, 17, 31; 1 Corinthians, 5, 10; 2 Thessalonians, 1, 6, 7). in that day—not until His appearing (ch. 1, 12). The partakers of the first resurrection may receive a crown also at the last day, and obtain in that general assembly of all men, a new award of praise. The favourable sentence passed on the "brethren" of the Judge, who sit with Him on His throne, is in Matthew, 25, 40, taken for granted as already awarded, when that affecting those who benefited them is being passed. [BENGL.] The former, the elect church who reign with Christ in the millennium, are fewer than the latter. The righteous heavenly Judge stands in contrast to the unrighteous earthly judges who condemned Paul. me—individual appropriation. Greek, "Not only to me," them that love—Greek, "have loved, and do love:" habitual love and desire for Christ's appearing, which presupposes faith (cf. Hebrews, 9, 28). Cf. the sad contrast, v. 10, "having loved this present world." 9. (v. 21; ch. 1, 4, 8.) Timothy is asked to come to be a comfort to Paul, and also to be strengthened by Paul, for carrying on the gospel work after Paul's decease. 10 Demas—once a "fellow-labourer" of Paul, along with Mark and Luke (Colossians, 4, 14; Philemon, 24). His motive for forsaking Paul seems to have been love of worldly ease, safety, and comforts at home, and disinclination to brave danger with Paul (Matthew, 13, 30, 21, 22). CURYSSOTON implies that Thessalonica was his home. Galatia—One oldest MSS. supports the reading "Gaul." But most oldest MSS. &c., "Galatia." Thus—He must have therefore left Crete after "setting in order" the affairs of the churches there (Titus, 1, 6). Dalmatia—part of the Roman province of Illyricum on the coast of the Adriatic. Paul had written to him (Titus, 3, 12) to come to him in the winter to Nicopolis in Epirus; intending in the spring to preach the gospel in the adjoining province of Dalmatia. Titus seems to have gone thither to carry out the apostle's intention, the execution of which was interrupted by his arrest. Whether he went of his own accord, as is likely, or being sent by Paul, which the expression "is departed" hardly accords with, cannot be positively decided. Paul here speaks only of his personal attendants having forsaken him; he had still friends among the Roman Christians who visited him (ch. 4, 21), though they had been afraid to stand by him at his trial (v. 16). 11. Take—Greek, "take up" on thy journey (Acts, 20, 13, 14). John Mark was probably in, or near, Colosse, as in the epistle to the Colossians (Colossians, 4, 10), written two years before this, he is mentioned as about to visit them. Timothy was now absent from Ephesus, and somewhere in the interior of Asia Minor; hence he would be sure to fall in with Mark on his journey. he is profitable to me for the ministry—Mark had been under a cloud for having forsaken Paul at a critical moment in his missionary tour with Barnabas (Acts, 15, 37-40; 13, 6, 13). Timothy had subsequently occupied the same post in relation to Paul as Mark once held. Hence Paul, appropriately here, wipes out the past censure by high praise of Mark, and guards against Timothy's making self-complacent comparisons between himself and Mark, as though he were superior to the latter (cf. Philemon, 24). Demas apostatizes. Mark returns to the right way, and is no longer unprofitable, but is profitable for the gospel ministry (Philemon, 11). 12. And—Greek, "But." Thou art to come to me, but Tycheus I have sent to Ephesus to supply thy place (if thou so wilt) in presiding over the church there in thy absence (cf. Titus, 3, 12). It is possible Tycheus was the bearer of this epistle, though the omission of "to thee" is rather against this view. 13. cloak... I left—Probably obliged to leave it in a hurried departure from Troas. Carpus—a faithful friend to have been entrusted with so precious deposits. The mention of his "cloak," so far from being unworthy of inspiration, is one of those graphic touches which sheds a flood of light on the last scene of Paul's life, on the confines of two worlds: in this wanting a cloak to cover him from the winter cold, in that covered with the righteousness of saints, "clothed upon with his house from heaven." [GAUSS.] So the inner vesture and outer garment of Jesus, Paul's master, are suggestive of most instructive thought (John, 10, 1). books—he was anxious respecting these that he might transmit them to the faithful, so that they might have the teaching of his writings when he should be gone, especially the parchments—containing perhaps some of his inspired epistles themselves. 14. Alexander the copper-smith—or "smith" in general. Perhaps the same as the Alexander, 1 Timothy, 1, 20 (note there) at Ephesus. Excommunicated then he subsequently was restored, and now vented his personal malice because of his excommunication in accusing Paul before the Roman judges, whether of incendiarism or of introducing a new religion. See my Introduction. He may have been the Alexander put forward by the Jews in the tumult at Ephesus (Acts, 19, 33, 34). reward—The oldest MSS. read, "shall reward," or "requite him." Personal revenge certainly did not influence the apostle (v. 16, end). 15. our words—the arguments of us Christians for our common faith. Believers have a common cause. 16. At my first answer—i.e., "defence" in court, at my first public examination. Timothy knew nothing of this, it is plain, till Paul now informs him. But during his former imprisonment at Rome, Timothy was with him (Philippians, 1, 1, 7). This must have been, therefore, a second imprisonment. He must have been set free before the persecution in A.D. 64, when the Christians were accused of causing the conflagration in Rome; for, had he been a prisoner then, he certainly would not have been spared. The tradition [EUSEBIUS, 2, 26] that he was finally beheaded, accords with his not having been put to death in the persecution, A.D. 64, when burning to death was the mode by which the Christians were executed, but subsequently to it. His "first" trial in his second imprisonment seems to have been on the charge of complicity in the conflagration; his absence from Rome may have been the ground of his acquittal on that charge; his final condemnation was probably on the charge of introducing a new and unlawful religion into Rome. stood with me—Greek, "came forward with me" [ALFORD] as a friend and advocate. may [it] not be laid to their charge—The position of "their," in the Greek, is emphatic. "May it not be laid to THEIR charge," for they were intimidated: their drawing back from me was not from bad disposition so much as from fear; it is sure to be laid to the charge of those who intimidated them. Still Paul, like Stephen, would doubtless have offered the same prayer for his persecutors themselves (Acts, 7, 60).

17. the Lord—the more because men deserted me. stood with me—stronger than “came forward with me” (Greek, v. 16). strengthened—Greek, “put strength in me.” by me—“through me:” through my means. One single occasion is often of the greatest moment. the preaching—the gospel proclamation.—might be fully known—might be fully made (Note, v. 6). that all the Gentiles—present at my trial, “might hear” the gospel proclaimed then. Rome was the capital of the Gentile world, so that a proclamation of the truth to the Romans was likely to go forth to the rest of the Gentile world. I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion—viz., Satan, the roaring, devouring lion (Luke, 22. 31; 1 Peter, 5. 8). I was prevented falling into his snare (ch. 2. 26; Psalms 22. 21; 2 Peter, 2. 9); v. 18 agrees with this interpretation. “The Lord shall deliver me from every evil work,” viz., both from evil and the Evil One, as the Greek of the Lord’s Prayer expresses it. It was not deliverance from Nero (who was called the lion) which he rejoiced in, for he did not fear death (v. 6-8), but deliverance from the temptation, through fear, to deny His Lord; so ALFORD. 18. And the Lord shall—Hope draws its conclusions from the past to the future. [BENGE.] will preserve me—lit., “will save” (Psalms 22. 21; “will bring me safe to.” Jesus is the Lord and the Deliverer (Philippians, 3. 29; 1 Thessalonians, 1. 10). He saves from evil; He gives good things, heavenly kingdom—Greek, “His kingdom which is a heavenly one.” to whom, &c.—Greek, “to whom be the glory unto the ages of ages.” The very hope produces a doxology: how much greater will be the doxology which the actual enjoyment shall produce. [BENGE.] 19. Prisca and Aquila—(Acts, 18. 2, 3; Romans, 16. 3, 4; 1 Corinthians, 16. 19, written from Ephesus, where therefore Aquila and Priscilla must then have been.) household of Onesiphorus—If he were dead at the time the “household” would not have been called “the household of Onesiphorus.” He was probably absent (Note, ch. 1. 16). 20. In order to depict his desertion, he informs Timothy that Erastus, one of his usual companions [Acts, 19. 22, possibly the same Erastus as in Romans, 16. 23, though how he could leave his official duties for missionary journeys is not clear], stayed behind at Corinth, his native place, or usual residence, of which city he was “chamberlain,” or city steward and treasurer (Romans, 16. 23); and Trophimus he left behind at Miletus sick. (See on his former history, Acts, 20. 4; 21. 29.) This verse is irreconcilable with the imprisonment from which he writes being the first: for he did not pass by Corinth or Miletus on his way to Rome when about to be imprisoned for the first time.

As Miletus was near Ephesus, there is a presumption that Timothy was not at Ephesus when Paul wrote, or he would not need to inform Timothy of Trophimus lying sick in his immediate neighbourhood. However, Trophimus may not have been still at Miletus at the time when Paul wrote, though he had left him there on his way to Rome. Prisca and Aquila were most likely to be at Ephesus (s. 19), and he desires Timothy to salute them: so also Onesiphorus’ household (ch. 1. 18). Paul had not the power of healing at will (Acts, 19. 12), but as the Lord allowed him. 21. before winter—when a voyage, according to ancient usages of navigation, would be out of the question: also, Paul would need his “cloak” against the winter (v. 13). Pudens—Claudia—afterwards husband and wife (according to MARTIAL IV., 13; XI., 54), he a Roman knight, she a Briton, surnamed Rufina. TACITUS, Agriicola, 14, mentions that territories in South East Britain were given to a British king, Cogidunnus, in reward for his fidelity to Rome, A.D. 52, whilst Claudius was emperor. In 1772 a marble was dug up at Chichester, mentioning Cogidunnus with the surname Claudius, added from his patron, the emperor’s name; and Pudens in connexion with Cogidunnus, doubtless his father-in-law. His daughter would be Claudia, who seems to have been sent to Rome for education, as a pledge of the father’s fidelity. Here she was under the protection of Pomponia, wife of Aulus Plautius, conqueror of Britain. Pomponia was accused of foreign superstitions, A.D. 67 [TACITUS, Annals, 3. 32], probably Christianity. She probably was the instrument of convertio, Claudia, who took the name Rufina from her, that being a cognomen of the Pomponian gens (cf. Romans, 16. 15, Rufus a Christian). Pudens in Martial and in the Chichester inscription, appears as a pagan; but perhaps he or his friends concealed his Christianity through fear. Tradition represents Timothy, a son of Pudens, as taking part in converting the Britons. Linaus—put third; therefore not at this time yet, as he was afterwards, bishop. His name being here inserted between Pudens and Claudia, implies the two were not yet married. “Eubulus” is identified by some with Aristobolus, who, with his converts, is said to have been among the first evangelists of Britain. Paul himself, says CLEMENT, “visited the farthest west (perhaps Britain, certainly Spain) and was martyred under the rulers at Rome,” who were Nero’s viceregents in his absence from the city. 22. Grace be with you—Plural in oldest MSS., “with you,” viz., thee and the members of the Ephesian and neighbouring churches.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL TO TITUS.

INTRODUCTION.

GENUINENESS.—Clement of Rome quotes it (Epistola ad Corinthios, c. 9); Irenæus (3. 3, sec. 4) refers to it as Paul’s; Theophilus, ad Autolytus, 2, sec. 14, quotes it as Scripture. Cf. Clement of Alexandria, Stromata, 1. 299; Tertullian, Prescriptione Hereticorum, 6.

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.—This epistle seems to have been written from Corinth (Birké), subsequently to his first imprisonment, when Paul was on his way to Nicopolis (ch. 3. 15) in Epirus, where he purposed passing the winter, shortly before his martyrdom, A.D. 67. Birké thinks, from the similarity of the epistle to Titus and first Timothy, that both were written from the same place, Corinth, and at dates not widely apart; first Timothy shortly after coming to Corinth, before he had planned a journey to Epirus, the epistle to Titus afterwards. The journey to Crete and Ephesus for the benefit of his letters would be easy from Corinth, and he could himself thence easily pass into Epirus. He had shortly before visited Crete, wherein a church existed (though without due organization), the first foundation of which he may have partly laid at his former visit (Acts, 27. 7, &c.), when on his way to his first imprisonment at Rome. That he returned to the East after his first imprisonment appears most probable from Philippians, 2. 24; Philemon, 22. However, there may have been seekers of Christianity sown in Crete, even before his first visit, by the Cretians who heard Peter’s preaching on Pentecost (Acts, 2. 11).

OCCASION OF WRITING.—Corrupt elements soon showed themselves in the Cretian church, similar to those noticed in the epistles to Timothy as existing in the Ephesian church, Judaism, false pretensions to science, and practical ungod-ness. Paul, on his late visit, had left Titus in Crete to establish church government, and ordain presbyters (deacons are not mentioned). Titus had been several times employed by Paul on a mission to the Corinthian churches, and had probably thence visited Crete, which was within easy reach of Corinth. Hence the suitability of his selection by the apostle for the superintendence of the Cretan church. Paul now follows up with instructions by letter those he had already given to Titus in person on the qualifications of elders, and the graces becoming the old, the young, and females, and warns him against the unprofitable speculations so rife in Crete. The national character of the Cretians was low in the extreme, as Epimenides, quoted in ch. 1, 12, paints it. Livy, 44, 48, stigmatizes their avarice; Polypius, 6, 44, 9, their ferocity and fraud; and 6, 47, 5, their wastefulness, so much so, that "to Cretanise" is another name for to lie: they were included in the proverbial three infamous initials K or C, "Cappadocia, Crete, Cilicia."

NOTICES OF TITUS.—It is strange that he is never mentioned by this name in Acts, and there seems none of those mentioned in that book who exactly answers to him. He was a Greek, and therefore a Gentle (Galatians, 2, 1, 3), and converted by Paul (ch. 1, 4). He accompanied the apostle on the deputation sent from the church of Antioch to Jerusalem, to consult the apostles respecting the circumcision of Gentile converts (Acts, 15, 2); and, agreeably to the decree of the council there, was not circumcised. He was in company with Paul at Ephesus, whence he was sent to Corinth to commence the collection for the Jerusalem saints, and to ascertain the effect of the first epistle on the Corinthians (3 Corinthians, 7, 6-9; 8, 6; 12, 18), and there showed an unmercenary spirit. He next proceeded to Macedonia, where he rejoined Paul, who had been already eagerly expecting him at Throas (3 Corinthians, 2, 12, 13, "Titus my brother," 7, 6). He was then employed by the apostle in preparing the collection for the poor saints in Judea, and became the bearer of the second epistle to the Corinthians (4 Corinthians, 9, 16, 17, 23). Paul in it calls him "my partner and fellow helper concerning you." His being located in Crete (Titus, 1, 5) was subsequent to Paul's first imprisonment, and shortly before the second, about 67 A.D., ten years subsequent to the last notice of him in second Corinthians, 87 A.D. He probably met Paul, as the apostle desired, at Nicopolis; for his subsequent journey into Dalmatia, thence (or else from Rome, whither he may have accompanied Paul) would be more likely, than from the distant Crete (3 Timothy, 4, 10, written subsequently to the epistle to Titus). In the unsettled state of things then, Titus' episcopal commission in Crete was to be but temporary, Paul requiring the presence of Titus with himself, whenever Artemas or Tychicus should arrive in Crete and set him free from his duties there.

Tradition represents him to have died peaceably in Crete, as Archbishop of Gortyna, at an advanced age.

Ver. 1-16. ADDRESS: FOR WHAT END TITUS WAS LEFT IN CRETE: QUALIFICATIONS FOR ELDERS: GAIN-SAYERS IN CRETE NEEDING REPROOF. 1. servant of God—not found elsewhere in the same connexion. In Romans, 1, 1, it is "servant of Jesus Christ" (Galatians, 1, 10; Philippians, 1, 1; cf. Acts, 10, 17; Revelation, 1, 1; 15, 3). In Romans, 1, 1, there follows, "called to be an apostle," which corresponds to the general designation of the office first, "servant of God," here, followed by the special description, "apostle of Jesus Christ." The full expression of his apostolic office answers, in both epistles, to the design, and is a comprehensive index to the contents. The peculiar form here would never have proceeded from a forger, according to the faith—rather, "for," "with a view to subserve the faith," this is the object of my apostleship (cf. v. 4, 9; Romans, 1, 5), the elect—for whose sake we ought to endure all things (2 Timothy, 2, 10). This election has its ground, not in any thing; belonging to those thus distinguished, but in the purpose and will of God from everlasting (2 Timothy, 1, 9; Romans, 8, 29-33; cf. Luke, 18, 7; Ephesians, 1, 4; Colossians, 3, 12). Acts, 13, 48, shows that all faith on the part of the elect, rests on the divine foreordination: they do not become elect by their faith, but receive faith, and so become believers, because they are elect, and the acknowledging of the truth—and (for promoting) the full knowledge of the truth, i.e., the Christian truth (Ephesians, 1, 13—after godliness—i.e., which belongs to piety; opposed to the knowledge which has not for its object the truth, but error, doctrinal and practical v. 11, 16; 1 Timothy, 6, 3; or even which has for its object mere earthly truth, not growth in the divine life. "Godliness," or "piety," is a term peculiar to the pastoral epistles: a fact explained by the apostle having in them to combat doctrine tending to "ungodliness" (3 Timothy, 2, 16; cf. ch. 2, 11, 12). 2. In hope of eternal life—Connected with the whole preceding sentence. That whereon rests my aim as an apostle to promote the elect's faith and full knowledge of the truth, is, "the hope of eternal life" (ch. 2, 13; 3, 7; Acts, 23, 6; 24, 15; 28, 20), that cannot lie—Romans, 3, 4; 11, 29; Hebrews, 6, 18.) promised before the world began—A contracted expression for "purposed before the world began (lit., before the ages of time, and promised actually in time," the promise springing from the eternal purpose: as in 3 Timothy, 1, 9, the gift of

grace was the result of the eternal purpose "before the world began." 3. in due times—Greek, "in its own seasons," the seasons appropriate to it, and fixed by God for it (Acts, 1, 7). manifested—implying that the "promise," v. 2, had lain hidden in His eternal purpose heretofore (cf. Colossians, 1, 26; 2 Timothy, 1, 9, 10), his word—equivalent to "eternal life" (v. 3; John, 5, 24; 6, 63; 17, 3, 17), through preaching—Greek, "in preaching," or rather as ALFORD (Note, cf. 2 Timothy, 4, 17), "in the gospel; proclamation (the thing preached the gospel) with which I was entrusted," according to—in pursuance of (cf. 1 Timothy, 1, 1), of God our Saviour—rather as Greek, "of our Saviour God." God is predicated of our Saviour (cf. Jude, 25; Luke, 1, 47). Also Psalm 24, 5; Isaiah, 12, 2; 45, 15, 21, LXX. Applied to Jesus, v. 4; ch. 2, 13; 3, 6; 2 Timothy, 1, 10. 4. Titus, mine own son—Greek, "my genuine child" (1 Timothy, 1, 2, i.e., converted by my instrumentalities (1 Corinthians, 4, 17; Philemon, 10), after the common faith—A genuine son in respect to: in virtue of) the faith common to all the people of God, comprising in a common brotherhood Gentiles as well as Jews, therefore embracing Titus a Gentle (2 Peter, 1, 1; Jude, 3). Grace, mercy, and peace—"Mercy" is omitted in some of the oldest MSS. But one of the best and oldest MSS. supports it (Notes, cf. 1 Timothy, 1, 2; 3 Timothy, 1, 2). There are many similarities of phrase in the pastoral epistles. The Lord Jesus Christ—The oldest MSS. read only "Christ Jesus." our Saviour—found thus added to "Christ" only in Paul's pastoral epistles, and 2 Peter, 1, 1, 11; 2, 20; 3, 18, 5. I left thee—"I left thee behind" (ALFORD) when I left the island: not implying permanence of commission (cf. 1 Timothy, 1, 3), in Crete—now Candia, set in order—rather as Greek, "that thou mightest follow up (the work begun by me) setting right the things that are wanting," which I was unable to complete by reason of the shortness of my stay in Crete. Christianity, doubtless, had long existed in Crete: there were some Cretians among those who heard Peter's preaching on Pentecost (Acts, 2, 11). The number of Jews in Crete was large (v. 10), and it is likely that those scattered in the persecution of Stephen (Acts, 11, 19) preached to them, as they did to the Jews of Cyprus, &c. Paul also was there on his voyage to Rome (Acts, 27, 7-12). By all these instrumentalities the gospel was sure to reach Crete. But until Paul's later visit, after his first imprisonment

Some, the Cretian Christians were without church organization. This Paul began, and had commissioned (before leaving Crete) Titus to go on with, and now reminds him of that commission, ordain—rather, "appoint," "constitute," in every city—"from city to city." as I appointed thee—i.e., as I directed thee; prescribing as well the act of constituting elders, as also the manner of doing so, which latter includes the qualifications required in a presbyter presently stated. Those called "elders" here are called "bishops." v. 7. Elder is the term of dignity in relation to the college of presbyters; bishop points to the duties of his office in relation to the flock. From the unsound state of the Cretian Christians described here, we see the danger of the want of church government. The appointment of presbyters was designed to check idle talk and speculation, by setting forth the "faithful word." 6. (Notes, cf. 1 Timothy, 3, 2-4). The thing dwelt on here as the requisite in a bishop, is a good reputation among those over whom he is to be set. The immorality of the Cretian professors rendered this a necessary requisite in one who was to be a reprover; and their unsoundness in doctrine also made needful great steadfastness in the faith (v. 9, 13), having faithful children—i.e., believing children. He who could not bring his children to faith, how shall he bring others? [BENGEL.] ALFORD explains, "established in the faith," not accused—Not merely not riotous, but "not (even) accused of riot" ("profligacy" [ALFORD]; "Dissolute life" [WAILL.], unruly—insubordinate: opposed to "in subjection" (1 Timothy, 3, 4). 7. Fer... must—The emphasis is on must. The reason why I said "blameless," is the very idea of a "bishop" (an overseer of the flock: he here substitutes for "presbyter" the term which expresses his duties) involves the necessity for such blamelessness, if he is to have influence over the flock, steward of God—The greater the master is, the greater the virtues required in His servant (BENGEL) (1 Timothy, 3, 15): the church is God's house, over which the minister is set as a steward (Hebrews, 3, 2-6; 1 Peter, 4, 10, 17). Note, ministers are not merely church officers, but God's stewards; church government is of divine appointment, not self-willed—ill, "self-pleasing;" unaccommodating to others: harsh, the opposite of "a lover of hospitality" (v. 8): so Nabal (1 Samuel, 25.); self-loving and impertuous: such a spirit would incapacitate him for leading a willing flock, instead of driving, not given to wine—(Notes, 1 Timothy, 3, 3, 8.) not given to filthy lucre—not making the gospel a means of gain (1 Timothy, 3, 3, 8). In opposition to those "teaching for filthy lucre's sake" (v. 11; 1 Timothy, 6, 5; 1 Peter, 5, 2). 8. lover of hospitality—needed especially in those days (Romans, 12, 13; 1 Timothy, 3, 2; Hebrews, 13, 2; 1 Peter, 4, 9; 3 John, 5). Christians travelling from one place to another were received and forwarded on their journey by their brethren. lover of good men—Greek, "a lover of (all that is) good," men or things (Philippians, 4, 8, 9). sober—towards one's self; "discreet;" "self-restrained" [ALFORD] (Notes, 1 Timothy, 2, 9). just—towards men, holy—towards God (Notes, 1 Thessalonians, 2, 10). temperate—"One having his passions, tongue, hand, and eyes, at command" [CHRYSOSTOM]; "continent." 9. Holding fast—Holding firmly to cf. Matthew, 6, 24; Luke, 16, 13. the faithful—true and trustworthy (1 Timothy, 1, 15). word as he has been taught—ill, "the word (which is) according to the teaching" which he has received (cf. 1 Timothy, 4, 6, end; 2 Timothy, 3, 14). by—translate as Greek, "to exhort in doctrine (instruction) which is sound;" sound doctrine or instruction is the element in which his exhorting is to have place. On "sound" (peculiar to the pastoral epistles, see 1 Timothy, 1, 10; 6, 2. convince—rather, "reprove" [ALFORD] (v. 13). 10. unruly—insubordinate," and—Omitted in the oldest MSS. "There are many unruly persons, vain talkers, and deceivers:" "unruly" being predicated of both vain talkers and deceivers. vain talkers—opposed to "holding fast the faithful word" (v. 9). "Vain jangling" (1 Timothy, 1, 6): "foolish questions, unprofitable and vain" (ch. 3, 9). The source of the evil was corrupted Judaism (v. 14). Many Jews were then living in Crete, according to JOSEPHUS: so the Jewish law remained in some of them after conversion. deceivers—ill, "deceivers of the minds of others" (Greek, Galatians, 6, 3). 11. mouths...stuffed—ill, "muzzled," "bridled" as an unruly beast (cf. Psalm 32, 9). who—Greek, "seeing that they are: such men as;" or "inasmuch as they." [ELICOTT.] subvert...houses—overthrowing their "faith" (2 Timothy, 2, 18). "They are the devil's levers by which he subverts the houses of God" [THEOPHYLACT.] for filthy lucre—(1 Timothy, 3, 3, 8; 6, 5). 12. One—Epimenides of Phlius, or Gnosus, in Crete, about 600 B.C. He was sent for to purify Athens from its pollution occasioned by Cylon. He was regarded as a diviner and prophet. The words here are taken probably from his treatise "concerning oracles." Paul also quotes from two other heathen writers, ARATUS (Acts, 17, 28) and MENANDER (1 Corinthians, 15, 33), but he does not honour them so far as even to mention their names, of themselves... their own—which enhances his authority as a witness. "To Cretanise" was proverbial for to lie; as "to Corinthianise" was for to be dissolute. always liars—not merely at times, as every natural man is. Contrast v. 2, "God that cannot lie." They love "fables," v. 14; even the heathen poets laughed at their lying assertion that they had in their country the sepulchre of Jupiter. evil beasts—rude, savage, cunning, greedy. Crete was a country without wild beasts. Epimenides' sarcasm was, that its human inhabitants supplied the place of wild beasts, slow bellies—indolent through pampering their bellies. They themselves are called "bellies," for that is the member for which they live (Romans, 14, 18; Philippians, 3, 19). 13. This witness—"This testimony (though coming from a Cretian) is true," sharply—Gettleness would not reclaim so perverse offenders. that they—that those seduced by the false teachers may be brought back to soundness in the faith. Their mainy is strifes about words and questions (ch. 3, 9; 1 Timothy, 6, 4). 14. Jewish fables—(Notes, 1 Timothy, 1, 4; 4, 7; 2 Timothy, 4, 4.) These formed the transition stage to subsequent Gnosticism; as yet the error was but profitless, and not tending to godliness, rather than openly opposed to the faith. commandments of men—as to ascetic abstinence (v. 16; Mark, 7, 7-9; Colossians, 2, 16, 20-23; 1 Timothy, 4, 3). that turn from the truth—whose characteristic is that they turn away from the truth (2 Timothy, 4, 4). 15. all things—eternal, "are pure" in themselves; the distinction of pure and impure is not in the things, but in the disposition of him who uses them: in opposition to "the commandments of men" (v. 14), which forbid certain things as if impure intrinsically. "To the pure" is inwardly, i.e., those purified in heart by faith (Acts, 15, 9; Romans, 14, 20; 1 Timothy, 4, 3), all outward things are pure; all are open to their use. Sin alone fouls and defiles the soul (Matthew, 23, 26; Luke, 11, 41), not being pure—either within or without (Romans, 14, 20). mind—their mental sense and intelligence. consciences—their moral consciousness of the conformity or discrepancy between their motives and acts on the one hand, and God's law on the other. A conscience and a mind defiled are represented as the source of the errors opposed in the pastoral epistles (1 Timothy, 1, 19; 3, 9; 6, 5). 16. They profess—i.e., make a profession acknowledging God. He does not deny their theoretical knowledge of God, but that they practically know Him, deny him—The opposite of the previous "profess" or "confess" Him (1 Timothy, 6, 8; 2 Timothy, 2, 12; 3, 5). abominable—themselves, though laying so much stress on the contracting of abomination from outward things (cf. Leviticus, 11. 10-13; Romans, 2. 23). disobedient—to God (ch. 3. 8; Ephesians, 2. 2; 5. 6). reprobate—rejected as worthless when tested (Notes, Romans, 1. 28; 1 Corinthians, 9. 27; 2 Timothy, 3. 8).

CHAPTER II.

VER. 1-15. DIRECTIONS TO TITUS: HOW TO EXHORT VARIOUS CLASSES OF BELIEVERS: THE GRACE OF GOD IN CHRIST OUR GRAND INCENTIVE TO LIVE GODLY. 1. But, thou—in contrast to the reprobate seducers stigmatized ch. 1. 11, 15, 16. "He deals more in exhortations, because those intent on useless questions needed chiefly to be recalled to the study of a holy, moral life; for nothing so effectually allays men's wandering curiosity, as the being brought to recognize those duties in which they ought to exercise themselves." [CALVIN.] 2. sober—translated "vigilant," as sober men alone can be 1 Timothy, 3. 2. But "sober" here answers to "not given to wine," v. 3; ch. 1. 7. grave—"dignified;" behaving with reverent propriety, temperate—"self-restrained;" "discreet" [ALFORD.] (ch. 1. 8; 1 Timothy, 2. 9). faith... charity [love]... patience—combined in 1 Timothy, 6. 11. "Faith, hope, charity" (1 Corinthians, 13. 13). "Patience, hope, charity," "enduring perseverance," is the attendant on, and is supported by, "hope" (1 Corinthians, 13. 7; 1 Thessalonians, 1. 3). It is the grace which especially becomes old men, being the fruit of ripened experience derived from trials overcome (Romans, 6. 8). 3. behaviour—"deportment," as becometh holiness—"as becometh women consecrated to God" [WAHL:] being by our Christian calling priestesses unto God (Ephesians, 5. 3; 1 Timothy, 2. 10). "Observant of sacred decorum." [BENGL.] not false accusers—not slanderers: a besetting sin of some elderly women, given to much wine—the besetting sin of the Cretians (ch. 1. 12). Lit., "enslaved to much wine." Addition to wine is slavery (Romans, 6. 16; 2 Peter, 2. 19). teachers—in private: not in public (1 Corinthians, 14. 34; 1 Timothy, 2. 11, 12): influencing for good the younger women by precept and example. 4. to be sober—Greek, "self-restrained," "discreet:" the same Greek as in v. 2, "temperate." But see Note; cf. Note, 2 Timothy, 1. 7. ALFORD therefore translates, "That they school [admonish in their duty] the young women to be lovers of their husbands," &c. (the foundation of all domestic happiness). It was judicious that Titus, a young man, should admonish the young women, not directly, but through the elder women. 5. keepers at home—as "guardians of the house," as the Greek expresses. The oldest MSS. read, "Workers at home:" active in household duties (Proverbs, 7. 11; 1 Timothy, 5. 13). good—kind, beneficent (Matthew, 20. 16; Romans, 5. 7; 1 Peter, 2. 18). Not churlish and niggardly, whilst thrifty as housewives, obedient—rather, "submissive," as the Greek is translated, see Notes, Ephesians, 5. 21, 22, 24. their own-marking the duty of subjection which they owe them, as being their own husbands (Ephesians, 4. 22; Colossians, 3. 18). blasphemed—"evil spoken of." That no reproach may be cast on the gospel, through the inconsistencies of its professors (v. 8, 10; Romans, 2. 24; 1 Timothy, 6. 14; 6. 1). "Unless we are virtuous, blasphemy will come through us to the faith." [THEOPHYLACT.] 6. Young—Greek, "The younger men," so minded—self-restrained. [ALFORD.] "Nothing is so hard at this age as to overcome pleasures and follies." [CHRYSOSTOM.] 7. In—With respect to all things. thyself a pattern—though but a young man thyself. All teaching is useless, unless the teacher's example confirm his word. In doctrine—in thy ministerial teaching (showing) unconspicuousness, i. e., unobtruded purity of motive on thy part (cf. 1 Corinthians, 11. 3), so as to be "a pattern" to all. As "gravity," &c., refers to Titus himself, so "unconspicuousness;" though, doubtless, unconspicuousness of the doctrine will be sure to follow as a consequence of the Christian minister being of simple, uncorrupt integrity himself, gravity—dignified seriousness in setting forth the truth. sincerity—Omitted in the oldest MSS. 8. speak—discourse in public and private ministrations. he that is of the contrary part—the adversary (ch. 1. 9; 2 Timothy, 2. 25), whether he be heathen or Jew, may be ashamed—put to confusion by the power of truth and innocence (cf. v. 6, 10; 1 Timothy, 6. 14; 6. 1). no evil thing—in our acts, or demeanour, of you—So one of the oldest MSS. Other very old MSS. read, "of us," Christians. 9. servants—"slaves," to please them well—"to give satisfaction." [ALFORD.] To be complaisant in every thing; to have that zealous desire to gain the master's good will which will anticipate the master's wish, and do even more than is required. The reason for the frequent recurrence of injunctions to slaves to subjection (Ephesians, 6. 5, &c.; Colossians, 3. 22; 1 Timothy, 6. 1, &c.; 1 Peter, 2. 18) was, that in no rank was there more danger of the doctrine of the spiritual equality and freedom of Christians being misunderstood, than in that of slaves. It was natural for the slave who had become a Christian, to forget his place and put himself on a social level with his master. Hence the charge for each to abide in the sphere in which he was when converted (1 Corinthians, 7. 20-24), not answering again—in contradiction to the master; so the Greek, "not contradicting." [WAHL.] 10. Not parading—Greek, "Not appropriating" what does not belong to one. It means "keeping back" dishonestly or deceitfully (Acts, 6. 2, 3). showing—manifesting in acts. all—all possible, good—really good; not so in mere appearance (Ephesians, 6. 5, 6; Colossians, 3. 22-24). "The heathen do not judge of the Christian's doctrines from the doctrine, but from his actions and life." [CHRYSOSTOM.] Men will write, fight, and even die for their religion; but how few live for it! Translates, "That they may adorn the doctrine of our Saviour God," i. e., God the Father, the originating author of salvation (cf. Note, 1 Timothy, 1. 1). God deigns to have His gospel-doctrine adorned even by slaves, who are regarded by the world as no better than beasts of burden. "Though the service be rendered to an earthly master, the honour redounds to God, as the servant's good will flows from the fear of God." [THEOPHYLACT.] Even slaves, low as is their status, should not think the influence of their example a matter of no consequence to religion; how much more those in a high position. His love in being "Our Saviour" is the strongest ground for our adorning His doctrine by our lives. This is the force of "For" in v. 11. The grace of God—God's gratuitous favour in the scheme of redemption, hath appeared—Greek, "hath been made to appear," or "shine forth" (Isaiah, 9. 2; Luke, 1. 79). "hath been manifested" (ch. 3. 4), after having been long hidden in the loving counsels of God (Colossians, 1. 26; 2 Timothy, 1. 9, 10). The image is illustrated Acts, 27. 20. The grace of God hath now been embodied in Jesus, "the brightness of the Father's glory," manifested as the sun of righteousness, "the Word made flesh." The gospel dispensation is hence termed "the day" (1 Thessalonians, 5. 5, 8; there is a double "appearing," that of "grace" here, that of "glory," v. 13; cf. Romans, 13. 12). Connect it not as English Version, but, "The grace, that bringeth salvation to all men hath appeared," or "been manifested" (1 Timothy, 2. 4; 4. 10). Hence God is called "Our Saviour" (v. 10). The very name Jesus means the same, to all—of whom he enumerated the different classes (v. 9-10): even to servants; to us Gentiles once aliens from God. Hence arises our obligation to all men (ch. 3. 2). 12. Teaching—Greek, "disciplining us." Grace exercises discipline, and is imparted in connexion with disciplining chastisements (1 Corinthians, 11. 33; Hebrews, 12. 6, 7).

The education which the Christian receives from "the grace of God" is a discipline often trying to flesh and blood; just as children need disciplining. The discipline which it exercises teaches us to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world (Greek, age, or course of things) where such self-discipline is needed, seeing that its spirit is opposed to God (ch. 1. 12, 16; 1 Corinthians, 1. 20; 3. 18, 19; in the coming world we may gratify every desire without need of self-discipline, because all desires there will be conformable to the will of God, that—Greek, "in order that," the end of the "disciplining" is "in order that...we may live soberly," &c. This point is lost by the translation, "teaching us," denying...lusts—[Luke, 9. 23.] The Greek artist expresses "denying once for all." We deny them when we withhold our consent from them, when we refuse the delight which they suggest, and the act to which they solicit us, nay, tear them up by the roots out of our soul and mind. [ST. BERNARD, Serm. 11.] worldly lusts—The Greek artist expresses, "the lusts of the world," "all worldly lusts" [ALFORD] (Galatians, 5. 16; Ephesians, 2. 3; 1 John, 2. 15-17; 5. 19). The world (cosmos) will not come to an end when this present age (æon) or course of things shall end. Live soberly, righteously, and godly—the positive side of the Christian character; as "denying...lusts" was the negative. "Soberly," i.e., with self-restraint, in relation to one's self; "righteously" or justly, in relation to our neighbour; "godly" or piously, in relation to God (not merely amiably and justly, but something higher, godly, with love and reverence toward God). These three comprise our "disciplining" in faith and love, from which he passes to hope (v. 13). 13. (Philippians, 3. 20, 21.) Looking for—with constant expectation so the Greek) and with joy (Romans, 8. 19). This will prove the antidote to worldly lusts, and the stimulus to "live in this present world" conformably to this expectation. The Greek is translated "waiting for" in Luke, 2. 25. that—Greek, "the," blessed—bringing blessedness (Romans, 4. 7, 8). hope—i.e., object of hope (Romans, 8. 24; Galatians, 5. 6; Colossians, 1. 5). the glorious appearing—There is but one Greek article to both "hope" and "appearing," which marks their close connexion (the hope being about to be realized only at the appearing of Christ). Translate, "The blessed hope and manifestation (cf. Note, v. 11) of the glory." The Greek for "manifestation" is translated "brightness" 2 Thessalonians, 2. 8. As His "coming" (Greek, parousia) expresses the fact; so "brightness, appearing," or "manifestation" (epiphania) expresses His personal visibility when He shall come. the great God and our Saviour Jesus—There is but one Greek article to "God" and "Saviour," which shows that both are predicated of one and the same Being. "Of Him who is at once the great God and our Saviour." Also, (2.) "appearing" (epiphania) is never by Paul predicated of God the Father (John, 1. 18; 1 Timothy, 6. 16; or even of "His glory" (as ALFORD explains it): it is invariably applied to CHRIST'S coming, to which (at His first advent, cf. 2 Timothy, 1. 10) the kindred verb "appeared" (epiphaneō), v. 11, refers (1 Timothy, 6. 14; 2 Timothy, 4. 1, 8). Also, (3.) in the context (v. 14) there is no reference to the Father, but to Christ alone; and here there is no occasion for reference to the Father in the exigencies of the context. Also, (4.) the expression "great God," as applied to Christ, is in accordance with the context, which refers to the glory of His appearing; just as "the true God" is predicated of Christ (1 John, 5. 20). The phrase occurs nowhere else in the New Testament, but often in the Old Testament, Deuteronomy, 7. 21; 10. 17, predicated of Jehovah, who, as their manifested Lord, led the Israelites through the wilderness, doubtless the Second Person in the Trinity. Believers now look for the manifestation of His glory, inasmuch as they shall share in it. Even the Socinian explanation, making "the great God" to be the Father, "our Saviour," the Son, places God and Christ on an equal relation to "the glory" of the future appearing; a fact incompatible with the notion that Christ is not Divine; indeed it would be blasphemy so to couple any mere created being with God. 14. gave himself—"The forcible 'Himself, His whole self, the greatest gift ever given,' must not be overlooked" for as—"Greek," in our behalf, "redeem us—deliver us from bondage by paying the price of His precious blood. An appropriate image in addressing bond servants (v. 9, 10), from all iniquity—the essence of sin, viz., "transgression of the law," in bondage to which we were till then. The aim of His redemption was to redeem us, not merely from the penalty, but from the being of all iniquity. Thus he reverts to the "teaching" in righteousness, or disciplining effect of the grace of God that bringeth salvation (v. 11, 12). peculiar—peculiarly His own, as Israel was of old, zealous—in doing and promoting "good works." 15. with all authority—translate, "authoritativeness" (cf. "sharply," ch. 1. 13). Let no man despise thee—Speak with such vigour as to command respect (1 Timothy, 4. 12). Warn them with such authority that no one may think himself above (so the Greek idē) the need of admonition. [TITMANN, Synonyms of New Testament.]

CHAPTER III.

VER. 1-15. WHAT TITUS IS TO TEACH CONCERNING CHRISTIANS' BEHAVIOUR TOWARDS THE WORLD: HOW HE IS TO TREAT HERETICS: WHEN AND WHERE HE IS TO MEET PAUL, SALUTATION. CONCLUSION. 1. Put them in mind—as they are in danger of forgetting their duty, though knowing it. The opposition of Christianity to heathenism, and the natural disposition to rebellion of the Jews under the Roman empire of whom many lived in Crete), might lead many to forget practically what was a recognised Christian principle in theory, submission to the powers that be. Diodorus Siculus mentions the tendency of the Cretians to riotous insubordination, principalities...powers—Greek, "magistrates...authorities," to be subject—willingly (so the Greek, to obey—the commands of "magistrates," not necessarily implying spontaneous obedience, Willing obedience is implied in "ready to ever good work." Cf. Romans, 13. 3, as showing that obedience to the magistracy would tend to good works, since the magistrate's aim generally is to favour the good and punish the bad. Contrast "disobedient" (v. 3). 2. To speak evil of no man—especially, not of "dignities" and magistrates, no brawlers—"not quarrelsome," not attacking others, gentle—towards those who attack us. Yielding, considerate, not urging one's rights to the uttermost, but forbearing and kindly (Note, Philippians, 4. 5). Very different from the innate greediness and spirit of aggression towards others which characterized the Cretians, showing—in acts, all—all possible meekness—(Note, 2 Corinthians, 10. 1)—the opposite of passionate severity, unto all men—The duty of Christian conduct towards all men is the proper consequence of the universality of God's grace to all men, so often set forth in the pastoral epistles. 3. For—Our own past sins should lead us to be lenient towards those of others. "Despise none, for such wast thou also," as the penitent thief said to his fellow-thief, "Dost thou not fear God...seeing that thou art in the same condemnation." we—Christians, were—Contrast v. 4. "But when," &c., i.e., now; a favourite contrast in Paul's writing, that between our past state by nature, and our present state of deliverance from it by grace. As God treated us, we ought to treat our neighbour, sometimes—once, foolish—Wanting right reason in our course of living. Irrational. The exact picture of human life without grace. Grace is the sole remedy even for foolishness, disobedient—to God, deceiver—led astray. The same Greek, "out of the way."

Hebrews, 5. 2. serving—Greek, "in bondage to," "serving as slaves," divers—the cloyed appetite craves constant variety, pleasures—of the flesh, malice—malignity, hateful...hating—Correlatives. Provoking the hatred of others by their detestable character and conduct, and in turn hating them. 4. To show how little reason the Cretian Christians had to be proud of themselves, and despise others not Christians (Notes, v. 2, 3). It is to the "kindness and love of God," not to their own merits, that they owe salvation. kindness—Greek, "goodness," "benignity," which manifests His grace, love...toward man—teaching us to have such "love (benevolence) toward man" (Greek, philanthropy). "showing all meekness unto all men" (v. 2), even as God had "toward man" (ch. 2. 11): opposed to the "hateful and hating" characteristics of unrenewed men, whose wretchedness moved God's benevolent kindness, of God our Saviour—Greek, "of our Saviour God," viz., the Father (ch. 1. 3), who "saved us" (v. 5) "through Jesus Christ our Saviour" (v. 6). appeared—Greek, "was made to appear": was manifested. 5. Not by—Greek, "Out of," "not as a result springing from works," &c. of righteousness—Greek, "in righteousness," i.e., wrought in a state of righteousness: as "deeds...wrought in God." There was an utter absence in us of the element ("righteousness") in which alone righteous works could be done, and so necessarily an absence of the works. "We neither did works of righteousness, nor were saved in consequence of them; but His goodness did the whole." [THEOPHYLACT.] we—Emphatically opposed to "His," mercy—the prompting cause of our salvation individually: "In pursuance of His mercy." His kindness and love to man were manifested in redemption once for all wrought by Him for mankind generally: His mercy is the prompting cause for our individual realization of it. Faith is pre-supposed as the instrument of our being "saved," our being so, then, is spoken of as an accomplished fact. Faith is not mentioned, but only God's part, as Paul's object here is not to describe man's new state, but the saving agency of God in bringing about that state, independent of all merit on the man's part (Note, c. 4). by—Greek, "through": by means of, the washing—rather, "the laver," i.e., the baptismal font, or lavatory, of regeneration—designed to be the visible instrument of regeneration. "The apostles are wont to draw an argument from the sacraments to prove the thing therein signified, because it ought to be a recognised principle among the godly, that God does not mock us with empty signs, but by His power inwardly makes good what He demonstrates by the outward sign. Wherefore baptism is congruously and truly called the laver of regeneration. We must connect the sign and thing signified, so as not to make the sign empty and ineffectual; and yet not, for the sake of honouring the sign, to detract from the Holy Spirit what is peculiarly His" [CALVIN] (1 Peter, 3. 21). Adult candidates for baptism are presupposed to have had repentance and faith (for Paul often assumes in faith and charity that those addressed are what they profess to be, though in fact some of them were not so, 1 Corinthians, 6. 11), in which case baptism would be the visible "laver of regeneration" to them, "faith being thereby confirmed, and grace increased, by virtue of prayer to God" (Church of England, Article 27). Infants are charitably presumed to have received a grace in connexion with their Christian descent, in answer to the believing prayers of their parents or guardians presenting them for baptism, which grace is visibly sealed and increased by baptism, "the laver of regeneration." They are presumed to be then regenerated, until years of developed consciousness prove whether they have been actually so or not. "Born of (from) water and (no 'of' in Greek) the Spirit." The Word is the remote and anterior instrument of the new birth; Baptism, the proximate instrument. The Word, the instrument to the individual; Baptism, in relation to the Society of Christians. The laver of cleansing stood outside the door of the tabernacle, wherein the priest had to wash before entering the Holy Place; so we must wash in the laver of regeneration before we can enter the church, whose members are "a royal priesthood." "Baptism by the Spirit" (whereof water-baptism is the designed accompanying seal) makes the difference between Christian baptism and that of John. As Paul presupposes the outward church is the visible community of the redeemed, so he speaks of baptism on the supposition that it answered to its idea: that all that is inward belonging to its completeness accompanied the outward. Hence he here asserts of outward baptism whatever is involved in the believing appropriation of the divine facts which it symbolizes, whatever is realized when baptism fully corresponds to its original design. So Galatians, 3. 27: language holding good only of those in whom the inward living communion and outward baptism coalesce. "Saved us" applies fully to those truly regenerate alone; in a general sense it may include many who, though put within reach of salvation, shall not finally be saved. "Regeneration" occurs only once more in New Testament, Matthew, 19. 28, i.e., the new birth of the heaven and earth at Christ's second coming to renew all material things the human body included, when the creature, now travelling in labour-throes to the birth, shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. Regeneration, which now begins in the believer's soul, shall then be extended to his body, and thence to all creation, and renewing—not "the laver" (washing) of renewing," but "and by the renewing," &c., following "saved us." To make "renewing of the Holy Ghost" follow "the laver," would destroy the balance of the clauses of the sentence, and would make baptism the seal, not only of regeneration, but also of the subsequent process of progressive sanctification ("renewing of the Holy Ghost"). Regeneration is a thing once for all done; renewing is a process daily proceeding. As "the washing," or "laver," is connected with "regeneration," so the "renewing of the Holy Ghost" is connected with "shed on us abundantly" (v. 6). 6. Which—the Holy Ghost, he said—Greek, "poured out": not only on the church in general at Pentecost, but also "on us" individually. This pouring out of the Spirit comprehends the grace received before, in, and subsequently to, baptism, abundantly—Greek, "richly" (Colossians, 3. 16). through Jesus Christ—the channel and Mediator of the gift of the Holy Ghost, our Saviour—Immediately: as the Father is mediately "our Saviour." The Father is the Author of our salvation, and saves us by Jesus Christ. 7. That, &c.—the purpose which He aimed at in having "saved us" (v. 5), viz., "That being (having been) justified (accounted righteous) through faith at our 'regeneration,' and made righteous by the daily 'renewing of the Holy Ghost' by His grace (as opposed to works, v. 5) we should be made heirs." His grace—Greek, "the grace of the former," i.e., God (v. 4; Romans, 5. 15). heirs—(Galatians, 3. 29.) according to the hope of eternal life—ch. 1. 2, and also the position of the Greek words, confirm English Version, i.e., agreeably to the hope of eternal life: the eternal inheritance fully satisfying the hope. BENGEI, ELLICOTT, &c., explain it, "heirs of eternal life, in the way of hope," i.e., not yet in actual possession. Such a blessed hope which once was not possessed, will lead a Christian to practical holiness and meekness toward others, the lesson especially needed by the Cretians. 8. Greek, "faithful is the saying." A formula peculiar to the pastoral epistles. Here "the saying" is the statement (v. 4-7) as to the gratuitousness of God's gift of salvation. Answering to the "Amen" these things, &c.—

Greek, "Concerning these things (the truths dwelt on, v. 4-7; not as English Version, what follow) I will that thou affirm (insist) strongly and persistently, in order that they who have believed God (the Greek for 'believed in God' is different, John, 14, 1. 'They who have learnt to credit God' in what He saith) may be careful ('solicitously sedulous,' diligence is necessary) to maintain (lit., 'to set before themselves so as to sustain') good works." No longer applying their ears to "unprofitable" and unpractical speculations (v. 9, these things—These results of doctrine ("good works") are "good and profitable unto men," whereas no such practical results flow from "foolish questions," So GNOTURUS & WISMINGEL. But ALFORD, to avoid the tautology, "these (good works) are good unto men," explains, "these truths" (v. 4-7). S. English-Greek, "insipid," producing no moral fruit. "Vain talkers," genealogies—akin to the "fables" (see Note, 1 Timothy, 1, 4). Not so much direct heresy as yet is here referred to, as profitless discussions about genealogies of zeus, &c., which ultimately led to Gnosticism. Synagogue discourses were termed daraschoth, i. e., discussions. Cf. "disputer of this world (Greek, dispensation)," strivings about the law—about the authority of the "commandments of men," which they sought to confirm by the law (ch. 1, 14; Note, 1 Timothy, 1, 7), and about the mystical meaning of the various parts of the law in connexion with the "genealogies," avoid—stand aloof from. Same Greek, as in Note, 2 Timothy, 2, 16, 10, heretic—Greek heresy, originally meant a division resulting from individual self-will: the individual doing and teaching what he chose independently of the teaching and practice of the church. In course of time it came to mean definitely "heresy" in the modern sense; and in the later epistles it has almost assumed this meaning. The heretics of Crete, when Titus was there, were in doctrine followers of their own self-willed "questions" reprobated in v. 9, and immoral in practice. reject—decline, avoid: not formal excommunication, but, "have nothing more to do with him," either in admonition or intercourse. 11. is...subverted—"is become perverse," condemned of himself—He cannot say, no one told him better; continuing the same after frequent admonition he is self-condemned. "He sinneth" wilfully against knowledge. 12. When I shall send [have sent] Artemas or Tycheus—to supply thy place in Crete. Artemas is said to have been subsequently bishop of Lystra. Tycheus was sent twice by Paul from Rome to Lesser Asia in his first imprisonment, (which shows how well qualified he was to become Titus' successor in Crete); Ephesians, 4, 21; and in his second, 2 Timothy, 4, 12. Tradition makes him subsequently bishop of Chalcedon, in Bithynia. Nicopolis—"The city of victory," called so from the battle of Actium, in Epirus. This epistle was probably written from Corinth in the autumn. Paul purposed a journey through Olybia and Acarnania, into Epirus, and there "to winter." See my Introduction to the pastoral epistles. 13. Bring...on their journey—Enable them to proceed forward by supplying necessaries for their journey. Zenas—the contracted form of Zenodorus, lawyer—A Jewish "scribe," who, when converted, still retained the title from his former occupation. A civil lawyer. Apollis—with Zenas, probably the bearers of this epistle. In 1 Corinthians, 16, 12, Apollis is mentioned as purposing to visit Corinth; his now being at Corinth (on the theory of Paul being at Corinth when he wrote accords with this purpose. Crete would be on his way either to Palestine or his native place, Alexandria. Paul and Apollis thus appear in beautiful harmony in that very city where their names had been formerly the watchword of unchristian party work. It was to avoid this party rivalry that Apollis formerly was unwilling to visit Corinth, though Paul desired him. Hippolytus mentions Zenas as one of the Seventy, and afterwards bishop of Diospolis. 14. And...also—Greek, "But...also." Not only thou, but let others also of "our" fellow-believers (or "whom we have gained over at Crete") with thee, for necessary uses—to supply the necessary wants of Christian missionaries and brethren, according as they stand in need in their journeys for the Lord's cause. Cf. ch. 1, 8, "a lover of hospitality." 15. Greet—"Salute them that love us in the faith." All at Crete had not this love rooted in faith, the true bond of fellowship. A salutation peculiar to this epistle, such as no former would have used. Grace—Greek, "The grace," viz., of God, with you all—not that the epistle is addressed to all the Cretan Christians, but Titus would naturally impart it to his flock.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL TO PHILEMON.

INTRODUCTION.

THE testimonies to its authenticity are, Origen, Homily 19, on Seren., vol. 1, p. 185, ed. Huet, cites it as the letter of Paul to Philemon concerning Onesimus; Tertullian against Marcion, 5, 21. "The brevity of this epistle is the sole cause of its escaping the falsifying hands of Marcion;" Eusebius, Eccl. History, 4, 25, mentions it among "the universally acknowledged epistles of the canon;" Jerome, Proemium in Philemonem, vol. iv., p. 442, argues for it against those who objected to its canonicity on the ground of its subject being beneath an apostle to write about. Ignatius, Ep. 5, and Magn. 12, seems to allude to Philemon, 20. Cf. epistle to Polycarp (ch. 1 and 6). Its brevity is the cause of its not being often quoted by the Fathers. Paley, Horæ Paulinæ, has shown striking proofs of its authenticity in the undesigned coincidences between it and the epistle to the Colossians.

PLACE AND TIME OF WRITING.—This epistle is closely linked with the epistle to the Colossians. Both were carried by the same bearer, Onesimus (with whom, however, Tycheus is joined in the epistle to the Colossians, Colossians, 4, 9. The persons sending salutations are the same, except one, Jesus called Justus (Colossians, 4, 11). In both alike Archippus is addressed (v. 2; Colossians, 4, 17). Paul and Timothy stand in the headings of both. And in both Paul appears as a prisoner (v. 9; Colossians, 4, 18). Hence it follows, it was written at the same time and place as the epistle to the Colossians (which was about the same time as the epistle to the Ephesians), viz., at Rome, during Paul's first imprisonment, A. D. 61 or 62.

OBJECT.—Onesimus, of Colosse ("one of you," Colossians, 4, 9), slave of Philemon, had fled from his master to Rome, after having probably defrauded him (v. 18). He there was converted to Christianity by St. Paul, and being induced by him to return to his master, he was furnished with this epistle, recommending him to Philemon's favourable reception, as being now no longer a mere servant, but also a brother in Christ. Paul ends by requesting Philemon to prepare him a lodging, to be trusted soon to be set free and visit Colosse. This epistle is addressed also to Apphia, supposed from its domestic subject Philemon's wife, and Arohippus (a minister of the Colossian church, Colossians, 4. 27), for the same reason, a near relative and inmate.

The Apostolical Canon (73), is said to have been emancipated by his master. The Apostolical Constitutions he was consecrated by Paul, bishop of Berea, in Macedonia, and that he was martyred at Rome. Ignatius, Letters, ch. 1., speaks of him as bishop of the Ephesians.

It has been happily termed, from its graceful and delicate urbanity, "the polite epistle." Yet there is more compliment, miscalled politeness by the world. It is manly and straightforward, without misrepresentation of facts; at the same time that it is most captivatingly persuasive. Alford quotes Luther's opinion, "This epistle showeth a right, noble, lovely example of Christian love. Here we see how St. Paul out for the poor Onesimus, and with all his means pleadeth his cause with his master, and so setteth himself against him, and had himself done wrong to Philemon. Yet all this doeth he, not with force, as if he had right stripped himself of his right, and thus enforceth Philemon to forego his right also. Even as Christ did for His Father, thus also doth St. Paul for Onesimus with Philemon: for Christ also stripped Himself of His right and humbly enforced (?) the Father to lay aside His wrath and power, and to take us to His grace for us, who lovingly pleadeth our cause, and with all His heart 'vreteth Himself out for us: for we are all His thinking."

To simply direction; unto, to the advantage &c.*—The aim of my thanksgiving and love is, in order that the, &c. the communion—the imparting of it and its fruits (viz., id beneficence: as Hebrews, 13. 16, "To i. e., to impart a share) to others; or, to others flowing from thy faith (so the stated, "liberal distribution," 2 Corinthians, 9. 12, "IN: the element liberality had place, i. e., may be proved, acknowledging—Greek, "the thorough, the experimental or practical recognition good thing which is in you—The oldest which is in us," i. e., the practical recognition grace which is in us Christians, in so far as the Christian character. In short, that by acts be proved to be "a faith which is in Christ Jesus—rather as Greek, Jesus," i. e., to the glory of Christ Jesus, dest MISS. omit "Jesus." This verse answers to v. 5, "Thy love and faith toward all saints:" Paul never ceases to mention him in his prayers, in order that his faith may still further show its power in his relation to others, by exhibiting every grace which is in Christians to the glory of Christ. Thus he paves the way for the request in behalf of Onesimus. 7. For—A reason for the prayer, v. 4-6. we have—Greek, "we had." joy and consolation—Joined in 2 Corinthians, 7. 4. saints are refreshed by these—his house was open to them. brother—put last, to conciliate his favourable attention to the request which follows. 8. Wherefore—Because of my love to thee, I prefer to "beseech," rather than "enjoin," or authoritatively command. I might... enjoin—In virtue of the obligation to obedience which Philemon lay under to Paul, as having been converted through his instrumentality, is Christ—the element in which his boldness has place. 9. for love's sake—mine to thee, and (what ought to be) thine to Onesimus. Or, that Christian love of which thou showest so bright an example (v. 7). being such an one—Explain, Being such a one as thou knowest me to be, viz., Paul (the founder of so many churches, and an apostle of Christ, and thy (rather in the faith) the aged a circumstance calculated to secure thy respect for anything I request), and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ the strongest claim I have on thy regard: if for no other reason, at least in consideration of this, through commiseration gratify me). 10. I beseech thee—Emphatically repeated from v. 9. In the Greek, the name "Onesimus" is skilfully put last; he puts first a favourable description of him before he mentions the name that had fallen into so bad repute with Philemon. "I beseech thee for my son, whom I have begotten in my bonds, Onesimus." Scripture does not sanction slavery, but at the same time does not begin a political crusade against it. It sets forth principles of love to our fellowmen which were sure (as they have done) in due time to undermine and overthrow it, without violently convulsing the then existing political fabric, by stirring up slaves against their masters. 11. Which...was...unprofitable—Relying his name Onesimus, which means profitable. Not only was he unprofitable, but positively injurious, having "wronged" his master. Paul uses a mild expression, now profitable—Without godliness a man is so in no station. Profitable in spiritual, as well as in temporal things. 12. mine own bowels—as dear to me as my own heart. [ALFORD.] Cf. v. 17, "as myself." The object of my most intense affection as that of a parent for a child. 13. I—Emphatical. bonds endured for the gospel's sake (v. 9). 14. without thy mind—i.e., consent, should not be as—"should not appear as a matter of necessity, but of free will." Had Paul kept Onesimus, however willing to gratify Paul, in fact, Philemon might be, he would have no opportunity given him of showing he was so, his leave not having been asked. 15. perhaps—speaking in human fashion, yet as one believing that God's Providence probably (for we cannot dogmatically define the hidden purposes of God in providence) overruled the past evil to ultimately greater good to him. This thought would soften Philemon's indignation at Onesimus' past offence. The same Greek as in Matthew, 6, 2, for ever—in this life and in that to come (cf. Exodus, 21, 6). Onesimus' time of absence, however long, was but a short "hour" (so Greek) compared with the everlasting devotion henceforth binding him to his master. 16. No longer as a mere servant or slave (though still he is that), but above a servant, so that thou shalt derive from him not merely the services of a slave, but higher benefits: a servant "in the flesh," he is a brother "in the Lord," beloved, specially to me—who am his spiritual father, and who have experienced his faithful attentions. Lest Philemon should dislike Onesimus being called "brother," Paul first recognises him as a brother, being the spiritual son of the same God. much more unto thee—to whom he stands in so much nearer and more lasting relation. 17. a partner—in the Christian fellowship of faith, hope, and love, receive him as myself—Resuming "receive him that is mine own bowels." 18. Greek, "But if thou art not inclined to 'receive him' because he hath wronged thee: a milder term than 'robbed thee.'" Onesimus seems to have confessed some such act to Paul. put that on mine account—I am ready to make good the loss to thee if required. The latter parts of v. 19, 21, imply that he did not expect Philemon would probably demand it. 19. with mine own hand—not employing an amanuensis, as in other epistles: a special compliment to Philemon which he ought to show his appreciation of by granting Paul's request. Contrast Colossians, 4, 18, which shows that the epistle to the Colossian church, accompanying our epistle, had only its closing "salutation" written by Paul's own hand. albeit, &c. —lit., "that I may not say...not to say," &c. thou owest...even thine own self—not merely thy possessions. For to my instrumentality thou owest thy salvation. So the debt which "he oweth thee" being transferred upon me (I making myself responsible for it) is cancelled. 20. let me—"Me" is emphatic: "Let me have profit (so Greek 'for joy,' onesimen, referring to the name Onesimus, 'profitable') from thee, as thou shouldst have had from Onesimus;" for "thou owest thine own self to me." in the Lord—not in worldly gain, but in thine increase in the graces of the Lord's Spirit. [ALFORD] my bowels—my heart. Gratify my feelings by granting this request, in the Lord—The oldest MSS. read, "in Christ." The element or sphere in which this act of Christian love naturally ought to have place. 21. Having confidence in thy obedience—to my apostolic authority, if I were to "enjoin" it (v. 8, which I do not, preferring to beseech thee for it as a favour &c. 9. thou wilt also do more—towards Onesimus: hinting at his possible manumission by Philemon, besides being kindly received. 22. This prospect of Paul's visiting Colosse would tend to secure a kindly reception for Onesimus, as Paul would know in person how he had been treated, your...you—Referring to Philemon, Apphia, Archippus, and the church in Philemon's house. The same expectation is expressed by him, Philippians, 2, 23, 24, written in the same imprisonment. 23. The same persons send salutations in the accompanying epistle, except that "Jesus Justus" is not mentioned here. Epaphras, my fellow-prisoner—he had been sent by the Colossian church to enquire after, and minister to, Paul, and possibly was cast into prison by the Roman authorities on suspicion. However, he is not mentioned as a prisoner in Colossians, 4, 12, so that fellow-prisoner" here may mean merely one who was a faithful companion to Paul in his imprisonment, and by his society put himself in the position of a prisoner. So also "Aristarchus, my fellow-prisoner," Colossians, 4, 10, may mean. BERNIER conjectures the meaning to be that on some former occasion these two were Paul's "fellow-prisoners," not at the time. 25. is with your spirit—(Galatians, 6, 18; 2 Timothy, 4, 23.)

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE HEBREWS.

INTRODUCTION.

CANONICITY AND AUTHORSHIP.—Clement of Rome, at the end of the first century, A.D., copiously uses it, adopting its words just as he does those of the other books of the New Testament; not indeed giving to either the term "Scripture," which he reserves for the Old Testament (the canon of the New Testament not yet having been formally established), but certainly not ranking it below the other New Testament acknowledged epistles. As our epistle claims authenticity on the part of the writer, Clement's adoption of extracts from it is virtually sanctioning its authority, and this in the apostolic age. Justin Martyr quotes it as divinely authoritative, to establish the titles "apostle," as well as "angel," as applied to the Son of God. Clement of Alexandria refers it expressly to Paul, on the authority of Pantænus, chief of the Catechetical school in Alexandria, in the middle of the second century, saying, that as Jesus is termed in it the "apostle" sent to the Hebrews, Paul, through humility, does not in it call himself apostle of the Hebrews, being apostle to the Gentiles. Clement also says that Paul, as the Hebrews were prejudiced against him, prudently omitted to put forward his name in the beginning; also, that it was originally written in Hebrew for the Hebrews, and that Luke translated it into Greek for the Greeks, whence the style is similar to that of Acts. He, however, quotes frequently the words of the existing Greek epistle as St. Paul's words. Origen similarly quotes it as St. Paul's epistle. However, in his Homilies, he regards the style as distinct from that of Paul, and as "more Grecian," but the thoughts as the apostle's; adding that the "ancients who have handed down the tradition of its Pauline authorship, must have had good reason for doing so, though God alone knows the certainty who was the actual writer" (i.e., probably "transcriber" of the apostle's thoughts). In the African church, in the beginning of the third century, Tertullian ascribes it to Barnabas. Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, is mentioned in Eusebius, as quoting from this epistle, though without expressly referring it to Paul. About the same period, Caius, the presbyter, in the church of Rome, mentions only thirteen epistles of Paul, whereas, if the epistle to the Hebrews were included, there would be fourteen. So the canon fragment of the end of the second century, or beginning of the third, published by Muratorii, apparently omits mentioning it. And so the Latin church did not recognise it as Paul's till a considerable time after the beginning of the third century. Thus, also, Novatian of Rome, Cyprian of Carthage, and Victorinus, also of the Latin church. But in the fourth century, Hilary of Poitiers (A.D. 368), Lucifer of Cagliari (A.D. 371), Ambrose of Milan (A.D. 387), and other Latins, quote it as Paul's; and the fifth Council of Carthage (A.D. 419) formally reckons it among his fourteen epistles.

As to the similarity of its style to that of St. Luke's writings, this is due to his having been so long the companion of Paul. Chrysostom, comparing Luke and Mark, says, "Each imitated his teacher: Luke imitated Paul flowing with more than river-fulsness; but Mark imitated Peter, who studied brevity of style." Besides, there is a greater predominance of Jewish feeling and familiarity with the peculiarities of the Jewish schools apparent in this epistle than in St. Luke's writings. There is no clear evidence for attributing the authorship to him, or to Apollos, whom Alford upholds as the author. The grounds alleged for the latter view are its supposed Alexandrian phraseology and modes of thought. But these are such as any Palestinian Jew might have used; and Paul, from his Hebrew-Hellenistic education at Jerusalem and Tarsus, would be familiar with Philo's modes of thought, which are not, as some think, necessarily all derived from his Alexandrian, but also from his Jewish education. It would be unlikely that the Alexandrian church should have so undebatingly asserted the Pauline authorship, if Apollos, their own countryman, had really been the author. The eloquence of its style and rhetoric, a characteristic of Apollos' at Corinth, whereas Paul there spoke in words unadorned by man's wisdom, are doubtless designedly adapted to the minds of those whom St. Paul in this epistle addresses. To the Greek Corinthians, who were in danger of idolising human eloquence and wisdom, he writes in an unadorned style, in order to fix their attention more wholly on the gospel itself. But the Hebrews were in no such danger. And his Hebrew-Grecian education would enable him to write in a style attractive to the Hebrews at Alexandria, where Greek philosophy had been blended with Judaism. The Septuagint translation framed at Alexandria, had formed a connecting link between the latter and the former; and it is remarkable that all the quotations from the Old Testament, excepting two (ch. 10. 30; 12. 8), are taken from the LXX. The fact that the peculiarities of the LXX. are interwoven into the argument, prove that the Greek epistle is an original, not a translation; had the original been Hebrew, the quotations would have been from the Hebrew Old Testament. The same conclusion follows from the plays on similarly-sounding words in the Greek, and alliterations, and rhythmically-constructed periods. Celsus observes, if the epistle had been written in Hebrew, ch. 9. 15-17, would lose all its point, which consists in the play upon the double meaning of the Greek diathere, a "covenant," or a "testament;" whereas the Hebrew berith means only "covenant."

Internal evidence favours the Pauline authorship. Thus the topic so fully handled in this epistle, that Christianity is superior to Judaism, inasmuch as the reality exceeds the type which gives place to it, is a favourite one with St. Paul (cf. 2 Corinthians, 3. 6-18; Galatians, 3. 23-26; 4. 1-9, 21-31, wherein the allegorical mode of interpretation appears in its divinely-sanctioned application, a mode pushed to an unwarrantable excess in the Alexandrian school). So the Divine Son appears in ch. 1. 3, &c., as in other epistles of Paul (Philippians, 2. 6; Colossians, 1. 25-26), as the Image, or manifestation of the Deity. His lowering of Himself for man's sake similarly, cf. ch. 2. 9, with 2 Corinthians, 8. 9; Philippians, 2. 7, 8. Also his final exaltation, cf. ch. 2. 8; 10. 13; 12. 2, with 1 Corinthians, 15. 26-27. The word "Mediator" is peculiar to Paul alone, cf. ch. 8. 6, with Galatians, 3. 19, 20. Christ's death is represented as the sacrifice for sin prefigured by the Jewish sacrifices, cf. Romans, 3. 25-26; 1 Corinthians, 5. 7, with Hebrews, 7.—10. The phrase, "God of Peace," is peculiar to St. Paul, cf. ch. 12. 30; Romans, 15. 33; 1 Thessalonians, 5. 23. Also, cf. ch. 2. 4, Margis, 1 Corinthians, 12. 4. Justification, or "righteousness by faith," appears in ch. 11. 7; 10. 38, as in Romans, 1. 17; 4. 23; 5. 1; Galatians, 3. 11; Philippians, 3. 9. The word of God is the "sword of the Spirit," cf. ch. 4. 12, with Ephesians, 6. 17. Inexperienced Christians are children needing milk, i.e., instruction in the elements, whereas riper Christians, as full grown men, require strong meat, cf. ch. 5. 12, 13; 6. 1, with 1 Corinthians, 3. 1, 2; 14. 20; Galatians, 4. 9; Colossians, 2. 14. Salvation is represented as a boldness of access to God by Christ, cf. ch. 10. 19, with Romans, 5. 3; Ephesians, 3. 12; 3. 12. Afflictions are a fight, ch. 10. 23; cf. Philippians, 1. 30; Colossians, 2. 1. The Christian life is a race, ch. 12. 1; cf. 1 Corinthians, 9. 24; Philippians, 3. 12-14. The Jewish ritual is a service, Romans, 9. 4; cf. ch. 9. 1, 6. Cf. "subject to bondage," ch. 2. 15, with Galatians, 5. 1. Other characteristics of Paul's style appear in this epistle, viz., a propensity "to go off at a word" and enter on a long parenthesis suggested by that word, a fondness for play upon words of similar sound, and a disposition to repeat some favourite word. Frequent appeals to the Old Testament, and quotations linked by "and again," cf. ch. 1. 5; 2. 12, 13, with Romans, 15. 9-12. Also quotations in a peculiar application, cf. ch. 2. 8, with 1 Corinthians, 15. 27; Ephesians, 1. 22. Also the same passage quoted in a form not agreeing with the LXX., and with the addition "saith the Lord," not found in the Hebrew, in ch. 10. 30; Romans, 12. 19.

The supposed Alexandrian (which are rather Philon-like) characteristics of the epistle are probably due to the fact that the Hebrews were generally then imbued with the Alexandrian modes of thought of Philo, &c.; and Paul, without colouring or altering gospel truth "to the Jews, became (in style) as a Jew, that he might win the Jews" (1 Corinthians, 9. 20). This will account for its being recognised as St. Paul's epistle in the Alexandrian and Jerusalem churches unanimously, to the Hebrews of whom probably it was addressed. Not one Greek father ascribes the epistle to any but Paul, whereas in the Western and Latin churches, which it did not reach for some time, it was for long doubted, owing to its anonymous form, and generally less distinctively Pauline style. Their reason for not accepting it as Paul's, or indeed as canonical, for the first three centuries was negative, insufficient evidence for it, not positive evidence against it. The positive evidence is generally for its Pauline origin. In the Latin churches, owing to their distance from the churches to whom belonged the Hebrews addressed, there was no generally received tradition on the subject. The epistle was in fact but little known at all, whence we find it not mentioned at all in the canon of Muratorii. When at last, in the fourth century, the Latins found that it was received as Pauline and canonical on good grounds in the Greek churches, they universally acknowledged it as such.

The personal notices all favour its Pauline authorship, viz., his intention to visit those addressed, shortly, along with Timothy, styled "our brother," ch. 12. 18; his being then in prison, ch. 13. 19; his formerly having been imprisoned in Palestine, according to English Version reading, ch. 10. 34; the salutation transmitted to them from believers of Italy, ch. 13. 24. A reason for not prefixing the name may be the rhetorical character of the epistle which led the author to waive the usual form of epistolary address.

DESIGN.—His aim is to show the superiority of Christianity over Judaism, in that it was introduced by one far higher than the angels or Moses, through whom the Jews received the law, and in that its priesthood and sacrifices are far less perfecting as to salvation than those of Christ; that He is the substance of which the former are but the shadow, and that the type necessarily gives place to the antitype; and that now we no longer are kept at a comparative distance as under the law, but have freedom of access through the opened veil, i.e. Christ's flesh; hence he warns them of the danger of apostasy, to which Jewish converts were tempted, when they saw Christians persecuted, whilst Judaism was tolerated by the Roman authorities. He infers the obligation to a life of faith, of which, even in the less perfect Old Testament dispensation, the Jewish history contained bright examples. He concludes in the usual Pauline mode, with practical exhortations and pious prayers for them.

HIS MODE OF ADDRESS is in it hortatory rather than commanding, just as we might have expected from St. Paul addressing the Jews. He does not write to the rulers of the Jewish Christians, for in fact there was no exclusively Jewish church; and his epistle, though primarily addressed to the Palestinian Jews, was intended to include the Hebrews of all adjoining churches. He inculcates obedience and respect in relation to their rulers (ch. 13. 7, 17, 24): a tacit obviating of the objection that he was by writing this epistle interfering with the prerogative of Peter the apostle of the circumcision, and James the bishop of Jerusalem. Hence arises his gentle and delicate mode of dealing with them (Hebrews, 13. 25). So far from being surprised at discrepancy of style between an epistle to Hebrews, and epistles to Gentile Christians, it is just what we should expect. The Holy Spirit guided him to choose means best suited to the nature of the ends aimed at. Wordsworth notices a peculiar Pauline Greek construction, Romans, 12. 9, lit., "Let your love be without dissimulation, ye abhorring... evil, cleaving to... good," which is found nowhere else save Hebrews, 12. 5, lit., "Let your conversation be without covetousness, ye being content with," (an a noun singular feminine nominative absolute, suddenly passing into a participle masculine nominative plural absolute). So in quoting Old Testament Scripture, the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews quotes it as a Jew writing to Jews would, "God speaks to our fathers," not "it is written." So ch. 13. 16, "We trust we have a good conscience" is an altogether Pauline sentiment (Acts, 23. 1; 24. 16; 2 Corinthians, 1. 12; 4. 2; 2 Timothy, 1. 3). Though he has not prefixed his name, he has given at the close his universal token to identify him, viz., his apostolic salutation, "Grace be with you all;" this "salutation with his own hand" he declared (2 Thessalonians, 3. 17, 18) to be his "token in every epistle;" so 1 Corinthians, 16. 21, 23; Colossians, 4. 18. The same prayer of greeting closes every one of his epistles, and is not found in any one of the epistles of the other apostles written in St. Paul's lifetime; but it is found in the last book of the New Testament Revelation, and subsequently in the epistle of Clement of Rome. This proves that, by whomsoever the body of the epistle was committed to writing (whether a mere amanuensis writing by dictation, or a companion of Paul by the Spirit's gift of interpreting tongues, 1 Corinthians, 12. 10, transcribing Paul's Spirit-taught sentiments into his own Spirit-guided diction), Paul at the close sets his seal to the whole as really his, and sanctioned by him as such. The churches of the East, and Jerusalem, their centre, to which quarter it was first sent, received it as St. Paul's from the earliest times according to Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem (A.D. 349). Jerome, though bringing with him from Rome the prejudices of the Latins against the epistle to the Hebrews, aggravated, doubtless, by its seeming sanction of the Novatian heresy (ch. 6. 4-6), was constrained by the force of facts to receive it as Paul's, on the almost unanimous testimony of all Greek Christians from the earliest times; and was probably the main instrument in correcting the past error of Rome in rejecting it. The testimony of the Alexandrian church is peculiarly valuable, for it was founded by Mark, who was with Paul at Rome in his first confinement, when this epistle seems to have been written (Colossians, 4. 10), and who possibly was the bearer of this epistle, at the same time visiting Colosse on the way to Jerusalem (where Mark's mother lived), and thence to Alexandria. Moreover, 2 Peter, 3. 15, 16, written shortly before Peter's death, and like his first epistle written by him, "the apostle of the circumcision," to the Hebrew Christians dispersed in the East, saith, "As our beloved brother Paul hath written unto you," i.e. to the Hebrews; also the words added, "As also in all his epistles," distinguish the epistle to the Hebrews from the rest: then he further speaks of it as on a level with "other Scriptures," thus asserting at once its Pauline authorship and Divine inspiration. An interesting illustration of the power of Christian faith and love, St. Peter, who had been openly rebuked by Paul (Galatians, 2. 7-14), fully adopted what St. Paul wrote there was no difference in the gospel of the apostle of the circumcision and that of the apostle of the uncircumcision. It strikingly shows God's sovereignty that He chose as the instrument to confirm the Hebrews, Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles; and on the other hand, Peter to open the gospel door to the Gentiles (Acts, 10. 1, &c.), though being the apostle of the Jews; thus perfect unity reigns amidst the diversity of agencies.

Rome, in the person of Clement of Rome, originally received this epistle. Then followed a period in which it ceased to be received by the Roman churches. Then, in the fourth century, Rome retracted her error. A plain proof she is not unchangeable or infallible. As far as Rome is concerned, the epistle to the Hebrews was not only lost for three centuries, but never would have been recovered at all but for the Eastern churches; it is therefore a happy thing for Christendom that Rome is not the Catholic church.

It plainly was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, which would have been mentioned in the epistle had the event gone before, cf. ch. 13. 10; and probably to churches in which the Jewish members were the more numerous, as those in Judea, and perhaps Alexandria. In the latter city were the greatest number of resident Jews next to Jerusalem. In Leontopolis, in Egypt, was another temple, with the arrangements of which, Wieseler thinks the notices in this epistle may nearly corresponded than with those in Jerusalem. It was from Alexandria that the epistle appears first to have come to the knowledge of Christendom. Moreover, "the epistle to the Alexandrians," mentioned in the Canon of Muratorius, may possibly be this epistle to the Hebrews. He addresses the Jews as peculiarly "the people of God" (ch. 2. 17; 4. 9; 12. 18 "the seed of Abraham," i.e., as the primary stock on which Gentile believers are grafted, to which Romans, 11. 16-21 responds; but he urges them to come out of the carnal earthly Jerusalem and to realize their spiritual union to "the heavenly Jerusalem" (ch. 12. 18-23; 13. 13).

The use of Greek rather than Hebrew is doubtless due to the epistle being intended, not merely for the Hebrew, but for the Hellenistic Jew converts, not only in Palestine, but elsewhere: a view confirmed by the use of the LXX. Espe thinks, probably (cf. 2 Peter, 3. 15, 16, explained above), the Jews primarily, though not exclusively, addressed, were those who had left Jerusalem on account of the war and were settled in Asia Minor.

The notion of its having been originally in Hebrew arose probably from its Hebrew tone, method, and topics. It is reckoned among the epistles, not at first generally acknowledged, along with James, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, and Revelation. A beautiful link exists between these epistles and the universally-acknowledged epistles. Hebrews unites the ordinances of Leviticus with their antitypical gospel fulfilment. St. James is the link between the highest doctrines of Christianity and the universal law of moral duty—a commentary on the sermon on the mount—harmonizing the decalogue law of Moses and the revelation to Job and Elias, with the Christian law of liberty. Second Peter links the teaching of Peter with that of Paul. Jude links the earliest unwritten to the latest written Revelation. The two shorter epistles to John, lit. Philemon, apply Christianity to the minute details of the Christian life, showing that Christianity can sanctify all earthly missions.

CHAPTER I.

VER. 1-14. THE HIGHEST OF ALL REVELATIONS IS GIVEN US NOW IN THE SON OF GOD, WHO IS GREATER THAN THE ANGELS, AND WHO, HAVING COMPLETED REDEMPTION, SITS ESTABLISHED AT GOD'S RIGHT HAND. The writer, though not inscribing his name, was well known to those addressed (ch. 13. 19). For proofs of Paul being the author, see my Introduction. In the Pauline method, the statement of subject and the division are put before the discussion; and at the close, the practical follows the doctrinal portion. The ardour of spirit in this epistle, as in 1 John, bursting forth at once into the subject (without prefatory inscription of name and greeting), the more effectively strikes the hearers. The date must have been whilst the temple was yet standing, before its destruction, 70 A. D.: some time before the martyrdom of Peter, who mentions this epistle of Paul (2 Peter, 3. 15, 16): at a time when many of the first hearers of the Lord were dead. 1. at sundry times—Greek, "in many portions." All was not revealed to each one prophet; but one received one portion of revelation, and another another. To Noah the quarter of the world to which Messiah should belong was revealed; to Abraham, the nation; to Jacob, the tribe; to David and Isaiah, the family; to Micah, the town of nativity; to Daniel, the exact time; to Malachi, the coming of His forerunner, and His second advent; through Jonah, his burial and resurrection; through Isaiah and Hosea, His resurrection. Each only knew in part: but when that which was perfect came in Messiah, that which was in part was done away (1 Corinthians, 13. 12). In divers manners—e.g., internal suggestion, audible voices, the Urim and Thummim, dreams, and visions. "In one way He was seen by Abraham, in another by Moses, in another by Elias, and in another by Micah; Isaiah, Daniel, and Ezekiel, beheld different forms" (THEODORET) (cf. Numbers, 12. 6-8). The Old Testament revelations were fragmentary in substance, and manifold in form: the very multitude of prophets shows that they prophesied only in part. In Christ the revelation of God is full, not in shifting hues of separated colour, but Himself the pure light, uniting in His one person the whole spectrum (e. 3). spake—the expression usual for a Jew to employ in addressing Jews. So St. Matthew, a Jew writing especially for Jews, quotes Scripture, not by the formula, "It is written," but "said," &c. in time past.—From Malachi, the last of the Old Testament prophets, for four hundred years, there had arisen no prophet, in order that the Son might be the more an object of expectation. [BENGL.] As God (the Father) is introduced as having spoken here: so God the Son, ch. 2. 3: God the Holy Ghost, ch. 3. 7. the fathers—the Jewish fathers. The Jews of former days (1 Corinthians, 10. 1). by—Greek, "in." A mortal king speaks by his ambassador, not (as the King of kings) in his ambassador. The Son is the last and highest manifestation of God (Matthew, 21. 34, 37): not merely a measure, as in the prophecies, but the fulness of the Spirit of God dwelling in him bodily (John, 1. 16; 3. 34; Colossians, 2. 9. Thus he answers the Jewish objection drawn from their prophets. Jesus is the end of all prophecy (Revelation, 19. 10), and of the law of Moses (John, 1. 17: 5. 46). 2. in these last days.—In the oldest MSS. the Greek is, "At the last part of these days." The Rabbins divided the whole of time into "this age," or "world," and "the age to come" (ch. 2. 6; 8. 6). The days of Messiah were the transition period, or "last part of these days" (in contrast to "in time past"), the close of the existing dispensation, and beginning of the final dispensation of which Christ's second coming shall be the crowning consummation, by His Son—Greek, "in (His) Son" (John, 14. 10). The true "Prophet" of God. "His majesty is set forth, [1.] Absolutely by the very name 'son,' and by three glorious predicates, Whom He hath

appointed," By whom He made the worlds, "Who sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high": thus His course is described from the beginning of all things till he reached the goal (v. 2, 3). (2.) Relatively, in comparison with the angels, v. 4: the confirmation of this follows, and the very name 'Son' is proved at v. 5; the 'heirship,' v. 6-9; the 'making the worlds,' v. 10-12; the 'sitting at the right hand' of God, v. 13, 14. "His being made heir follows His sonship, and preceded His making the worlds" (Proverbs, 8. 22, 23; Ephesians, 3. 11). As the first begotten, He is heir of the universe (v. 6), which He made instrumentally, ch. 11. 3, where "by the Word of God" answers to "by whom" (the Son of God) here (John, 1. 3). Christ was "appointed" (in God's eternal counsel) to creation as an office; and the universe so created was assigned to Him as a kingdom. He is "heir of all things" by right of creation, and especially by right of redemption. The promise to Abraham that he should be heir of the world, had its fulfilment, and will have it still more fully, in Christ (Romans, 4. 13; Galatians, 3. 16; 4. 7). worlds—the inferior and the superior worlds (Colossians, 1. 16). Lit., ages with all things and persons belonging to them: the universe, including all space and ages of time, and all material and spiritual existences. The Greek implies, He not only appointed His Son heir of all things before creation, but He also (better than "also He") made by Him the worlds. 3. Who being—by pre-existent and essential being, brightness of his glory—Greek, the εὐφροσύνη of His glory. "Light of (from) light." [NICENE Creed.] "Who is so senseless as to doubt concerning the eternal being of the Son? For when has one seen light without effulgence?" [ATHANASIUS against ARIUS, Orat. 2.] "The sun is never seen without effulgence, nor the Father without the Son." [THEOPHYLACT.] It is because He is the brightness, &c., and because He upholds, &c., that He sat down on the right hand, &c. It was a return to His Divine glory (John, 6. 62; 17. 5; cf. Wisd. 7. 25, 26, where similar things are said of wisdom). express image—"impress." But veiled in the flesh.

"The Son of God in glory beams Too bright for us to scan;

But we can face the light that streams

From the mild Son of man." (1 Cor. 3. 18) of his person—Greek, "of His substantial essence;" hypostasis, upholding all things—Greek, "the universe." (cf. Colossians, 1. 16, 17, 20, which enumerates the three facts in the same order as here, by the word—Therefore the Son of God is a Person; for He has the word, [BENGL.] His word is God's word (ch. 11. 3). of his power—"The word" is the utterance which comes from His (the Son's) power, and gives expression to it, by himself—Omitted in the oldest MSS. purged—Greek, "made purification of . . . sin," viz., in His atonement, which graciously covers the guilt of sin. "Our" is omitted in the oldest MSS. Sin was the great uncleanness in God's sight, of which He has effected the purification by His sacrifice. [ALFOULD.] Our nature, as guilt-laden, could not, without our great High Priest's blood of atonement sprinkling; the heavenly mercy seat, come into immediate contact with God. ENRARD says, "The mediation between man and God, who was present in the Most Holy Place, was revealed in three forms: (1.) In sacrifices (typical propitiations for guilt); (2.) in the priesthood (the agents of those sacrifices); (3.) in the Levitical laws of purity [Levitical purity being attained by sacrifice positively, by avoidance of Levitical pollution negatively, the people being thus enabled to come into the presence of God without dying, Deuteronomy, 5. 26] [Leviticus, 16.], sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high—fulfilling Psalm 110. 1. This sitting of the Son at God's right hand was by the act of the Father (ch. 8. 1; Ephesians, 1. 20): it is never used of His 1st existing state, equal with the Father, but always of His exalted state as Son of man after His sufferings, and as Mediator for man in the presence of God (Romans, 8, 34); a relation towards God and us about to come to an end when His object has been accomplished (1 Corinthians, 13, 28). 4. Being made... better — by His exaltation by the Father (cf. 3, 13): in contrast to His being "made lower than the angels" (ch. 2, 9). "Better," i.e., superior to. As "being" (ch. 3) expresses His essential being: so "being made" (ch. 2, 28) marks what He became in His assumed manhood (Philippians, 2, 6-9). Paul shows that His humbled form (at which the Jews might stumble) is no objection to His Divine Messiahship. As the law was given by the ministrations of angels and Moses, it was inferior to the gospel given by the Divine Son, who both is (cf. 4-10) as God, and has been made, as the exalted Son of man (ch. 2, 6-15), much better than the angels. The manifestations of God by angels (and even by the angel of the covenant) at different times in the Old Testament, did not bring man and God into personal union, as the manifestation of God in human flesh does, by inheritances obtained—He always had the thing itself, viz., Sonship; but He "obtained by inheritance," according to the promise of the Father, the name "Son," whereby He is made known to men and angels. He is "the Son of God" in a sense far exalted above that in which angels are called "sons of God" (Job, 1, 6; 38, 7). "The fulness of the glory of the peculiar name 'the Son of God,' is unattainable by human speech or thought. All appellations are but fragments of its glory—beams united in it as in a central sun. Revelation, 19, 12. A name that no man knew but He Himself." 5. For—Substantiating His having "obtained a more excellent name than the angels," unto which—A frequent argument in this epistle is derived from the silence of Scripture (e. 13, ch. 2, 16; 7, 3, 14). [HEBREW.] this day have I begotten thee—(Psalm 2, 7). Fulfilled at the resurrection of Jesus, whereby the Father "declared," i.e., made manifest His Divine Sonship, heretofore veiled by His humiliation (Acts, 13, 33; Romans, 1, 4). Christ has a fourfold right to the title "Son of God": (1.) By generation, as begotten of God; (2.) by commission, as sent by God; (3.) by resurrection, as "the first-begotten of the dead" (cf. Luke, 20, 36; Romans, 1, 4; Revelation, 1, 5); (4.) by actual possession, as heir of all. [BISHOP PARSON.] The Psalm here quoted applied primarily in a less full sense to Solomon, of whom God promised by Nathan to David, "I will be his Father, and he shall be my son." But as the whole theocracy was of Messianic import, the triumph of David over Hadadezer and neighbouring kings (2 Samuel, 8; Psalm 2, 2, 3, 9-12) is a type of God's ultimately subduing all enemies under His Son, whom He sets (Hebrew, anointed, Psalm 2, 6) on His "holy hill of Zion," as King of the Jews and of the whole earth, the antitype to Solomon, son of David. The "I" in Greek is emphatic; I the Everlasting Father have begotten thee this day, i.e., on this day, the day of thy being manifested as My Son, "the first-begotten of the dead" (Colossians, 1, 18; Revelation, 1, 5), when thou hadst ransomed and opened heaven to thy people. He had been always Son, but now first was manifested as such in His once humbled, now exalted manhood united to His Godhead. ALFORD refers "this day" to the eternal generation of the Son: The day in which the Son was begotten by the Father in an everlasting today: there never was a yesterday or past time to Him, nor a to-morrow or future time: "Nothing there is to come, and nothing past, but an eternal now doth ever last" (Proverbs, 30, 4; John, 10, 30, 38; 16, 25; 17, 8). The communication of the Divine essence in its fullness, involves eternal generation; for the Divine essence has no beginning. But the context refers to a definite point of time, viz., that of His having entered on the inheritance (v. 4). The "bringing the first-begotten into the world" (v. 6), is not subsequent, as ALFORD thinks, to v. 5, but anterior to it (cf. Acts, 2, 50-55). 6. And—Greek, "But." Not only this proves His superiority, BUT a more decisive proof is Psalm 97, 7, which shows that not only at His resurrection, but also in prospect of His being brought into the world (cf. ch. 9, 11; 10, 9) as man, in His incarnation, nativity (Luke, 2, 9-14), temptation (Matthew, 4, 10, 11), resurrection (Matthew, 28, 2), and future second advent in glory, angels were designed by God to be subject to Him. Cf. 1 Timothy, 3, 16, "Seen of angels." God manifesting Messiah as one to be gazed at with adoring love by heavenly intelligences (Ephesians, 3, 10; 2 Thessalonians, 1, 9, 10; 1 Peter, 3, 22). The fullest realization of His Lordship shall be at His second coming (Psalm 97, 7; 1 Corinthians, 15, 24, 25; Philippians, 2, 9). "Worship Him all ye gods" ("gods," i.e., exalted beings, as angels), refers to God; but it was universally admitted among the Hebrews that God would dwell, in a peculiar sense, in Messiah (so as to be in the Talmud phrase, "capable of being pointed to with the finger"); and so what was said of God was true of, and to be fulfilled in, Messiah. KIMCHI says that Psalms 95-101, contain in them the mystery of Messiah. God ruled the theocracy in and through Him, the world—subject to Christ (ch. 2, 4). As "the first-begotten" He has the rights of primogeniture (Romans, 8, 29; Colossians, 1, 16, 18, 15). In Deuteronomy, 32, 43, the LXX. have, "Let all the angels of God worship Him," words not now found in the Hebrew. This passage of the LXX. may have been in Paul's mind as to the form, but the substance is taken from Psalm 97, 7. The type David, in the Psalm 97, 7 (quoted in v. 6), is called "God's first-born, higher than the kings of the earth," so the antitypical first-begotten, the Son of David, is to be worshipped by all inferior lords, as angels "gods." Psalm 97, 7; for He is "King of kings and Lord of lords" (Revelation, 19, 16). In the Greek, "again" is transposed; but this does not oblige us, as ALFORD thinks, to translate, "When He again shall have introduced," &c., viz., at Christ's second coming; for there is no previous mention of a first bringing in; and "again" is often used in quotations, not to be joined with the verb, but parenthetically ("that I may again quote Scripture"). English Version is correct (cf. Matthew, 6, 23; Greek, John, 12, 39). 7. of—The Greek is rather, "In reference to the angels," spirits—or "winds." Who employeth His angels as the winds, His ministers as the lightnings; or, He taketh His angelic ministers the directing powers of winds and flames, when these latter are required to perform His will. "Commissions them to assume the agency or form of flames for His purposes." [ALFORD.] English Version, "Maketh His angels spirits," means, He maketh them of a subtle, incorporeal nature, swift as the wind. So Psalm 18, 10, "A cherub...the wings of the wind." Verse 14, "ministering spirits," favours English Version here. As "spirits" implies the wind-like velocity and subtle nature of the Cherubim, so "flame of fire" expresses the burning devotion and intense all-consuming zeal of the adoring Seraphim (meaning "burning"), Isaiah, 6, 1. The translation, "Maketh winds His messengers, and a flame of fire His ministers," is plainly wrong. In the Psalm 104, 3, 4, the subject in each clause comes first, and the attribute predicated of it second; so the Greek article here marks "angels" and "ministers" as the subjects, and "winds" and "flame of fire," predicates. Schemoth Rabba says, "God is called God of Zebaoth (the heavenly hosts), because He does what he pleases with his angels. When He pleases, He makes them to sit (Judges, 6, 11); at other times to stand (Isaiah, 6, 2); at times to resemble women (Zechariah, 5, 9); at other times to resemble men (Genesis, 18, 2); at times He makes them 'spirits'; at times, fire." "Maketh" implies that, however exalted, they are but creatures.

whereas the Son is the Creator (v. 10; not begotten from everlasting, nor to be worshipped, as the Son (Revelation, 14. 7; 22. 8, 9). 8. O God—The Greek has the article to mark emphasis (Psalm 45. 6, 7), for ever—righteousness—Everlasting duration and righteousness go together (Psalm 45. 2; 89. 14), a sceptre of righteousness—lit., "a rod of rectitude," or "straight-forwardness." The oldest MSS. prefix "and" (cf. Esther, 4. 11). 9. iniquity—"unrighteousness." Some oldest MSS. read, "Lawlessness," therefore—because God loves righteousness and hates iniquity. God... thy God—JEROME, AUGUSTINE, &c., translate, Psalm 45. 7, "O God, thy God, hath anointed thee," whereby Christ is addressed as God. This is probably the true translation of the Hebrew there, and also of the Greek of Hebrews here; for it is likely the Son is addressed "O God," as in v. 8. The anointing here meant is not that at His baptism, when He solemnly entered on His ministry for us; but that with the "oil of gladness," or "exalting joy" (which denotes a triumph, and follows as the consequence of His manifested love of righteousness and hatred of iniquity), wherewith, after His triumphant completion of His work, He has been anointed by the Father above His fellows (not only above us, His fellowmen, the adopted members of God's family, whom "He is not ashamed to call His brethren," but above the angels, fellow-partakers in part with Him, though infinitely His inferiors, in the glories, holiness, and joys of heaven; "sons of God," and angel—"messengers," though subordinate to the Divine Angel—"Messenger of the covenant"). Thus He is antitype to Solomon, "chosen of all David's many sons to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord over Israel," even as his father David was chosen before all the house of his father's sons. The image is drawn from the custom of anointing guests at feasts (Psalm 23. 5); or rather of anointing kings: not until His ascension did He assume the kingdom as Son of man. A fuller accomplishment is yet to be, when He shall be VISIBLY the anointed King over the whole earth (set by the Father) on His holy hill of Zion, Psalm 2. 6, 8. So David, His type, was first anointed at Bethlehem (1 Samuel, 16. 13; Psalm 89. 20); and yet again at Hebron, first over Judah (2 Samuel, 2. 4), then over all Israel (2 Samuel, 6. 3); not till the death of Saul did he enter on his actual kingdom, as it was not till after Christ's death that the Father set Him at His right hand far above all principally (Ephesians, 1. 20, 21). The 45th Psalm in its first meaning was addressed to Solomon; but the Holy Spirit inspired the writer to use language, which in its fulness can only apply to the antitypical Solomon, the true Royal Head of the theocracy. 10. And—In another passage (Psalm, 102. 25-27) He says, in the beginning—English Version, Psalm 102. 25, "of old." Hebrew, "before," "aforetime." LXX., "in the beginning" (as in Genesis, 1. 1) answers by contrast to the end implied in "they shall perish," &c. The Greek order here (not in the LXX) is, "Thou in the beginning, O Lord," which throws the "Lord" into emphasis. "Christ is preached even in passages where many might contend that the Father was principally intended." [BANKS.] laid the foundation of—"firmly founded" is included in the idea of the Greek, heavens—plural; not merely one, but manifold, and including various orders of heavenly intelligences (Ephesians, 4. 10), works of thine hands—the heavens, as a woven veil or curtain spread out. 11. They—The earth and the heavens in their present state and form "shall perish" (ch. 12. 26, 27; 3 Peter, 3. 13). "Perish" does not mean annihilation; just as it did not mean so in the case of "the world" that, being overflowed with water, perished" under Noah (3 Peter, 3. 6). The covenant of the possession of the earth was renewed with Noah and his seed on the renovated earth. So it shall be after the perishing, by fire (2 Peter 3. 12, 13), remains—through

(so the Greek) all changes, as... a garment—(Isaiah, 61. 6) 12. vesture—Greek, "an enveloping cloak," said them up—So the LXX., Psalm 102. 26; but the Hebrew, "changes them." The Spirit, by Paul, treats the Hebrew of the Old Testament, with independence of handling, presenting the Divine truth in various aspects: sometimes as here sanctioning the LXX. (cf. Isaiah, 34. 4; Revelation, 6. 14); sometimes the Hebrew; sometimes varying from both, changed—as one lays aside a garment to put on another, then art the same—(Isaiah, 66. 4; Malachi, 2. 6.) The same in nature, therefore in covenant faithfulness to thy people, shall not fail—Hebrew, "shall not end." Israel, in the Babylonian captivity, in Psalm 102., casts her hopes of deliverance on Messiah, the unchanging covenant-God of Israel. 13. Quotation from Psalm 110. 1. The image is taken from the custom of conquerors putting the feet on the necks of the conquered (Joshua, 10. 24, 25). 14. ministering spirits—Referring to v. 7, "spirits... ministers." They are incorporeal spirits, as God is, but ministering to Him as inferiors, sent forth—present participle: "Being sent forth" continually, as their regular service in all ages, to minister—Greek, "unto (i.e., for) ministry," for them—Greek, "on account of them," &c. Angels are sent forth on ministrations to God and Christ, not primarily to men, though for the good of "those who are about to inherit salvation" (so the Greek): the elect, who believe, or shall believe, for whom all things, angels included, work together for good (Romans, 4. 28). Angels' ministrations are not properly rendered to men, since the latter have no power of commanding them, though their ministrations to God are often directed to the good of men. So the superiority of the Son of God to angels is shown. They "all," however various their ranks, minister: He is ministered to. They "stand" (Luke, 1. 19) before God, or are "sent forth" to execute the divine commands on behalf of them whom He pleases to save; He "sits on the right hand of the majesty on high" (v. 3, 13). He rules; they serve.

CHAPTER II.

VER. 1-18. DANGER OF NEGLECTING SO GREAT SALVATION, FIRST SPOKEN BY CHRIST; TO WHOM, NOT TO ANGELS, THE NEW DISPENSATION WAS SUBJECT; THOUGH HE WAS FOR A TIME HUMBLED BELOW THE ANGELS: THIS HUMILIATION TOOK PLACE BY DIVINE NECESSITY FOR OUR SALVATION. 1. Therefore—Because Christ the Mediator of the new covenant is so far (ch. 1.) above all angels, the mediators of the old covenant, the more earnest—Greek, "the more abundantly," heard—spoken by God ch. 1. 1; and by the Lord (v. 3), let them slip—lit., "flow past them" (ch. 4. 1). 2. (Cl. v. 3.) Argument a fortiori, spoken by angels—The Mosaic law spoken by the ministrations of angels (Deuteronomy, 33. 3; Psalm 68. 17; Acts, 7. 53; Galatians, 3. 19). When it is said, Exodus, 20. 1, "God spake," it is meant He spake by angels as His mouth-piece, or at least angels repeating in unison with His voice the words of the decalogue. Whereas the gospel was first spoken by the Lord alone, was steadfast—Greek, "was made steadfast," or "confirmed," was enforced by penalties on those violating it, transgression—by doing evil; lit., overstepping its bounds: a positive violation of it, disobedience—by neglecting to do good: a negative violation of it, recompense—(Deuteronomy, 32. 36, 3.) we—who have received the message of salvation so clearly delivered to us (cf. ch. 12. 25), so great salvation—embodied in Jesus, whose very name means salvation, including not only deliverance from foes and from death, and the grant of temporal blessings (which the law promised to the obedient), but also grace of the Spirit, forgiveness of sins, and the promise of heaven, glory, and eternal life (v. 10), which—"inasmuch as it is a salvation which began," &c. spoken by the Lord—as the instrument of proclaiming it. Not as

the law, spoken by the instrumentality of angels (v. 2). Both law and gospel came from God; the difference here referred to lay in the instrumentality by which each respectively was promulgated (cf. v. 6). Angels recognise Him as "the Lord" (Matthew, 28, 6; Luke, 2, 11). Confirmed unto us—not by penalties, as the law was confirmed, but by spiritual gifts (v. 4), by them that heard him—(cf. Luke, 1, 2.) Though Paul had a special and independent revelation of Christ (Galatians, 1, 16, 17, 19), yet he classes himself with those Jews whom he addresses, "unto us," for like them in many particulars (see, gr., the agony in Gethsemane, ch. 5, 7), he was dependent for apocryphal information on the twelve apostles. So the discourses of Jesus, et. gr., the sermon on the mount, and the first proclamation of the gospel kingdom by the Lord (Matthew, 4, 17), he could only know by the report of the twelve: so the saying, "It is more blessed to give, than to receive" (Acts, 20, 35). Paul mentions what they had heard, rather than what they had seen, conformably with what he began with, v. 1, 2, "Spoke...spoken." Appropriately also in his epistles to Gentiles, he dwells on his independent call to the apostleship of the Gentiles; in his epistle to the Hebrews, he appeals to the apostles who had been long with the Lord (cf. Acts, 1, 21; 10, 41); so in his sermon to the Jews in Antioch of Pisidia (Acts, 13, 31); and "he only appeals to the testimony of these apostles in a general way, in order that he may bring the Hebrews to the Lord alone" [BENGEL], not to become partizans of particular apostles, as Peter, the apostle of the circumcision, and James, the bishop of Jerusalem. This verse implies that the Hebrews of the churches of Palestine and Syria (or those of them dispersed in Asia Minor [BENGEL], 1 Peter, 1, 1, or in Alexandria) were primarily addressed in this epistle; for of none so well could it be said, the gospel was confirmed to them by the immediate hearers of the Lord: the past tense, "was confirmed," implies some little time had elapsed since this justification by eye-witnesses. 4. then—rather, "God also [as well as Christ, v. 3] bearing witness to it"..."joining in attestation of it," signs and wonders—performed by Christ and His apostles. "Signs" are miracles, or other facts regarded as proof of a divine mission; "wonders" are miracles viewed as prodigies, causing astonishment (Acts, 2, 22, 33); powers are miracles viewed as evidences of superhuman power; divers miracles—Greek, "varied (miraculous) powers" (2 Corinthians, 12, 12) granted to the apostles after the ascension, gifts, &c.—Greek, "distributions." The gift of the Holy Spirit was given to Christ without measure (John, 3, 34), but to us it is distributed in various measures and operations (Romans, 12, 3, 6, &c.; 1 Corinthians, 12, 4-11), according to his own will—God's free and sovereign will, assigning one gift of the Spirit to one, another to another (Acts, 5, 33; Ephesians, 1, 6). 5. For—Confirming the assertion, v. 2, 3, that the new covenant was spoken by One higher than the mediators of the old covenant, viz., angels. Translate in the Greek order, to bring out the proper emphasis, "Not the angels hath He," &c. the world to come—Implying, He has subjected to angels the existing world, the Old Testament dispensation (then still partly existing as to its frame-work), v. 2, the political kingdoms of the earth (Daniel, 4, 13; 10, 13, 20, 21; 12, 1), and the natural elements (Revelation, 9, 11; 16, 4), and even individuals (Matthew, 18, 10). "The world to come" is the new dispensation brought in by Christ, beginning in grace here, to be completed in glory hereafter. It is called "to come," or "about to be," as at the time of its being subjected to Christ by the Divine decree, it was as yet a thing of the future, and is still so to us, in respect to its full consummation. In respect to the subjecting to Christ in fulfilment of Psalm 8, the reality "to come." Regarded from the Old standpoint, which looks prophetically forward to the New Testament (and the Jewish priesthood and Old Testament ritual were in force then when Paul wrote, and continued till their forcible abrogation by the destruction of Jerusalem), it is "the world to come;" Paul, as addressing Jews, appropriately calls it so, according to their conventional way of viewing it. We, like them, still pray, "Thy kingdom come;" for its manifestation in glory is yet future. "This world" is used in contrast to express the present fallen condition of the world (Ephesians, 2, 2). Believers belong not to this present world-course, but by faith rise in spirit to "the world to come," making it a present, though internal, reality. Still, in the present world, natural and social, angels are mediately rulers under God in some sense: not so in the coming world: man in it, and the Son of man, man's Head, are to be supreme. Hence greater reverence was paid to angels by men in the Old Testament, than is permitted in the New Testament. For man's nature is exalted in Christ now, so that angels are our "fellow-servants" (Revelation, 22, 9). In their ministrations they stand on a different footing from that on which they stood towards us in the Old Testament. We are "brethren" of Christ in a nearness not enjoyed even by angels (v. 10-12, 16). 6. But—It is not to angels the gospel kingdom is subject, BUT, &c. one... testified—The usual way of quoting Scripture to readers familiar with it. Psalm 8, 6-7, praises Jehovah for exalting MAN, so as to subject all the works of God on earth to him: this dignity having been lost by the first Adam, is realized only in Christ the Son of man, the Representative Man and Head of our redeemed race. Thus Paul proves that it is MAN, not to angels, that God has subjected "the world to come." In v. 6-8, MAN is spoken of in general ("him...him...his"); then at v. 9, first JESUS is introduced as fulfilling, as man, all the conditions of the prophecy, and through death passing Himself, and so consequently bringing us men, His "brethren," to "glory and honour." What—How insignificant in Himself, yet how exalted by God's grace! (cf. Psalm 144, 3) The Hebrew, Enoch and Ben-Adam, express man and Son of man in his weakness: "Son of man" is here used of any and every child of man: unlike, seemingly, the Lord of creation, such as he was originally (Genesis, 1, and 2), and such as he is designed to be (Psalm 8), and such as he actually is by title, and shall hereafter more fully be in the person of, and in union with, Jesus, presently the Son of man (v. 9). *art mindful—*as of one absent, viesteet—lookest after him, as one present. 7. a little—Not as BENGEL, "a little time," thus the angels—Hebrew, "than God," Elohim, i.e., the abstract qualities of God, such as angels possess in an inferior form, viz., heavenly, spiritual, incorporeal nature. Man, in his original creation, was set next beneath them. So the man Jesus, though Lord of angels, who He emptied Himself of the externals of His Divinity (Note, Philipians, 2, 6, 7), was in His human nature "a little lower than the angels;" though this is not the primary reference here, but man in general, crowned him with glory and honour—as the appointed kingly viceregent of God over this earth (Genesis, 1, and 2), and did set him over the works of thy hands—Omitted in some of the oldest MSS.; but read by others, and by oldest versions: so Psalm 8, 6, "Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands." 8. [1 Corinthians, 15, 27]. For in that—i.e., "For in that" God with in the 8th Psalm, "He put the all things (so the Greek, the all things just mentioned) in subjection under him (man), He left nothing," &c. is no limitation occurs in the sacred writing, the "all things" must include heavenly, as well as earthly things (cf. 1 Corinthians, 3, 21, 22). But now—as things now are, we see not yet the all things put under man. 9. But—We see not man as yet exercising lordship over all things, "but rather, Him who was made a little lower than the angels (cf. Luke, 21. 26), we behold (by faith): a different Greek verb from that for 'we see,' v. 3, which expresses the impression which our eyes passively receive from objects around us; whereas, 'we behold,' or 'look at,' implies the direction and intention of one deliberately regarding something which he tries to see; so ch. 3. 10; 10. 26, Greek, vis., Jesus, on account of His suffering of death, crowned." &c. He is already so crowned, though unseen by us, save by faith; hereafter all things shall be subjected to Him visibly and fully. The ground of His exaltation is "on account of His having suffered death" (v. 10; Philippians, 2. 8, 9), that he by the grace of God—(Titus, 2. 11; 3. 4.) The reading of ORIGEN, "That He without God" (laying aside His Divinity; or, for every being sees God; or perhaps alluding to His having been temporarily "forsaken," as the sin-bearer, by the Father on the cross), is not supported by the MSS. The "that" &c. is connected with "crowned with glory," &c., thus: His exaltation after suffering is the perfecting or consummation of His work (v. 10) for us; without it His death would have been ineffectual; with it, and from it, flows the result that His tasting of death is available for (in behalf of, for the good of) every man. He is crowned as the Head in heaven of our common humanity, presenting His blood as the all-prevailing plea for us. This coronation above makes His death applicable for every individual man (observe the singular: not merely "for all men"), ch. 4. 14; 9. 24; 1 John, 2. 2. "Taste death," implies His personal experimental undergoing of death: death of the body, and death (spiritually) of the soul, in His being forsaken of the Father. "As a physician first tastes his medicines to encourage his sick patient to take them, so Christ, when all men feared death, in order to persuade them to be bold in meeting it, tasted it Himself, though He had no need" (CHRYSOSTOM) (v. 14, 15). 10. For—Giving a reason why "the grace of God" required that Jesus "should taste death," it became him—the whole plan was [not only not derogatory to, but] highly becoming God, though unbelief considers it a disgrace. (BERGK.) An answer to the Jews, and Hebrew Christians, who, ever, through impatience at the delay in the promised advent of Christ's glory, were in danger of apostasy, stumbling at Christ crucified. The Jerusalem Christians especially were liable to this danger. The scheme of redemption was altogether such a one as harmonises with the love, justice, and wisdom of God. &c. when—God the Father (Romans, 11. 36; 1 Corinthians, 8. 6; Revelation, 4. 11). In Colossians, 1. 16, the same is said of Christ, all things—Greek, "the universe of things," "the all things." He uses for "God," the periphrasis, "Him for whom...by whom are all things," to mark the becomingness of Christ's suffering as the way to His being "perfected" as "Captain of our salvation," seeing that His is the way that pleased Him whose will and whose glory are the end of all things, and by whose operation all things exist, in bringing—The Greek is past, "Having brought as He did," vis., in His electing purpose (cf. "Ye are sons," vis., in His purpose, Galatians, 4. 6; Ephesians, 1. 4), a purpose which is accomplished in Jesus' being "perfected through sufferings," many—(Matthew, 20. 28). "The church" (v. 12), "the general assembly" (ch. 12. 23). sons—no longer children as under the Old Testament law, but sons by adoption, unto glory, to share Christ's "glory" (v. 9; cf. v. 7; John, 17. 10, 22, 24; Romans, 8. 31). Sonship, holiness (v. 11), and glory, are inseparably joined. "Suffering," "salvation," and "glory," in Paul's writings, often go together (3 Timothy, 2. 10). Salvation presupposes destruction, deliverance from which for us required Christ's "sufferings," to make... perfect—to consummate: to bring to consummated glory through sufferings, as the appointed avenue to it. "He who suffers for another, not only benefits him, but becomes himself the brighter and more perfect." (CHRYSOSTOM.) Bringing to the end of troubles, and to the goal full of glory: a metaphor from the contests in the public games. Cf. "It is finished," Luke, 24. 36; John, 19. 30. I prefer, with CALVIN, understanding, "to make perfect as a completed sacrifice," legal and official, not moral, perfection is meant: "to consecrate" (so the same Greek is translated ch. 7. 28; cf. Marginal) by the finished expiation of His death, as our perfect High Priest, and so our "Captain of salvation" (Luke, 12. 32). This agrees with v. 11, "He that sanctifieth," &c., consecrates them by Himself being made a consecrated offering for them. So ch. 10. 14, 29; John, 17. 19; by the perfecting of His consecration for them in His death, He perfects their consecration, and so throws open access to glory (John, 10. 19-21; ch. 4. 9; 9. 9, accord with this sense). Captain of &c.—id., Prince-leader, as Joshua, not Moses, led the people into the Holy land, so will our Joshua, or Jesus, lead us into the heavenly inheritance (Acts, 12. 20). The same Greek is in ch. 12. 2, "Author of our faith," Acts, 3. 15, "Prince of life" (5. 31). Preceding others by His example, as well as the originator of our salvation. 11. he that sanctifieth—Christ who once for all consecrates His people to God (Jude, 1, bringing them nigh to Him as the consequence) and everlasting glory, by having consecrated Himself for them in His being made "perfect" (as their expiatory sacrifice) through sufferings" (v. 10; ch. 10. 10, 14, 29; John, 17. 17, 19). God, in His electing love, by Christ's finished work, perfectly sanctifies them to God's service and to heaven once for all: then they are progressively sanctified by the transforming Spirit. "Sanctification is glory working in embryo; glory is sanctification come to the birth, and manifested." (ALFORD.) they were sanctified—Greek, "they that are being sanctified" (cf. the use of "sanctified," 1 Corinthians, 7. 14), of one—Father, God: not in the sense wherein He is Father of all beings, as angels; for these are excluded by the argument, v. 16; but as He is Father of His spiritual human sons, Christ the Head and elder Brother, and His believing people, the members of the body and family. Thus, this and the following verses are meant to justify his having said, "many sons" (v. 10). "Of one" is not "of one father Adam," or "Abraham," as BERGK., &c., suppose. For the Saviour's participation in the lovenes of our humanity is not mentioned till v. 14, and then as a consequence of what precedes. Moreover, "Sons of God" is, in Scripture usage, the dignity obtained by our union with Christ; and our brotherhood with Him flows from God being His and our Father. Christ's Sonship (by generation) in relation to God is reflected in the sonship (by adoption) of His brethren. He is not ashamed—though being the Son of God, since they have now by adoption obtained a like dignity, so that His majesty is not compromised by brotherhood with them (cf. ch. 11. 16). It is a striking feature in Christianity that it unites such amazing contrasts as "our brother and our God." (THEOLUCK.) "God makes of sons of men sons of God, because God hath made of the Son of God the Son of man." (ST. AUGUSTINE on Psalm 2.) 12. (Psalm 22. 22.) Messiah declares the name of the Father, not known fully as Christ's Father, and therefore their Father, till after His crucifixion (John, 20. 17), among His brethren ("the church," &c., the congregation), that they in turn may praise Him (Psalm 22. 23). At v. 22 the 22d Psalm, which begins with Christ's cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me," and details minutely His sorrows, passes from Christ's sufferings to His triumph, prefigured by the same in the experience of David. will I sing—as leader of the choir (Psalm 8. 2). 13. I will put my trust in him.—From the LXX., Isaiah, 8. 17, which immediately precedes the next quotation, "Behold, I and the children," &c. The only objection is, the following words, "and again," usually introduce a new quotation, whereas these two are parts of one and the same passage. However, this objection is not valid, as the two clauses express distinct ideas: "I will put my trust in Him" expresses His filial confidence in God as His Father, to whom He flees from His sufferings, and is not disappointed; which His believing brethren imitate, trusting solely in the Father through Christ, and not in their own merits. "Christ exhibited this 'trust,' not for Himself, for He and the Father are one, but for His own people" (v. 16). Each fresh aid given Him assured Him, as it does them, of aid for the future, until the complete victory was obtained over death and hell (Philippians, 1. 16). [BENGL.] Behold I and the children, &c.—(Isaiah, 8. 18.) "Sons" (v. 10), "brethren" (v. 12), and "children," imply His right and property in them from everlasting. He speaks of them as "children" of God, though not yet in being, yet considered as such in His purpose, and presents them before God the Father, who has given Him them, to be glorified with Himself. Isaiah (meaning "salvation of Jehovah") typically represented Messiah, who is at once Father and Son, Isaiah and Immanuel (Isaiah, 9. 6). He expresses his resolve to rely, he and his children, not like Ahar and the Jews on the Assyrian king, against the confederacy of Pekah of Israel, and Rezin of Syria, but on Jehovah; and then foretells the deliverance of Judah by God, in language which finds its antitypical full realization only in the far greater deliverance wrought by Messiah. Christ, the antitypical Prophet, similarly, instead of the human confidences of His age, Himself, and with Him God the Father's children (who are therefore His children, and so antitypical to Isaiah's children, though here regarded as His "brethren," cf. Isaiah, 9. 6, "Father," and "His seed," 53. 10) led by Him, trust wholly in God for salvation. The official words and acts of all the prophets find their antitype in the Great Prophet (Revelation, 19. 10), just as His kingly office is antitypical to that of the theocratic kings; and His priestly office to the types and rites of the Aaronic priesthood. 14. He who has thus been shown to be the "Captain (Greek, Leader) of salvation" to the "many sons," by trusting and suffering like them, must therefore become man like them, in order that His death may be efficacious for them. [AUFORD.] the children—beforementioned (v. 13): those existing in His eternal purpose, though not in actual being, are partakers of—lit., "have [in His purpose] been partakers" all in common, flesh and blood—Greek oldest MSS, have "blood and flesh." The inner and more important element, the blood, as the more immediate vehicle of the soul, stands before the more palpable element, the flesh; also, with reference to Christ's blood-shedding, with a view to which He entered into community with our corporeal life. "The life of the flesh is in the blood: it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul" (Leviticus, 17. 11, 14). likewise—Greek, "in a somewhat similar manner;" not altogether in a like manner. For He, unlike them, was conceived and born not in sin (ch. 4. 15). But mainly "in like manner;" not in mere semblance of a body, as the Docetae heretics taught, took part of—participated in. The forfeited inheritance (according to Jewish law) was ransomed by the nearest of kin; so Jesus became our nearest of kin by His assumed humanity, in order to be our Redeemer, that through death—which He could not have undergone as God, but only by becoming man. Not by Almighty power, but "by His death" (so the Greek) He overcame death. "Jesus suffering death overcame; Satan wielding death succumbed." [BENGL.] As David cut off the head of Goliath with the giant's own sword wherewith the latter was wont to win his victories. Coming to redeem mankind, Christ made Himself a sort of hook to destroy the devil; for in Him there was His humanity to attract the Devourer to Him, His divinity to pierce him, apparent weakness to provoke, hidden power to transfix the hungry ravisser. The Latin epigram says, "Mors mortis morti mortem nisi morte tulisset, Aeterna vitæ janua clausa foret." Had not death by death borne to death the death of Death, the gate of eternal life would have been closed. destruy—lit., "render powerless;" deprive of all power to hurt His people. "That thou mightest still the enemy and avenger" (Psalm 8. 2). The same Greek verb is used, 2 Timothy, 1. 10, "abolished death." There is no more death for believers. Christ plants in them an undying seed the germ of heavenly immortality, though believers have to pass through natural death. power—Satan is "strong" (Matthew, 12. 29), of death—implying that death itself is a power which, though originally foreign to human nature, now reigns over it (Romans, 5. 12; 6. 9). The power which death has Satan wields. The author of sin is the author of its consequences. Cf. "power of the enemy" (Luke, 10. 19). Satan has acquired over man (by God's law, Genesis, 2. 17; Romans, 6. 23) the power of death by man's sin, death being the executioner of sin, and man being Satan's "lawful captive." Jesus, by dying, has made the dying His own (Romans, 14. 9), and has taken the prey from the mighty. Death's power was manifest; who wielded that power, lurking beneath it, is here expressed, vid., Satan. Wisdom 2. 24, "By the envy of the devil, death entered into the world." 15. fear of death—even before they had experienced its actual power, all their lifetime—Such a life can hardly be called life, subject to bondage—lit., "subjects of bondage" not merely liable to it, but enthralled in it (cf. Romans, 8. 15; Galatians, 5. 1). Contrast with this bondage, the glory of the "sons" (v. 10). "Bondage" is defined by Aristotle, "The living not as one chooses;" "liberty," "the living as one chooses." Christ, by delivering us from the curse of God against our sin, has taken from death all that made it formidable. Death, viewed apart from Christ, can only fill with horror, if the sinner dares to think. 16. For verily—Greek, "For as we all know;" "For as you will doubtless grant." Paul probably alludes to Isaiah, 41. 4; Jeremiah, 31. 32, LXX, from which all Jews would know well that the fact here stated as to Messiah, was what the prophets had led them to expect, took not as him, &c.—rather, "It is not angels that He is helping (the present implies duration); but it is the seed of Abraham that He is helping." The verb is lit., to help by taking one by the hand, as in ch. 8. 9, "When I took them by the hand," &c. Thus it answers to "succour," v. 18, and "deliver," v. 15. "Not angels," who have no flesh and blood, but "the children," who have "flesh and blood." He takes hold of to help by "Himself taking part of the same" (v. 14). Whatever effect Christ's work may have on angels, He is not taking hold of them to help them by suffering in their nature to deliver them from death, as in our case. seed of Abraham—He views Christ's redemption (in compliment to the Hebrews whom he is addressing, and as enough for his present purpose) with reference to Abraham's seed, the Jewish nation, primarily: not that he excludes the Gentiles (v. 9, "for every man"), who, like believers, are the seed of Abraham spiritually (v. 12; Psalm 22. 22, 25, 27), but direct reference to them, such as is in Romans, 4. 11, 12, 16; Galatians, 3. 7, 14, 28, 29, would be out of place in his present argument. It is the same argument for Jesus being the Christ, which Matthew, writing his gospel for the Hebrews, uses, tracing the genealogy of Jesus from Abraham, the father of the Jews, and the one to whom the promises were given, on which the Jews especially prided themselves (cf. Romans, 9. 4, 5). 17. Wherefore—Greek, "Whence," Found in Paul's speech, Acts, 26. 18, "all things—which are incidental to manhood, the being born, nourished, growing up, suffering. Son is not, in the original constitution of man, a necessary attendant of manhood, so He had no sin. It behoved him—by moral necessity, considering what the justice and love of God required of Him as Mediator (cf. ch. 5, 3, the office which He had voluntarily undertaken in order to "help" man (v. 16), his brethren—(v. 11)—"the seed of Abraham" (v. 16), and so also the spiritual seed, His elect out of all mankind, be—rather as Greek, "that He might become High Priest." He was called so, when He was "made perfect by the things which He suffered" (v. 10; ch. 5, 8-10). He was actually made so, when He entered within the veil, from which last flows His ever-continuing intercession as Priest for us. The death, as man, must first be, in order that the bringing in of the blood into the heavenly Holy Place might follow, in which consisted the expiation as High Priest, merciful—to "the people" deserving wrath by "sins." Mercy is a prime requisite in a priest, since His office is to help the wretched and raise the fallen: such mercy is most likely to be found in one who has a fellow-feeling with the afflicted, having been so once Himself (ch. 4, 15: not that the Son of God needed to be taught by suffering to be merciful, but that in order to save us He needed to take our manhood with all its sorrows, thereby qualifying Himself by experimental suffering with us, to be our sympathizing High Priest, and assuring us of His entire fellow-feeling with us in every sorrow. So in the main CALVIN remarks here, Faithful—true to God (ch. 3, 5, 6) and to man (ch. 10, 23, in the Mediatorial office which He has undertaken, High Priest—which Moses was not, though "faithful" (ch. 3, 2. Nowhere, except in Psalm 110, "Zechariah, 6, 13, and in this epistle, is Christ expressly called a Priest. In this epistle alone His priest-hood is professedly discussed; whence it is evident how necessary is this book of the New Testament. In Psalm 110, and Zechariah, 6, 13, there is added mention of the kingdom of Christ, which elsewhere is spoken of without the priest-hood, and that frequently. On the cross, whereon as Priest He offered the sacrifice, He had the title "King" inscribed over Him. [BENGEL.] to make reconciliation for the sins—rather as Greek, "to propitiate (in respect to) the sins;" "to expiate the sins." Strictly Divine justice is "propitiated;" but God's love is as much from everlasting as His justice; therefore, lest Christ's sacrifice, or its typical forerunners, the legal sacrifices, should be thought to be antecedent to God's grace and love, neither are said in the Old or New Testament to have propitiated God; otherwise Christ's sacrifice might have been thought to have first induced God to love and pity man, instead of (as the fact really is) His love having originated Christ's sacrifice, whereby Divine justice and Divine love are harmonized. The sinner is brought by that sacrifice into God's favour, which by sin he had forfeited; hence his right prayer is, "God be propitiated (so the Greek) to me who am a sinner" (Luke, 18, 13). Sins bring death and "the fear of death" (v. 16). He had no sin Himself, and "made reconciliation for the iniquity" of all others (Daniel, 9, 24), of the people—"the seed of Abraham" (v. 16); the literal Israel first, and then in the design of God, through Israel, the believing Gentiles, the spiritual Israel (1 Peter, 2, 10, 18. For—Explanation of how His being made like His brethren in all things has made Him a merciful and faithful High Priest for us v. 17, in that—rather as Greek, "wherein He suffered Himself: having been tempted, He is able to succour them that are being tempted" in the same temptation; and as "He was tempted (tried and afflicted) in all points," He is able (by the power of sympathy) to succour us in all possible temptations and trials incidental to man (ch. 4, 10; 5, 2). He is the antitypical Solomon, having for every grain of Abraham's seed (which were to be as the sand for number), "largeness of heart even as the sand that is on the sea shore" (1 Kings, 4, 29). "Not only as God He knows our trials, but also as man He knows them by experimental feeling."

CHAPTER III.

VER. 1-10. THE SON OF GOD GREATER THAN MOSES, WHEREFORE UNBELIEF TOWARDS HIM WILL INCUR A HEAVIER PUNISHMENT THAN BEFELL UNBELIEVING ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS. As Moses especially was the prophet by whom "God in time past spake to the Fathers," being the mediator of the law, Paul deems it necessary now to show that, great as was Moses, the Son of God is greater. ERRARD in ALFORD remarks, The angel of the covenant came in the name of God before Israel: Moses in the name of Israel before God; whereas the high priest came both in the name of God (bearing the name of the twelve tribes on his breast) before Israel, and in the name of Israel (bearing the names of the twelve tribes on his breast) before God (Exodus, 28, 9-29, 36-38). Now Christ is above the angels, according to chs. 1 and 2, because (1), as Son of God He is higher; and (2) because manhood, though originally lower than angels, is in Him exalted above them to the lordship of "the world to come," inasmuch as He is at once Messenger of God to men, and also atoning Priest—Representative of men before God (ch. 2, 17, 18). Parallel with this line of argument as to His superiority to angels (ch. 1, 4) runs that which here follows as to His superiority to Moses (ch. 3, 3): (1) Because as Son over the house, He is above the servant in the house (v. 6, 8), just as the angels were shown to be but ministering (serving) spirits (ch. 1, 14), whereas He is the Son (v. 7, 8); (2) because the bringing of Israel into the promised rest, which was not finished by Moses, is accomplished by Him (ch. 4, 1-11), through His being not merely a leader and lawgiver as Moses, but also a propitiatory High Priest (ch. 4, 14, 5, 10). 1. Therefore—Greek, "Whence," i.e., seeing we have such a sympathizing Helper you ought to "consider attentively".... "contemplate" fix your eyes and mind on Him with a view to profiting by the contemplation (ch. 12, 2). The Greek word is often used by Luke, Paul's companion (Luke, 12, 24, 27), brethren—in Christ, the common bond of union, partakers—"of the Holy Ghost," heavenly calling—coming to us from heaven, and leading us to heaven whence it comes. Philippians, 3, 14, "the high calling;" Greek "the calling above," i.e., heavenly, the Apostle and High Priest of our profession—There is but one Greek title to both nouns: "Him who is at once Apostle and High Priest"—Apostle, as Ambassador (a higher designation than "angel-messenger) sent by the Father (John, 20, 21), pleading the cause of God with us; High Priest, as pleading our cause with God. Both His Apostleship and High Priesthood are comprehended in the one title, Mediator. [BENGEL.] Though the title "Apostle" is nowhere else applied to Christ, it is appropriate here in addressing Hebrews, who used the term of the delegates sent by the High Priest to collect the temple tribute from Jews resident in foreign countries, even as Christ was Delegate of the Father to this world far off from Him (Matthew, 21, 37). Hence as what applies to Him, applies also to His people, the twelve are designated His apostles, even as He is the Father's (John, 20, 21). It was desirable to avoid designating Him here "angel," in order to distinguish His nature from that of angels mentioned before, though He is "the Angel of the Covenant." The "legate of the church" (Sheliach Tabbur) offered up the prayers in the synagogue in the name of all, and for all. So Jesus, "the Apostle of our profession," is delegated to intercede for the church before the Father. The words "of our profession," mark that it is not of the legal ritual, but of our Christian faith, that He is the High Priest. Paul compares Him as an Apostle to Moses, as High

Priest to Aaron. He alone holds both offices combined, and in a more eminent degree than either, which those two brothers held apart. "Profession," or "confession," corresponds to God having spoken to us by His Son, sent as Apostle and High Priest. What God proclaims we confess. 2. He first notes the feature of resemblance between Moses and Christ, in order to conciliate the Hebrew Christians whom He addressed, and who still entertained a very high opinion of Moses; he afterwards brings forward Christ's superiority to Moses. Who was faithful—The Greek implies also that He still is faithful, viz., as our mediating High Priest, faithful to the trust God has assigned Him (ch. 2. 17). So Moses in God's house (Numbers, 12. 7.) appointed him—"made Him" HIGH PRIEST: to be supplied from the preceding context. Greek, "made;" so in ch. 5. 5; 1 Samuel, 11. 6, Margin; Acts, 2. 36; so the Greek fathers. Not as ALFORD, with AMBROSE and the Latins, "Created Him," i.e., as man, in His incarnation. The likeness of Moses to Messiah was foretold by Moses himself (Deuteronomy, 18. 15). Other prophets only explained Moses, who was in this respect superior to them; but Christ was like Moses, yet superior. 3. For—Assigning the reason why they should "consider" attentively "Christ" (v. 1), highly as they regard Moses who resembled Him in faithfulness (v. 2), was—Greek, "has been" counted worthy of more glory—by God, when He exalted Him to His own right hand. The Hebrew Christians admitted the fact (ch. 1. 13). but did the house—Greek, "inasmuch as He hath more honour than the house, who prepared it," or "established it." [ALFORD.] The Greek verb is used purposely instead of "bulld," in order to mark that the building meant is not a literal, but a spiritual house: the church both of the Old Testament and New Testament; and that the building of such a house includes all the preparations of Providence and grace needed to furnish it with "living stones," and fitting "servants." Thus, as Christ the Founder and Establisher (in Old Testament as well as the New Testament) is greater than the house so established, including the servants, He is greater also than Moses who was but a "servant." Moses, as a servant, is a portion of the house, and less than the house; Christ, as the Instrumental Creator of all things, must be God, and so greater than the house of which Moses was but a part. Glory is the result of honour. 4. Some one must be the establisher of every house: Moses was not the establisher of the house, but a portion of it (but He who established all things, and therefore the spiritual house in question, is God). Christ, as being instrumentally the Establisher of all things, must be the Establisher of the house, and so greater than Moses. 5. faithful in all his house—i.e., in all God's house (v. 4). servant—Not here the Greek for "slave," but "a ministering attendant;" marking the high office of Moses towards God, though inferior to Christ, a kind of steward, for a testimony, &c.—in order that he might in his typical institutions give "testimony" to Israel "of the things" of the gospel "which were to be spoken afterwards" by Christ (ch. 8. 5; 9. 8, 23; 10. 1). 6. But Christ—was and is faithful (v. 2), as a Son over his own house—rather, "over His (God's, v. 4) house;" and therefore, as the inference from His being one with God, over His own house. So ch. 10. 21, "having an High Priest over the house of God." Christ enters His Father's house as the Master (over it), but Moses as a servant [INT, v. 2, 5]. [CHRYSOSTOM.] An ambassador in the absence of the king is very distinguished—in the presence of the king he falls back into the multitude. [BENNETT.] whose house are we—Paul and his Hebrew readers. One old MS., with Vulgate & LUCIFER, reads, "which house;" but the weightiest MSS. support English Version reading, the rejoicing—rather, "the matter of rejoicing." of the hope—"of our hope." Since all our good things lie in hopes,

we ought so to hold fast our hope as already to rejoice, as though our hopes were realized. [CHRYSOSTOM.] firm unto the end—Omitted in LUCIFER & AMBROSE, and in one oldest MS., but supported by most oldest MSS. 7. &c.—Exhortation from Psalm 95., not through unbelief to lose participation in the spiritual house. Wherefore—Seeing that we are the house of God if we hold fast our confidence, &c. (v. 6). Jesus is "faithful," be not ye unfaithful (v. 2, 13). The sentence beginning with "wherefore," interrupted by the parenthesis confirming the argument from Psalm 95., is completed at v. 12, "Take heed," &c. Holy Ghost saith—by the inspired psalmist: so that the words of the latter are the words of God Himself. To-day—at length: in David's day, as contrasted with the days of Moses in the wilderness, and the whole time since then, during which they had been rebellious against God's voice: as for instance, in the wilderness (v. 9). The Psalm, each fresh time when used in public worship, by "to-day," will mean the particular day when it was, or is, used, heard—obediently. His voice—of grace. 8. Harden not your hearts—This phrase here only is used of men's own act: usually of God's act (Romans, 9. 18). When man is spoken of as the agent in hardening the phrase usually is, "harden his neck," or "back" (Nehemiah, 5. 17). provocation... temptation—Massah—meribah, translated in Margin, "temptation...chiding," or "strife" (Exodus, 17. 1-7). Both names seem to refer to that one event, the murmuring of the people against the Lord at Rephidim for want of water. The first offence especially ought to be guarded against, and is the most severely reprov'd, as it is apt to produce many more. Numbers, 20. 1-13, and Deuteronomy, 33. 5, mention a second similar occasion in the wilderness of Sin, near Kadesh, also called Meribah. In the day—Greek, "according to the day of," &c. 9. When—rather, "Where," viz., in the wilderness, your fathers—The authority of the ancients is not conclusive. [BENNETT.] tempted me, proved me—The oldest MSS. read, "tempted (me) in the way of testing," i.e., putting (me) to the proof whether I was able and willing to relieve them, not believing that I am so. saw my works forty years—They saw, without being led thereby to repentance, my works of power partly in affording miraculous help, partly in executing vengeance, forty years. The "forty years" joined in the Hebrew and LXX., and below, v. 17, with "I was grieved," is here joined with "they saw." Both are true: for, during the same forty years that they were tempting God by unbelief, notwithstanding their seeing God's miraculous works, God was being grieved. The lesson intended to be hinted to the Hebrew Christians is, their "to-day" is to last only between the first preaching of the gospel and Jerusalem's impending overthrow, viz., FORTY YEARS; exactly the number of years of Israel's sojourn in the wilderness, until the full measure of their guilt having been filled up all the rebels were overthrown. 10. grieved—displeased. Cf. "walk contrary," Leviticus, 20. 24, 25, that generation—"that" implies alienation and estrangement. But the oldest MSS. read, "this," said—"grieved," or "displeased," at their first offence. Subsequently when they hardened their heart in unbelief still more, He swore in His wrath (v. 11): an ascending gradation (cf. v. 17, 18), and they have not known—Greek, "But these very persons," &c.: they perceived I was displeased with them, yet they, the same persons, did not a whit the more wish to know my way [BENNETT]; cf. "But they," Psalm 106. 43, not know my ways—not know practically and believingly the ways in which I would have had them go, so as to reach my rest (Exodus, 18. 20). 11. So—i.e., "as" I swear—BENNETT remarks the oath of God preceded the forty years. not—i.e., "If they shall enter, &c. God do so to me and more also," 2 Samuel, 3. 25. The Greek is the same, Mark, 8. 12. my rest—CANTAB.

pecially, their rest after wandering in the wilderness: still, even when in it, they never fully enjoyed rest; whence it followed, that the threat extended further than the exclusion of the unbelieving from the literal land of rest, and that the rest promised to the believing in its full blessedness was, and is, yet future: Psalm 23. 12; 37. 9, 11, 23, 29, and Christ's own beatitude (Matthew, 4. 5) all accord with this, v. 9, 12. Take heed—to be joined with "wherefore," v. 7. lest there be—Greek (indicative), "lest there shall be;" lest there be, as I fear there is: implying that it is not merely a possible contingency, but that there is ground for thinking it will be so, in any—"in any one of you." Not merely ought all in general be on their guard, but they ought to be so concerned for the safety of each one member, as not to suffer any one to perish through their negligence. [CALVIN.] heart—The heart is not to be trusted. Cf. v. 10, "They do always err in their heart." unbelief—fathlessness, Christ is fathful; therefore, said Paul to the Hebrews, we ought not to be fathless as our fathers were under Moses, departing—apostatizing. The opposite of "come unto" Him (ch. 4. 14). God punishes such apostates in kind. He departs from them—the worst of woes. the living God—Real: the distinctive characteristic of the God of Israel, not like the lifeless gods of the heathen; therefore One whose threats are awful realities. To apostatize from Christ is to apostatize from the living God (ch. 2. 3. 12. one another—Greek, "yourselves;" let each exhort himself and his neighbour. daily—Greek, "on each day," or "day by day," while it is called to-day—while the "to-day" lasts (the day of grace, Luke, 4. 21, before the coming of the day of glory and judgment at Christ's coming, ch. 10. 26, 37. To-morrow is the day when idle men work, and fools repent. To-morrow is Satan's to-day; he cares not what good resolutions you form, if only you fix them for to-morrow. lest... of you—The "you" is emphatic, as distinguished from "your fathers" (v. 9). "That from among you no one (so the Greek order is in some of the oldest MSS.) be hardened" (v. 8). deceitfulness—causing you to "err in your heart," sin—unbelief. 14. For. &c.—Enforcing the warning, v. 12. partakers of Christ—cf. v. 1. a.) So "partakers of the Holy Ghost" (ch. 6. 4). hold—Greek, "hold fast," the beginning of our confidence—i.e., the confidence (lit., substantial, solid confidence) of faith which we have begun (ch. 6. 11; 12. 2). A Christian so long as he is not made perfect, considers himself as a beginner. [BENNETT.] unto the end—unto the coming of Christ (ch. 12. 2). 15. While it is said—Connected with v. 13, "exhort one another, &c., while it is said To-day;" v. 14, "for we are made partakers," &c., being a parenthesis. "It entirely depends on yourselves that the invitation of the 96th Psalm be not a mere invitation, but also an actual enjoyment." ALFORD translates, "Since (i.e., for) it is said," &c., regarding v. 15 as a proof that we must "hold... confidence... unto the end," in order to be "partakers of Christ." 16. For some—rather interrogatively, "For who was it that, when they had heard (referring to 'if ye will hear,' v. 15), did provoke (God)?" The "for" implies, Ye need to take heed against unbelief: for, was it not because of unbelief that all our fathers were excluded (Ezekiel, 2. 3)? "Some," and "not all," would be a faint way of putting his argument, when his object is to show the universality of the evil. Not merely some, but all the Israelites, for the solitary exceptions, Joshua and Caleb, are hardly to be taken into account in so general a statement. So v. 17, 18, are interrogative: (1.) The beginning of the provocation, soon after the departure from Egypt, is marked in v. 16; (2.) the forty years of it in the wilderness, v. 17; (3.) the denial of entrance into the land of rest, v. 18. Not, cf. 1 Corinthians, 10. 5, "with the majority of them God was displeased." howbeit—"Nay (why need I put the question), was it not all that came out of Egypt" (Ezekiel, 17. 1. 2)? by Moses—by the instrumentality of Moses as their leader. 17. But—translates, "Moreover," as it is not in contrast to v. 16, but carrying out the same thought. corpses—lit., "limbs," implying that their bodies fell limb from limb. 18. to them that believed not—rather as Greek, "to them that disobeyed." Practical unbelief (Deuteronomy, 1. 28). 19. they could not enter—though desiring it.

CHAPTER IV.

VER. 1-16. THE PROMISE OF GOD'S REST IS FULLY REALIZED THROUGH CHRIST: LET US STRIVE TO OBTAIN IT BY HIS, OUR STRIPPING OFF HEAVENLY FRAMES. 1. Let us...strive—not with slavish terror, but godly "fear and trembling" (Philippians, 2. 12). Since so many have fallen, we have cause to fear (ch. 3. 17-19), being left us—still remaining to us after the others have, by neglect, lost it. his rest—God's heavenly rest, of which Canaan is the type. "To-day" still continues, during which there is the danger of failing to reach the rest. "To-day," rightly used, terminates in the rest which, when once obtained, is never lost (Revelation, 3. 12). A foretaste of the rest is given in the inward rest which the believer's soul has in Christ, should seem to come about of it—Greek, "to have come about of it;" should be found, when the great trial of all shall take place [ALFORD], to have fallen short of attaining the promise. The word "seem" is a mitigating mode of expression, though not lessening the reality. BENNETT & OWEN take it, lest there should be any semblance or appearance of falling short. 2. Gospel preached...unto them—in type: the earthly Canaan, wherein they failed to realize perfect rest, suggesting to them that they should look beyond to the heavenly land of rest, to which faith is the avenue, and from which unbelief excludes, as it did from the earthly Canaan, the word preached—lit., "the word of hearing;" the word heard by them. not being mixed with faith in them that heard—So the Syriac and the Old Latin Versions, older than any of our MSS., and LUCIFER, read, "As the word did not unite with the hearers in faith." The word heard being the food which, as the bread of life, must pass into flesh and blood through man's appropriating it to himself in faith. Hearing alone is of as little value as undigested food in a bad stomach. [THEOLUCK.] The whole of oldest extant MS. authority supports a different reading, "unmingled as they were (Greek accusative agreeing with 'them') in faith with its hearers," i.e., with its believing, obedient hearers, as Caleb and Joshua. So "hear" is used for "obey" in the context, v. 7, "To-day, if ye will hear His voice." The disobedient, instead of being blended in "the same body," separated themselves as Korah: a tactful reproof to like separatists from the Christian assembling together (ch. 10. 26; Jude, 19). 3. For—Justifying his assertion of the need of "faith," v. 2, we which have believed—we who at Christ's coming shall be found to have believed. do enter—i.e., are to enter: so two of the oldest MSS. and LUCIFER and the old Latin. Two other oldest MSS. read, "Let us enter," into rest—Greek, "into the rest" which is promised in the 96th Psalm, as he said—God's saying that unbelief excludes from entrance, implies that belief gains an entrance into the rest. What, however, Paul mainly here dwells on in the quotation is, that the promised "rest" has not yet been entered into. At v. 11 he again, as in ch. 3. 12-19 already, takes up faith as the indispensable qualification for entering it, although, &c.—Although God has finished His works of creation and entered on His rest from creation long before Moses' time, yet under that leader of Israel another rest was promised, which most fell short of through unbelief; and although the rest in Canaan was subsequently attained under Joshua, yet long after, in David's days, God, in the 96th Psalm, still speaks of the rest of God as not yet.

attained. THEREFORE, there must be meant a rest still future, viz., that which "remaineth for the people of God" in heaven, v. 3-9, when they shall rest from their works, as God did from His, v. 10. The argument is to show that by "my rest," God means a future rest, not for Himself, but for us. finished—Greek, "brought into existence," "made." 4. he spake—God (Genesis, 2, 2). God did rest the seventh day—A rest not ending with the seventh day, but beginning then and still continuing, into which believers shall hereafter enter. God's rest is not a rest necessitated by fatigue, nor consisting in idleness, but is that upholding and governing of which creation was the beginning. [ALFORD.] Hence Moses records the end of each of the first six days, but not of the seventh. from all his works—Hebrew, Genesis, 2, 2, "from all His work." God's "work" was one, comprehending, however, many "works." 5. in this place—in this passage of the Psalm again, it is implied that the rest was even then still future. 6. it remaineth—still to be realized. some must enter—The denial of entrance to unbelievers is a virtual promise of entrance to those that believe. God wishes not his rest to be empty, but furnished with guests (Luke, 14, 23). they to whom it was first preached entered not—Id., "they who first (in the time of Moses) had the gospel preached to them," viz., in type, as Note, v. 2. unbeliever—Greek, rather "disobedience" (Note, ch. 3, 18). 7. Again—Ases the promise recurs. Translate as the Greek order is, "He limiteth a certain day, 'To-day.'" Here Paul interrupts the quotation by, "In (the Psalm of) David saying after so long a time (after 500 years' possession of Canaan); and resumes it by, "As it has been said before (so the Greek oldest MS., before, viz., ch. 3, 7, 15), To-day if ye hear His voice," &c. [ALFORD.] 8. Answer to the objection which might be made to his reasoning, viz., that those brought into Canaan by Joshua (so "Jesus" here means, as in Acts, 7, 45) did enter the rest of God. If the rest of God meant Canaan, God would not, after their entrance into that land, have spoken (or speak [ALFORD.]) of another (future) day of entering the rest. 9. therefore—because God "speaks of another day" (Note, v. 8). remaineth—still to be realized hereafter by the "some (who) must enter therein" (v. 6, &c.). "the people of God," the true Israel, who shall enter into God's rest ("my rest," v. 3). God's rest was a Sabbatism, so also will ours be, a rest—Greek, "Sabbatism." In time there are many Sabbaths, but then there shall be the enjoyment and keeping of a Sabbath rest: one perfect and eternal. The "rest" in v. 8 is Greek "καταπαυσις," Hebrew, "Noah," rest from weariness, as the ark rested on Ararat after its tossings to and fro; and as Israel, under Joshua, enjoyed at last rest from war in Canaan. But the "rest" in this v. 9 is the nobler and more exalted (Hebrew) "Sabbath rest"; Id., cessation: rest from work when finished (v. 4), as God rested (Revelation, 16, 17). The two ideas of "rest" combined, give the perfect view of the heavenly Sabbath. Rest from weariness, sorrow, and sin; and rest in the completion of God's new creation (Revelation, 21, 6). The whole renovated creation shall share in it; nothing will there be to break the Sabbath of eternity; and the Triune God shall rejoice in the work of His hands (Zechariah, 3, 17). Moses, the representative of the law, could not lead Israel into Canaan: the law leads us to Christ, and there its office ceases, as that of Moses on the borders of Canaan: it is Jesus, the antitype of Joshua, who leads us into the heavenly rest. This verse indirectly establishes the obligation of the Sabbath still; for the type continues until the antitype supersedes it: so legal sacrifices continued till the great antitypical sacrifice superseded it. As then the antitypical heavenly Sabbath rest will not be till Christ comes, our gospel Joshua, to usher us into it, the typical earthly Sabbath must continue till then,

The Jews call the future rest "the day which is all Sabbath." 10 For—Justifying and explaining the word "rest," or "Sabbatism," just used (Note, v. 9). he that is entered—whosoever once enters. his rest—God's rest: the rest prepared by God for His people. [ESTIVAS.] Rather, His rest: the man's rest: that assigned to him by God as his. The Greek is the same as that for "his own" immediately after. hath ceased—The Greek aorist is used of indefinite time. "Is wont to cease," or rather, "rests." The past tense implies at the same time the certainty of it, as also that in this life a kind of foretaste in Christ is already given (GNOTIUS) (Jeremiah, 8, 16; Matthew, 11, 28, 29). Our highest happiness shall, according to this verse, consist in our being united in one with God, and moulded into conformity with Him as our archetype. (CALVIN.) Thus his own works—even from those that were good and suitable to the time of doing work. Labour was followed by rest even in Paradise (Genesis, 2, 3, 16). The work and subsequent rest of God are the archetype to which we should be conformed. The argument is, He who once enters rest, rests from labours; but God's people have not yet rested from them, therefore they have not yet entered the rest, and so it must be still future. ALFORD translates, "He that entered into his (or else God's), but rather 'his,' Isaiah, 11, 10. 'His rest': the joy of the Lord," Matthew, 25, 21, 29 rest (viz., Jesus, our Forerunner, v. 14; ch. 6, 20). The Son of God that is passed through the heavens: in contrast to Joshua the type, who did not bring God's people into the heavenly rest, he himself (emphatically) rested from his works (v. 4), as God (did) from His own" so the Greek, works). The argument, though generally applying to any one who has entered his rest, probably alludes to Jesus in particular, the antitypical Joshua, who, having entered His rest at the Ascension, has ceased or rested from His work of the new creation, as God on the seventh day rested from the work of physical creation. Not that He has ceased to carry on the work of redemption, nay, He upholds it by His mediation; but He has ceased from those portions of the work which constitute the foundation, the sacrifice has been once for all accomplished. Cf. as to God's creation rest, once for all completed, and rested from. —Now still upheld (Note, v. 4). 11. Let us... therefore—Seeing such a promise is before us, which we may, like them, fall short of through unbelief, Id.—Greek, "strive diligently." that rest—which is still future and so glorious. Or, in ALFORD'S translation of v. 10, "That rest into which Christ has entered before" (v. 14; ch. 6, 20). fall—with the soul, not merely the body, as the rebel Israelites fell (ch. 3, 17). after the same example—ALFORD translates, "fall into the same example." The less prominent place of the "fall" in the Greek favours this. The sense is, "lest any fall into such disobedience so the Greek for 'unbelief' means as they gave a sample of." [GNOTIUS.] The Jews say, "The parents are a sign (warning) to their sons" II For—Such diligent striving (v. 11) is incumbent on us, for we have to do with God whose "word," whereby we shall be judged, is heart-searching, and whose eyes are all-seeing (v. 13). The qualities here attributed to the word of God, and the whole context, show that it is regarded in its JUDICIAL power, whereby it dooms the disobedient Israelites to exclusion from Canaan and shall exclude unbelieving so-called Christians from the heavenly rest. The written word of God is not the prominent thought here, though the passage is often quoted as if it were. Still the word of God (the same as that preached, v. 2), used here in the broadest sense, but with special reference to its judicial power, INCLUDES the word of God, the sword of the Spirit with double edge, one edge for convicting and converting some (v. 2), and the other for condemning and destroying the unbelieving (v. 14). Revelation, 19, 15, Id.

represents the Word's judicial power as a sharp sword going out of Christ's mouth to smite the nations. The same word which is saving to the faithful (v. 3) is destroying to the disobedient (3 Corinthians, 2, 15, 16). The personal Word, to whom some refer the passage, is not here meant: for He is not the sword, but As the sword. Thus reference to Joshua appropriately follows in v. 2. quick—Greek, "living," having living power, as "the rod of the mouth and the breath of the lips" of "the living God." powerful—Greek, "energetic;" not only living, but energetically efficacious, sharper—"more cutting," two-edged—sharpened at both edge and back. Cf. "sword of the Spirit...word of God" (Ephesians, 6, 17). Its double power seems to be implied by its being "two-edged." "It judges all that is in the heart, for there it passes through, at once punishing (unbelievers) and searching" (both believers and unbelievers). (CHRYSOBOSTOM.) PHILLO similarly speaks of "God passing between the parts of Abraham's sacrifice" (Genesis, 15, 17, where, however, it is a "burning lamp that passed between the pieces) with His word, which is the cutter of all things: which sword, being sharpened to the utmost keenness, never ceases to divide all sensible things, and even things not perceptible to sense or physically divisible, but perceptible and divisible by the word." Paul's early training, both in the Greek schools of Tarsus and the Hebrew schools at Jerusalem, accounts fully for his acquaintances with Philo's modes of thought, which were sure to be current among learned Jews every where, though Philo himself belonged to Alexandria, not Jerusalem. Addressing Jews, he by the Spirit sanctions what was true in their current literature, as he similarly did in addressing Gentiles (Acts, 17, 28), piercing—Greek, "coming through," even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit—i. e., reaching through even to the separation of the animal soul (the lower part of man's incorporeal nature, the seat of animal desires, which he has in common with the brutes; of the same Greek, 1 Corinthians, 2, 14, "the natural (animal-souled) man," Jude, 19) from the spirit (the higher part of man, receptive of the Spirit of God, and allying him to heavenly beings), and of the joints and marrow—rather, (reaching even to) "both the joints (so as to divide them; and marrow," Christ "knows what is in man" (John, 2, 24); so His word reaches as far as to the most intimate and accurate knowledge of man's most hidden parts, feelings, and thoughts, dividing, i. e., distinguishing what is spiritual from what is corporeal and animal in him, the spirit from the soul; so Proverbs, 20, 27. As the knife of the Levitical priest reached to dividing parts, closely united as the joints of the limbs, and penetrated to the innermost parts, as the marrow (the Greek is psural); so the word of God divides the closely-joined parts of man's immaterial being, soul and spirit, and penetrates to the innermost parts of the spirit. The clause (reaching even to) "both the joints and marrow" is subordinate to the clause, "even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit." (In the oldest MSS., as in English Version, there is no "both," as there is in the clause "both the joints and," &c., which marks the latter to be subordinate.) An image (appropriate in addressing Jews) from the literal dividing of joints, and penetrating to, so as to open out, the marrow, by the priest's knife, illustrating the previously-mentioned spiritual "dividing of soul from spirit," whereby each (soul as well as spirit) is laid bare and "naked" before God; this view accords with v. 13. Evidently "the dividing of the soul from the spirit" answers to the "joints" which the sword, when it reaches unto, divides asunder, as the "Spirit" answers to the innermost—"marrow." "Moses forms the soul, Christ the spirit. The soul draws with it the body; the spirit draws with it both soul and body." ALFORD'S interpretation is clumsy, by which he makes the soul itself, and the spirit itself, to be divided, instead of the soul from the spirit; so also he makes not only the joints to be divided asunder, but the marrow also to be divided (2). The Word's dividing and far-penetrating power, has both a punitive and a healing effect. discerner of the thoughts—Greek, "capable of judging the purposes." intents—rather, "conceptions" (CARILLIUS); "ideas." [ALFORD.] As the Greek for "thoughts" refers to the mind and feelings, so that for "intents," or rather "mental conceptions," refers to the intellect. 13. swearer—visible or invisible. In his sight—in God's sight (v. 13). "God's wisdom, simply manifold, and uniformly multiform, with incomprehensible comprehension, comprehends all things incomprehensible." comes—it, "thrown on the back so as to have the neck laid bare," as a victim with neck exposed for sacrifice. The Greek perfect tense implies that this is our continuous state in relation to God. "Show, O man, shame and fear towards thy God, for no woe, no twisting, banding, colouring, or disguise, can cover us!" (Greek, "disobedience," v. 11). Let us, therefore, earnestly labour to enter the rest lest any fall through practical unbelief (v. 11). 14. having, therefore, &c.—Resuming ch. 3, 17. great—as being "the Son of God, higher than the heavens" (ch. 7, 26); the archetype and antitype of the king high priest, passed into the heavens—rather, "passed through the heavens," viz., those which come between us and God, the aerial heaven, and that above the latter containing the heavenly bodies, the sun, moon, &c. These heavens were the veil which our High Priest passed through into the heaven of heavens, the immediate presence of God, just as the Levitical high priest passed through the veil into the Holy of holies. Neither Moses, nor even Joshua, could bring us into this rest, but Jesus, as our Forerunner, already spiritually, and hereafter in actual presence, body, soul, and spirit, brings His people into the heavenly rest. Jesus—the antitypical Joshua (v. 8), held fast—the opposite of "let slip" (ch. 2, 1); and "fall away" (ch. 6, 6). As the genitive follows, the lit. sense is, "Let us take hold of our profession," i. e., of the faith and hope which are the subjects of our profession and confession. The accusative follows when the sense is "hold fast." [TITTMANN.] 15. For—The motive to "holding our profession" (v. 14), viz., the sympathy and help we may expect from our High Priest. Though "great" (v. 14), He is not above caring for us; nay, as being in all points one with us as to manhood, sin only excepted, He sympathizes with us in every temptation. Though exalted to the highest heavens, He has changed His place, not His nature and office in relation to us, His condition, but not His affection. (X. Matthew, 28, 28. "Watch with me;" showing His desire in the days of His flesh for the sympathy of those whom He loved; so He now gives His suffering people His sympathy. (X. Aaron, the type, bearing the names of the twelve tribes in the breastplate of judgment on his heart, when he entered into the holy place, for a memorial before the Lord continually (Exodus, 28, 29). cannot be touched by the feeling of—Greek, "cannot sympathize with our infirmities;" our weakness, physical and moral (not sin, but liability to its assaults). He, though sinless, can sympathize with us sinners; His understanding more acutely perceived the forms of temptation than we who are weak can; His will repelled them as instantaneously as the fire does the drop of water cast into it. He, therefore, experimentally knew what power was needed to overcome temptations. He is capable of sympathizing, for He was at the same time tempted without sin, and yet truly tempted. [BENJAMIN.] In Him alone we have an example suited to men of every character and under all circumstances. In sympathy He adapts himself to each, as if He had not merely taken on Him man's nature in general, but also the peculiar nature of that single individual.

but—nay, rather, He was (one) tempted." [ALFORD.] Like as we are—Greek, "according to (our) similitude." without sin—Greek choris, "separate from sin" (ch. 7, 26). If the Greek anew had been used, sin would have been regarded as the object absent from Christ the subject; but choris here implies that Christ, the subject, is regarded as separated from sin the object. [TYTSMANN.] Thus, throughout His temptations in their origin, process, and result, sin had nothing in Him: He was apart and separate from it. [ALFORD.] 16. come—rather as Greek, "approach," "draw near." boldly—Greek, "with confidence," or "freedom of speech" (Ephesians, 4, 19). the throne of grace—God's throne is become to us a throne of grace through the mediation of our High Priest at God's right hand (ch. 8, 1, 12, 2). Pleading our High Priest Jesus' meritorious death, we shall always find God on a throne of grace. Contrast Job's complaint (Job, 23, 2-5) and Elihu's "I," &c. (Job, 23, 23-28), obtain—rather, "receive," mercy—"Compassion," by its derivation (lit., fellow-feeling from communio of suffering), corresponds to the character of our High Priest, "touched with the feeling of our infirmities" (e. 15). and grace—Corresponding to "throne of grace." Mercy especially refers to the remission and removal of sins: grace, to the saving bestowal of spiritual gifts. [ESTRUS.] Cf. Come unto me...and I will give you rest (the rest received on first believing; take my yoke on you...and ye shall find rest (the continuing rest and peace found in daily submitting to Christ's easy yoke: the former answers to "receives mercy" here; the latter, to "and grace." Matthew, 11, 28, 29). in time of need—Greek, "seasonably." Before we are overwhelmed by the temptation: when we most need it, in temptations and persecutions: such as is suitable to the time, persons, and end designed (Psalm 104, 27). A supply of grace is in store for believers against all exigencies; but they are only supplied with it according as the need arises. Cf. "In due time," Romans, 5, 6. Not, as ALFORD explains, "Help in time," i. e., to day, while it is yet open to us: the accepted time (2 Corinthians, 6, 2). help—Cf. ch. 2, 18, "He is able to succour them that are tempted."

CHAPTER V.

VER. 1-14. CHRIST'S HIGH PRIESTHOOD: NEEDED QUALIFICATIONS: MUST BE A MAN: MUST NOT HAVE ASSUMED THE DIGNITY HIMSELF, BUT HAVE BEEN APPOINTED BY GOD: THEIR LOW SPIRITUAL PERCEPTIONS A BAR TO PAUL'S SAYING ALL HE MIGHT OF CHRIST'S MELCHISEDEC-LIKE PRIESTHOOD. 1. For—Substantiating ch. 4, 15. every—i. e., every legitimate high priest; for instance, the Levitical, as he is addressing Hebrews, among whom the Levitical priesthood was established as the legitimate one. Whatever, reasons Paul, is excellent in the Levitical priests, is also in Christ, and besides excellencies which are not in the Levitical priests, taken from among men—not from among angels who could not have a fellow-feeling with us men. This qualification Christ has, as being, like the Levitical priests, a man (ch. 2, 14, 16). Being "from men," He can be "for (i. e., in behalf of, for the good of) men," ordained—Greek, "constituted," "appointed," both gifts—to be joined with "for sins," as "sacrifices" is (the "both...and" requires this; therefore not the Hebrew Mincha, unbloody offerings, but animal whole burnt offerings, spontaneously given. "Sacrifices" are the animal sacrifices due according to the legal ordinance. [ESTRUS.] 2. Who can—Greek, "Being able:" not pleasing himself (Romans, 15, 3), have compassion—Greek, "estimate mildly," "feel leniently," or "moderately towards:" "to make allowance for," not showing stern rigour save to the obstinate (ch. 10, 29). ignorant—sins not committed in resistance of light and knowledge, but as Paul's past sin (1 Timothy, 1, 13). No sacrifice was appointed for wilful sin committed with a high hand: for such were to be punished with death; all other sins, viz., ignorances and errors, were confessed and expiated with sacrifices by the high priest, out of the way—not deliberately and altogether wilfully erring, but deluded through the fraud of Satan and their own carnal frailty and thoughtlessness. Infirmity—moral weakness which is sinful, and makes men capable of sin, and so requires to be expiated by sacrifices. This kind of "infirmity" Christ had not: He had the "infirmity" of body whereby He was capable of suffering and death. 3. by reason hereof—"on account of this" infirmity, he ought...also for himself, to offer for sins—the Levitical priest ought: in this our High Priest is superior to the Levitical. The second "for" is a different Greek term from the first: "in behalf of the people, &c., on account of sins." 4. as man—of any other family but Aaron's, according to the Mosaic law, can take to himself the office of high priest. This verse is quoted by some to prove the need of an apostolic succession of ordination in the Christian ministry; but the reference here is to the priesthood, not the Christian ministry. The analogy in our Christian dispensation would warn ministers, seeing that God has separated them from the congregation of His people to bring them near Himself, and to do the service of His house, and to minister (as He separated the Levites, Korah with his company), that content with this, they should beware of assuming the sacrificial priesthood also, which belongs to Christ alone. The sin of Korah was, not content with the ministry as a Levite, he took the sacerdotal priesthood also. No Christian minister, as such, is ever called Hiericus, i. e., sacrificing priest. All Christians, without distinction, whether ministers or people, have a metaphorical, not a literal, priesthood. The sacrifices which they offer are spiritual, not literal, their bodies and the fruit of their lips, praises continually (ch. 13, 15). Christ alone had a proper and true sacrifice to offer. The law sacrifices were typical, not metaphorical, as the Christian's, nor proper and true, as Christ's. In Roman times the Mosaic restriction of the priesthood to Aaron's family was violated. 5. glorified not himself—did not assume the glory of the priestly office of Himself without the call of God (John, 5, 54). but he that said—i. e., the Father glorified Him or appointed Him to the priesthood. This appointment was involved in, and was the result of, the Sonship of Christ, which qualified Him for it. None but the Divine Son could have fulfilled such an office (ch. 10, 5-9). The connexion of Sonship and priesthood is typified in the Hebrew title for priests being given to David's sons (2 Samuel, 8, 18). Christ did not constitute Himself the Son of God, but was from everlasting the only-begotten of the Father. On His Sonship depended His glorification, and His being called of God (e. 10), as Priest. 6. He is here called simply "Priest," in e. 5, "High Priest." He is a Priest absolutely, because He stands alone in that character without an equal. He is "High Priest" in respect of the Aaronic type, and also in respect to us, whom He has made priests by throwing open to us access to God. [BENNETT.] "The order of Melchisedec" is explained in ch. 7, 15, "the similitude of Melchisedec." The priesthood is similarly combined with His kingly office in Zechariah, 6, 13. Melchisedec was at once man, priest, and king. Paul's selecting as the type of Christ one not of the stock of Abraham, on which the Jews prided themselves, is an intimation of Messianic universalism. 7. in the days of his flesh—(ch. 2, 14; 10, 20.) Verses 7-9 state summarily the subject about to be handled more fully in chs. 7, and 8. when he had offered—rather, "in that He offered." His crying and tears were part of the experimental lesson of obedience which He submitted to learn from the Father (when God was qualifying Him for the high priesthood). "Who" is to be construed with "learned obedience" (or rather as Greek, "His obedience; the obedience which we all know about. This all shows that "Christ glorified not Himself to be made an High Priest" (v. 8), but was appointed thereto by the Father, prayers and supplications — Greek, "both prayers and supplications." In Gethsemane, where He prayed terris, and on the cross, where He cried, My God, my God, &c. probably repeating inwardly all the 2d Psalm. "Prayers" refer to the mind: "supplications" also to the body (viz., the suppliant attitude) (Matthew, 26, 39). [BAXTER.] with strong crying and tears.—The "tears" are an additional fact here communicated to us by the inspired apostle, not recorded in the gospels, though implied. Matthew, 26, 37, "sorrowful and very heavy." Mark, 14, 33; Luke, 22, 44, "in an agony He prayed more earnestly... His sweat... great drops of blood falling down to the ground." Psalm 22, 1 ("roaring...cry"), 2, 19, 21, 24; Ps. 2, 10, "I wept," able to save him from death.—Mark, 14, 36, "All things are possible unto thee" (John, 13, 37). His cry showed His entire participation of man's infirmity: His reference of His wish to the will of God, His sinless faith and obedience, heard in that he feared.—There is no intimation in Psalm 22, or the gospels, that Christ prayed to be saved from the mere act of dying. What He feared was the hiding of the Father's countenance. His holy filial love must rightly have shrunk from this strange and bitterest of trials without the imputation of impotence. To have been passively content at the approach of such a cloud would have been, not faith, but sin. The cup of death He prayed to be freed from was, not corporal, but spiritual death, i.e., the (temporary) separation of His human soul from the light of God's countenance. His prayer was "heard" in His Father's strengthening Him so as to hold fast His unswerving faith under the trial (My God, my God, was still His filial cry under it, still claiming God as His, though God hid His face), and soon removing it in answer to His cry during the darkness on the cross, "my God, my God," &c. But see below a further explanation of how He was heard. The Greek lit. is, "Was heard from His fear," i.e., so as to be saved from His fear. Cf. Psalm 22, 31, which well accords with this, "Save me from the lion's mouth (His prayer): thou hast heard me from the horns of the unicorns." Or what better accords with the strict meaning of the Greek noun, "in consequence of His REVERENTIAL FEAR," i.e., in that He shrunk from the horrors of separation from the bright presence of the Father, yet was reverentially cautious by no thought or word of impotence to give way to a shadow of distrust or want of perfect filial love. In the same sense ch. 12, 28 uses the noun, and ch. 11, 7 the verb. ALFORD somewhat similarly translates, "By reason of His reverent submission." I prefer "reverent fear." The word in derivation meant the cautious handling of some precious, yet delicate vessel, which with ruder handling might easily be broken. [TRESCHE.] This fully agrees with Jesus' spirit, "If it be possible...nevertheless not my will, but thy will be done," and with the context, v. 8, "Glorified not Himself to be made an High Priest," implying reverent fear: wherein it appears He had the requisite for the office specified v. 4, "No man taketh this honour unto himself." ALFORD well says, What is true in the Christian's life, that what we ask from God, though He may not grant in the form we wish, yet He grants in His own, and that a better form, does not hold good in Christ's case; for Christ's real prayer, "not my will, but thine be done," in consistency with His reverent fear towards the Father, was granted in the very form in which it was expressed, not in another. 8. Though He was (so it ought to be translated: a positive admitted fact: not a mere supposition as seems would imply) God's Divine Son (whence, even in His agony, He so lovingly and often cried, Father, Matthew, 26, 39), yet He learned His (so the Greek) obedience, not from His Sonship, but from His sufferings. As the Son, He was always obedient to the Father's will; but the special obedience needed to qualify Him as our High Priest, He learned experimentally in practical suffering. Cf. Philipians, 2, 6-8, "Equal with God, but...took upon Him the form of a servant, and became obedient unto death," &c. He was obedient already before His passion, but He stooped to a still more humiliating and trying form of obedience then. The Greek adage is, Painemata, mathemata, "sufferings, disciplinings." Praying and obeying, as in Christ's case, ought to go hand in hand. 9. made perfect—completed, brought to His goal of learning and suffering through death (ch. 2, 10: [ALFORD], viz., at His glorious resurrection and ascension. author—Greek, "cause," state all...that obey him—As Christ obeyed the Father, so must we obey Him by faith. eternal salvation—obtained for us in the short "days of Jesus' flesh" (v. 7; cf. v. 6, "for ever," Isaiah, 44, 17). 10. Great, rather, "Addressed by God (by the appellation) High Priest." Being formally recognised by God as High Priest at the time of His being "made perfect" (v. 9). He was High Priest already in the purpose of God before His passion; but after it, when perfected, He was formally addressed so. 11. Here he digresses to complain of the low spiritual attainments of the Palestinian Christians, and to warn them of the danger of falling from light once enjoyed; at the same time encouraging them by God's faithfulness to persevere. At ch. 6, 20, he resumes the comparison of Christ to Melchisedec, hard to be uttered—rather as Greek, "hard of interpretation to speak." Hard for me to state intelligibly to you owing to your dulness about spiritual things. Hence, instead of saying many things, he writes in comparatively few words (ch. 12, 23). In the "we," Paul, as usual, includes "Timothy with himself in addressing them. ye are—Greek, "ye have become dull" (the Greek, by derivation, means hard to move): this implies that once, when first "enlightened," they were earnest and zealous, but had become dull. That the Hebrew believers at JERUSALEM were dull in spiritual things, and legal in spirit, appears from Acts, 21, 20-24, where James and the elders expressly say of the "thousands of Jews which believe," that "they are all zealous of the law:" this was at Paul's last visit to Jerusalem, after which this epistle seems to have been written (v. 12, Note on "for the time"). 12. for the time—considering the long time that you have been Christians. Therefore this epistle was not one of those early written, which be the first principles—Greek, "the rudiments of the beginning of," &c. A Pauline phrase (Notes, Galatians, 4, 3, 9). Ye need not only to be taught the first elements, but also "which they be." They are therefore enumerated ch. 6, 1, 2. [BENGEL.] ALFORD translates, "That some one teach you the rudiments;" but the position of the Greek hina, inclines me to take it interrogatively, "which," as English Version, Syrjac, Vulgate, &c. of the oracles of God—viz., of the Old Testament: instead of seeing Christ as the end of the Old Testament scripture, they were relapsing towards Judaism, so as not only not to be capable of understanding the typical reference to Christ of such an Old Testament personage as Melchisedec, but even much more elementary references, are become—through indolence, milk...not...strong meat—"Milk" refers to such fundamental first principles as he enumerates ch. 6, 1, 2. The solid meat, or food, is not absolutely necessary for preserving life, but is so for acquiring greater strength. Especially in the case of the Hebrews, who were much given to allegorical interpretations of their law, which they so much venerated, the application of the Old Testament types, to Christ and His High Priesthood, was calculated much to strengthen them in the Christian faith. [LEMBORCH.] 13. useth—Greek, "partaketh," i.e., taketh as his portion. Even strong men partake of milk, but do not make milk their chief, useth less their sole, diet. the word of righteousness—the gospel wherein “the righteousness of God is revealed from faith to faith” (Romans, 1. 17), and which is called “the ministration of righteousness” (3 Corinthians, 5. 9). This includes the doctrine of justification and sanctification; the first principles, as well as the perfection, of the doctrine of Christ: the nature of the offices and person of Christ as the true Melchisedec, i.e., “King of righteousness” (cf. Matthew, 2. 15). 14. strong meat—“solid food.” by reason of use—Greek, “habit.” them ... of full age—lit. “perfect;” akin to “perfection” (ch. 6. 1). senses—organs of sense. exercised—similarly connected with “righteousness” in ch. 11. 11. to discern both good and evil—as a child no longer an infant (Isaiah, 7. 16): so able to distinguish between sound and unsound doctrine. The mere child puts into its mouth things hurtful and things nutritious, without discrimination; but not so the adult. Paul again alludes to their tendency not to discriminate, but to be carried about by strange doctrines in ch. 13. 9.

CHAPTER VI.

VEY, 1-14. WARNING AGAINST RETROGRADING, WHICH SOON LEADS TO APOSTASY; ENCOURAGEMENT TO STEADFASTNESS FROM GOD'S FAITHFULNESS TO HIS WORD AND OATH. 1. Therefore—Wherefore: seeing that ye ought not now to be still “babes” (ch. 5. 11-14). leaving—getting further forward than the elementary “principles.” “As in building a house, one must never leave the foundation; yet to be always labouring in ‘laying the foundation’ would be ridiculous.” [CALVIN.] the principles of the doctrine—Greek, “the word of the beginning;” i.e., the discussion of the first principles of Christianity (ch. 6. 12). let us go on—Greek, “let us be borne forward;” or “bear ourselves forward;” implying active exertion; press on. St. Paul, in teaching, here classifies himself with his Hebrew readers, or (as they ought to be) learners, and says, Let us together press forward. perfection—the matured knowledge of those who are “of full age” (ch. 5. 14) in Christian attainments. foundation of—i.e., consisting in “repentance.” repentance from dead works—viz. not springing from the vital principle of faith and love towards God, and so counted, like their doer, dead before God. This repentance from dead works is therefore paired with “faith toward God.” The three pairs of truths enumerated are designedly such as JEWISH believers might in some degree have known from the Old Testament, but had been taught more clearly when they became Christians. This accounts for the omission of distinct specification of some essential first principle of Christian truth. Hence, too, he mentions “faith toward God,” and not explicitly faith toward Christ (though of course included). Repentance and faith were the first principles taught under the gospel. 2. the doctrine of baptisms—paired with “laying on of hands,” as the latter followed on Christian baptism, and answers to the rite of confirmation in Episcopal churches. Jewish believers passed, by an easy transition, from Jewish baptismal purifications (ch. 9. 10, “washings”), baptism of proselytes, and John's baptism, and legal imposition of hands, to their Christian analogues, baptism, and the subsequent laying on of hands, accompanied by the gift of the Holy Ghost (cf. v. 4). Greek. Baptismoi, plural, including Jewish and Christian baptisms are to be distinguished from Baptisma, singular, restricted to Christian baptism. The six particulars here specified had been, as it were, the Christian Cat. ch. sm of the Old Testament; and such Jews who had begun to recognise Jesus as the Christ immediately on the new light being shed on these fundamental particulars, were accounted as having the elementary principles of the doctrine of Christ. [BENNETT.] The first and most obvious elementary instruction of Jews, would be the teaching them the typical significance of their own ceremonial law in its

Christian fulfilment. [ALFORD.] resurrection, &c.—held already by the Jews from the Old Testament: confirmed with clearer light in Christian teaching or “doctrine.” eternal judgment—judgment fraught with eternal consequences either of joy or of woe. 3. will we do—So some of the oldest MSS. read; but others, “Let us do.” “This,” i.e., “Go on unto perfection.” If God permit—For even in the case of good resolutions, we cannot carry them into effect, save through God “working in us both to will and to do of His good pleasure” (Philippians, 2. 13). The “for” in v. 4, refers to this: I say, if God permit, for there are cases where God does not permit, ex. gr. “it is impossible,” &c. Without God's blessing, the cultivation of the ground does not succeed (v. 7). 4. We must “go on towards perfection;” for if we fall away, after having received enlightenment, it will be impossible to renew us again to repentance, for those—“in the case of those,” viz. those enlightened—once for all illuminated by the word of God taught in connexion with “baptism” (to which, in v. 2, as once for all done, “once enlightened” here answers, cf. Ephesians, 4. 20). This passage probably originated the application of the term “illumination” to baptism in subsequent times. Illumination, however, was not supposed to be the inseparable accompaniment of baptism: thus CRYSTOSTOM says, “Heretics have baptism, not illumination: they are baptized in body, but not enlightened in soul: as Simon Magus was baptized, but not illuminated.” That “enlightened” here means knowledge of the word of truth, appears from comparing the same Greek word, “illuminated,” ch. 10. 32, with 26, where “knowledge of the truth” answers to it. tasted of the heavenly gift—tasted for themselves. As “enlightened” refers to the sense of sight: so here tasted follows. “The heavenly gift:” Christ given by the Father, and revealed by the enlightening word preached and written: as conferring peace in the remission of sins; and as the Bestower of the gift of the Holy Spirit (Acts, 8. 19, 20). made partakers of the Holy Ghost—Specified as distinct from, though so inseparably connected with, “enlightened,” and “tasted of the heavenly gift,” Christ, as answering to “laying on of hands” after baptism, which was then generally accompanied with the impartation of the Holy Ghost in miraculous gifts. 5. tasted the good word of God—Distinct from “tasted of (genitive) the heavenly gift;” we do not yet enjoy all the fulness of Christ, but only have a taste of Him, the heavenly gift now; but believers may taste the whole word (accusative) of God already, viz. God's “good word” of promise. The Old Testament promise of Canaan to Israel, typified “the good word of God's” promise of the heavenly rest (ch. 4.). Therefore, there immediately follows the clause, “the powers of the world to come.” As “enlightening” and “tasting of the heavenly gift,” Christ, the Bread of Life, answers to FAITH; so “made partakers of the Holy Ghost,” to CHARITY, which is the first fruit of the Spirit; and “tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come,” to HOPE. Thus the triad of privileges answers to the Trinity, the Father, Son, and Spirit, in their respective words towards us. “The world to come” is the Christian dispensation, viewed especially in its future gloria, though already begun in grace here. The world to come thus stands in contrast to course of this world, altogether disorganised, because God is not its spirit of action and end. By faith, Christians make the world to come a present reality, though but a foretaste of the perfect future. The powers of this new spiritual world, partly exhibited in outward miracles at that time, and then, as now, especially consisting in the Spirit's inward quickening influences, are the earnest of the coming inheritance above, and lead the believer who gives himself up to the Spirit, to seek to live as the angels, to sit with Christ in heavenly places, to sit the sions on things above, and not on things on earth, & to look for Christ's coming and the full manifestation of the world to come. This "world to come," in future aspect, thus corresponds to "resurrection of the dead and eternal life" (v. 2), the first Christian principle which the Hebrew believers had been taught, the Christian light being thrown back on their Old Testament for their instruction (Notes, v. 1, 2). "The old to come," which, as to its "powers," exists only in the reformed, will pass into a fully realized state at Christ's coming (Colossians, 3, 4). 6. If—Greek, had (yet) have fallen away: cf. a less extreme falling decision, Galatians, 4, 4. "Ye are fallen from grace." Here an entire and wilful apostasy is meant: Hebrews had not yet so fallen away; but he warns us that such would be the final result of retrogression, if, instead of "going on to perfection," they should stop to learn again the first principles of Christianity. 7. To renew them again—they have been "once & already renewed, or made anew, and now they are to be "renewed" over "again." cradly to themselves the Son of God—"are crucifying to themselves Christ, instead of, like Paul, crucifying the world unto us by the cross of Christ" (Galatians, 6, 14). So in ch. 28, "trodden under foot the Son of God, and counted blood of the covenant, wherewith...sanctified, an holy thing." "The Son of God," marking His deity, shows the greatness of their offence. put him an open shame—lit., "make a public example of" us, as if He were a malefactor suspended on a tree. hat the carnal Israel did outwardly, those who fall away from light do inwardly, they virtually crucify in the Son of God: "they tear Him out of the recesses of their hearts where He had fixed His abode, & exhibit Him to the open scoffs of the world as nothing powerless and common." (Interp. in ROM.) The Montanists and Novatians used this sense to justify the lasting exclusion from the church those who had once lapsed. The Catholic church rays opposed this view, and re-admitted the lapsed their repentance, but did not re-baptize them. is passage implies that persons may be in some use "renewed," and yet fall away finally; for the vid., "renew again," imply that they have been, in a sense, not the full sense, ONCE RENEWED by the Holy Ghost; but certainly not that they are "the elect." these can never fall away, being chosen unto everlasting life (John, 10, 28). The elect abide in Christ, or, and continuously obey His voice, and do not fall away. He who abides not in Christ, is cast forth as a thered branch; but he who abides in Him becomes free and more free from sin: the wicked one cannot reach him; and he by faith overcomes the world. A spurious faith is possible, without one thereby being instituted one of the elect (Mark, 4, 16, 17). At the same time it does not limit God's grace, as if it were impossible for God to reclaim even such a hardened soul so as yet to look on Him whom he has pierced. impossibility rests in their having known in themselves once the power of Christ's sacrifice, and yet now rejecting it: there cannot possibly be any new means provided for their renewal afresh, and the means provided by God's love they now, after experience of same, deliberately and continuously reject: their conscience being seared, and they "twice dead" (Jude, 12), now past hope, except by a miracle of God's grace. t is the curse of evil eternally to propagate evil." Interp. "He who is led into the whole (compass) Christian experiences, may yet cease to abide in same: he who abides not in them, was, at the very best when he had those objective experiences, not *sub-*stantially true to them; otherwise there would have been filled in him, "Whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance" (Matthew, 13), so that he would have abided in them and not have fallen away." [Interp.] Such a one was never truly a Spirit-led disciple of Christ (Romans, 8, 14-17). The sin against the Holy Ghost, though somewhat similar, is not identical with this sin; for that sin may be committed by those outside the church (as in Matthew, 12, 31, 32); this, only by those inside. 7. the earth—rather as Greek (no article), "land," which drinketh in—Greek, "which has drunk in;" not merely receiving it on the surface. Answering to those who have enjoyed the privilege of Christian experiences, being in some sense renewed by the Holy Ghost; true alike of those who persevere, and those who "fall away," the rain that cometh et upon it—not merely falling over it, or towards it, but falling and resting upon it so as to cover it (the Greek genitive, not the accusative). The "oft" implies, on God's part, the riches of His abounding grace "abounding" spontaneously, and often; and, on the apostate's part, the wilful perversity whereby he has done continual despite to the oft-repeated motions of the Spirit. Cf. "How often," Matthew, 23, 27. The rain of heaven falls both on the elect and the apostate. bringeth forth—as the natural result of "having drunk in the rain." See above. herbs—provident. meet—fit. Such as the master of the soil wishes. The opposite of "rejected," v. 8, by whom—rather as Greek, "for (i.e., on account of) whom," viz., the lords of the soil; not the labourers, as English Version, viz., God and His Christ (1 Corinthians, 3, 9). The heart of man is the earth: man is the dresser: herbs are brought forth meet, not for the dresser, by whom, but for God, the owner of the soil, for whom it is dressed. The plural is general, the owners whosoever they may be: here God, receive—"partaketh of" blessing—fruitfulness. Contrast God's curse causing unfruitfulness, Genesis, 3, 17, 18; also spiritually (Jeremiah, 17, 5-8). From God—Man's use of means are vain unless God bless (1 Corinthians, 3, 4, 7). 8. That which—rather as Greek (no article), "But if (the 'land,' v. 7) bear:" not so favourable a word as "bringeth forth," v. 7, said of the good soil. briars—Greek, "thistles," rejected—after having been tested; so the Greek implies. Reprobate...rejected by the Lord, nigh unto cursing—on the verge of being given up to its own barrenness by the just curse of God. This "nigh" softens the severity of the previous "it is impossible," &c. (v. 4, 6). The ground is not yet actually cursed, whose—"of which (land) the end is unto burning," viz., with the consuming fire of the last judgment; as the land of Sodom was given to "brimstone, salt, and burning" (Deuteronomy, 29, 23); so as to the ungodly (Matthew, 3, 10, 12; 7, 19; 18, 30; John, 16, 6; 2 Peter, 3, 10). Jerusalem, which had so resisted the grace of Christ, was then nigh unto cursing, and in a few years was burned. Cf. Matthew, 22, 7: "Burned up their city:" an earnest of a like fate to all wilful abusers of God's grace (ch. 10, 26, 27). 9. We are persuaded—on good grounds: the result of proof. Cf. Romans, 15, 14, "I myself am persuaded of you, my brethren, that ye are full of goodness." A confirmation of the Pauline authorship of this epistle. beloved—Appositely here introduced: LOVE to you prompts me in the strong warnings I have just given, not that I entertain unfavourable thoughts of you; nay, I anticipate better things of you, Greek, "the things which are better;" that ye are not thorn-bearing, or nigh unto cursing, and doomed unto burning, but heirs of salvation in accordance with God's faithfulness (ch. 6, 10), things that accompany—Greek, "things that hold by," i.e., are close unto "salvation." Things that are linked unto salvation (cf. v. 19). In opposition to "nigh unto cursing," though—Greek, "if even we thus speak." "For it is better to make you afraid with words, than ye may not suffer in fact." 10. Not unrighteous—not unfaithful to His own gracious promise. Not that we have any inherent right to claim reward; for (1.) a servant has no merit, &c.

only does that which is his bounden duty; (2.) our best performances bear no proportion to what we leave undone; (3.) all strength comes from God; but God has promised of His own grace to reward the good works of His people already accepted through faith in Christ; it is His promise, not our merits, which would make it unrighteous were He not to reward His people's works. God will be no man's debtor. your work—your whole Christian life of active obedience. labour of love—The oldest MSS. omit "labour of," which probably crept in from 1 Thesalonians, 1. 3. As "love" occurs here, so "hope," v. 11, "faith," v. 12; as in 1 Corinthians, 13. 13; the Pauline triad. By their love he sharpens their hope and faith. ye have showed—(cf. ch. 10. 32-34.) toward his name—your acts of love to the saints were done for His name's sake. The distressed condition of the Palestinian Christians appears from the collection for them. Though receiving bounty from other churches, and therefore not able to minister much by pecuniary help, yet those somewhat better off could minister to the greatest sufferers in their church in various other ways (cf. 2 Timothy, 1. 18). St. Paul, as elsewhere, gives them the utmost credit for their graces, whilst delicately hinting the need of perseverance, a lack of which had probably somewhat begun to show itself. 11. And—Greek, "But," desire—Greek, "earnestly desire." The language of fatherly affection, rather than command, every one of you—Implying that all in the Palestinian churches had not shown the same diligence as some of those whom he praises in v. 10. "He cares alike for great and small, and overlooks none." "Every one of them," even those diligent in acts of love (v. 10), needed to be stimulated to persevere in the same diligence with a view to the full assurance of hope unto the end. They needed, besides love, patient perseverance, resting on hope and faith (ch. 10. 36; 13. 7). Cf. "the full assurance of faith," ch. 10. 22; Romans, 4. 21; 1 Thesalonians, 1. 5. unto the end—the coming of Christ. 12. be not—Greek, "become not." In ch. 5. 11, he said, "Ye have become dull (Greek, slothful) of hearing;" here he warns them not to become "slothful" absolutely, etc., also in mind and deed. He will not become slothful who keeps always the end in view: hope is the means of ensuring this. followers—Greek, "imitators;" so in Ephesians, 5. 1. Greek; 1 Corinthians, 11. 1. patience—Greek, "long-suffering endurance." There is the long-suffering patience, or endurance of love, 1 Corinthians, 13. 4, and that of faith, v. 15. them who... inherit the promises—Greek, "...who are inheriting," &c.: to whom the promises are their inheritance. Not that they have actually entered on the perfect inheritance, which ch. 11. 13, 29, 40, explicitly denies, though doubtless the dead in Christ have, in the disembodied soul, a foretaste of it; but "them (enumerated in ch. 11) who in every age have been, are, or shall be, inheritors of the promises" of whom Abraham is an illustrious example (v. 13). 13. For—Confirming the reasonableness of resting on "the promises" as infallibly sure, resting as they do on God's oath, by the instance of Abraham. "He now gives consolation, by the oath of God's grace, to those whom, in chs. 3. and 4., he had warned by the oath of God's 'wrath.' The oath of wrath did not primarily extend its force beyond the wilderness; but the oath of grace is in force for ever." [BENGE.] 14. multiplying... multiply—Hebraism for superabundantly multiply. thee—The increase of Abraham's seed is virtually an increase of himself. The argument here refers to Abraham himself as an example; therefore Paul quotes Genesis, 22. 17, "thee," instead of, "thy seed." 15. so—not relying on the promise. 16. for confirmation—thus to be joined, as English Version, to "an oath;" but to "an end." [ALFORD.] I prefer, "The oath is to them, in respect to confirmation [of one's solemn promise or covenant: as here, God's], an end of all contradiction" (so the

Greek is translated, ch. 12. 3, or "painsaying." This passage shows, (1) an oath is sanctioned even in the Christian dispensation as lawful; (2) that the limits to its use are, that it only be employed where it can put an end to contradiction vs. disputes, and for confirmation of a solemn promise. 17. Wherein—i.e., which being the case among men, God, in accommodation to their manner of confirming covenants, superadded to His sure word His oath: the "two immutable things" (v. 18). willing... counsel—Greek, "willing... will;" words akin. Expressing the utmost benignity. [BENGE.] more abundantly—than had He not sworn. His word would have been amply enough; but, to make assurance doubly sure, He "interposed with an oath" (so the Greek). Lat., He acted as Mediator, coming between Himself and us; as if He were less, while He avows, than Himself by whom He avows (for the less among men usually swear by the greater). Dost thou not yet believe, thou that hearest the promise! [BENGE.] heirs of promise—not only Abraham's literal, but also his spiritual, seed (Galatians, 3. 29). 18. immutable—translate, as in v. 17, "unchangeable." impossible... to lie—'ever to lie:' this is the force of the Greek aorist [ALFORD]. His not being able to deny Himself is a proof, not of weakness, but of strength incomparable, consolation—under doubts and fears, and so "encouragement." It., exhortation. fled for refuge—as if from a shipwreck. Or, as one fleeing to one of the six cities of refuge. Kedesh, i.e., holy, implies the holiness of Jesus, our Refuge. Shechem, i.e., shoulder, the government is upon His shoulder (Isaiah, 9. 6). Hebron, i.e., fellowship, believers are called into the fellowship of Christ. Bezer, i.e., a fortress, Christ is so to all who trust in Him. Ramoth, i.e., high, for Him hath God exalted with His right hand (Acts, 5. 31). Golan, i.e., joy, for in Him all the saints are justified and shall glory. lay hold upon the hope—i.e., the object of our hope, as upon a preservative from sinking, set before us—as a prize for which we strive: a new image, viz., the race-course (ch. 12. 1, 2). 19. Hope is found represented on coins by an anchor, sure and steadfast—sure in respect to us; steadfast, or firm. [ALFORD.] in itself. Not such an anchor as will not keep the vessel from tossing, or an anchor unsound or too light. [THEOPHYLACT.] which entereth into it [i.e. the place] within the veil—Two images beautifully combined: 1. The soul is the ship; the world, the sea; the bliss beyond the world, the distant coast; the hope resting on faith, the anchor which prevents the vessel being tossed to and fro; the encouraging consolation through the promise and oath of God, the cable connecting the ship and anchor. 2. The world is the fore-court; heaven, the Holy of holies; Christ, the High Priest going before us, so as to enable us, after Him, and through Him, to enter within the veil. ESTIUS explains, As the anchor does not stay in the waters, but enters the ground hidden beneath the waters, and fastens itself in it, so here, our anchor of the soul, is not satisfied with merely coming to the vestibule, i.e., is not content with merely earthly and visible goods, but penetrates even to those which are within the veil, viz., to the Holy of holies where it lays hold on God Himself, and heavenly goods, and fastens on them. "Hope, entering within heaven, hath made us already to be in the things promised to us, even whilst we are still below, and have not yet received them; such strength hope has, as to make those that are earthly to become heavenly." "The soul clings, as one in fear of shipwreck, to an anchor, and sees not whither the cable of the anchor runs—where it is fastened; but she knows that it is fastened behind the veil which hides the future glory." veil—Greek, catapetasma; the second veil which shut in the Holiest place. The outer veil was called, by a distinct Greek term, columina: "the second (i.e., the inner) veil." 20. The absence of the Greek article requires ALL ORD'S

CHAPTER VII.

22. CHRIST'S HIGH PRIESTHOOD AFTER THE MELCHISEDUB SUPERIOR TO AARON'S, Melchisede—(ch. 6, 20; Psalm 110. 4.) The verb some till v. 3, "abideth," king...priest—Christ see offices in their highest sense, and so re- patriarchal union of these offices. Salem—n, i.e., seeing peace: others make Salem- be to be that mentioned Genesis, 22, 18; John, he most high God—called also "Possessor of nd earth" (Genesis, 14, 19, 22). This title of a Most High," handed down by tradition from tive revelation, appears in the Phœnician on," i.e., Most High. It is used to imply that whom Melchisedec served is THE TRUE GOD, one of the gods of the nations around. So in the only other cases in which it is found ew Testament, viz., in the address of the , and the divining damsel constrained to con- her own gods were false, and God the only who met Abraham—in company with the dom (Genesis, 14, 17, 18), slaughter—perhaps ALFORD translates. So Genesis, 14, 17 (cf. 15), visited. Artoch, king of Elasar, lived and fter the disaster. (BERGEL.) However, if umer, and Anuraphel, and Tidal, were slain, rtoch survived, "slaughter of the kings" correct, blessed him—as priest he first blessed on God's part, next he blessed God on 's part: a reciprocal blessing. Not a mere authoritative and efficacious intercession est. The Most High God's prerogative as or of heaven and earth," is made over to ; and Abraham's glory, from his victory over s made over to God. A blessed exchange for (Genesis, 14, 19, 20). 2. gave—Greek, "ap- t," assigned as his portion. tenth...of all—viz., taken. The tithes given are closely associated riesthood: the mediating priest received them e of the giver's whole property being God's; conveyed God's gifts to man (v. 1, "blessed also man's gifts to God. Melchisedec is a ow God preserves, amidst general apostasy, remnant. The meeting of Melchisedec and is the connecting link between the two dis- a, the patriarchal, represented by Mel- who seems to have been specially consecrated as KING-PRIEST, the highest form of that system in which each father of a household it in it, and the Levitical, represented by , in which the priesthood was to be limited to y of one tribe and one nation. The Levitical itetical, and severed the kingdom and priest- patriarchal was the true forerunner of Christ's, ke Melchisedec's, unties the kingship and priesthood, and is not derived from other man, or trans- mitted to other man; but derived from God, and is transmitted in God to a never-ending perpetuity. Melchisedec's priesthood continueth in Christ for ever. For other points of superiority, see v. 16-21. Melchisedec must have had some special consecration above the other patriarchs, as Abraham, who also exercised the priesthood, else Abraham would not have paid tithes to him as to a superior: his peculiar function seems to have been, by God's special call, king-priest; whereas no other patriarch-priest was also a God-con-secrated king also. First being—Paul begins the mystical explanation of the historical fact (allegorical ex- planations being familiar to Jews), by mentioning the significance of the name, righteousness—not merely righteous; so Christ, Hebrew Melch means king; Tsedek, righteousness. King of Salem—not only his own name, but that of the city which he ruled, had a typical significance, viz., peace. Christ is the true Priest of peace. The peace which He brings is the fruit of right- eousness. 3. Without father, &c.—Explained by "with- out genealogy" (so the Greek is for "without descent"), cf. v. 3, i.e., his genealogy is not known; whereas a Levitical priest could not dispense with the proof of his descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of his—viz., history not having recorded his beginning nor end, as it has the beginning and end of Aaron. The Greek idiom expressed by "without father," &c., one whose parentage was humble or unknown. "Days" mean his time of discharging his function. So the eternally spoken of in Psalm 110. 4, is that of the priestly office chiefly, made like—it is not said that he was absolutely "like." Made like, viz., in the particu- lars here specified. Nothing is said in Genesis of the end of his priesthood, or of his having had in his priesthood either predecessor or successor, which, in a typical point of view, represents Christ's eternal priesthood, without beginning or end. Aaron's end is recorded; Melchisedec's not: typically significant. "The Son of God" is not said to be made like unto Melchisedec, but Melchisedec to be "made like the Son of God." When ALFORD denies that Melchisedec was made like the Son of God in respect of his priest- hood, on the ground that Melchisedec was prior in time to our Lord, he forgets that Christ's eternal priesthood was an archetypal reality in God's purpose from everlasting, to which Melchisedec's priesthood was "made like" in due time. The Son of God is the more ancient, and is the archetype: cf. ch. 8. 5, where the heavenly things are represented as the primary arch- etype of the Levitical ordinances. The epithets, "with- out father, &c., beginning of days nor end, abideth continually," belong to Melchisedec only in respect to his priesthood, and in so far as he is a type of the Son of God, and are strictly true of Him alone. Melchisedec was, in his priesthood, "made like" Christ, as far as the imperfect type could represent the lineaments of the perfect archetype. "The portrait of a living man can be seen on the canvas, yet the man is very different from his picture." There is nothing in the account, Genesis, 14., to mark Melchisedec as a superhuman being: he is classed with the other kings in the chapter as a living historic personage: not as ORIGIN thought, an angel; nor as the Jews thought, Shem, son of Noah; nor as Calmet, Enoch; nor as the Melchisedekites, that he was the Holy Ghost; nor as others, the Divine Word. He was probably of Semitic, not Canaanite origin: the last independent representative of the original Semitic population, which had been van- quished by the Canaanites, Ham's descendants. The greatness of Abraham then lay in hopes; of Melchisedec, in present possession. Melchisedec was the highest and last representative of the Noachic covenant, as Christ was the highest and ever-enduring representa- tive of the Abrahamic. Melchisedec, like Christ, unties in himself the kingly and priestly offices, which Abraham does not. ALFORD thinks the epithets are, in some sense, strictly true of Melchisedec himself; not merely in the typical sense given above; but that he had not, as mortal men have, a beginning or end of life (v. 3). A very improbable theory, and only to be resorted to in the last extremity, which has no place here. With Melchisedec, whose priesthood probably lasted a long period, the priesthood and worship of the true God in Canaan ceased. He was first and last king-priest there, till Christ, the antitype; and therefore his priesthood is said to last for ever, because it both lasts a long time, and lasts as long as the nature of the thing itself (vis., his life, and the continuance of God's worship in Canaan) admits. If Melchisedec were high priest for ever in a literal sense, then Christ and he would now still be High Priests, and we should have two instead of one (5). THOLUCK remarks, "Melchisedec remains in so far as the type remains in the antitype, in so far as his priesthood remains in Christ." The father and mother of Melchisedec, as also his children, are not descended from Levi, as the Levitical priests (v. 6) were required to be, and are not even mentioned by Moses. The wife of Aaron, Elisheba, the mother from whom the Levitical priests spring, is mentioned: as also Sarah, the original mother of the Jewish nation itself. As man, Christ had no father; as God, no mother. 4. consider—not merely see, but weigh with attentive contemplation, the fact, also—"To whom (as his superior) Abraham eeen paid tithes (went so far as to pay tithes) (of consisting of, lit., from) the best of the spoils" (lit., the top of the heap; whether of corn, the first fruits of which, taken from the top, used to be consecrated to God; or of spoils, from the top of which the general used to take some portion for consecration to God, or for his own use). He paid "tithes of ALL," and those tithes were taken out of the topmost and best portion of the whole spoils. The patriarch—in the Greek emphatically standing at the end of the whole sentence: And this payer of tithes being no less a personage than "the patriarch," the first forefather and head of our Jewish race and nation. See Note, v. 3, on Melchisedec's superiority as specially consecrated king-priest, above the other patriarch-priests. 5. sons of Levi—vis., those alone who belonged to the family of Aaron, to whom the priesthood was restricted. Tithes originally paid to the whole tribe of Levi, became at length attached to the priesthood, according to the law—sanctioned by Jehovah (ch. 9. 19), of their brethren—with whom, in point of natural descent, they are on a level, though, &c.,—though thus on a level by common descent from Abraham, they yet pay tithes to the Levites, whose brethren they are. Now the Levites are subordinate to the priests; and these again to Abraham, their common progenitor; and Abraham to Melchisedec. "How great" (v. 4) then, must this Melchisedec be in respect to his priesthood, as compared with the Levitical, though the latter received tithes; and how unspeakably great must "the Son of God" be, to whom, as the sacerdotal archetype (in God's purpose), Melchisedec was made like. Thus compare the "consider," v. 4, in the case of Melchisedec, the type, with the "consider" (Greek, contemplate attentively, Note, ch. 3. 1, a stronger word than here) in the case of Christ, the archetype. 6. he whose descent is not counted from them—not from "the sons of Levi," as those "who receive the priesthood." This verse explains "without descent" (Greek genealogy in both verses, v. 3). He who needs not, as the Levitical priests, to be able to trace his genealogy back to Levi, received—Greek, "hath received tithes," blessed—Greek, "hath blessed." The perfect tense implies that the significance of the fact endures to the present time, him that had—"the possessor of the promises," Abraham's peculiar distinction and designation. Paul exalts

Abraham in order still more to exalt Melchisedec. When Christ is the subject, the singular "promise" is used. "The promises," in the plural, refer to God's promise of greatness to himself and his seed, and of the possession of Canaan, twice repeated before the blessing of Melchisedec. As the priests, though above the people (v. 7) whom it was their duty to "bless," were yet subordinate to Abraham; and as Abraham was subordinate to Melchisedec, who blessed him, Melchisedec must be much above the Levitical priests. 7. The principle that the blesser is superior to him whom he blesses, holds good only in a blessing given with divine authority; not merely a prayerful wish, but one that is divinely efficient in working its purport, as that of the patriarchs on their children; so Christ's blessing, Luke, 24. 41; Acts, 3. 26. 8. Second point of superiority: Melchisedec's is an enduring, the Levitical a transitory, priesthood. As the law was a parenthesis between Abraham's dispensation of promise of grace, and its enduring fulfillment at Christ's coming (Romans, 5. 20, Greek, "The law entered as something additional and by the way"); so the Levitical priesthood was parenthetical and temporary, between Melchisedec's typically-enduring priesthood, and its antitypical realization in our ever-continuing High Priest, Christ, here—in the Levitical priesthood, there—in the priesthood after the order of Melchisedec. In order to bring out the typical parallel more strongly, Paul substitutes "He of whom it is witnessed that he liveth," for the more untypical, "He who is made like to Him that liveth." Melchisedec "liveth" merely in his official capacity, his priesthood being continued in Christ, Christ, on the other hand, is, in His own person, "ever-living after the power of an endless life" (v. 16. 20. Melchisedec's death not being recorded, is expressed by the positive term "liveth," for the sake of bringing into prominence the antitype, Christ, of whom alone it is strictly and perfectly true, "that He liveth." 9. as I may so say—to preclude what he is about to say being taken in the mere literal sense; I may say that, virtually, Levi, in the person of his father Abraham, acknowledged Melchisedec's superiority, and paid tithes to him, whosoever tithes—cf. v. 6.) is Abraham—Greek, "by means of (by the hand of) Abraham; through Abraham." "Paid tithes," lit., "hath been tithed," i.e., been taken tithes of. 10. in the loins of his father—i.e., forefather Abraham, Christ did not, in this sense, pay tithes in Abraham, for He never was in the loins of an earthly father. [ALFORD.] Though in respect to His mother, He was "of the fruit of (David's, and so of) Abraham's loins," yet being supernaturally, without human father, conceived, as He is above the natural law of birth, so is He above the law of tithes. Those alone born in the natural way, and so in sin, being under the curse, needed to pay tithes to the priest, that he might make propitiation for their sin. Not so Christ, who derived only his flesh, not also the taint of the flesh, from Abraham. ESSER remarks, The blessings which Abraham had before meeting Melchisedec, were the general promises, and the special one of a natural seed, and so of Levi; but the promises under which Christ was comprehended, and the faith for which Abraham was so commended, followed after Abraham's meeting Melchisedec, and being blessed by him: to which fact, Genesis, 15. 1, "After these things," calls our attention. This explains why Christ, the supernatural seed, is not included as paying tithes through Abraham to Melchisedec. 11. perfection—absolute; "the bringing of man to his highest state, vis., that of salvation and sanctification." under it—The reading in the oldest MSS. is, "Upon it (i.e., on the ground of it) as the basis, the priest having to administer the law, Malachi, 2. 7: it being presupposed) the people (ch. 9. 19, 'all the people') hath received the law" (the Greek is perfectly).

For God does see, another—rather as Greek, "that a (one of a different order) should arise" not be called—Greek, "not be said (to order of Aaron," i.e., that, when spoken in 110. 4, "He is not said to be (as we, if the Aaronic priesthood was perfect) of Aaron." 12. Another proof or economy, is changed, viz., forasmuch ppointed Priest, "not according to the i (i.e., a mere outward) commandment," g to the power of an indissoluble (so the The 110th Psalm appoints Him "for he Levitical law required a definite car- n-contrast stands "the power"; Christ's rd living power of overcoming death. to a statute is Christ appointed, but in inward living power. But our nherent "power," now in heaven, has in -ever," ch. 9. 14, "through the eternal 25, "able"...ever liveth" (John, 5. 26), iver of His resurrection life, not of His at Christ officiates as a Priest. 17. For life to be "endless" or indissoluble mphasis is on "for ever." The oldest e is testified of, that Thou art," &c. 18, "there takes place," according to Psalm illing—a repealing, of the commandment to Levitical priesthood. And, as the Levitical priesthood and the law are inseparably joined, since the former is repealed, the latter is so also (Note, v. 11), going before—the legal ordinance introducing and giving place to the Christian, the antitypical and permanent end of the former, weakness and unprofitableness—The opposite of "power" (v. 16). 19. For, &c.—Justifying his calling the law weak and unprofitable (v. 18). The law could not bring men to true justification or sanctification before God, which is the "perfection" that we all need in order to be accepted of Him, and which we have in Christ, nothing—not merely "no one," but "nothing." The law brought nothing to its perfected end; everything in it was introductory to its antitype in the Christian economy, which realizes the perfection contemplated; cf. "unprofitableness" v. 18, did—rather connect with v. 18, thus, "There takes place (by virtue of Psalm 110. 4) a repealing of the commandment (on the one hand); but (on the other) a bringing in afterwards (the Greek expresses that there is a bringing in of something over and above the law; a superseding, or accession of something new, viz., something better than the good things which the pre-existing law promised [WAS.] of a better hope, not one weak and unprofitable, but, as elsewhere the Christian dispensation is called, "everlasting," "true," "the second," "more excellent," "different," "living," "new," "to come," "perfect." Cf. ch. 8. 8, bringing us near to God, now in spirit, hereafter both in spirit and in body. we draw nigh unto God—the sure token of "perfection." Weakness is the opposite of this filial confidence of access. The access through the legal sacrifices was only symbolical and through the medium of a priest; that through Christ is immediate, perfect, and spiritual. 20. Another proof of the superiority of Christ's Melchisedec-like priesthood: the oath of God gave a solemn weight to it which was not in the law-priesthood, which was not so confirmed. he was made Priest—rather supply from v. 22, which completes the sentence begun in this verse. v. 21 being a parenthesis, "Inasmuch as not without an oath He was made every of the testament (for, &c.), of so much better a testament hath Jesus been made the surety." 21. Translate in the Greek order. "For they indeed (the existing legal priests) without the (solemn) promise on oath (so the Greek [ΤΙΤΗΜΑΝ]) are made priests," by him—God, unto him—the Lord, the Son of God (Psalm 110. 1), not repeat—never change His purpose. after the order of Melchisedec—Omitted in some oldest MSS., contained in others. 22. surety—ensuring in His own person the certainty of the covenant to us. This He did by becoming responsible for our guilt, by sealing the covenant with His blood, and by being openly acknowledged as our triumphant Saviour by the Father, who raised Him from the dead. Thus He is at once God's surety for man, and man's surety for God, and so Mediator between God and man (ch. 8. 6). better—ch. 8. 6; 13. 20, "everlasting" testament—sometimes translated "covenant." The Greek term implies that it is appointed by God, and comprises the relations and bearings partly of a covenant, partly of a testament: (1.) the appointment made without the concurrence of a second party, of somewhat concerning that second party: a last will or testament, so in ch. 9. 16, 17; (2.) a mutual agreement in which both parties consent. 23. Another proof of superiority: the Levitical priests were many, as death caused the need of continually new ones being appointed in succession. Christ dies not, and so hath a priesthood which passes not from one to another. were—Greek, "are made," many—one after another: opposed to His "unchangeable" (that does not pass from one to another) priesthood (v. 24), not suffered to continue—Greek, "hindered from permanently continuing," viz., in the priesthood. 24. be—emphatic: Greek, Himself. So in Psalm 110. 4, "Thou art a priest," &c.

not priests "many." contrast—Greek simple verb, not the compound as in v. 23. "Remaineth," viz., in life, unchangeable—Greek, "hath His priesthood unchangeable;" not passing from one to another, intransmissible. Therefore no earthly so-called apostolic succession of priests are His viceregers. The Jewish priests had successors in office because "they could not continue by reason of death." But this man, because He liveth ever, hath no successor in office, not even Peter (i Peter, 5. 1). 25. Wherefore—Greek, "Whence?" inasmuch as "He remaineth for ever," also—as a natural consequence flowing from the last, at the same time a new and higher thing. [ALFORD.] save—His very name JESUS (v. 22) meaning Saviour, to the uttermost—altogether, perfectly, so that nothing should be wanting afterwards for ever. [TITMANN.] It means "in any wise," "utterly," in Luke, 13. 11. come unto God—by faith, by him—through Him as their mediating Priest, instead of through the Levitical priests, seeing He ever liveth—re-suming "He continueth ever" v. 24; therefore "He is able to the uttermost;" He is not, like the Levitical priest, prevented by death, for "He ever liveth" (v. 23). to make intercession—There was but the one offering on earth once for all. But the intercession for us in the heavens (v. 26) is ever continuing, whence the result follows, that we can never be separated from the love of God in Christ. He intercedes only for those who come unto God through Him, not for the unbelieving world (John, 17. 9). As samples of His intercession, cf. the prophetic descriptions in the Old Testament. "By an humble omnipotency (for it was by His humiliation that He obtained all power), or omnipotent humility, appearing in the presence, and presenting His postulations at the throne of God." [BISHOP PEARSON.] He was not only the offering, but the priest who offered it. Therefore, He has become not only a sacrifice, but an intercessor: His intercession being founded on His voluntary offering of Himself without spot to God. We are not only then in virtue of His sacrifice forgiven, but in virtue of the intercession admitted to favour and grace. [ARCHBISHOP MAGEE.] 26. such—as is above described. The oldest MSS. read, "also." "For to us (as sinners; emphatical: there was also becoming besides the other excellencies of our High Priest) such an High Priest," holy—gious is distinct Greek word from that for holy, which latter implies consecration towards God: perfectly answering God's will in reverent piety (Psalm 16. 10). harmless—lit., "free from evil" and guile, in relation to Himself, undefiled—not defiled by stain contracted from others, in relation to men. Temptation, to which He was exposed, left no trace of evil in Him, separate—rather, "separated from sinners," viz., in His heavenly state as our High Priest above, after He had been parted from the earth, as the Levitical high priest was separated from the people in the sanctuary (whence he was not to go out), Leviticus, 21. 12. Though justifying through faith the ungodly, He hath no contact with them as such. He is lifted above our sinful community, being "made higher than the heavens," at the same time that He makes believers as such not as sinners, "to sit together (with Him) in heavenly places" (Ephesians, 2. 6). Just as Moses on the mount was separated from and above the people, and alone with God. This proves Jesus is God. "Though innumerable lies have been forged against the venerable Jesus, none dared to charge Him with any impropriety." [ORIGEN.] made—Jesus was higher before (John, 17. 5), and as the God-MAN was made so by the Father after His humiliation (cf. ch. 1. 4). higher than the heavens—for "He passed through (so the Greek) the heavens" (ch. 4. 14). 27. daily—"day by day." The priests daily offered sacrifices (ch. 9. 6; 10. 11; Exodus, 29. 38-42). The high priests took part in these daily-offered sacrifices only on festival days; but as they represented the whole priesthood, the daily offerings are here attributed to them: their exclusive function was to offer the atonement "since every year" (ch. 9. 7), and "year by year continually" (ch. 10. 1). The "daily" strictly belongs to Christ, not to the high priests, "who needeth not daily, as those high priests (year by year, and their subordinate priests daily), to offer," &c. offer up—The Greek term is peculiarly used of sacrifices for sin. The high priest's double offering on the day of atonement, the bullock for himself, and the goat for the people's sins, had its counterpart in the two lambs offered daily by the ordinary priests. this he did—not "died first for His own sins and then the people's," but for the people's only. The negation is twofold: He needeth not to offer (1) daily; nor (2) to offer for His own sins also; for He offered Himself a spotless sacrifice (v. 26; ch. 4. 15). The sinless alone could offer for the sinful, especially as Greek, "once for all." The sufficiency of the one sacrifice to atone for all sins for ever, resulted from its absolute spotlessness. 28. For—Reason for the difference stated in v. 27, between His one sacrifice and their oft-repeated sacrifices, viz., because of His entire freedom from the sinful infirmity to which they are subject, He needeth not, as they, to offer FOR HIS OWN SINS; and being now exempt from death and "perfected for evermore," He needeth not to REPEAT His sacrifice, the word—"the word" confirmed by "the oath," which—oath was after the law, viz., in Psalm 110. 4, abrogating the preceding law-priesthood, the son—contracted with "men," as translated—Greek, "made perfect" once for all, in ch. 2. 16; 5. 9. Notes. Opposed to "having infirmity." Consecrated as a perfected priest by His perfected sacrifice and consequent anointing and exaltation to the right hand of the Father.

CHAPTER VIII.

VEY. 1-33. CHRIST, THE HIGH PRIEST IN THE TRUE SANCTUARY, SUPERSEDING THE LEVITICAL PRIESTHOOD: THE NEW, RENDEWS OBSOLETE THE OLD COVENANT. 1. the sum—rather, "the principal point" for the particle is present, not past, which would be required if the meaning were "the sum." "The chief point in (or, 'in the case' so the Greek, ch. 2. 10, 15, 17) the things which we are speaking," lit., "which as being spoken," such—so transcendently pre- eminent, viz., in this respect, that "He is set on the right hand," &c. Infinitely above all other priests in this one grand respect. He exercises His priesthood in HEAVEN, not in the earthly "holiest place" (ch. 10. 12). The Levitical high priests, even when they entered the Holiest place once a year, only stood for a brief space before the symbol of God's throne; but Jesus SITS on the throne of the Divine Majesty in the heaven itself, and this for ever (ch. 10. 11, 12). 2. minister—The Greek term implies priestly ministry in the temple, the sanctuary—Greek, "the holy places;" the Holy of holies. Here the heavenly sanctuary is meant, the true—the archetypal and antitypical, as contrasted with the typical and symbolical (ch. 9. 24). Greek alothinos (used here is opposed to that which does not fulfil its idea, as, for instance, a type; alothos, to that which is untrue and unreal, as a lie. The measure of alothos is reality; that of alothinos, ideality. In alothos the idea corresponds to the thing; in alothinos, the thing to the idea [KALMIS in ALFORD.] tabernacle—(ch. 9. 11.) His body. Through His glorified body as the tabernacle, Christ passes into the heavenly "Holy of holies," the immediate immaterial presence of God, where He intercedes for us. This tabernacle in which God dwells, where God in Christ meets us who are "members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones." This tabernacle answers to the heavenly Jerusalem, where God's visible presence is to be manifested to His perfected saints and angels, who are united to Christ the Head:

injection to His personal invisible presence of holies, unapproachable save to Christ. "Wom...dwell among us," Greek, "tabernacle—Greek, "fixed" firmly, not man—as 3. [BENCKE.] I conceive that the f Christ's priesthood on earth, does not a sacrifice on the cross which He offered a earth; but applies only to the crowning priesthood, the bringing of the blood into oles, which He could not have done in foly of holies, as not being an Aaronic place (the heavenly Holy of holies) was as he atonement being made as the oblation The body was burnt without the gate; tification was effected by the presentation within the sanctuary by the high priest. It is implied hereby, the gospel is he law, in the spirit and essence of the -resting upon, better promises—enume-1. The Old Testament promises were mainly of earthly, the New Testament promises, of heavenly blessings: the exact fulfilment of the earthly promises was a pledge of the fulfilment of the heavenly. "Like a physician who prescribes a certain diet to a patient, and then when the patient is beginning to recover, changes the diet, permitting what he had before forbidden; or as a teacher gives his pupil an elementary lesson at first, preparatory to leading him to a higher stage;" so Rabbi Albo in his Ikkorim. Cf. Jeremiah, 7. 31, 32, which shows that God's original design in the old covenant ritual system was, that it should be pedagogical, as a schoolmaster leading and preparing men for Christ. 7. Same reasoning as in ch. 7. 11. faultless—perfect in all its parts, so as not to be found fault with as wanting anything which ought to be there: answering all the purposes of a law. The law in its morality was blameless, Greek amomos; but in seeing us it was defective, and so not faultless, Greek amemptos. should no place have been sought—as it has to be now; and as it is sought in the prophecy (v. 6-11). The old covenant would have anticipated all man's wants, so as to give no occasion for seeking something more perfectly adequate. Cf. on the phrase "place...sought," ch. 12. 17. 8. finding fault with them—the people of the old covenant, who were not made "faultless" by it (v. 7); and whose disregard of God's covenant made Him to "regard them not" (v. 9). The law is not faultless, blamed, but the people who had not observed it, he saith—Jeremiah, 31. 31-34; cf. Ezekiel, 11. 19; 36. 26-27.) At Rama, the head quarters of Nebuzaradan, whither the captives of Jerusalem had been led, Jeremiah uttered this prophecy of Israel's restoration under another David, whereby Rachel, weeping for her lost children, shall be comforted; literally in part fulfilled at the restoration under Zerubbabel, and more fully to be hereafter at Israel's return to their own land; spiritually fulfilled in the gospel covenant, whereby God forgives absolutely His people's sins, and writes His law by His Spirit on the hearts of believers, the true Israel. "This prophecy forms the third part of the third trilogy of the three great trilogies into which Jeremiah's prophecies may be divided: Jeremiah, 21-23, against the shepherds of the people; 26-29, against the false prophets; 30. and 31., the book of restoration." [DELITZSCH in ALFORD.] Behold, the days come—The frequent formula introducing a Messianic prophecy, makes—Greek, "perfect"—"consummate." A suitable expression as to the new covenant which perfected what the old could not (cf. end of v. 9, with end of v. 10). Israel...Judah—therefore, the ten tribes, as well as Judah, share in the new covenant. As both shared the exile, so both shall share the literal and spiritual restoration. 9. Not according to—very different from, and far superior to, the old covenant, which only "worked wrath" (Romans, 4. 15) through man's "not regarding" it. The new covenant enables us to obey by the Spirit's inward impulse producing love because of the forgiveness of our sins, made with—rather as Greek, "to:" the Israelites being only recipients, not co-agents [ALFORD] with God. I took them by the hand—as a father takes his child by the hand to support and guide his steps. "There are three periods: (1.) that of the promise; (2.) that of the pedagogical instruction; (3.) that of fulfilment." [BENCKE.] The second, that of the pedagogical pupilage, began at the exodus from Egypt. I regarded them not—English Version, Jeremiah, 31. 32, translates, "Although I was an husband unto them." St. Paul's translation here is supported by LXX., Syriac, and GUMMARIUS, and accords with the kindred Arabic. The Hebrews regarded not God, so God, in righteous retribution, regarded them not. On "continued not in my covenant," SCHILLING observes, The law was in fact the mere ideal of a religious constitution: in practice, the Jews were throughout, before the captivity, more or less polytheistic, &c.

In the time of David, and the first years of Solomon (the type of Messiah's reign). Even after the return from Babylon, to idolatry, there succeeded what was not much better, formalism and hypocrisy (Matthew, 23. 43). The law was (1.) a typical picture, tracing out the features of the glorious gospel to be revealed; (2.) it had a delegated virtue from the gospel, which ceased, therefore, when the gospel came. 10. make with—Greek, "make unto." Israel—Comprising the before disunited (v. 8) ten tribes kingdom, and that of Judah. They are united in the spiritual Israel, the elect church, now; they shall be so in the literal restored kingdom of Israel to come. I will put—lit., "(I) giving." This is the first of the "better promises" (v. 6). mind—their intelligent faculty. in—rather, "on their hearts." Not on tables of stone as the law (2 Corinthians, 3. 3). write—Greek, "inscribe." I will be to them a God, &c.—Fulfilled first in the outward kingdom of God. Next, in the inward-gospel kingdom. Thirdly, in the kingdom at once outward and inward, the spiritual being manifested outwardly (Revelation, 21. 3). Cf. a similar progression as to the priesthood, (1.) Exodus, 19. 8; (2.) 1 Peter, 2. 5; (3.) Isaiah, 61. 6; Revelation, 1. 6. This progressive advance of the significance of the Old Testament institutions, &c., says THOLOCK, shows the transparency and prophetic character which runs throughout the whole. 11. Second of the "better promises" (v. 6). they shall not—"they shall not have to teach." [ALFORD.] his neighbour—So Vulgate reads; but the oldest MSS. have "his (fellow) citizen." brother—a closer and more endearing relation than fellow-citizen, from the least to the greatest—Greek, "from the little one to the great one." Zechariah, 12. 8, "He that is feeble among them shall be as David." Under the old covenant, the priest's lips were to keep knowledge, and at his mouth the people were to seek the law: under the new covenant, the Holy Spirit teaches every believer. Not that the mutual teaching of brethren is excluded whilst the covenant is being promulgated; but when once the Holy Spirit shall have fully taught all the remission of their sins and inward sanctification, then there shall be no further need of man teaching his fellowman. Cf. 1 Thessalonians, 4. 9; 5. 1, an earnest of that perfect state to come. On the way to that perfect state every man should teach his neighbour. "The teaching is not hard and forced, because grace renders all teachable; for it is not the ministry of the letter, but of the spirit (2 Corinthians, 3. 6). The believer's firmness does not depend on the authority of human teachers, God Himself teaches." (BENSON.) The New Testament is shorter than the Old Testament, because, instead of the details of an outward letter law, it gives the all-embracing principles of the spiritual law written on the conscience, leading one to spontaneous instinctive obedience in outward details. None save the Lord can teach effectually, "know the Lord." 12. For, &c.—The third of "the better promises" (v. 6). The forgiveness of sins is, and will be, the root of this new state of inward grace and knowledge of the Lord. Sin being abolished, sinners obtain grace. I will be merciful—Greek, "propitious;" the Hebrew "salach" is always used of God only in relation to men, and their iniquities—Not found in Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and one oldest Greek MS.; but most oldest MSS. have the words (cf. ch. 10. 17). remember no more—Contrast the law, ch. 10. 3. 13. he—God. made...old—"hath (at the time of speaking the prophecy) antiquated the first covenant." From the time of God's mention of a new covenant (since God's words are all realities) the first covenant might be regarded as ever dwindling away, until its complete abolition on the actual introduction of the gospel. Both covenants cannot exist side by side. Mark how verbal inspiration is proved in Paul's argument turning wholly on the one word "NEW"

(covenant), occurring but once in the Old Testament that which decays—Greek, "that which is being antiquated," &c., at the time when Jeremiah speaks. For in Paul's time, according to his view, the new had absolutely set aside the old covenant. "The Greek for (Koine) New Testament implies that it is of a different kind, and supersedes the old; not merely recent (Greek, new). Cf. Hosea, 3. 4, 5.

CHAPTER IX.

VET. 1-28. INFERIORITY OF THE OLD TO THE NEW COVENANT IN THE MEANS OF ACCESS TO GOD: THE BLOOD OF BULLS AND GOATS OF NO REAL AVAIL: THE BLOOD OF CHRIST ALL-SUFFICIENT TO PURGE AWAY SIN, WHENCE FLOWS OUR HOPE OF HIS APPEARING AGAIN FOR OUR PERFECT SALVATION. 1. True verily—Greek, "Accordingly then." Resuming the subject from ch. 8. 5. In accordance with the command given to Moses, "the first covenant had," &c. had—not "has," for as a covenant it no longer existed, though its rites were observed till the destruction of Jerusalem. ordinances—of divine right and institution. service—worship, a worldly sanctuary—Greek, "its ibi, ibi, ibi sanctuary worldly," mundane: consisting of the elements of the visible world. Contrasted with the heavenly sanctuary. Cf. v. 11, 12, "not of this building," v. 24. Material, outward, perishing (however precious its materials were), and also defective religiously. In v. 2-5, "the worldly sanctuary" is discussed; in v. 6, &c., the "ordinances of worship." The outer tabernacle, the Jews believed, signified this world; the Holy of holies, heaven. JOSEPHUS calls the outer, divided into two parts, "a secular and common place," answering to "the earth and sea;" and the inner holiest place, the third part, appropriated to God and not accessible to men. 2. Defining "the worldly tabernacle," a tabernacle—"the tabernacle" made—built and furnished. the fi:—the anterior tabernacle. candlestick...table—Typifying light and life Exodus, 25. 31-39. The candlestick consisted of a shaft and six branches of gold, seven in all, the bowls made like almonds, with a knob and a flower in one branch. It was carried in Vespasian's triumph, and the figure is to be seen on Titus' arch at Rome. The table of Shittim wood, covered with gold, was for the showbread (Exodus, 25. 23-30). show-bread—it, "the setting forth of the loaves," i.e., the loaves set forth: "the show of the bread." [ALFORD.] In the outer holy place; so the Eucharist continues until our entrance into the heavenly Holy of holies (1 Corinthians, 11. 26). which, &c.—"which (tabernacle) is called the holy place," as distinguished from "the Holy of holies." 3. And—Greek, "But," after—behind: within. second veil—There were two veils, or curtains, one before the Holy of holies (catapetasma) here alluded to, the other before the tabernacle door (calumna), called—as opposed to "the true;" 4. golden censer—The Greek most not be translated "altar of incense," for it was not in "the holiest" place "after the second veil," but in "the holy place;" but as in 2 Chronicles, 26. 19, and Ezekiel, 8. 11, "censer" so Vulgate and Syriac. This golden censer was only used on the day of atonement (other kinds of censers on other days), and is therefore associated with the holiest place, as being taken into it on that anniversary by the high priest. The expression "which had," does not mean that the golden censer was deposited there, for in that case the high priest would have had to go in and bring it out before burning incense in it; but that the golden censer was one of the articles belonging to, and used for, the yearly service in the holiest place. He virtually supposes (without specifying) the existence of the "altar of incense" in the anterior holy place, by mentioning the golden censer filled with incense from it: the incense answers to the prayers of the saints; and the altar, though outside the holiest place, is connected with it by the second veil, directly before the ignorance may mitigate one's punishment (Luke, 12. 48), it does not wholly exempt from punishment. 8. The antitype, the first tabernacle—the anterior tabernacle, representative of the whole Levitical system. While it (the first tabernacle, and that which represents the Levitical system) as yet "has a standing" (so the Greek, i. e., has continuance: lasts), the way to heaven (the antitypical "holiest place") is not yet made manifest (cf. ch. 10. 19, 20). The Old Testament economy is represented by the holy place, the New Testament economy by the Holy of holies. Redemption by Christ, has opened the Holy of holies (access to heaven by faith now, ch. 4. 16; 7. 19, 26; 10. 19, 23; by sight all mankind. The Greek for "not yet" (in po) refers to the mind of the Spirit: the Spirit intimating that men should not think the way was yet opened.

 [TITTMANN.] The Greek negative, ou po, would deny the fact objectively; me po, denies the thing subjectively.

 time of reformation," the New Testament time, was now present and existing. So "the age to come," is the phrase applied to the gospel, because it was present

The Levitical priests must therefore retire. Just as on the day of atonement, no work was done, no sacrifice was offered, or priest was allowed to be in the tabernacle while the high priest went into the holiest place to make atonement (Leviticus, 16. 17, 29). So not our righteousness, nor any other priest's sacrifice, but Christ alone atones; and as the high priest before offering incense had on common garments of a priest, but after it wore his holy garments of "glory and beauty" (Exodus, 28.) in entering the holiest, so Christ entered the heavenly holiest in His glorified body. good things to come—Greek, "the good things to come," ch. 10. 1; "better promises," ch. 8. 5; the "eternal inheritance," v. 16; 1 Peter, 1. 4; the "things hoped for," ch. 11. 1. by...tabernacle—Joined with "He entered." Translate, "Through the...tabernacle" (of which we know). (ALFORD.) As the Jewish high priest passed through the anterior tabernacle into the holiest place, so Christ passed through heaven into the inner abode of the unseen and unapproachable God. Thus, "the tabernacle" here is the heaven through which He passed (Note, ch. 4. 14). But "the tabernacle" is also the glorified body of Christ (Note, ch. 8. 2, "not of this building" (not of the mere natural "creation, but of the spiritual and heavenly, the new creation"), the Head of the mystical body, the church. Through this glorified body He passes into the heavenly holiest place (v. 24), the immaterial, unapproachable presence of God, where He intercedes for us. Besides the goat offered for the people, the blood of which was sprinkled before the mercy-seat, the high priest led forth a second goat, viz., the scapegoat: over it he confessed the people's sins, putting them on the head of the goat, and sent as the sin-bearer into the wilderness out of sight, implying that the atonement effected by the goat-sin-offering (of which the ceremony of the scapegoat is a part, and not distinct, from the sin offering) consisted in the transfer of the people's sins on the goat, and their consequent removal out of sight. The transference of sins on the victim usual in other expiatory sacrifices being omitted (in the case of the slain goat, but employed in the case of the goat sent away, proved the two goats were regarded as one offering. [ARCHBISHOP MAGEE.] Christ's death is symbolized by the slain goat; His resurrection to life by the living goat sent away. Modern Jews substitute in some places a cock for the goat as an expiation, the sins of the offerers being transferred to the entrails, and exposed on the house-top for the birds to carry out of sight, as the scapegoat did: the Hebrew for man and cock being similar, Gadher. [BUXTORF.] by—"through," as the means of His entrance: the key unlocking the heavenly Holy of holies to Him. The access of Christ to the Father was arduous (ch. 5. 7). None before had trodden the path. eternal—The entrance of our Redeemer, once for all, into the heavenly holiest place, secures eternal redemption to us; whereas the Jewish high priest's entrance was repeated year by year, and the effect temporary and partial. On "redemption," cf. Matthew, 20. 28; Ephesians, 1. 7; Colossians, 1. 14; 1 Timothy, 2. 5; Titus, 2. 14; 1 Peter, 1. 19.

13-25. PROOF OF, AND ENLARGEMENT ON, THE "ETERNAL REDEMPTION" MENTIONED v. 12. For His blood, offered by Himself, purifies not only outwardly, as the Levitical sacrifices on the day of atonement, but inwardly unto the service of the living God (v. 13, 14). His death is the inaugurating act of the new covenant, and of the heavenly sanctuary (v. 15-23). His entrance into the true Holy of holies is the consummation of His once for all offered sacrifice of atonement (v. 24-26); henceforth, His re-appearance alone remains to complete our redemption (v. 27, 28). 13. If—as we know is the case; so the Greek indicative means. Argued from the less to the greater. If the blood of mere brutes could purify in any, however small a degree, how much more shall inward purification, and complete and eternal salvation, be wrought by the blood of Christ, in whom dwell all the fullness of the Godhead's ashes of an heifer—(Numbers, 19. 16-18.) The type is full of comfort for us. The water of separation, made of the ashes of the red heifer, was the provision for removing ceremonial defilement whenever incurred by contact with the dead. As she was slain without the camp, so Christ (cf. ch. 13. 11; Numbers, 19. 3, 4). The ashes were laid by for constant use: so the continually cleansing effects of Christ's blood, once for all shed. In our wilderness journey we are continually contracting defilement by contact with the spiritually dead, and with dead works, and need therefore continual application to the antitypical life-giving cleansing blood of Christ, whereby we are afresh restored to peace and living communion with God in the heavenly Holy place. the unclean—Greek, "those defiled" on any particular occasion, purifying—Greek, "purity," the fact—their effect in themselves extended no further. The law had a carnal and a spiritual aspect: carnal, as an instrument of the Hebrew polity, God, their King, accepting, in minor offences, expiatory victims instead of the sinner, otherwise doomed to death; spiritual, as the shadow of good things to come (ch. 10. 1). The spiritual Israelite derived, in partaking of these legal rights, spiritual blessings not flowing from them, but from the great antitype. Ceremonial sacrifices released from temporal penalties and ceremonial disqualifications: Christ's sacrifice releases from everlasting penalties (v. 12), and moral impurities on the conscience disqualifying from access to God (v. 14). The purification of the flesh (the mere outward man) was by "sprinkling;" the washing followed by inseparable connexion (Numbers, 19, 19). So justification is followed by removing. 14. offered himself—The voluntary nature of the offering gives it especial efficacy. He "through the eternal Spirit," i.e., His Divine Spirit (Romans, 1, 4, in contrast to His "flesh," v. 3; His Godhead, 1 Timothy, 3, 16; 1 Peter, 3, 18). "His inner personality" (ALROED), which gave a free consent to the act, offered Himself. The animals offered had no spirit or will to consent in the act of sacrifice; they were offered according to the law; they had a life neither enduring, nor of any intrinsic efficacy. But He from eternity, with His divine and everlasting Spirit, concurred with the Father's will of redemption by Him. His offering began on the altar of the cross, and was completed in His entering the Holiest place with His blood. The eternity and infinitude of His Divine Spirit (cf. ch. 7, 16) gives eternal ("eternal redemption," v. 12, also cf. v. 15) and infinite merit to His offering, so that not even the infinite justice of God has any exception to take against it. It was "through His most burning love, flowing from His eternal Spirit," that He offered Himself. (SCOLA MEFADIA.) without spot—the animal victims had to be without outward blemish; Christ on the cross was a victim inwardly and essentially stainless (1 Peter, 2, 19). purge—purify from fear, guilt, alienation from Him, and selfishness, the source of dead works (v. 22, 23). year—The oldest MSS. read "our." Vulgate however, supports English Version reading. conscience—moral religious consciousness. dead works—all works done in the natural state, which is a state of sin, are dead; for they come not from living faith in, and love to, "the living God" (ch. 11, 6). As contact with a dead body defiled ceremonially (cf. the allusion, "ashes of an heifer," v. 13), so dead works defile the inner consciousness spiritually, to—so as to serve. The ceremonially unclean could not serve God in the outward communion of His people: so the unrenewed cannot serve God in spiritual communion. Man's works before justification, however life-like they look, are dead, and cannot therefore be accepted before the living God. To have offered a dead animal to God would have been an insult (cf. Malachi, 1, 8), much more for a man not justified by Christ's blood to offer dead works. But those purified by Christ's blood in living faith do serve (Romans, 12, 1), and shall more fully serve God (Revelation, 22, 3). Living God—therefore requiring living spiritual service (John, 4, 24). 15. for this cause—Because of the all-cleansing power of His blood, this fits Him to be Mediator (ch. 8, 6, ensuring to both parties, God and us, the ratification) of the new covenant, which secures both forgiveness of the sins not covered by the former imperfect covenant or testament, and also an eternal inheritance to the called, by means of death—rather as Greek, "death having taken place." At the moment that His death took place, the necessary effect is, "the called receive the (fulfilment of the) promise" (so Luke, 24, 49, uses "promise;" ch. 1, 18; Acts, 1, 4); that moment divides the Old from the New Testament. The "called" are the elect "heirs," "partakers of the heavenly calling" (ch. 3, 1). redemption of...transgressions...under...first testament—the transgressions of all men from Adam to Christ, first against the primitive revelation, then against the revelations to the patriarchs, then against the law given to Israel, the representative people of the world. The "first testament" thus includes the whole period from Adam to Christ, and not merely that of the covenant with Israel, which was a concentrated representation of the covenant made with (or the first testament given to) mankind by sacrifice, down from the fall to redemption. Before the inheritance by the New Testament (for here the idea of the "inheritance," following as the result of Christ's "death," being introduced, requires the Greek to be translated testament, as it was before covenant) could come in, there must be redemption of (i.e., deliverance from the penalties incurred by) the transgressions committed under the first testament, for the propitiatory sacrifices under the first testament reached only as far as removing outward ceremonial defilement. But in order to obtain the inheritance which is a reality, there must be a real propitiation, since God could not enter into covenant-relation with us so long as past sins were unexpiated; Romans, 3, 24, 25, "a propitiation... His righteousness for the remission of sins that are past," the promise—to Abraham, might—Greek, "may receive," which previously they could not (ch. 11, 29, 30). 16. A general axiomatic truth; it is "a testament" not the testament. The testator must die before his testament takes effect (v. 17). This is a common meaning of the Greek noun diatheke. So in Luke, 22, 29, "I appoint (by testamentary disposition: the cognate Greek verb diatithemai) unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me." The need of death before the testamentary appointment takes effect, holds good in Christ's relation as MAN to us; of course not in God's relation to Christ, he—44, "be borne"; "be involved in the case"; be involved; or else, "be brought forward in court," so as to give effect to the will. This sense (testament) of the Greek diatheke here does not exclude its other secondary senses in the other passages of the New Testament: (1.) a covenant between two parties; (2.) an arrangement, or disposition, made by God alone in relation to us. Thus, Matthew, 26, 28, may be translated, "Blood of the covenant;" for a testament does not require blood shedding. Cf. Exodus, 24, 8 (covenant), which Christ quotes, though it is probable He included in sense "testament" also under the Greek word diatheke (comprehending both meanings, "covenant" and "testament"), as this designation strictly and properly applies to the new dispensation, and is rightly applicable to the old also, not in itself, but when viewed as typifying the new, which is properly a Testament. Moses (Exodus, 24, 8) speaks of the same thing as (Christ and) Paul. Moses, by the term "covenant," does not mean aught save one concerning giving the heavenly inheritance typified by Canaan after the death of the Testator, which he represented by the sprinkling of blood. And Paul, by the term "testament," does not mean aught save one having conditions attached to it, one which is at the same time a covenant (POLI. Synopsis): the conditions are fulfilled by Christ, not by us, except that we must be heirs, but even this God works in His people. THOUCK explains as elsewhere, "covenant... covenant... mediating victim;" the masculine is used of the victim personified, and regarded as mediator of the covenant; especially as in the new covenant a MAN (Christ) took the place of the victim. The covenanting parties used to pass between the divided parts of the sacrificed animals; but, without reference to this rite, the need of a sacrifice for establishing a covenant sufficiently explains this verse. Others, also, explaining the Greek as "covenant," consider that the death of the sacrificial victim represented in all covenants the death of both parties as unalterably bound to the covenant. So in the redemption covenant, the death of Jesus symbolised the death of God (♂) in the person of the mediating victim, and the death of man in the same. But the expression is not "there must be the death of both parties making the covenant," but singular, "of Him who made (aorist, past time: not of Him making) the testament." Also, it is "death," not "sacrifice" or "slaying." Plainly, the death is supposed to be past (aorist, "made"); and the fact of the death is brought (Greek) before court to give effect to the will. These requisites of a will, or testament, concur here: 1. A testator; 2. heirs; 3. goods; 4. the death of the testator; 5. the fact of the death.

brought forward in court. In Matthew, 26, 28, two other requisites appear: witnesses, the disciples; and a seal, the sacrament of the Lord's supper, the sign of His blood wherewith the testament is primarily sealed. It is true the heir is ordinarily the successor of him who dies and so ceases to have the possession. But in this case Christ comes to life again, and is Himself (including all that He hath), in the power of His now endless life. His people's inheritance; in His being Heir (ch. 1, 2, they are heirs, 17. after—it., "over," as we say "upon the death of the testator;" not as THOLUCK, "on the condition that slain sacrifices be there," which the Greek hardly sanctions. otherwise—"seeing that it is never availing." [ALFORD.] BENGE and LACHMANN read with an interrogation, "Since, is it ever in force (surely not) while the testator liveth?" 18. Whereupon—rather, "Whence," dedicated—"inaugurated." The Old Testament strictly and formally began on that day of inauguration. "Where the disposition, or arrangement, is ratified by the blood of another, viz., of animals, which cannot make a covenant, much less make a testament, it is not strictly a testament where it is ratified by the death of him that makes the arrangement, it is strictly, Greek diathese, Hebrew berith, taken in a wider sense, a testament" [BENGE]; thus, in v. 18, referring to the old dispensation, we may translate, "the first covenant;" or better, retain "the first testament;" not that the old dispensation, regarded by itself, is a testament, but it is so when regarded as the typical representative of the new, which is strictly a Testament. 19. For—Confirming the general truth, v. 10. spoken, according to the law—strictly adhering to every direction of "the law of commandments contained in ordinances" (Ephesians, 2, 15). Cf. Exodus, 24, 3, "Moses told the people all the words of the Lord, and all the judgments; and all the people answered with one voice," &c. the blood of calves—Greek, "the calves," viz., those sacrificed by the "young men" whom he sent to do so (Exodus, 24, 5). The "peace offerings" there mentioned were of oxen (LXX., "little calves," and the "burnt offerings" were probably (though this is not specified), as on the day of atonement, goats. The law in Exodus sanctioned formally many sacrificial practices in use by tradition, from the primitive revelation long before, with water—Prescribed, though not in Exodus, 24., yet in other purifications, as ex. gr., of the leper, and the water of separation which contained the ashes of the red heifer, scarlet wool, and hyssop—Ordinarily used for purification. Scarlet or crimson, resembling blood; it was thought to be a peculiarly deep, fast dye, whence it typified sin (Note, Isaiah, 1, 18). So Jesus wore a scarlet robe, the emblem of the deep dyed sins He bore on Him, though He had none in Him. Wool was used as imbibing and retaining water; the hyssop, as a bushy, tufted plant (wrapt round with the scarlet wool) was used for sprinkling it. The wool was also a symbol of purity (Isaiah, 1, 18). The hyssopus officinalis grows on walls, with small lanceol formed woolly leaves, an inch long with blue and white flowers, and a knotty stalk about a foot high. sprinkled, the book—viz., out of which he had read "every precept:" the book of the testament, or covenant. This sprinkling of the book is not mentioned in Exodus, 24. Hence BENGE (translates, "And having taken) the book itself (so Exodus, 24, 7), he both sprinkled all the people, and (v. 21) moreover sprinkled the tabernacle." But the Greek supports English Version, Paul, by inspiration, supplies the particular specified here, not in Exodus, 24, 7. The sprinkling of the roll (so the Greek for "book") of the covenant, or testament, as well as of the people, implies that neither can the law be fulfilled, nor the people be purged from their sins, save by the sprinkling of the blood of Christ (1 Peter, 1, 2). Cf. v. 23, which shows that there is something antitypical to the Bible in heaven itself (cf. Revelation, 20, 12). The Greek, "itself," distinguishes the book itself from the "precepts" in it which he "spoke." 20. Exodus, 24, 8, "Behold the blood of the covenant, which the Lord has made with you concerning all these words." The change is here made to accord with Christ's inauguration of the New Testament, or covenant, as recorded by St. Luke, 22, 20, "This cup (is) the New Testament in my blood, which is shed for you;" the only gospel in which the "is" has to be supplied. Luke was Paul's companion, which accounts for the correspondence, as here too "is" has to be supplied. testament—(Note, v. 16, 17.) The Greek diathese means both testament and covenant; the term "covenant" better suits the old dispensation, though the idea testament is included, for the old was one in its typical relation to the new dispensation, to which the term "testament" is better suited. Christ has sealed the testament with His blood, of which the Lord's supper is the sacramental sign. The testator was represented by the animals slain in the old dispensation. In both dispensations the inheritance was bequeathed: in the new by One who has come in person and died: in the old by the same one, only typically and ceremonially present. See ALFORD's excellent Note, enjoined unto you—commissioned me to ratify in relation to you. In the old dispensation the condition to be fulfilled on the people's part is implied in the words, Exodus, 24, 8, "Lord made with you] concerning all these words." But here Paul omits this clause, as he includes the fulfilment of this condition of obedience to "all these words" in the new covenant, as part of God's promise, in ch. 8, 5, 10, 12, whereby Christ fulfils all for our justification, and will enable us by putting His Spirit in us to fulfil all in our low progressive and finally complete sanctification. 21. Greek, "And, moreover, in like manner." The sprinkling of the tabernacle with blood is added by inspiration here to the account in Exodus, 30, 25-30; 40, 9, 10, which mentions only Moses' anointing the tabernacle and its vessels. In Leviticus, 8, 10, 15, 30, the sprinkling of blood upon Aaron and his garments, and upon his sons, and upon the altar, is mentioned as well as the anointing, so that we might naturally infer, as JOSEPHUS has distinctly stated, that the tabernacle and its vessels were sprinkled with blood as well as being anointed; Leviticus, 16, 16, 19, 20, 33, virtually sanctions this inference. The tabernacle and its contents needed purification (2 Chronicles, 19, 21). 22. almost—to be joined with "all things," viz., almost all things under the old dispensation. The exceptions to all things being purified with blood are, Exodus, 19, 10; Leviticus, 15, 4, &c., 16, 26, 28; 22, 6; Numbers, 31, 22-24, without-Greek, "apart from," shedding of blood—shed in the slaughter of the victim, and poured out at the altar subsequently. The pouring out the blood on the altar is the main part of the sacrifice (Leviticus, 17, 11), and it could not have place apart from the previous shedding of the blood in the slaying. Paul has, perhaps, in mind here, Luke, 22, 20, "This cup is the New Testament in my blood, which is shed for you." is—Greek, "takes place:" comes to pass. remission—of sins: a favourite expression of Luke, Paul's companion. Properly used of remitting a debt (Matthew, 6, 12; 15, 27, 32: our sins are debts. On the truth here, cf. Leviticus, 5, 11-13, an exception because of poverty, confirming the general rule. 23. patterns—"the suggestive representations;" the typical copies (Note, ch. 8, 5). things in the heavens—the heavenly tabernacle and the things therein, purified with these—with the blood of bulls and goats. heavenly things themselves—the archetypes. Man's sin had introduced an element of disorder into the relations of God and His holy angels in respect to man. The purification removes this element of disorder, and changes God's wrath against man in heaven (designed to be the place of God's revealing His grace to men and angels) into a smile of reconciliation. (Cf. "peace in heaven" [Luke, 19, 38. "The uncreated heaven of God, though in itself untroubled light, yet needed a purification in so far as the light of love was obscured by the fire of wrath against sinful man." [DELITZSCH in ALFORD.] Contrast Revelation, 12, 7-10. Christ's atonement had the effect also of casting Satan out of heaven [Luke, 10, 18; John, 12, 31; cf. ch. 2, 14]. Christ's body, the true tabernacle [Notes, ch. 8, 2; 9, 11], as bearing our imputed sin [3 Corinthians, 5, 21], was consecrated [John, 17, 17, 19] and purified by the shedding of His blood to be the meeting-place of God and man. sacrifices—The plural is used in expressing the general proposition, though strictly referring to the one sacrifice of Christ once for all. Paul implies, that His one sacrifice, by its matchless excellency, is equivalent to the Levitical many sacrifices. It, though but one, is manifold in its effects and applicability to many. 24. Resumption more fully of the thought, "He entered in once into the holy place." v. 12. He has in v. 12, 14, expanded the words "by His own blood," v. 12; and in v. 15-23, he has enlarged on "an High Priest of good things to come." sec....into...holy places made with hands—as was the Holy of holies in the earthly tabernacle [Notes, v. 11]. figures—copies "of the true" holiest place, heaven, the original archetype (ch. 8, 5). into heaven itself—the immediate presence of the invisible God beyond all the created heavens through which latter Jesus passed [Notes, ch. 4, 14; 1 Timothy, 6, 16]. now—ever since His ascension in the present economy (cf. v. 26). to appear—TO PRESENT HIMSELF; Greek, "to be made to appear." Mere man may have a vision through a medium, or veil, as Moses had (Exodus, 33, 15, 20-23). Christ alone beholds the Father without a veil, and is His perfect image. Through seeing HIM only can we see the Father, in the presence of God—Greek, "to the face of God." The saints shall hereafter see God's face in Christ (Revelation, 22, 4): the earnest of which is now given (3 Corinthians, 3, 18). Aaron, the Levitical high priest for the people, stood before the ark and only saw the cloud, the symbol of God's glory (Exodus, 28, 30). for us—in our behalf as our Advocate and Intercessor (ch. 7, 25; Romans, 8, 34; 1 John, 2, 1). It is enough that Jesus should show Himself for us to the Father: the sight of Jesus satisfied God in our behalf. He brings before the face of God no offering which has exhausted itself, and as only sufficing for a time, needs renewal; but He himself is in person, by virtue of the eternal Spirit, i.e., the imperishable life of His person, now and for ever freed from death, our eternally present offering before God." [DELITZSCH in ALFORD.] 25. As in v. 24, Paul said, it was not into the typical, but the true sanctuary, that Christ is entered; so now he says, that His sacrifice needs not, as the Levitical sacrifices did, to be repeated. Construe, "Nor yet did He enter for this purpose that He may offer Himself often," i.e., present Himself in the presence of God, as the high priest does (Paul uses the present tense as the legal service was then existing), year by year, on the day of atonement, entering the Holy of holies, with—lit., "in," blood of others—not his own, as Christ did. 26. then—in that case, must... have suffered—rather as Greek, "It would have been necessary for Him often to suffer." In order to "offer" (v. 25), or present Himself often before God in the heavenly Holiest place, like the legal high priests making fresh renewals of this high priestly function, He would have had, and would have often to suffer. His oblation of Himself before God was once for all (i.e., the bringing in of His blood into the heavenly Holy of holies), and therefore the preliminary suffering was once for all, since the foundation of the world—The continued sins of men, from their first creation, would entail a continual suffering on earth, and consequent oblation of His blood in the heavenly holiest place, since the foundation of the world, if the one oblation "in the fulness of time" were not sufficient. Philo de Mos., p. 637, shows that the high priest of the Hebrews offered sacrifices for the whole human race. "If there had been greater efficacy in the repetition of the oblation, Christ necessarily would not have been so long promised, but would have been sent immediately after the foundation of the world to suffer, and offer Himself at successive periods." [GREGORIUS.] now—as the case is, once—for all: without need of renewal. Rome's fiction of an UNBLOODY sacrifice in the mass, contradicts her assertion that the blood of Christ is present in the wine; and also confutes her assertion that the mass is propitiatory; for, if UNBLOODY, it cannot be propitiatory; for without shedding of blood there is no remission (v. 22). Moreover, the expression "once" all here, and in v. 28, and ch. 10, 10, 12, proves the falsity of her view that there is a continually-repeated offering of Christ in the Eucharist or mass. The offering of Christ was a thing once done that it might be thought of for ever [Notes, cf. ch. 10, 12]. in the end of the world—Greek, "at the consummation of the ages": the winding up of all the previous ages from the foundation of the world; to be followed by a new age (ch. 1, 1, 2). The last age, beyond which no further age is to be expected before Christ's speedy second coming, which is the complement of the first coming; lit., "the ends of the ages"; Matthew, 28, 20, is lit., "the consummation of the ages," or world (singular: not as here, plural, ages). Cf. "the fulness of times," Ephesians, 1, 10. appeared—Greek, "been manifested" an earth (1 Timothy, 3, 16; 1 Peter, 1, 20). English Version has confounded three distinct Greek verbs, by translating all alike, v. 24, 26, 28, "appear." But, in v. 24, it is "to present Himself," viz., before God in the heavenly sanctuary; in v. 26, "been manifested on earth"; in v. 28, "shall be seen" by all, and especially believers, put away—abolish; doing away sin's power as well by delivering men from its guilt and penalty, so that it should be powerless to condemn men, as also from its yoke, so that they shall at last sin no more. sin—Singular number: all the sins of men of every age are regarded as one mass laid on Christ. He hath not only atoned for all actual sins, but destroyed sin itself. John, 1, 29, "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin (not merely the sins: singular, not plural) of the world." by the sacrifice of himself—Greek, "by (through) His own sacrifice;" not by "blood of others" (v. 25). ALFORD loses this contrast in translating, "By His sacrifice." 27. as—inasmuch as. it is appointed—Greek, "it is laid up (as our appointed lot)," Colossians, 1, 6. The word "appointed" (so Hebrew "Beth" means) in the case of man, answers to "anointed" in the case of Jesus; therefore "the Christ," i.e., the anointed, is the title here given designedly. He is the representative man; and there is a strict correspondence between the history of man and that of the son of man. The two most solemn facts of our being are here connected with the two most gracious truths of our dispensation, our death and judgment answering in parallelism to Christ's first coming to die for us, and His second coming to consummate our salvation, once—and no more. after this the judgment—viz., at Christ's appearing, to which, in v. 28, "judgment" in this verse is parallel. Not "after this comes the heavenly glory." The intermediate state is a state of joyous, or else agonizing and fearful expectation of "judgment;" after the judgment comes the full and final state of joy, or else woe. 28. Christ—Greek, "THE Christ:" the representative MAN; representing all men, as the first Adam did. once offered—not "often," v. 25; just as "men," of whom He is the representative Head, are appointed by God, once to die. He did not need to die again and again for each individual, or each successive generation of men, for He represents all men of every age, and therefore needed to die but once for all, so as to exhaust the penalty of death incurred by all. He was offered by the Father, His own "eternal Spirit" (v. 14) concurring; as Abraham spared not Isaac, but offered him, the son himself unresistingly submitting to the father's will (Genesis, 22.). to bear the sin;—Referring to Isaiah, 53, 12, "He bare the sin of many," etc., on Himself; so "bear" means, Leviticus, 24, 15; Numbers, 8, 21; 14, 24. The Greek is lil, to bear up (1 Peter, 2, 24). "Our sins were laid on Him. When, therefore, He was lifted up on the cross, He bare up our sins along with Him." [BENGE.] many—not opposed to all, but to few. He, the One, was offered for many; and that ones for all (cf. Matthew, 20, 28). appear—rather as Greek, "be seen," No longer in the alien "form of a servant," but in His own proper glory. without—apart from...separate from..."sin." Not bearing the sin of many on Him as at His first coming (even then there was no sin in Him). That sin has been at His first coming once for all taken away, so as to need no repetition of His sin offering of Himself (v. 26). At His second coming He shall have no more to do with sin. look for him—with soaring expectation even unto the end (so the Greek). It is translated "wait for" in Romans, 8, 19, 23; 1 Corinthians, 1, 7, which see. ante-salvation—to bring in completed salvation; redeeming then the body which is as yet subject to the bondage of corruption. Hence, in Philipians, 3, 20, he says, "we look for THE SAVIOUR." Note, Christ's prophetic office, as the Divine Teacher, was especially exercised during His earthly ministry; His priestly is now from His first to His second coming; His kingly office shall be fully manifested at, and after, His second coming.

CHAPTER X.

VER. 1-20. CONCLUSION OF THE FOREGOING ARGUMENT. THE YEARLY RECURRING LAW-SACRIFICES CANNOT PERFECT THE WORSHIPPER, BUT CHRIST'S ONCE-FOR-ALL OFFERING CAN. Instead of the daily ministry of the Levitical priests, Christ's service is perfected by the one sacrifice, whence He now sits on the right hand of God as a Priest-King, until all His foes shall be subdued unto Him. Thus the new covenant (ch. 8, 8-12) is inaugurated, whereby the law is written on the heart, so that an offering for sin is needed no more. Wherefore we ought to draw near the Holiest in firm faith and love; fearful of the awful results of apostasy; looking for the recompense to be given at Christ's coming. 1. Previously the oneness of Christ's offering was shown: now is shown its perfection as contrasted with the law-sacrifices, having—inasmuch as it has but "the shadow, not the very image," i.e., not the exact likeness, reality, and full revelation, such as the gospel has. The "image" here means the archetype (cf. ch. 9, 24), the original, solid image (BENGE.) realizing to us those heavenly verities, of which the law furnished but a shadowy outline before. Cf. 2 Corinthians, 3, 13, 14, 18; the gospel is the very setting forth by the Word and Spirit of the heavenly realities themselves, out of which it (the gospel) is constructed. So ALFORD. As Christ is "the express image (Greek, impress) of the Father's person" (ch. 1, 3), so the gospel is the heavenly verities themselves manifested by revelation,—the heavenly very archetype, of which the law was drawn as a sketch, or outline-copy (ch. 8, 5). The law was a continual process of acted prophecy, proving the divine design that its counterparts should come; and proving the truth of those counterparts when they came. Thus the imperfect and continued expiatory sacrifices before Christ foretold, and now prove the reality of, Christ's one perfect antitypical expiation. Good things to come—(ch. 9, 11)—belonging to "the world (age) to come." Good things in part made present by faith to the believer, and to be fully realized hereafter in actual and perfect enjoyment. LESTER says, "As Christ's church on earth is a prediction of the economy of the future life, so the Old Testament economy is a prediction of the Christian church." In relation to the temporal good things of the law, the spiritual and eternal good things of the gospel are "good things to come." Colossians, 2, 17, calls legal ordinances "the shadow," and Christ "the body," never—at any time (v. 11), with those sacrifices—rather, "with the same sacrifices," year by year.—This clause in the Greek refers to the whole sentence, not merely to the words "which they (the priests) offered (Greek, offer)." Thus the sense is, not as English Version, but, the law year by year, by the repetition of the same sacrifices, testifies its inability to perfect the worshippers, viz., on the YEARLY day of atonement. The "daily" sacrifices are referred to v. 11, antitypally—Greek, "continuously," implying that they offer a timeless and ineffectual "continuous" round of the "same" atonement-sacrifices recurring "year by year," perfect—fully meet man's needs as to justification and sanctification (Note, ch. 9, 9), comes therewith—those so coming unto God, viz., the worshippers (the whole people) coming to God in the person of their representative, the High Priest. 2. For—if the law could, by its sacrifices, have perfected the worshippers, they—the sacrifices, once purged—19 they were once for all cleansed (ch. 7, 27). conscience—"consciousness of sin" (ch. 9, 9). 3. But—So far from those sacrifices ceasing to be offered (v. 2), is, &c.—in the fact of their being offered on the day of atonement. Contrast v. 17, a remembrance—recalling to mind by the high priest's confession, on the day of atonement, of the sins both of each past year and of all former years, proving that the expiatory sacrifices of former years were not felt by men's consciences to have fully atoned for former sins; in fact, the expiation and remission were only legal and typical (v. 4, 11). The gospel remission, on the contrary, is so complete, that sins are "remembered no more" (v. 17) by God. It is unbelief to "forget" this once for all purgation, and to fear on account of "former sin" (1 Peter, 1, 9). The believer, once for all bathed, needs only to "wash" his hands and "feet" of soils, according as he daily contracts them, in Christ's blood (John, 13, 10). 4. For—Reason why, necessarily, there is a continually recurring "remembrance of sins" in the legal sacrifices (v. 3). Typically, "the blood of bulls," &c., sacrificed, had power; but it was only in virtue of the power of the one real antitypical sacrifice of Christ: they had no power in themselves; they were not the instrument of perfect vicarious atonement, but an exhibition of the need of it, suggesting to the faithful Israelite the sure hope of coming redemption, according to God's promise. take away—"take off." The Greek, v. 11, is stronger, explaining the weak word here, "take away utterly." The blood of brutes could not take away the sin of man. A MAN must do that (Notes, ch. 9, 12-14). 5. Christ's voluntary self-offering, in contrast to those inefficient sacrifices, is shown to fulfil perfectly "the will of God" as to our redemption, by completely atoning "for (our) sins" Wherefore—Seeing that a nobler than animal sacrifice was needed to "take away sins," when he cometh—Greek, "coming." The time referred to is the period before His entrance into the world, when the inefficiency of animal sacrifices for expiation had been proved. [THOLUCK.] Or, the time is that between Jesus' first dawning of reason as a child, and the beginning of His public ministry, during which, being ripened in human resolution, He was in intent devoting Himself to the doing of His Father's will. [ALFORD.] But the time of "coming" is present; not "when He had come," but "when coming into the world;" so, in order to accord with ALFORD'S view, "the world" must mean His story: when coming, or about to come, into Greek verbs are in the past: "sacrifice, did not wish, but a body thou didst prepare." "Lo, I am come." Therefore, in order to see times, the present coming, or about to be past, "A body thou didst prepare for it either explain as ALFORD, or else, if period to be before His actual arrival in earth) or incarnation, we must explain it to refer to God's purpose, which speaks designed from eternity as though it were led. "A body thou didst prepare in thy self." This seems to me more likely than coming into the world, "coming into earth on His public ministry. David, in re quoted, reviews his past troubles and delivered him from them, and his consent to render willing obedience to God as ble than sacrifices; but the Spirit puts into language finding its partial application to us: full realization only in the Divine Son. The more any son of man approaches the of God in position, or office, or individual erience, the more directly may his holy the power of Christ's Spirit be taken as Christ Himself. Of all men, the prophet, resembled and foreshadowed Him the road.) a body hast thou prepared me: didst fit for me a body." "In thy didst determines to make for me a body, up to death as a sacrificial victim." the Hebrew, Psalm 40. 6. it is "mine ears med," or "dug." Perhaps this alludes to "boring the ear of a slave who volunteers to his master when he might be free. Christ's uman body, in obedience to the Father's to die the death of a slave (ch. 2. 14), was same act of voluntary submission to t of a slave suffering his ear to be bored r. His willing obedience to the Father's a dwelt on as giving especial virtue to v. 7, 9, 10). The preparing, or fitting of a 1, is not with a view to His mere int to His expiatory sacrifice (v. 10), as the sacrifice and offering" requires; cf. also Ephesians, 2. 16; Colossians, 1. 23. More pened mine ears," means opened mine so as to be attentively obedient to what to do, viz., to assume the body He has me for my sacrifice, so Job, Margin, doubtless the boring of a slave's ear was "such willing obedience": Isaiah, 50. 5. "The h opened mine ear," i. e., made me obedi as a slave to his master. Others some- y explain, "Mine ears hast thou digged," i," not with allusion to Exodus, 31. 6, but office of the ear—a willing, submissive the voice of God (Isaiah, 50. 4, 5). The ear implies the preparation of the body, ration; this secondary idea, really in though less prominent, is the one which his argument. In either explanation the ; taking on Him the form, and becoming servant, is implied. As He assumed a h to make His self sacrifice, so ought we dies a living sacrifice (Romans, 12. 1). 6. —Greek, "who's burnt offerings," then pleasure—as if these could in themselves God had pleasure in (Greek, "approved," pleased with") them, in so far as they of obedience to His positive command d Testament, but not as having an in- y such as Christ's sacrifice had. Contrast 17. 7. I come—rather, "I am come" —Here we have the creed, as it were, of Jesus: 'I am come to fulfil the law, Matthew, 5. 17; to preach, Mark, 1. 38; to call sinners to repentance, Luke, 5. 32; to send a sword, and to set men at variance, Matthew, 10. 34, 35; I came down from heaven to do the will of Him that sent me, John, 6. 38, 39 (so here, Psalm 40. 7, 8); I am sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, Matthew, 15. 24; I am come into this world for judgment, John, 9. 39; I am come that they might have life, and might have it more abundantly, John, 10. 10; to save what had been lost, Matthew, 18. 11; to seek and to save that which was lost, Luke, 19. 10; cf. 1 Timothy, 1. 15; to save men's lives, Luke, 9. 56; to send fire on the earth, Luke, 12. 49; to minister, Matthew, 20. 28; as "the Light," John, 12. 46; to bear witness unto the truth, John, 15. 27.' See, reader, that thy Saviour obtain what He aimed at in thy case. Moreover, do thou for thy part say, why thou are come here? Dost thou, then, also, do the will of God? From what time! and in what way? [BENGLI.] When the two goats on the day of atonement were presented before the Lord, that goat was to be offered as a sin offering on which the lot of the Lord should fall; and that lot was lifted up on high in the hand of the high priest, and then laid upon the head of the goat which was to die: so the Hand of God determined all that was done to Christ. Besides the covenant of God with man through Christ's blood, there was another covenant made by the Father with the Son from eternity. The condition was, "If He shall make His soul an offering for sin, He shall see His seed," &c. (Isaiah, 53. 10). The Son accepted the condition, "Lo, I come to do thy will, O God." [BISHOP PARSONS.] Oblation, intercession, and benediction, are His three priestly offices, in the volume, &c.—iii., "the roll;" the parchment MS. being wrapped round a cylinder headed with knobs. Here, the Scripture "volume" meant is the 40th Psalm. "By this very passage 'written of me,' I undertake to do thy will (viz., that I should die for the sins of the world, in order that all who believe may be saved, not by animal sacrifices, v. 6, but by my death)." This is the written contract of Messiah (cf. Nehemiah, 9. 38) whereby He engaged to be our surety. So complete is the inspiration of all that is written, so great the authority of the Psalms, that what David says is really what Christ then and there said. 8. he—Christ, sacrifice, &c.—The oldest MSS. read, "sacrifices and offerings" (plural). This verse combines the two clauses previously quoted distinctly, v. 6, 6, in contrast to the sacrifice of Christ with which God was well pleased. 9. Then said he—"At that very time (viz., when speaking by David's mouth in the 40th Psalm) He hath said." The rejection of the legal sacrifices involves, as its concomitant, the voluntary offer of Jesus to make the self-sacrifice with which God is well pleased (for, indeed it was God's own "will" that He came to do in offering it; so that this sacrifice could not but be well pleasing to God). I come—"I am come," "take away"—sets aside the first, viz., the legal system of "sacrifices" which God wills not, the second—"the will of God" (v. 7, 9) that Christ should redeem us by His self sacrifice. 10. By—Greek, "in." So "in," and "through," occur in the same sentence, 1 Peter, 1. 22, "Ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth through the Spirit." Also, 1 Peter, 1. 6, in the Greek. The "in" (fulfilment of which will" (cf. the use of in, Ephesians, 1. 6, "wherein [in which] grace) He hath made us accepted in the Beloved"), expresses the originating cause; "THROUGH the offering... of Christ," the instrumental or mediatory cause. The whole work of redemption flows from "the will" of God the Father, as the First cause, who decreed redemption from before the foundation of the world. The "will" here (boulema) is His absolute sovereign will. His "good will" (eudokia) is a particular aspect of it, are sacrificed—once for all, and as our permanent state (so the Greek).

It is the finished work of Christ in having sanctified us (i.e., having translated us from a state of unholy alienation into a state of consecration to God, having "no more conscience of sin," v. 2) once for all and permanently, not the process of gradual sanctification, which is here referred to, the body—"prepared" for Him by the Father (v. 5). As the atonement, or reconciliation, is by the blood of Christ (Leviticus, 17, 11), so our sanctification (consecration to God, holiness, and eternal bliss) is by the body of Christ (Colossians, 1, 22). ALFORD quotes the Book of Common Prayer Communion Service, "that our sinful bodies may be made clean by His body, and our souls washed through His most precious blood," once for all—ch. 7, 27; 9, 12, 25, 28; 10, 12, 14; 11, And—A new point of contrast: the frequent repetition of the sacrifice, priest—The oldest MRS. read, "High priest." Though he did not in person stand "daily" offering sacrifices, he did so by the subordinate priests of whom, as well as of all Israel, he was the representative head. So "daily" is applied to the high priests (ch. 7, 27). standeth—the attitude of one ministering; in contrast to "sat down on the right hand of God," v. 12, said of Christ: the posture of one being ministered to as a king, which—Greek, "the which," i.e., of such a kind as, take away—utterly; lit., strip off all round. Legal sacrifices might, in part, produce the sense of forgiveness, yet scarcely even that (Note, v. 4); but entirely to strip off one's guilt they never could. 12. this man—Emphatic (ch. 3, for ever—joined in English Version with "offered one sacrifice;" offered one sacrifice, the efficacy of which endures for ever; lit., continuously (v. 14). "The offering of Christ, once for all made, will continue the one and only oblation for ever; no other will supersede it." (BENGL.) The mass, which professes to be the frequent repetition of one and the same sacrifice of Christ's body, is hence disproved. For not only is Christ's body one, but also His offering is one, and that inseparable from His suffering (ch. 9, 26). The mass would be much the same as the Jewish sacrifices which Paul sets aside as abrogated, for they were anticipations of the one sacrifice, just as Rome makes masses continuations of it, in opposition to Paul's argument. A repetition would imply that the former once-for-all offering of the one sacrifice was imperfect, and so would be dishonouring to it (v. 2, 18). Verse 14, on the contrary, says, "He hath PERFECTED FOR EVER them that are sanctified." If Christ offered Himself at the last supper, then He offered Himself again on the cross, and there would be two offerings; but Paul says there was only one, once for all. Cf. Note, ch. 9, 26. English Version is favoured by the usage in this epistle, of putting the Greek "for ever" after that which it qualifies. Also, "one sacrifice for ever," stands in contrast to "the same sacrifices oftentimes" (v. 11). Also, 1 Corinthians, 15, 26, 28, agrees with v. 12, 13, taken as English Version, not joining, as ALFORD does, "for ever" with "sat down;" for Jesus is to give up the Mediatorial throne "when all things shall be subdued unto Him," and not to sit on it for ever. 13, expecting—"waiting." Anticipating the execution of His Father's will, that all His foes should be subjected to Him. The Son waits till the Father shall "send Him forth to triumph over all His foes." He is now sitting at rest (v. 12), invisibly reigning, and having His foes virtually, by right of His death, subject to Him. His present sitting on the unseen throne is a necessary preliminary to His coming forth to subject His foes openly. He shall then come forth to a visibly manifested kingdom, and conquest over his foes. Thus He fulfils Psalm 110, 1. This agrees with 1 Corinthians, 15, 23-28. He is, by His spirit and His providence, now subjecting His foes to Him in part (Psalm 110, 1). The subjection of His foes fully shall be at His second advent, and from that time to the general judgment (Revelation, 19, and 20); then comes the subjection of Himself as Head of the Church to the Father (the Mediatorial economy ceasing when its end shall have been accomplished, that God may be all in all. Eastern conquerors used to tread on the necks of the vanquished, as Joshua did to the five kings. So Christ's total and absolute conquest at His coming is symbolized, he made his footstool—lit., "be placed (tendered) footstool of His feet," his enemies—Satan and Death, whose strength consists in "sin," this being taken away (v. 13), the power of the foes is taken away, and their destruction necessarily follows. 14. For—The sacrifice being "for ever" in its efficacy (v. 12) needs no renewal. "For," &c. them that are sanctified—rather as Greek, "them that are being sanctified." The sanctification (consecration to God) of the elect (1 Peter, 1, 2) believers is perfect in Christ once for all (Note, v. 10). (Contrast the law, ch. 7, 19; 9, v. 18, 11) The development of that sanctification is progressive. 15. The Greek has "moreover," or "now," as a witness—of the truth which I am setting forth. The Father's witness is given ch. 5, 10. The Son's, ch. 10, 5. Now is added that of the Holy Spirit, called accordingly "the Spirit of grace," v. 23. The testimony of all Three leads to the same conclusion (v. 18), for after that he had said, &c.—The conclusion to the sentence is in v. 17, "After He had said before, This is the covenant that I will make with them (with the house of Israel, ch. 8, 10; here extended to the spiritual Israel), &c., saith the Lord; I will put (lit., giving; referring to the giving of the law; not now as then, giving into the hands, but giving) my laws into their hearts (mind, ch. 8, 10) and in their minds (hearts, ch. 8, 10); I will inscribe (so the Greeks) them (here he omits the addition quoted in ch. 8, 10, 11. I will be to them a God, &c., and they shall not teach every man his neighbour, &c.), and (i.e., after He had said the foregoing, HE THEN ADDS) their sins, &c., will I remember no more." The great object of the quotation here is, to prove that, there being in the gospel covenant "REMISSESION OF SINS" (v. 17), there is no more need of a sacrifice for sins. The object of the same quotation in ch. 8, 8-13, is to show that, there being a "NEW COVENANT," the old is antiquated, i.e., where remission of these is—as there is under the gospel covenant (v. 17). "Here ends the finale (ch. 10, 1-18) of the great tripartite arrangement ch. 7, 1-25; 8, 25, 4, 11; 9, 13-10, 18) of the middle portion of the epistle. Its great theme was Christ a High Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec. What it is to be a high priest after the order of Melchisedec is set forth, ch. 7, 1-25, as contrasted with the Aaronic order. That Christ, however, as High Priest, is Aaron's antitype in the true Holy place, by virtue of His self sacrifice here on earth, and Mediator of a better covenant, whose essential character the old only typified, we learn, ch. 7, 26-9, 12. And that Christ's self sacrifice, offered through the eternal Spirit, is of everlasting power, as contrasted with the unavailing cycle of legal offerings, is established in the third part, ch. 9, 13-10, 25; the first half of this last portion (ch. 9, 13-28), showing that both our present possession of salvation, and our future completion of it, are as certain to us as that He is with God, ruling as a Priest and reigning as a King, once more to appear, no more as a bearer of our sins, but in glory as a Judge. The second half, ch. 10, 1-18, re-enters the main position of the whole, the High Priesthood of Christ, grounded on His offering of Himself—its kingly character, its eternal accomplishment of its end, confirmed by Psalm 40, and 110, and Jeremiah 31." [DELITZSCH OR ALFORD.] 19. Here begins the third and last division of the epistle: our duty now while waiting for the Lord's second advent. Resumption and expansion of the exhortation (ch. 4, 14-16; cf. v. 22, 23 here) wherewith he closed the first part of the epistle, preparatory to his great doctrinal argument.

beginning ch. 7. 1. boldness—"free confidence," grounded on the consciousness that our sins have been forgiven. to enter—εἰς, "as regards the entering." by—Greek, "in;" it is in the blood of Jesus that our boldness to enter is grounded. Cf. Ephesians, 3. 12, "In whom we have boldness and access with confidence." It is His having once for all entered as our Forerunner (ch. 9. 26) and High Priest (v. 21), making atonement for us with His blood, which is continually there (ch. 12. 24) before God, that gives us confident access. No priestly caste now mediates between the sinner and his Judge. We may come boldly with loving confidence, not with slavish fear, directly through Christ, the only mediating Priest. The minister is not officially nearer God than the layman; nor can the latter serve God as a distance or by deputy, as the natural man would like. Each must come for himself, and all are accepted when they come by the new and living way opened by Christ. Thus all Christians are, in respect to access directly to God, virtually high priests (Revelation, 1. 6). They draw nigh in and through Christ, the only proper High Priest (ch. 7. 25). 20. which—The antecedent in the Greek is "the entering;" not as English Version, "way." Translate, "Which (entering) He has consecrated (not as though it were already existing, but has been the first to open, INAUGURATED as a new thing; Note, ch. 9. 18, where the Greek is the same) for us (and a new Greek, recent) recently opened, Romans, 12. 26, 28, and living way" (not like the lifeless way through the law offering of the blood of dead victims, but real, vital, and of perpetual efficacy, because the living and life-giving Saviour is that way. It is a living Way that we have, producing not dead, but living, works). Christ, the first-fruits of our nature, has ascended, and the rest is sanctified thereby. "Christ's ascension is our promotion; and whither the glory of the Head hath preceded, thither the hope of the body, too, is called." [LXX.] the veil—As the veil had to be passed through in order to enter the Holiest place, so the weak, human suffering flesh (ch. 5. 7) of Christ's humanity (which veiled His Godhead) had to be passed through by Him in entering the heavenly Holiest place for us; in putting off His rent flesh, the temple veil, its type, was simultaneously rent from top to bottom (Matthew, 27. 51). Not His body, but His weak suffering flesh, was the veil: His body was the temple (John, 2. 19). 21. High Priest—As a different Greek term (archiereus) is used always elsewhere in this epistle for "High Priest," translate as Greek here, "A Great Priest;" one who is at once King and "Priest on His throne" (Zechariah, 6. 13; a royal Priest, and a priestly King, house of God—the spiritual house, the church, made up of believers, whose home is heaven, where Jesus now is (ch. 12. 22, 23). Thus, by "the house of God," over which Jesus is, heaven is included in meaning, as well as the church, whose home it is. 22. (Ch. 4. 16; 7. 19.) with a true heart—without hypocrisy: "in truth, and with a perfect heart;" a heart thoroughly imbued with "the truth" (v. 22). full assurance—(ch. 4. 11)—With no doubt as to our acceptance when coming to God by the blood of Christ. As "faith" occurs here, so "hope" and "love," v. 23, 24, sprinkled from—i.e., sprinkled so as to be cleansed from, and uncleaned away (v. 2; ch. 9. 9). Both the hearts and the bodies are cleansed. The legal purifications were with blood of animal victims and with water, and could only cleanse the flesh (ch. 9. 13, 21). Christ's blood purifies the heart and conscience. The Aaronic priest, in entering the Holy place, washed with water (ch. 9. 10) in the brazen laver. Believers, as priests to God, are once for all washed in BODY (as distinguished from "hearts") at baptism. As we have an immaterial, and a material nature, the cleansing of both is expressed by "hearts" and "body," the inner and the outer man; so the whole man, material and immaterial. The baptism of the body, however, is not the mere putting away of material filth, nor an act operating by intrinsic efficacy, but the sacramental seal, applied to the outer man, of a spiritual washing (1 Peter, 3. 21). "Body" (not merely "flesh," the carval part, as 2 Corinthians, 7. 1) includes the whole material man, which needs cleansing, as being redeemed, as well as the soul. The body, once polluted with sin, is washed, so as to be fitted like Christ's holy body, and by His body, to be spiritually a pure and living offering. On the "pure water," the symbol of consecration and sanctification, cf. John, 19. 34; 1 Corinthians, 6. 12; 1 John, 5. 6; Ezekiel, 36. 25. The perfects "having... hearts sprinkled... body (the Greek is singular) washed," imply a continuing state produced by a once-for-all accomplished act, viz., our justification by faith through Christ's blood, and consecration to God, sealed sacramentally by the baptism of our body. 23. Ch. 3. 6, 14; 4. 14. profession—Greek, "confession," our faith—rather as Greek, "OUR HOPE;" which is indeed faith exercised as to the future inheritance. Hope rests on faith, and at the same time quickens faith, and is the ground of our bold confession (1 Peter, 3. 15). Hope is similarly (v. 22) connected with purification (1 John, 3. 3), without wavering—without dejection (ch. 3. 14); "steadfast unto the end." He—God is faithful to His promises (ch. 4. 17, 18; 11. 11; 12. 23, 25; 1 Corinthians, 1. 9; 10. 13; 1 Thessalonians, 5. 24; 2 Thessalonians, 3. 3; see also Christ's promise, John, 12. 26; but man is too often unfaithful to his duties. 24. Here, as elsewhere, Hope and love follow faith; the Pauline triad of Christian graces, consider—with the mind attentively fixed on "one another" (Note, ch. 3. 1), contemplating with continual consideration the characters and wants of our brethren, so as to render mutual help and counsel. Cf. "consider," Psalm 41. 1, and ch. 12. 15, "(All) looking diligently lest any fall of the grace of God," to provoke—Greek, "with a view to provoking unto love," instead of provoking to hatred, as is too often the case. 25. assembling of ourselves together—The Greek, episynagoge, is only found here and 2 Thessalonians, 2. 1 (the gathering together of the elect to Christ at His coming, Matthew, 24. 31). The assembling or gathering of ourselves for Christian communion in private and public, is an earnest of our being gathered together to Him at His appearing. Union is strength: continual assemblies together beset and foster love, and give good opportunities for "provoking to good works," by "exhorting one another" (ch. 3. 13). IGNATIUS says, "When ye frequently, and in numbers meet together, the powers of Satan are overthrown, and his mischief is neutralized by your like-mindedness in the faith." To neglect such assemblies together might end in apostasy at last. He avoids the Greek term synagoge, as suggesting the Jewish synagogue meetings (cf. Revelation, 2. 9), as the manner of some is—"manner," i.e., habits, customs. This gentle expression proves he is not here as yet speaking of apostasy, the day approaching—This, the shortest designation of the day of the Lord's coming, occurs only in 1 Corinthians, 3. 13; a confirmation of the Pauline authorship of this epistle. The church being in all ages kept uncertain how soon Christ is coming, the day is, and has been, in each age, practically always near; whence, believers have been called on always to be watching for it as night at hand. The Hebrews were now living close upon one of those great types and foretastes of it, the destruction of Jerusalem (Matthew, 24.), "the bloody and fiery dawn of the great day; that day is the day of days, the ending day of all days, the settling day of all days, the day of the promotion of time into eternity, the day which, for the church, breaks through and breaks off the night of the present world" (DELITZSCH in ALFORD). 26. Cf. on this and following verses, ch. 6, 4, &c. There the warning was, that if there be not diligence in progressing, a falling off will take place, and apostasy may ensue: here it is, that if there be lukewarmness in Christian communion, apostasy may ensue. If we sin—Greek present participle: if we be found sinning, i. e., not isolated acts, but a state of sin. [ALFORD.] A violation not only of the law, but of the whole economy of the New Testament (v. 28, 29), wilfully—presumptuously, Greek "willingly." After receiving "full knowledge (so the Greek, cf. 1 Timothy, 2, 4) of the truth," by having been "enlightened," and by having "tasted" a certain measure even of grace of "the Holy Ghost" (the Spirit of truth, John, 14, 17; and "the Spirit of grace," v. 29); to fall away (as "sin" here means, ch. 3, 12, 17; cf. ch. 6, 6) and apostatize (ch. 3, 12) to Judaism or infidelity, is not a sin of ignorance, or error ("out of the way": the result of infirmity, but a deliberate sinning against the Spirit (v. 29; ch. 5, 2); such sinning, where a consciousness of gospel obligations not only was, but is present: a sinning presumptuously and perseveringly against Christ's redemption for us, and the Spirit of grace in us. "He only who stands high can fall low. A lively reference in the soul to what is good is necessary in order to be thoroughly wicked; hence, man can be more reprobate than the beasts, and the apostate angels than apostate man." [THOLUCK.] remaneth no more sacrifice—For there is but ONE sacrifice that can atone for sin; that, after having fully known that sacrifice, deliberately reject it. 27, a certain—an extraordinary and indescribable. The indefiniteness, as of something peculiar of its kind, makes the description the more terrible (cf. Greek, James, 1, 18), "looking for—" expectation;" a later sense of the Greek. ALFORD strangely translates, as the Greek usually means elsewhere, "reception." The transition is easy from "giving a reception to" something or some one, to looking for. Contrast the "expecting" (the very same Greek as here), v. 13, which refutes ALFORD. Very indignation—lit., "zeal of fire." Fire is personified: glow or ardour of fire, i. e., of Him who is "a consuming fire." devour—continually. 29. Cf. ch. 2, 2, 3; 12, 25. despised—"set at nought" [ALFORD]; utterly and heinously violated, not merely some minor detail, but the whole law and covenant, as ex. gr., by idolatry (Deuteronomy, 17, 2-7). So here apostasy answers to such an utter violation of the old covenant, died—Greek, "dies": the normal punishment of such transgression, then still in force, without mercy—lit., merces: removed out of the pale of mitigation, or respite of his doom. under—on the evidence of. 29. sorer—Greek, "worse," viz., "punishment" (lit., vengeance), than any mere temporal punishment of the body. suppose ye—an appeal to the Hebrews' reason and conscience. thought worthy—by God at the judgment, trodden under foot the Son of God—by "wilful" apostasy. So he treats under foot God Himself who "glorified His Son as an High Priest" (ch. 5, 6; 6, 6). an unholty thing—lit., "common," as opposed to "sanctified." No better than the blood of a common man, thus involving the consequence that Christ, in claiming to be God, was guilty of blasphemy, and so deserved to die! wherewith he was sanctified—for Christ died even for him. "Sanctified," in the fullest sense, belongs only to the saved elect. But in some sense it belongs also to those who have gone a far way in Christian experience, and yet fall away at last. The higher such a one's past Christian experiences, the deeper his fall. done despite unto—by repelling in fact: as "blasphemy" is despite in words (Mark, 3, 29). "Of the Jews who became Christians and relapsed to Judaism, we find from the history of Uriel Acosta, that they required a blasphemy against Moloch, 'the adulterous branch,' &c. [THOLUCK.] the Spirit of grace—the Spirit that confers grace. "He who does not accept the benefit, insults Him who confers it. He hath made thee a son: wilt thou become a slave? He has come to take up His abode with thee: but thou art introducing evil into thyself." [CHRYSTOSTOM.] "It is the curse of evil eternally to propagate evil: so, for him who profanes the Christ without him, and blasphemes the Christ within him, there is subjectively no renewal of a change of mind (ch. 6, 6), and objectively no new sacrifice for sins" (ch. 10, 26). [THOLUCK.] 30. him—God, who utters no empty threats. Vengeance belongeth unto me—Greek, "To me belongeth vengeance:" exactly according with Paul's quotation, Romans, 12, 19, of the same text. Lord shall judge his people—in grace, or else anger, according as each deserves: here, "judge," so as to punish the reprobate apostate; there, "judge," so as to interpose in behalf of, and save His people (Deuteronomy, 32, 36, 31, fearful, to fall into the hands, &c.—It is good like David to fall into the hands of God, rather than man, when one does so with filial faith in his father's love, though God chastises him. "It is fearful" to fall into His hands as a reprobate and presumptuous sinner doomed to His just vengeance as judge (v. 27). I live God—therefore able to punish for ever (Matthew, 10, 29). 32. As previously he has warned them by the awful end of apostates, so here he stirs them up by the remembrance of their own former faith, patience, and self-sacrificing love. So Revelation, 2, 3, 4, call it remembrance—habitually: so the present tense meant illuminated—"enlightened:" come to "the knowledge of the truth" (v. 26 in connexion with baptism [Note, ch. 6, 4]). In spiritual baptism, Christ, who is "the Light," is put on. "On the one hand, we are not to sever the sign and the grace signified where the sacrament truly answers its design: on the other, the glass is not to be mistaken for the liquor, nor the sheath for the sword." [BENGEL.] fight of—i. e., consisting of afflictions. 33. The persecutions here referred to seem to have been endured by the Hebrew Christians at their first conversion, not only in Palestine, but also in Rome and elsewhere, the Jews in every city inciting the populace and the Roman authorities against Christians, gaining stock—as in a theatre (so the Greek: often used as the place of punishment in the presence of the assembled multitudes. Acts, 19, 29; 1 Corinthians, 4, 9.) Made a theatrical spectacle to the world. ye became—of your own accord: attesting your Christian sympathy with your suffering brethren, companions of—sharers in affliction with. 34. ye had compassions on me in my bonds—The oldest MSS. and versions omit "me," and read, "Ye both sympathized with those in bonds (answering to the last clause of v. 33; cf. ch. 13, 3, 23; 6, 10), and accepted (so the Greek: is translated ch. 11, 35) with joy (James, 1, 2; joy in tribulations, as exercising faith and other graces, Romans, 5, 3; and the pledge of the coming glory, Matthew, 5, 12) the plundering of your [own] goods" (answering to the first clause of v. 33) in yourselves—The oldest MSS. omit "in:" translate, "Knowing that ye have for (or to) yourselves," better—a heavenly (ch. 11, 16). enduring—not liable to spoiling, substance—possession: peculiarly our own, if we will not cast away our birthright. 35-37. Consequent exhortation to confidence and endurance, as Christ is soon coming. Cast not away—Implying that they now have "confidence," and that it will not withdraw of itself, unless they "cast it away" wilfully (cf. ch. 3, 14). which—Greek, "the which:" inasmuch as being such as, hath—present tense: it is as certain as if you had it in your hand (v. 37). It hath in reversion, recompense of reward—of grace, not of debt: reward of a kind which no mercenary self-seeker would seek: holiness will be its own reward; self-devoting unselfishness for Christ's sake will be its own rich recompense (Note, ch. 2, 2; 11, 26). 36. patience—Greek, "waiting endurance," or "enduring perseve-ance" the kindred Greek verb in the LXX., Habakkuk, 2. 3, is translated, "I wait for it" (cf. James, 5. 7), after ye have done the will of God—"that whereas ye have done the will of God" hitherto (v. 22-30), ye may now show also patient persevering endurance, and so "receive the promise," i.e., the promised reward: eternal life and bliss commensurate with our work of faith and love (ch. 6. 10-12). We must not only do, but also suffer (1 Peter, 4. 10). God first uses the active talents of His servants; then polishes the other side of the stone, making the passive graces shine, patience, meekness, &c. It may be also translated, "That ye may do the will of God, and receive," &c. (ALFORD): "patience" itself is a further and a persevering doing of "God's will" otherwise it would be profitless and no real grace (Matthew, 7. 21). We should look, not merely for individual bliss now and at death, but for the great and general consummation of bliss of all saints, both in body and soul. 37, 38. Encouragement to patient endurance by consideration of the shortness of the time till Christ shall come, and God's rejection of him that draws back, taken from Habakkuk, 2. 3, 4, a little while—(John, 16. 16.) he that shall come—lit., "the Corner." In Habakkuk, it is the vision that is said to be about to come. Christ, being the grand and ultimate subject of all prophetic vision, is here made by Paul, under inspiration, the subject of the Spirit's prophecy by Habakkuk, in its final and exhaustive fulfilment. 38. Just—The oldest MSS. and Vulgate read, "my just man." God is the speaker: "He who is just in my sight." BENGE translates, "The just shall live by my faith;" answering to the Hebrew, Habakkuk, 2. 4. lit., "the just shall live by the faith of Him," viz., Christ, the final subject of "the vision," who "will not lie," i.e., disappoint. Here not merely the first beginning, as in Galatians, 3. 11, but the continuance, of the spiritual life of the justified man is referred to, as opposed to declension and apostasy. As the justified man receives his first spiritual life by faith, so it is by faith that he shall continue to live (Luke, 4. 4). The faith meant here is that fully developed living trust in the unseen (ch. 11. 1) Saviour, which can keep men steadfast amidst persecutions and temptations (v. 34-36). But—Greek, "and," if any man draw back—so the Greek admits; though it might also be translated, as ALFORD approves, "if he (the just man) draw back." Even so, it would not disprove the final perseverance of saints. For "the just man" in this latter clause would mean one seemingly, and in part really, though not savingly, "just" or justified: as in Ezekeil, 16. 24, 26. In the Hebrew, this latter half of the verse stands first, and is, "Behold, his soul which is lifted up, is not upright in him." Habakkuk states the cause of drawing back: a soul lifted up, and in self-inflated unbelief setting itself up against God. Paul, by the Spirit, states the effect, it draws back. Also, what in Habakkuk is, "His soul is not upright in him," is in Paul, "My soul shall have no pleasure in him." Habakkuk states the cause, Paul the effect: He who is not right in his own soul, does not stand right with God: God has no pleasure in him. BENGE translates Habakkuk, "His soul is not upright in respect to him," viz., Christ, the subject of "the vision," i.e., Christ has no pleasure in him (cf. ch. 12. 25). Every flower in spring is not a fruit in autumn. 39. A Pauline elegant turning-off from denunciatory warnings to charitable hopes of his readers (Romans, 6. 12), saving of the soul—lit., "acquisition or obtaining" of the soul." The kindred Greek verb is applied to Christ's acquiring the church as the purchase of His blood (Acts, 20. 28). If we acquire or obtain our soul's salvation, it is through Him who has obtained it for us by His blood shedding. "The unbelieving man loses his soul: for not being God's, neither is he his own" (cf. Matthew, 16. 26, with Luke, 9. 26); faith saves the soul by linking it to God. (TRITZSCH in ALFORD.)

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-40. DEFINITION OF THE FAITH JUST SPOKEN OF (ch. 10. 39): EXAMPLES FROM THE OLD COVENANT FOR OUR PERSEVERANCE IN FAITH. 1. Description of the great things which faith (in its widest sense: not here restricted to faith in the gospel sense) does for us. Not a full definition of faith in its whole nature, but a description of its great characteristics in relation to the subject of Paul's exhortation here, viz., to perseverance. substance, &c.—It substantiates promises of God which we hope for, as future in fulfilment, making them present realities to us. However, the Greek is translated in ch. 3. 14, "confidence;" and it also here may mean "sure confidence." So ALFORD translates. THOMAS MAGISTER supports English Version, "The whole thing that follows is virtually contained in the first principle; now the first commencement of the things hoped for is in us through the assent of faith, which virtually contains all the things hoped for." Cf. Notes, ch. 6. 6, "tasted... powers of the world to come." Through faith, the future object of Christian hope, as its beginning, is already present. True faith infers the reality of the objects believed in and hoped for (v. 6). HUGO DE ST. VICTOR distinguished faith from hope. By faith alone we are sure of eternal things that they ARE; but by hope we are confident that WE SHALL HAVE them. All hope presupposes faith (Romans, 4. 26). evidence—"demonstration;" convincing proof to the believer; the soul thereby seeing what the eye cannot see, things not seen—the whole invisible and spiritual world; not merely things future and things pleasant, as the "things hoped for," but also the past and present, and those the reverse of pleasant. "Eternal life is promised to us, but it is when we are dead; we are told of a blessed resurrection, but meanwhile we moulder in the dust; we are declared to be justified, and sin dwells in us; we hear that we are blessed, meantime we are overwhelmed in endless miseries; we are promised abundance of all goods, but we still endure hunger and thirst; God declares He will immediately come to our help, but He seems deaf to our cries. What should we do if we had not faith and hope to lean on, and if our mind did not emerge amidst the darkness above the world by the shining of the Word and Spirit of God?" (CALVIN.) Faith is an assent unto truths credible upon the testimony of God [not on the reasonableness of the thing revealed, though by this we may judge as to whether it be what it professes, a genuine revelation], delivered unto us in the writings of the apostles and prophets. Thus Christ's ascension is the cause, and His absence the crown, of our faith: because He ascended, we the more believe, and because we believe in Him who hath ascended, our faith is the more accepted. (BISHOP PEARSON.) Faith believes what it sees not; for if thou seest there is no faith: the Lord has gone away so as not to be seen; He is hidden that He may be believed; the yearning desire by faith after Him who is unseen is the preparation of a heavenly mansion for us; when He shall be seen it shall be given to us as the reward of faith (AUGUSTINE.) As Revelation deals with spiritual and invisible things exclusively, faith is the faculty needed by us, since it is the evidence of things not seen. By faith we venture our eternal interests on the bare word of God, and this is also, other reasonable. 2. For—So high a description of faith is not undeserved; for, &c. (ALFORD.) by—Greek, "in;" in respect to...in the matter of, "it," or, as Greek more emphatically, "this," the elders—as though still living and giving their powerful testimony to the reasonableness and excellence of faith (ch. 12. 1). Not merely the ancients, as though they were people solely of the past; nay, they belong to the one and the same blessed family as ourselves (v. 39, 40). "The elders," whom we all revere so highly. "I will show how we ought to seek in all its fulness, under the veil of history, the essential substance of the doctrine sometimes briefly indicated. [BENGL.] "The elders," as "the fathers," is a title of honour given on the ground of their bright faith and practice, obtained a good report—Greek, "were testified of," viz., favourably (cf. ch. 7, 8). It is a phrase of Luke, Paul's companion. Not only men, but God, gave testimony to their faith (e. 4, 5, 39). Thus they being testified of themselves have become "witnesses" to all others (ch. 12, 1). The earlier elders had their patience exercised for a long period of life; those later, in sharper afflictions. Many things which they hoped for and did not see, subsequently came to pass and were conspicuously seen, the event confirming faith. [BENGL.] 3. we understand—we perceive with our spiritual intelligence the fact of the world's creation by God, though we see neither Him nor the act of creation as described, Genesis, 1. The natural world could not, without revelation, teach us this truth, though it confirms the truth when apprehended by faith (Romans, 1, 20). Adam is passed over in silence here as to his faith, perhaps as being the first who fell and brought sin on us all; though it does not follow that he did not repent and believe the promise, worlds—lit., "ages" all that exists in time and space, visible and invisible, present and eternal, framed—"fitly formed and consolidated" including the creation of the single parts and the harmonious organization of the whole, and the continual providence which maintains the whole throughout all ages. As creation is the foundation and a specimen of the whole Divine economy, so faith in creation is the foundation and a specimen of all faith. [BENGL.] by the word of God—not the personal word (Greek logos, John, 1, 1) here, but the spoken word (Greek rhema); though by the instrumentality of the personal word (ch. 1, 2). not made, &c.—translate as Greek, "so that not out of things which appear hath that which is seen been made?" not as in the case of all things which we see reproduced from previously-existing and visible materials, as, for instance, the plant from the seed, the animal from the parent, &c., but the visible world sprung into being from apparent materials. So also it is implied in the first clause of the verse that the invisible spiritual worlds were framed not from previously existing materials. BENGL. explains by distinguishing "appear," i.e., begin to be seen (viz., at creation), from that which is seen as already in existence, not merely beginning to be seen; "so that the things seen were not made of the things which appear," i.e., which begin to be seen by us in the act of creation. We were not spectators of creation; it is by faith we perceive it. 4. more excellent sacrifice—because offered in faith. Now faith must have some revelation of God on which it fastens. The revelation in this case was doubtless God's command to sacrifice animals ("the frailings of the flock") in token of the forfeiture of men's life by sin, and as a type of the promised bruiser of the serpent's head (Genesis, 3, 15), the one coming sacrifice; this command is implied in God's having made coats of skin for Adam and Eve (Genesis, 3, 21); for these skins must have been taken from animals slain in sacrifice; inasmuch as it was not for food they were slain, animal food not being permitted till after the flood; nor for mere clothing, as, were it so, clothes might have been made of the fleeces without the needless cruelty of killing the animal; but a coat of skin put on Adam from a sacrificed animal typified the covering or atonement (the Hebrew for atone means to cover) resulting from Christ's sacrifice. The Greek is more lit. rendered [KENNICOTT] by WICKLIFFE "a much more sacrifice;" and by Queen Elizabeth's version "a greater sacrifice." A fuller, more ample sacrifice, that which partook more largely and essentially of the true nature and virtue of sacrifice.

[ARCHBISHOP MAGER.] It was not any intrinsic merit in "the frailings of the flock" above "the fruits of the ground." It was God's appointment that gave it all its excellency as a sacrifice; if it had not been so, it would have been a presumptuous act of wild worship (Colossians, 2, 23), and taking of a life which man had no right over before the flood (Genesis, 9, 1). The sacrifice seems to have been a holocaust, and the sign of the Divine acceptance of it was probably the consumption of it by fire from heaven (Genesis, 15, 17). Hence, "to accept" a burnt sacrifice is in Hebrew "to turn it to ashes" (Margin, Psalm 20, 3). A flame seems to have issued from the Shechinah or flaming cherubim, east of Eden ("the presence of the Lord," Genesis, 1, 16), where the first sacrifices were offered. Cain, in unbelieving self-righteousness, presented merely a thank-offering, not like Abel feeling his need of the propitiatory sacrifice appointed on account of sin. God "had respect (first) unto Abel, and then) to his offering" (Genesis, 4, 4). Faith causes the believer's person to be accepted, and then his offering. Even an animal sacrifice, though of God's appointment, would not have been accepted, had it not been offered in faith. He obtained witness—God by fire attesting His acceptance of him as "righteous by faith," his gifts—the common term for sacrifices, implying that they must be freely given, by it—by faith exhibited in his animal sacrifice, dead, yet speaks—His blood crying from the ground to God, shows how precious, because of his "faith," he was still in God's sight even when dead. So he becomes a witness to us of the blessed effects of faith. 5. Faith was the ground of his pleasing God; and his pleasing God was the ground of his translation, translated—Genesis, 5, 22, 24. Implies a sudden removal (the same Greek as in Galatians, 1, 6) from mortality without death to immortality: such a change as shall pass over the living at Christ's coming (1 Corinthians, 15, 51, 52). had this testimony—viz., of Scripture; the Greek perfect implies that this testimony continues still; "he has been testified of," pleased God—The Scripture testimony virtually expresses that he pleased God, viz., "Enoch walked with God." LXX. translates the Hebrew for "walked with God," Genesis, 6, 9, pleased God, 6. without—Greek, "apart from faith;" if one be destitute of faith (cf. Romans, 14, 23). to please—translate, as ALFORD does, the Greek aorist, "it is impossible to please God at all" (Romans, 8, 8). Natural amiabilities and works done before the grace of Christ are not pleasant to God, forasmuch as they spring not of faith in Jesus Christ; yea, rather, for that they are not done as God hath willed them to be done, we doubt not but they have the nature of sin. [Article XIII., Book of Common Prayer.] Works not rooted in God are splendid sin. [AUGUSTINE.] he that cometh to God—as a worshipper (ch. 7, 19), must believe—once for all; Greek aorist, that God is—is; is the true self-existing Jehovah as contrasted with all so-called gods, not gods, Galatians, 4, 8; the source of all being, though he sees Him not (e. 1) as being "invisible" (e. 27). So Enoch; this passage implies that he had not been favoured with visible appearances of God, yet he believed in God's being and in God's moral government, as the Rewarder of His diligent worshippers, in opposition to antediluvian scepticism. Also Moses was not so favoured before he left Egypt the first time, e. 27. still he believed, and is—a different Greek verb from the former "is." Translated, "is eventually;" proves to be; lit., becomes, rewarder of reward. [ALFORD.] So God proved to be to Enoch. The reward is God Himself diligently "sought" and "walked with" in partial communion here, and to be fully enjoyed hereafter. Cf. Genesis, 15, 1. "I am thy exceeding great reward." of them and them only, diligently seek—Greek, "seek out" God. Cf. "seek early," Proverbs, 5, 17. Not only

"ask" and "seek," but "knock," Matthew, 7, 7; cf. ch. 11, 12; Luke, 13, 24. "Strive" as in an agony of contest. 7. warned of God—The same Greek ch. 8, 4, "admonished of God," moved with fear—not mere slavish fear, but as in Note, ch. 4, 7; Greek, reverential fears; opposed to the world's sneering disbelief of the revelation, and self-deceiving security. Join "by faith" with "prepared an ark" (1 Peter, 2, 20), by the which—faith, condemned the world—for since he believed and was saved, so might they have believed and been saved, so that their condemnation by God is by his case shown to be just. righteousness which is by faith—Greek, "according to faith." A Pauline thought. Noah is first called "righteous" in Genesis, 4, 8. Christ calls Abel so, Matthew, 23, 35. Cf. as to Noah's righteousness, Ezekiel, 14, 14, 30; 2 Peter, 2, 5, "a preacher of righteousness." Paul here makes faith the principle and ground of his righteousness. heir—the consequence of sonship which flows from faith. 8. From the antediluvian saints he passes to the patriarchs of Israel, to whom "the promises" belonged. called—by God (Genesis, 12, 1). The oldest MSS. and Vulgate read, "He that was called Abraham," his name being changed from Abram to Abraham, on the occasion of God's making with him and his seed a covenant sealed by circumcision, many years after his call out of Ur. "By faith, he who was (afterwards) called Abraham (father of nations, Genesis, 17, 4. in order to become which was the design of God's bringing him out of Ur) obeyed the command of God: to be understood in this reading, as as to go out," &c. which he should after receive—He had not fully received even this promise when he went out, for it was not explicitly given him till he had reached Canaan (Genesis, 12, 1, 6, 7). When the promise of the land was given him the Canaanite was still in the land, and himself a stranger; it is in the new heaven and new earth that he shall receive his personal inheritance promised him; so believers sojourn on earth as strangers, whilst the ungodly and Satan lord it over the earth; but at Christ's coming that same earth which was the scene of the believer's conflict, shall be the inheritance of Christ and His saints. 9. sojourned—as a "stranger and pilgrim." in—Greek, "into," i. e., he went into it and sojourned there, as in a strange country—a country not belonging to him but to others (see the Greek), Acts, 7, 4, 6. dwelling in tabernacles—as strangers and sojourners do: moving from place to place, as having no fixed possession of their own. In contrast to the abiding "city" (v. 10). with—Their kind of dwelling being the same is a proof that their faith was the same. They all alike were content to wait for their good things hereafter (Luke, 16, 25). Jacob was fifteen years old at the death of Abraham, heirs with him of the same promise—Isaac did not inherit it from Abraham, nor Jacob from Isaac, but they all inherited it from God directly as "fellow-heirs." In ch. 6, 12, 16, 17, "the promise" means the thing promised as a thing in part already attained; but in this ch. "the promise" is of something still future. See, however, Note, ch. 6, 12. 10. looked for—Greek, "he was expecting;" waiting for with eager expectation (Romans, 8, 19). a—Greek, "the city," &c., already alluded to. Worldly Enoch, son of the murderer Cain, was the first to build his city here: the godly patriarchs waited for their city hereafter (v. 16; ch. 12, 22; 13, 14). foundations—Greek, "the foundations" which the tents had not, nor even men's present cities have, whose builder and maker—Greek, "designer" (Ephesians, 1, 4, 11) and master-builder, or executor of the design. The city is worthy of its Framers and Builder (cf. v. 16; ch. 6, 2). Cf. "found," Note, ch. 6, 12. 11. also saw herself—though being the weaker vessel, and though at first she doubted, was delivered of a child—Omitted in the oldest MSS.; then translated, "and that when she was past age" (Romans, 4, 19), she judged him faithful who had promised—after she had ceased to doubt, being instructed by the angel that it was no jest, but a matter in serious earnest. 12. as good as dead—lit., "deadened," no longer having, as in youth, energetic vital powers, stars—said—(Genesis, 22, 17.) 12-16. Summary of the characteristic excellencies of the patriarchs' faith, died in faith—died as believers, waiting for, not actually seeing as yet their good things promised to them. They were true to this principle of faith even unto, and especially in, their dying hour (cf. v. 20). These all—beginning with "Abraham" (v. 8), to whom the promises were made (Galatians, 3, 16), and who is alluded to in the end of v. 13 and in v. 16. [BENNETT & ALFORD.] But the "ALL" can hardly but include Abel, Enoch, and Noah. Now as these did not receive the promise of entering literal Canaan, some other promise made to the first ages, and often repeated, must be that meant, viz., the promise of a coming Redeemer made to Adam, viz., "the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." Thus the promises cannot have been merely temporal, for Abel and Enoch mentioned here received no temporal promise. [ABRONSIEFF OF MAGER.] This promise of eternal redemption is the inner essence of the promises made to Abraham (Galatians, 3, 16, not having received—It was this that constituted their "faith." If they had "received" THE THING PROMISED (so "the promises" here mean: the plural is used because of the frequent renewal of the promise to the patriarchs: verse 17 says he did receive the promises, but not the thing promised, it would have been right, not faith, seen them afar off—John, 3, 56.) Christ, as the Word, was preached to the Old Testament believers, and so became the seed of life to their souls, as He is to ours, and were persuaded of them—The oldest MSS. omit this clause. embraced them—as though they were not "afar off," but within reach, so as to draw them to themselves and clasp them in their embrace. TRENCH denies that the Old Testament believers embraced them, for they only saw them afar off: he translates, "saluted them," as the homeward bound mariner, recognizing from afar the well known promontories of his native land. ALFORD translates, "greeted them." Jacob's exclamation, "I have waited for thy salvation. O Lord" (Genesis, 49, 18), is such a greeting of salvation from afar [DELITZSCH]. confessed... were strangers—so Abraham to the children of Heth (Genesis, 23, 4); and Jacob to Pharaoh (Genesis, 47, 9; Psalm, 119, 19). Worldly men hold fast the world; believers sit loose to it. Citizens of the world do not confess themselves "strangers on the earth," pilgrims—Greek, "temporary (lit., by the way) sojourners," on the earth—contrasted with "an heavenly" (v. 16); "our citizenship is in heaven" (Greek: ch. 10, 34; Psalm 119, 64; Philipplians, 3, 20). "Whosoever professes that he has a father in heaven, confesses himself a stranger on earth; hence there is in the heart an ardent longing, like that of a child living among strangers, in want and grief, far from his fatherland." [LUTHER.] "Like ships in seas, while in, above the world." 14. Fe.—Proof that "faith" (v. 13) was their actuating principle. declares plainly—make it plainly evident, seek—Greek, "seek after;" implying the direction towards which their desires ever tend, a country—rather as Greek, "a fatherland." In confessing themselves strangers here, they evidently imply that they regard not this as their home or fatherland, but seek after another and a better. 15. As Abraham, had he desired to leave his pilgrim life in Canaan, and resume his former fixed habitation in Ur, among the carnal and worldly, had in his long life ample opportunities to have done so; and so spiritually, as to all believers who came out from the world to become God's people, they might, if they had been so minded, have easily gone back. 16. Proving the truth that the old fathers did not, as some assert, "look only for transitory promises" (Article VII., Book the progressive acts of redemption, JOHN, 14. 2. for them a city," the city in which He Himself reigns, so that their yearning for rest shall not be disappointed. 14. 16. "I will send down my garniture by God, on revelation, 21. 19. 27. "I7. offered up—id., "hath offered up," as if the work and its praise were yet enduring. [ALFORD.] As far as his intention was concerned he did sacrifice Isaac; and in actual fact "he offered him," as far as the presentation of him on the altar as an offering to God is concerned. trac.—Greek, "sacrificed," as in Genesis, 22. 1. Put so the proof of his faith. Not that God "tempted" to sin, but God "tempted" in the sense of proving or trying (James, 1. 13-15). and— and so. he that was received—rather as Greek, "accepted," i. e., welcomed and embraced by faith, not merely "had the promise," as in ch. 7. 8. This added to the difficulty in the way of his faith, that it was in Isaac's posterity the promises were to be fulfilled; how then could they be fulfilled if Isaac were sacrificed? offered up—rather as Greek, "was offering up;" he was in the act of offering, his only begotten son.—Cl. Genesis, 22. 2, "Isaac now thy son, thine only son." EUSEBIUS, Preparatio Evangelica, 1. 10, and 4. 16, has preserved a fragment of a Greek translation of Sanchoniatho, which mentions a mystical sacrifice of the Phœniciana, wherein a prince in royal robes was the offerer, and his only son was to be the victim; this evidently was a tradition derived from Abraham's offering, and handed down through Kean or Edom, Isaac's son. Isaac was Abraham's "only-begotten son" in respect of Sarah and the promises; he sent away his other sons, by other wives (Genesis, 25. 6). Abraham is a type of the Father not sparing His only-begotten Son to fulfil the Divine purpose of love. God no where in the Mosaic law allowed human sacrifices, though He claimed the first-born of Israel as His. 18. Or whom—rather as Greek, "His (Abraham, not Isaac, to whom it was said." [ALFORD.] HENAGEL supports English Version, to ch. 1. 7 uses the same Greek preposition, "unto," for "in respect to," or "of." This verse gives a definition of the "only-begotten son" (v. 17). in Isaac shall thy seed be called.—(Genesis, 21. 12.) The posterity present. Isaac, by JUSTI, assigned to his future, as if they were present. 21. 16. Greek, "each of the sons" (Genesis, 47. 29; knew not Joseph's sons, and could not distinguish by sight, yet he did distinguish them by putting his hands intentionally, so as to lay his hands on the younger, Ephraim, whose posterity greater than that of Manasse; he also a grand-children as his own sons, after he had the right of primogeniture to Joseph 48. 22. and worshipped, &c.—This did so in immediate connection with the foregoing 28, when Jacob made Joseph swear that he would be with his fathers in Canaan, that he might be assured that Joseph would do so full pious gratitude to God, which he expressed himself on his bed to an attitude of worship as Joseph's (v. 23), consisted in his so anticipating the fulfilment of God's promise to his descendants, as to desire to be his proper possession, leaning upon the bed (Genesis, 47. 31, Hebrew and English Ver the bed's head." LXX translates as Paul he justly reprobates the notion of modern Jacob worshipped the top of Joseph's staff, an image of Joseph's power, to which Jas recognition of the future sovereignty of the tribe—the father bowing to the son! The translated in English Version, sets it not alluded to afterwards (Genesis, 48. 2; 49. 1) likely that Jacob turned himself in his bed his face towards the pillow, Isaiah, 38. 2 (bedsteads in the East). Paul, by adoptive version, brings out, under the Spirit, a fact, viz., that the aged patriarch used Joseph's staff, too, was the emblem of his pilgrimage on his way to his heavenly city (v. 12, God had so wonderfully supported him, 10, "With my staff I passed over Jordan and become." &c. (cf. Exodus, 12. 11; Mat 1 Kinza. 1. 47. the same thing is said of T) resurrection of the body, and the enjoyment in it of the heavenly Canaan. His wish was fulfilled (Joshua, 24. 32; Acts, 4. 10). 23. parents—So the LXX. have the plural, viz., Amram and Jochebed (Numbers, 26. 59); but Exodus, 2. 2, the mother alone is mentioned; but doubtless Amram sanctioned all she did, and secrecy being their object, he did not appear prominent in what was done. a proper child—Greek, "a comely child." Acts, 7. 20, "exceeding fair," Greek, "fair to God." The "faith" of his parents in saving the child must have had some Divine revelation to rest on (probably at the time of his birth), which marked their "exceeding fair" babe as one whom God designed to do a great work by. His beauty was probably "the sign" appointed by God to assure their faith. the king's commandment—to slay all the males (Exodus, 1. 22). 24. So far from faith being opposed to Moses, he was an eminent example of it. [BENNETT.] refused—in believing self-denial, when he might possibly have succeeded at last to the throne of Egypt. Thermutis, Pharaoh's daughter, according to the tradition which Paul under the Spirit sanctions, adopted him, as Josephus says, with the consent of the king. Josephus states that when a child, he threw on the ground the diadem put on him in jest, a presage of his subsequent formal rejection of Thermutis' adoption of him. Faith made him to prefer the adoption of the King of kings, unseen, and so to choose (v. 25, 26) things, the very last which flesh and blood relish. 25. He balanced the best of the world with the worst of religion, and decidedly chose the latter. "Choosing" implies a deliberate resolution, not a hasty impulse. He was forty years old, a time when the judgment is matured, for a season—if the world has "pleasure" (Greek, "enjoyment") to offer, it is but for a season. If religion bring with it "affliction," it too is but for a season; whereas its "pleasures are for evermore." 26. Esteeming—Inasmuch as he esteemed, the reproach of Christ—i. e., the reproach which falls on the church, and which Christ regards as His own reproach, He being the Head, and the church (both of the Old and New Testament) His body. Israel typified Christ: Israel's sufferings were Christ's sufferings (cf. 2 Corinthians, 1. 5; Colossians, 1. 24). As circumcision was Egypt's reproach, so circumcision was the badge of Israel's expectation of Christ, which Moses especially cherished, and which the Gentiles reproached Israel on account of. Christ's people's reproach will ere long be their great glory. had respect unto—Greek, "turning his eyes away from other considerations, he fixed them on the (eternal) recompense" (v. 39, 40). 27. not fearing the wrath of the king.—But in Exodus, 2. 14 it is said, "Moses feared, and fled from the face of Pharaoh." He was afraid, and fled from the danger where no duty called him to stay (to have stayed without call of duty would have been to tempt Providence, and to sacrifice his hope of being Israel's future deliverer according to the Divine intimations: his great aim, Note, v. 33). He did not fear the king so as to neglect his duty and not return when God called him. It was in spite of the king's prohibition he left Egypt, not fearing the consequences which were likely to overtake him if he should be caught, after having, in defiance of the king, left Egypt. If he had stayed and resumed his position as adopted son of Pharaoh's daughter, his slaughter of the Egyptian would doubtless have been connived at; but his resolution to take his portion with oppressed Israel, which he could not have done had he stayed, was the motive of his flight, and constituted the "faith" of this act, according to the express statement here. The exodus of Moses with Israel cannot be meant here, for it was made, not in defiance, but by the desire, of the king. Besides, the chronological order would be broken thus, the next particular specified here, viz., the institution of the Passover, having taken place before the exodus. Besides, it is Moses' personal history and faith which are here described. The faith of the people ("they passed") is not introduced till v. 29. endured—steadfast in faith amidst trials. He had fled, not so much from fear of Pharaoh, as from a revulsion of feeling in finding God's people insensible to their high destiny, and from disappointment at not having been able to inspire them with those hopes for which he had sacrificed all his earthly prospects. This accounts for his strange reluctance and despondency when commissioned by God to go and arouse the people (Exodus, 3. 15; 4. 1, 10-12). seeing him—invisible—as though he had not to do with men, but only with God, ever before his eyes by faith, though invisible to the bodily eye (Romans, 1. 20; 1 Timothy, 1. 17; 6. 16). Hence he feared not the wrath of visible man: the characteristic of faith (v. 1; Luke, 12. 4, 6). 28. kept—Greek, "hath kept," the Passover being, in Paul's day, still observed. His faith here was his belief in the invisible God's promise that the destroying angel should pass over, and not touch the inmates of the blood-sprinkled houses (Exodus, 12. 23). "He acquiesced in the bare word of God where the thing itself was not apparent." [CALVIN.] the first-born—Greek "neuter" both of man and beast. 29. they—Moses and Israel. Red sea—called so from its red sea-weed, or rather from Edom (meaning red, whose country adjoined it, which...assaying to do—Greek, "of which (Red sea) the Egyptians having made experiment." Rashness and presumption mistaken by many for faith: with similar rash presumption many rush into eternity. The same thing when done by the believer, and when done by the unbeliever, is not the same thing. [BENNETT.] What was faith in Israel, was presumption in the Egyptians. were drowned—Greek, "were swallowed up," or "engulfed." They sank in the sands as much as in the waves of the Red sea. Cf. Exodus, 15. 12, "the earth swallowed them." 30. The soundings of trumpets, though one were to sound for ten thousand years, cannot throw down walls, but faith can do all things. [CHRYSOSTOM.] seven days—whereas sieges often last for years. 31. Rahab allowed her "faith" in her confession, Joshua, 2. 9, 11, "I know that Jehovah hath given you the land: Jehovah your God, is God in heaven above, and in earth beneath." the harlot—her former life adds to the marvel of her repentance, faith, and preservation (Matthew, 21. 31, 32). believed not—Greek, "were disobedient," viz., to the will of God manifested by the miracles wrought in behalf of Israel (Joshua, 2. 8-11). received—in her house (Joshua, 2. 1, 4, 6). with peace—peaceably: so that they had nothing to fear in her house. Thus Paul, quoting the same examples (v. 17, 31) for the power of faith, as James, 2. 21, 25 (see my notes there) does for justification by works evidentially, shows that in maintaining justification by faith alone, he means not a dead faith, but "faith" which worketh by love" (Galatians, 5. 6). 32. the time—suitable for the length of an epistle. He accumulates collectively some out of many examples of faith. Gideon—put before Barak, not chronologically, but as being more celebrated. Just as Samson for the same reason is put before Jephthah. The mention of Jephthah as an example of "faith," makes it unlikely he sacrificed the life of his daughter for a rash vow. David, the warrior king and prophet, forms the transition from warrior chiefs to the "prophets," of whom "Samuel" is mentioned as the first. 33. subdued kingdoms—as David did (2 Samuel, 8. 1, &c.); so also Gideon subdued Midian (Judges, 7.). wrought righteousness—as Samuel did (1 Samuel, 8. 9; 12. 3-23; 15. 33; and David, 2 Samuel, 8. 16). obtained promises—as "the prophets" (v. 23) did; for through them the promises were given (cf. Daniel, 9. 21). [BENNETT.] Rather, "obtained the fulfilment of promises," which had been previously object of their faith (Joshua, 21, 48; 1 Kings, 8, 56). Indeed, Gideon, Barak, &c., also obtained the things which God promised. Not "the promises," which are still future (e. 13, 39). stopped the mouths of lions—Note the words, "because he believed in his God." Also Samson (Judges, 14, 6), David (1 Samuel, 17, 34-37), Benaiah (2 Samuel, 23, 20). 34. Quenched the violence of fire—(Daniel, 3, 27.) Not merely "quenched the fire," but "quenched the power (so the Greek) of the fire," Daniel, 3, and 6, record the last miracles of the Old Testament. So the martyrs of the reformation, though not escaping the fire, were delivered from its having power really or lastingly to hurt them. escaped...sword—So Jephthah (Judges, 12, 3); and so David escaped Saul's sword (1 Samuel, 18, 11; 19, 10, 12); Elijah (1 Kings, 19, 1, &c.; 2 Kings, 6, 14). out of weakness...made strong—Samson (Judges, 16, 28; 18, 19), Hezekiah (Isaiah, 37, and 38.). Milton says of the martyrs, "They shook the powers of darkness with the irresistible power of weakness." valiant in fight—Barak (Judges, 4, 14, 16). And the Maccabees, the sons of Matthias, Judas, Jonathan, and Simon, who delivered the Jews from their cruel oppressor, Antiochus of Syria. armies—lit., camps: referring to Judges, 7, 21. But the reference may be to the Maccabees having put to flight the Syrian and other foes. 35. Women received their dead raised—as the widow of Zarephath (1 Kings, 17, 17, &c.; 22.). The Shunammite (2 Kings, 4, 17, &c.; 35.). The two oldest MSS. read, "They received women of aliens by raising their dead." 1 Kings, 17, 24, shows that the raising of the widow's son by Elijah, led her to the faith, so that he thus took her into fellowship, an alien though she was. Christ, in Luke, 4, 26, makes especial mention of the fact that Elijah was sent to an alien from Israel, a woman of Sarepta. Thus Paul may quote this as an instance of Elijah's faith, that at God's command he went to a Gentile city of Sidonia (contrary to Jewish prejudices), and there, as the fruit of faith, not only raised her dead son, but received her as a convert into the family of God, as Vulgata reads. Still, English Version may be the right reading, and—Greek, "but;" in contrast to those raised again to life, tortured—"broken on the wheel." Eleazar (2 Macc. 6, 18, end, 19, 20, 30). The sufferer was stretched on an instrument like a drumhead, and scourged to death, not accepting deliverance—when offered to them. So the seven brothers, 2 Macc. 7, 9, 11, 14, 29, 36; and Eleazar, 2 Macc. 6, 21, 28, 30. "Though I might have been delivered from death, I endure these severe pains, being beaten," a better resurrection—than that of the women's children "raised to life again;" or, than the resurrection which their foes could give them by delivering them from death (Daniel, 12, 2; Luke, 20, 35; Philipplians, 3, 11). The fourth of the brethren (referring to Daniel, 12, 2) said to king Antiochus, "To be put to death by men, is to be chosen to look onward for the hopes which are of God, to be raised up again by Him: but for thee there is no resurrection to life." The writer of 2 Maccabees expressly disclaims inspiration, which prevents our mistaking Paul's allusion here to it as if it sanctioned the Apocrypha as inspired. In quoting Daniel, he quotes a book claiming inspiration, and so tacitly sanctions that claim. 36. others—of a different class of confessors for the truth (the Greek is different from that for "others," e. 35, alioi, heteroi). trial—testing their faith. imprisonment—as Hanani (2 Chronicles, 16, 10), imprisoned by Asa. Micaiah, the son of Imlah, by Ahab (1 Kings, 22, 26, 27). 37. stoned—as Zechariah, son of Jehoiada (2 Chronicles, 24, 20-22; Matthew, 23, 35). sawn asunder—as Isaiah was said to have been by Manasseh: but see my Introduction to Isaiah. tempted—by their foes, in the midst of their tortures, to renounce their faith: the most bitter aggravation of them. Or else, by those of their own household, as Job was (Estiva); or by the fiery darts of Satan, as Jesus was in his last trials. [GLASSIUS.] Probably it included all three: they were tempted in every possible way, by friends and foes, by human and Satanic agents, by carresses and afflictions, by words and deeds, to forsake God, but in vain, through the power of faith. sword—lit., "they died in the murder of the sword." In v. 34, the contrary is given as an effect of faith, "they escaped the edge of the sword." Both alike are marvellous effects of faith. It both accomplishes great things, and suffers great things, without counting it suffering. [CHRYSOSTOM.] Urijah was so slain by Jehoiakim (Jeremiah, 38, 23); and the prophets in Israel (1 Kings, 19, 10). in sheep-skins—as Elijah (1 Kings, 19, 13, LXX.). They were white: as the "goat-skins" were black (cf. Zechariah, 13, 4). tormented—Greek, "in evil state." 38. Of whom the world was not worthy—So far from their being unworthy of living in the world, as their exile in desert, &c., might seem to imply, "the world was not worthy of them." The world, in shutting them out, shut out from itself a source of blessing: such as Joseph proved to Potiphar (Genesis, 39, 6, and Jacob to Laban (Genesis, 30, 27). In condemning them, the world condemned itself. caves—lit., "chinks." Palestine, from its hilly character, abounds in favores and caves, affording shelter to the persecuted, as the fifty hid by Obadiah (1 Kings, 18, 4, 13) and Elijah (1 Kings, 19, 8, 13); and Mattathias and his sons (1 Macc. 2, 25, 29); and Judas Maccabees (2 Macc. 4, 37, 39, having obtained a good report—Greek, "being borne witness of." Though they were so, yet "they received not the promise," i.e., the final completion of "salvation" promised at Christ's coming again (ch. 9, 28: "the eternal inheritance" (ch. 9, 15). Abraham did obtain the thing promised (ch. 6, 15) in part, viz., blessedness in soul after death, by virtue of faith in Christ about to come: the full blessedness of body and soul shall not be till the full number of the elect shall be accomplished, and all together, no one preceding the other, shall enter on the full glory and bliss. Moreover, in another point of view, it is probable that some accumulation of blessedness was added to holy souls, when Christ came and fulfilled all things; even as at His burial many rose from the dead, who doubtless ascended to heaven with Him" (FLACIUS IN BRUGI) (cf. Note, Ephesians, 4, 8). The perfecting of believers in title, and in respect to conscience, took place, once for all, at the death of Christ, by virtue of His being made by death perfect as Saviour. Their perfecting in soul at, and ever after Christ's death, took place, and takes place, at their death. But the universal and final perfecting will not take place till Christ's coming, 40. provided—with Divine forethought from eternity (cf. Genesis, 22, 8, 14). some better thing for us—(ch. 7, 19)—than they had here. They had not in this world, "apart from us" (so the Greek is for "without us," i.e., they had to wait for us for), the clear revelation of the promised salvation actually accomplished, as we now have it in Christ: in their state beyond the grave their souls also seem to have attained an increase of heavenly bliss on the death and ascension of Christ: and they shall not attain the full and final glory in body and soul (the regeneration of the creature), until the full number of the elect (including us with them) is completed. The fathers, Chrysostom, &c., restricted the meaning of v. 39, 40 to this last truth, and I incline to this view. The connexion is, "You, Hebrews, may far more easily exercise patience than Old Testament believers: for they had much longer to wait, and are still waiting until the elect are all gathered in: you, on the contrary, have not to wait for them." [EUSTATIUS.] I think his object in these verses (39, 40), is to warn Hebrew Christians against their tendency to relapse into Judaism. Though the Old Testament writers attained such eminence by faith, they are not above us in privileges, but the reverse." It is not we who are perfected with them, but rather they with us. They waited for His coming: we enjoy Him as having come (ch. 1. 1; 2. 3). Christ's death, the means of perfecting what the Jewish law could not perfect, was reserved for our time. Cf. ch. 12. 2. "perfecter (Greek) of our faith." Now that Christ is come, they in soul share our blessedness, being "the spirits of the just made perfect" (ch. 12. 23); so ALFORD; however, see Notes there. Ch. 9. 12 shows that the blood of Christ, brought into the heavenly holy place by Him, still opened an entrance into heaven (cf. John, 3. 13). Still the fathers were in blessedness by faith in the Saviour to come, at death (ch. 4. 14; Luke, 16. 22).

CHAPTER XII.

VER. 1-29. EXHORTATION TO FOLLOW THE WITNESSES OF FAITH JUST MENTIONED: NOT TO FAINT IN TRIALS: TO REMOVE ALL BITTER ROOTS OF SIN: FOR WE ARE UNDER, NOT A LAW OF TERROR, BUT THE GOSPEL OF GRACE, TO DESPISE WHICH WILL BEING THE HEAVIER PENALTIES, IN PROPORTION TO OUR GREATER PRIVILEGES. I, we also—as well as those recounted in v. 11. are compassed about—Greek, "have so great a cloud in numberless multitude above us, like a cloud, 'holy and palinid,' Clemens Alexandrinus of witnesses surrounding us." The image is from a "race," an image common even in Palestine from the time of the Greco-Macedonian empire, which introduced such Greek usages as national games. The "witnesses" answer to the spectators pressing round to see the competitors in their contest for the prize (Philippians, 3. 14). Those "witnessed of" (Greek, ch. 11. 4. 28) become in their turn "witnesses" in a twofold way: (1.) attesting by their own case the faithfulness of God to His people [ALFORD] (ch. 4. 13), some of them martyrs in the modern sense; (2.) witnessing our struggle of faith; however, this second sense of "witnesses," though agreeing with the image here if it is to be pressed, is not positively, unequivocally, and directly sustained by Scripture. It gives vividness to the image: as the crowd of spectators gave additional spirit to the combatants, so the cloud of witnesses who have themselves been in the same contest, ought to increase our earnestness, testifying, as they do, to God's faithfulness, weight—As corporeal unworldliness was, through a disciplinary diet, laid aside by candidates for the prize in racing; so carnal and worldly lusts, and all, whether from without or within, that would impede the heavenly runner, are the spiritual weight to be laid aside. "Encumbrance," all superfluous weight: the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, and even harmless and otherwise useful things which would positively retard us (Mark, 16. 50, the blind man casting away his garment to come to Jesus; 9. 43-45; cf. Ephesians, 4. 22; Colossians, 2. 8, 10), the sin which doth so easily beset us—Greek, "sin which easily stands around us," so LUTHER, "which always so clings to us," "sinful propensity always surrounding us, ever present and ready." [WASEL.] It is not primarily "the sin" &c., but sin in general, with, however, special reference to "apostasy," against which he had already warned them, as one to which they might gradually be seduced: the besetting sin of the Hebrews, UNBELIEF, with patience—Greek, "in persevering endurance" (ch. 10. 36). On "ran" cf. 1 Corinthians, 9. 24, 26. 2. Looking unto—lit., "Looking from afar" (Notes, ch. 11. 28); fixing the eyes upon Jesus seated on the throne of God, author—"Prince-leader." The same Greek is translated "Captain (of salvation)" ch. 1. 10; "Prince (of life)" Acts, 2. 16, (going before us as the Originator of our faith, and the Leader whose matchless example we are to follow always. In this He is distinguished from all those examples of faith in ch. 11 (cf. 1 Corinthians, 11. 1). On His "faith" cf. ch. 2. 13; 3. 2. Believers have ever looked to Him (ch. 11. 26; 13. 8). Answer—Greek, "Perfecter," referring to ch. 11. 40. of our faith—rather as Greek, "of the faith," including both His faith as exhibited in what followed and our faith. He fulfilled the ideal of faith Himself, and so, both as a vicarious offering and an example, He is the object of our faith. for the joy...set before him—via, of presently after sitting down at the right hand of the throne of God; including besides His own personal joy, the joy of sitting there as a Prince and Saviour, to give repentance and remission of sins. The coming joy disarmed of its sting the present pain. cross—shame—the great stumbling-block to the Hebrews. "Despised," (i. e., disregarded. 3. For—Justifying His exhortation. "Looking unto Jesus," consider—by way of comparison with yourselves, so the Greek, contradiction—unbelief, and every kind of opposition (Acts, 23. 19). sinners—Sin assails us. Not sin, but sinners, contradicted Christ. [BUNGEK.] he wearied and faint—Greek, "lest ye weary fainting," &c. Cf. Isaiah, 40. 4, 5, as a specimen of Jesus' not being wearied out by the contradiction and strange unbelief of those among whom He laboured, preaching as never man did, and exhibiting miracles wrought by His inherent power, as none else could do. 4. not yet resisted unto blood—Image from pugilism, as he previously had the image of a race, both being taken from the great national Greek games. Ye have suffered the loss of goods, and been a ginsingstock both by reproaches and afflictions; ye have not yet shed your blood (Notes, ch. 12. 7). "The athlete who hath seen his own blood, and who though cast down by his opponent, does not let his spirits be cast down, who as often as he hath fallen hath risen the more determined, goes down to the encounter with great hope." [BUNGEK.] against sin—Sin is personified as an adversary; sin, whether within you, leading you to spare your blood, or in your adversaries, leading them to shed it, if they cannot through your faithfulness even unto blood, induce you to apostatize. 5. forgotten—utterly, so the Greek. Cf. v. 16-17, in which he implies how utterly some of them had forgotten God's word. His exhortation ought to have more effect on you than the cheers and exhortations of the spectators have on the competitors striving in the games. which—Greek, "the which," of which the following is a specimen. [ALFORD.] speaketh unto you—as in a dialogue or discourse, so the Greek, implying God's loving condescension (cf. Isaiah, 1. 18). despise not—lit., "Do not hold of little account." Betraying a contumacious spirit of unbelief (ch. 3. 12), as "faint" implies a broken down, weak, and desponding spirit. "Chastening" is to be borne with "subjection" (v. 9); "rebuke" (more severe than chastening) is to be borne with endurance (v. 7). "Some in adversity kick against God's will, others despond; neither is to be done by the Christian, who is peculiarly the child of God. To him such adverse things occur only by the decree of God, and that designed in kindness, via, to remove the defilements adhering to the believer, and to exercise his patience. [GROTIUS.] 6. (Revelation, 3. 19.) and—Greek "ye and," "and moreover"; bringing out an additional circumstance. scourgeth—which draws forth "blood" (v. 4). recedit—accepts. Takes to Himself as a son "in whom He delighteth" (Proverbs, 3. 12). 7. In v. 7, 8, the need of "chastening" or "discipline" is inculcated; in v. 8, the duty of those to whom it is administered. If—the oldest MSS. read, "With a view to chastening (i. e., since God's chastisement is with a view to your chastening, i. e., disciplinary amelioration) endure patiently;" so Vulgate. ALFORD translates it as indicative not so well, "It is for chastisement that ye are enduring," delect with you—"bearth Himself toward you" in the very act of chastening. what son is he—"What son is there" even in ordinary life? Much more God as to His sons (Isaiah, 48. 10; Acts, 14. 22). The most eminent of God's saints were the most afflicted. God loquitur ad nos ut nos ad deum loquamur as Greek, "We had the fathers of our flesh as correctors."—subjection—See the punishment of insubordination Deuteronomy, 21. 18. Father of spirits—contrasted with the fathers of our flesh. "Generation by man is carnal, by God is spiritual." [BENNETT.] As "Father of spirits," He is both the Originator, and the Providential, and Gracious Sustainer, at once of animal and spiritual life. Cf. "and LIVE," viz., spiritually; also v. 18, "that we might be partakers of His holiness" (3 Peter, 1. 4). God is spirit Himself, and the Creator of spirits like Himself, in contrast to men who are flesh, and the progenitors of flesh (John, 1. 6). Jesus our pattern "learned obedience" experimentally by suffering (ch. 4. 8), and live—and so, thereby, live spiritually and eternally. 10. Showing wherein the chastisement of our heavenly Father is preferable to that of earthly fathers. for a few days—i. e., with a view to our well-being in the few days of our earthly life; so the Greek, after their own pleasure—Greek, "according to what seemed fit to themselves." Their rule of chastening is what may seem fit to their own often erring judgment, temper, or caprice. The two defects of human education are (1.) the prevalence in it of a view to the interests of our short earthly term of days; (2.) the absence in parents of the unerring wisdom of our heavenly Father. "They err much at one time in severity, at another in indulgence" [1 Samuel, 2. 13; Ephesians, 6. 4], and do not so much chasten as THINK they chasten." [BENNETT.] that we might be partakers of His holiness—Becoming holy as He is holy (John, 16. 8). To become holy like God, is tantamount to being educated for passing eternity with God (v. 14; 3 Peter, 1. 4). So this "partaking of God's holiness" stands in contrast to the "few days" of this life, with a view to which earthly fathers generally educate their sons. 11. joyous...grievous—Greek, "matter of joy... matter of grief." The objection that chastening is grievous is here anticipated and answered. It only "seems" so to those being chastened, whose judgments are confused by the present pain. Its ultimate fruit amply compensates for any temporary pain. The real in the words, "Lest any root of bitterness third in v. 16. "Lest there be any fornicatious person," &c. This threefold relation of Paul's epistles. Cf. Notes, Titus, 2. 12 righteously, and godly." The Greek active middle or reflexive, requires the sense to be, only your own hands and knees, but also the brethren (cf. v. 18; Isaiah, 26. 4). 13. Quoted verbo, 4. 28, LXX. "Make straight paths for the straight, i. e., leading by a straight road to God (v. 1, 2, 14). Come to "halt" between Jew and Christianity. [BENNETT.] "Patha," Met., ed Let your walk be so firm and so unanimous! direction, that a plain track and "highway" thereby established for those who accompany you, to persevere and walk in (and [ALFORD.] that which is lame—those "we faith" (Romans, 14. 1), having still Judaising; be turned out of the way—(Proverbs, 4. 27)—going the way, lose the prize of "the race" (v. he healed—Proper exercise of itself could health: the habit of walking straight our right way tends to healing. 14. Follow ye men—with the brethren especially (Romans that so the "lame" among them be not "in the way" (v. 12), and that no one of them "grace of God" (v. 14). holiness—a distinct (from God's "holiness" (v. 10). Translates his fiction. His is absolute holiness: our part His holiness, becoming "holy as He is holy, holiness. Whilst "following peace with all are not so to seek to please them, as to make and our sanctification a secondary object: must be our first aim (Galatians, 1. 10). viz—Greek, "apart from which," no man shall—no man as a son; in heavenly glory (Eph 3. 4). In the East, none but the greatest beg admitted to the honour of seeing the king (cf 14. 24). The Lord being pure and holy, no pure and holy shall see him (Matthew, 5. out holiness in them, they could not enjoy the glory in which He shall judge, not in the lowliness in which He was judged. His form as God, walking, He is equal to the Father, without doubt the ungodly shall not see; for it is only "the pure in heart who shall see God." [AUGUSTINE.] "He shall come to judge, who stood before a judge. He shall come in the form in which He was judged, that they may see Him whom they pierced: He who was before hidden shall come manifested in power: He, as Judge, shall condemn the real culprits, who was Himself falsely made a culprit." 15. lest any...fall—Greek, "lest any (viz., through sloth in running) falling," or "falling short of the grace of God...trouble you." The image is taken from a company of travellers, one of whom lags behind, and so never reaches the end of the long and laborious journey. [CHRYSOSTOM.] root of bitterness—not merely a "bitter root," which might possibly bring forth sweet fruits; this, a root whose essence is "bitterness," never could. Paul here refers to Deuteronomy, 28, 18. "Lest there should be among you a root that beareth gall and wormwood" (cf. Acts, 8, 23). Root of bitterness comprehends every person (cf. v. 18) and every principle of doctrine or practice so radically corrupt, as to spread corruption all around. The only safety is in rooting out such a root of bitterness, many—rather, "the many," &c., the whole congregation. So long as it is hidden under the earth it cannot be remedied, but when it "springs up," it must be dealt with boldly. Still remember the caution (Matthew, 13, 29-30) as to rooting out bad principles. 18. brimstone—(ch. 12, 4; 1 Corinthians, 13, 8.) or brimstone—Forbottion is nearly akin to glutinous, Euseb's sin. He profanely cast away his spiritual privilege for the gratification of his palate. Genesis, 26, 34, graphically portrays him. An example well fitted to strike fearful horror into the Hebrews, whoever of them, like Euseb, were only sons of Isaac according to the flesh. [BENJEL.] for one morsel—the smallness of the inducement only aggravates the guilt of casting away eternity for such a trifle, so far is it from being a claim for mercy (cf. Genesis, 3, 6). One single act has often the greatest power either for good or for evil. So in the cases of Reuben and Saul, for evil (Genesis, 49, 4; 1 Chronicles, 4, 1; 1 Samuel, 13, 23-14); and, on the other hand, for good, Abraham and Phineas (Genesis, 12, 1, &c.; 15, 6; Numbers, 25, 6-15), his birthright—Greek, "his own (so the oldest MSS. read, intensifying the suicidal folly and sin of the act) rights of primogeniture," involving the high spiritual privilege of being ancestor of the promised seed, and heir of the promises in Him. The Hebrews whom Paul addressed, had, as Christians, the spiritual rights of primogeniture (cf. v. 23): he intimates that they must exercise holy self-control, if they wish not, like Euseb, to forfeit them. 17. afterwards—Greek, "even afterward." He despised his birthright, accordingly also he was despised and rejected when he wished to have the blessing. As in the believer's case, so in the unbeliever's, there is an "afterwards" coming, when the believer shall look on his past griefs, and the unbeliever on his past joys, in a very different light from that in which they were respectively viewed at the time. Cf. "Nevertheless afterward," &c., v. 11, with the "afterward" here. Cf. "the cool of the day," Genesis, 3, 5, with 6, when he would—when he wished to have. "He that will not when he may, when he will, shall have nay" (Proverbs, 1, 24-30; Luke, 13, 34, 35; 19, 43). he was rejected—not as to every blessing, but only that which would have followed the primogeniture. He found no place for repentance—The cause is here put for the effect, "repentance" for the object which Euseb aimed at in his so-called repentance, viz., the change of his father's determination to give the chief blessing to Jacob. Had he sought real repentance with tears he would have found it (Matthew, 7, 7). But he did not find it, because this was not what he sought. What proves his tears were not those of one seeking true repentance is, immediately after he was asked in his desire, he resolved to murder Jacob! He shed tears, not for his sin, but for his suffering the penalty of his sin. His were tears of vain regret and remorse, not of repentance. "Before, he might have had the blessing without tears; afterwards, however many tears he shed, he was rejected. Let us use the time" (Luke, 13, 26!) [BENJEL.] ALFORD explains "repentance" here, a change, by repenting, to repair (&c., to regain the lost blessing). I agree with him that the translation, instead of "repentance," "no place for changing HIS FATHER'S mind," is forced; though doubtless this is what was the true aim of the "repentance" which he sought. The language is framed to apply to profane despisers who wilfully cast away grace and seek repentance (&c., not real; but escape from the penalty of their sin), but in vain. Cf. "afterward," Matthew, 26, 11, 12. Tears are no proof of real repentance (1 Samuel, 26, 16, 17; contrast Psalm 69, 3). is—the blessing, which was the real object of Euseb, though ostensibly seeking "repentance." 18. For—The fact that we are not under the law, but under a higher, and that the last dispensation, the gospel, with its glorious privileges, is the reason why, especially the Hebrew Christians should "look diligently," &c. (v. 14, 15), are set come—Greek, "have not come near to." Alluding to Deuteronomy, 4, 11, "Ye came near and stood under the mountain; and the mountain burned with fire...with darkness, clouds, and thick darkness." "In your coming near unto God, it has not been to" &c. the mount—The oldest MSS. and Vulgate omit "the mount." But still, "the mount" must be supplied from v. 22, that might be touched—palpable and material. Not that any save Moses was allowed to touch it (Exodus, 19, 12, 13). The Hebrews drew near to the material mount Sinai with material bodies; we, to the spiritual mount in the Spirit. The "darkness" was that formed by the clouds hanging round the mount; the "tempest" accompanied the thunder. 19. trampet—to rouse attention, and herald God's approach (Exodus, 19, 16), intreated that the word should not be spoken—fit, "that speech should not be added to them; not that they refused to hear the word of God, but they wished that God should not Himself speak, but employ Moses as His mediating spokesman. "The voice of words" was the declamation, spoken by God himself, a voice issuing forth, without any form being seen: after which "He added no more" (Deuteronomy, 4, 22, 20, that which was commanded—"the interdict." [TITTMANN.] A stern interdictory mandate is meant. And—rather, "Even if a beast (much more a man) touch," &c. or thrust through with a dart—Omitted in the oldest MSS. The full interdict in Exodus, 19, 12, 13, is abbreviated here; the beast alone, being put for "whether man or beast;" the stoning, which applies to the Asses offender, alone being specified, the beast's punishment, viz., the being thrust through with a dart, being left to be understood. 21. the sight—the vision of God's majesty. quake—Greek, "I am in trembling;" "fear" affected his mind; "trembling," his body. Moses is not recorded in Exodus to have used these words. But Paul, by inspiration, supplies (cf. Acts, 20, 35; 2 Timothy, 3, 8) this detail. We read in Deuteronomy, 9, 19, LXX., of somewhat like words used by Moses after breaking the two tables, through fear of God's anger at the people's sin in making the golden calves. He doubtless similarly "feared" in hearing the ten commandments spoken by the voice of Jehovah. 22. are come—Greek, "have come near unto" (cf. Deuteronomy, 4, 11). Not merely, ye shall come, but, ye have already come. meant Sina—antitypical Sion, the heavenly Jerusalem, of which the spiritual invisible church of which the first foundation was laid (in Hebrew Zion, John, 12, 18; 1 Peter, 2, 6 is now the earnest; and of which the restored literal Jerusalem hereafter shall be the earthly representative, to be succeeded by the everlasting and "new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven" (Revelation, 21, 2-7; cf. ch. 11, 10, 22, 23, to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church—the city of God having been mentioned, the mention of its citizens follows. Believers being like the angels (Job, 1, 6; 38, 7), "sons of God," are so their "equals" (Luke, 20, 36); and, being reconciled through Christ, are adopted into God's great and blessed family. For the full completion of this we pray (Matthew, 6, 10). English Version arrangement is opposed (1.) by "and" always beginning each new member of the whole sentence: (2.) "general assembly and church," form a kind of tautology: (3.) "general assembly," or rather, "festal full assembly," "the jubilant full company" (such as were the Olympic games, celebrated with joyous singing, dancing, &c.), applies better to the angels above, ever hymning God's praises, than to the church, of which a considerable part is now militant on earth. Translate therefore, "To myriads (ten thousands, cf. Deuteronomy, 33, 2; Psalm 68, 17; Daniel, 7, 10; Jude, 14; namely), the full festal assembly of angels, and the church of the first-born." Angels and saints together constitute the ten thousands. Cf. "all angels, all nations" Matthew, 25, 31, 32. Messiah is pre-eminently "the first-born," or "first-begotten" (ch. 1, 6, and all believers become so by adoption. Cf. the type, Leviticus, 3, 12, 45, 50; 1 Peter, 1, 18. As the kingly and priestly succession was in the first-born, and as Israel was God's "first-born" (Exodus, 4, 22; cf. 13, 2), and a "kingdom of priests" to God (Exodus, 19, 6), so believers (Revelation, 1, 6, written in heaven—enrolled as citizens there, All those who at the coming of 'God the Judge of all' (which clause therefore naturally follows), shall be found 'written in heaven,' i.e., in the Lamb's book of life. Though still fighting the good fight on earth, still in respect to your destiny, and present life of faith which substantiates things hoped for, ye are already members of the heavenly citizenship. "We are one citizenship with angels; to which it is said in the psalm, glorious things are spoken of thee, thou city of God." [AUGUSTINE.] I think ALFORD wrong in restricting "the church of the first-born written in heaven," to those militant on earth; it is rather, all those who at the judge's coming shall be found written in heaven (the true patent of heavenly nobility; contrast "written in the earth," Jeremiah, 17, 13, and Esau's profane sale of his birthright, v. 16; these all, from the beginning to the end of the world, forming one church to which every believer is already come. The first-born of Israel were "written" in a roll (Numbers, 3, 40, the spirits of just men made perfect—at the resurrection, when the "JUDGE" shall appear, and believers' bliss shall be consummated by the union of the glorified body with the spirit; the great hope of the New Testament (Romans, 8, 20-23; 1 Thessalonians, 4, 16.) The place of this clause after "the JUDGE OF ALL," is my objection to BENGEL, and ALFORD's explanation, the souls of the just in their separate state perfected. Cf. (Note) ch. 11, 39, 40, to which he refers here, and which I think confirms my view; those heretofore spirits, but now to be perfected by being clothed upon with the body. Still the phrase, "spirits of just men made perfect," not merely "just men made perfect," may favour the reference to the happy spirits in their separate state. The Greek is not "the perfected spirits," but "the spirits of the perfected just." In no other passage are the just said to be perfected before the resurrection, and the completion of the full number of the elect (Revelation, 6, 11); I think, therefore, "spirits of the just," may here be used to express the just whose predominant element in their perfected state shall be Spirit, So spirit and spirits are used of a man or men in the body, under the influence of the Spirit, the opposite of flesh (John, 2, 6). The resurrection bodies of the saints, shall be bodies in which the spirit shall altogether preponderate over the animal soul (Note, 1 Corinthians, 15, 44). 24, new—Not the usual term (novus, applied to the Christian covenant (ch. 9, 15), which would mean new as differed from, and superseding the old; but Greek neos, recent, lately established, having the freshness of youth, as opposed to age. The mention of Jesus, the Perfector of our faith v. 2, and Himself perfected through sufferings and death, in His resurrection and ascension (ch. 2, 10; 3, 9), is naturally suggested by the mention of "the just made perfect" at their resurrection (cf. ch. 7, 22). Paul uses "Jesus," dwelling here on Him as the Person realized as our loving friend, not merely in His official character as the Christ, and to the blood of sprinkling—here enumerated as distinct from "Jesus." BENGEL, reasonably argues as follows: His blood was entirely "poured out" of His body by the various ways in which it was shed. His bloody sweat, the crown of thorns, the scourging, the nails, and after death the spear, just as the blood was entirely poured out and extravasated from the animal sacrifices of the law. It was incorruptible (1 Peter, 1, 18, 19). No Scripture states it was again put into the Lord's body. At His ascension, as our great High Priest, He entered the heavenly holiest place "by His own blood" (not after shedding His blood, nor with the blood in His body, but), carrying it separately from His body (cf. the type, ch. 9, 7, 12, 25; 13, 11). Paul does not say, By the efficacy of His blood, but, "By His own proper blood" (ch. 9, 12); not MATERIAL blood, but "the blood of Him who, through the eternal Spirit, offered Himself without spot unto God" (ch. 9, 14). So in ch. 10, 29, the Son of God and the blood of the covenant whereof the professor was satisfied, are mentioned separately. Also in ch. 13, 12, 20; also cf. ch. 10, 19, with 21. So in the Lord's Supper (1 Corinthians, 10, 16; 11, 24-26), the body and blood are separately represented. The blood itself, therefore, continues still in heaven before God, the perpetual ransom-price of "the eternal covenant" (ch. 13, 20). Once for all Christ sprinkled the blood peculiarly for us at His ascension (ch. 9, 12). But it is called "the blood of sprinkling," on account also of its continued use in heaven, and in the consciences of the saints on earth (ch. 9, 14; 10, 22; Isaiah, 62, 15). This sprinkling is analogous to the sprinkled blood of the Passover. Cf. Revelation, 5, 6. "In the midst of the throne, a Lamb as it had been slain." His glorified body does not require meat, nor the circulation of the blood. His blood introduced into heaven took away the dragon's right to accuse. Thus Rome's theory of concomitancy of the blood with the body, the excuse for giving only the bread to the laity, falls to the ground. The mention of "the blood of sprinkling" naturally follows the mention of the "covenant," which could not be consecrated without blood (ch. 9, 18, 22). speaketh better things than that of Abel—viz., than the sprinkling (the best MSS. read the article masculine, which refers to "sprinkling," not to "blood," which last is neuter of blood by Abel in his sacrifice space. This comparison between two things of the same kind (viz., Christ's sacrifice, and Abel's sacrifice) is more natural, than between two things different in kind and in result (viz., Christ's sacrifice, and Abel's own blood (ALFORD), which was not a sacrifice at all), cf. ch. 11, 4; Genesis, 4, 4. This accords with the whole tenor of the epistle, and of this passage in particular v. 16-22, which is to show the superiority of Christ's sacrifice and the new covenant, to the Old Testament sacrifices (of which Abel's is the first recorded; if, moreover, was testified to by God as acceptable to Him above Cain's, cf. ch. 9, and 10.  5. 1; and ch. 9. 11, "made with hands... of this creation,"

 i. e., things so made at creation that they would not remain of themselves, but be removed. The new abiding heaven and earth are also made by God, but they are of a higher nature than the material creation, being made to partake of the Divine nature of Him who is not made; so in this relation, as one with the uncreated God, they are regarded as not of the same class as the things made. The things made in the former sense do not remain; the things of the new heaven and earth, like the uncreated God, "shall REMAIN before God" (Isaiah, 66. 22). The Spirit, the seed of the new and heavenly being, not only of the believer's soul, but also of the future body, is an uncreated and immortal principle. 28. receiving—as we do, in prospect cording to classical Greek, not Paul's phraseology for

 "to be thankful." (3.) "To God" would have been in that case added. (3.) "Whereby we may serve God," suits the English Version "grace" (i. e., gospel grace, the work of the Spirit, producing faith exhibited in serving God), but does not suit "thankfulness," ac-ceptably—Greek, "well-pleasing," reverent and godly fear—The oldest MSS. read, "reverent caution and fear." Reverent caution (same Greek as in ch. 6. 7; see Note there) lest we should offend God, who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity. Fear lest we should bring destruction on ourselves. 29. Greek, "Forever"

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1-25. EXHORTATION TO VARIOUS GRACES, ESPECIALLY CONSTANCY IN FAITH, FOLLOWING JESUS AMIDST REPROACHES. CONCLUSION, WITH PICES OF INTELLIGENCE AND SALUTATIONS. 1. brotherly love—a distinct special manifestation of "charity" or "love" (3 Peter, 1. 7). The church of Jerusalem, to which in part this epistle was addressed, was distinguished by this grace, we know from Acts (cf. ch.
 6. 10; 10. 33-34; 12. 12, 13), continue—charity will itself continue. See that it continue with you. 2. Two manifestations of "brotherly love," hospitality, and care for those in bonds. Be not forgetful—implying it was a duty which they all recognised, but which they might forget to act on (v. 3, 7, 10). The enemies of Christianity themselves have noticed the practice of this virtue among Christians. [JULIAN, Ep. 49.] entertained angels unawares—Abraham and Lot did so (Genesis, 18. 2; 19. 1). To obviate the natural distrust felt of strangers, Paul says, an unknown guest may be better than he looks: he may be unexpectedly found to be as much a messenger of God for good, as the angels (whose name means messenger) are; nay, more, if a Christian, he represents Christ Himself. There is a play on the same Greek word, Be not forgetful and unawares: let not the duty of hospitality to strangers escape you; for, by entertaining strangers, it has escaped the entertainers that they were entertaining angels.
 Not unconscious and forgetful of the duty, they have unconsciously brought on themselves the blessing. 3.
 Remember—in prayer and acts of kindness, bound with them—by virtue of the unity of the members in the body under one Head, Christ (1 Corinthians, 12. 26). suffer adversity—Greek, "are in evil state," being yourselves also in the body—and so liable to the adversities incident to the natural body, which ought to dispose you the more to sympathize with them, not knowing how soon your own turn of suffering may come. "One experiences adversely almost his whole life, as Jacob; another in youth, as Joseph; another in manhood, as Job; another in old age." [BENJAMIN] 4, is—translate, "Let marriage be treated as honourable:" as v. 5 also is an exhortation, in all—"In the case of all men:" "among all." "To avoid fornication let EVERY MAN have his own wife" (1 Corinthians, 7, 2). Judaism and Gnosticism combined were soon about to throw discredit on marriage. The venerable Paphnutius, in the council of Nice, quoted this verse for the justification of the married state. If one does not himself marry, he should not prevent others from doing so. Others, especially Romanists, translate, "in all things," as in v. 18. But the warning being against lasciviousness, the contrast to "whoremongers and adulterers" in the parallel clause, requires the "in all" in this clause to refer to persons, the bed undefiled—translate, as Greek requires "undefiled" to be a predicate, not an epithet. "And let the bed be undefiled." God will judge—Most whoremongers escape the notice of human tribunals; but God takes particular cognizance of those whom man does not punish. Gay immoralities will then be regarded in a very different light from what they are now. 5. conversation—"manner of life." The love of filthy lust, and the love of filthy lucre follow one another as closely akin, both alienating the heart from the Creator to the creature, such things as ye have—id., "present things" (Philippians, 4, 11). I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee—A promise tantamount to this was given to Jacob (Genesis, 28, 16), to Israel (Deuteronomy, 31, 6, 8), to Joshua (Joshua, 1, 2), to Solomon (1 Chronicles, 28, 20). It is therefore like a Divine adage. What was said to them, extends also to us. He will neither withdraw His presence ("never leave thee") nor His help ("nor forsake thee"). [BENJAMIN] 6, may—rather as Greek, expressing confidence actually realized, "So that we boldly (confidently) say" (Psalm 60, 4, 11; 118, 6). Punctuate as both the Hebrew and the Greek require. "And (so) I will not fear: what (then) shall man do unto me?" 7. Remember—so as to imitate; not to imitate in prayer, as Rome teaches, have the rule—rather, "who have had the rule over you:" your spiritual leaders. woe—Gr., "the which:" such persons as, who have spoken unto you—"apake" (so the Greek acrost means) during their life-time. This epistle was among those later written, when many of the heads of the Jerusalem church had passed away, whose faith—even unto death: probably death by martyrdom, as in the case of the instances of faith in ch. 11, 35. Stephen, James the brother of our Lord and bishop of Jerusalem, as well as James the brother of John (Acts, 12, 2), in the Palestinian church, which Paul addresses, suffered martyrdom, considering—Greek, "looking up to," "diligently contemplating all over," as an artist would a model, the end—the termination, at death. The Greek issued of decease (Luke, 9, 31; 2 Peter, 1, 15). of their conversation—"manner of life." "religious walk" (Galatians, 1, 13; Ephesians, 4, 22; 1 Timothy, 4, 12; James, 3, 13). Considering how they manifested the soundness of their faith by their holy walk which they maintained even to the end of that walk (their death by martyrdom). 9. This verse is not, as some read it, in apposition with "the end of their conversation" (v. 8), but forms the transition. "Jesus Christ, yesterday and to-day (is) the same, and (shall be the same) unto the ages" (i.e., unto all ages). The Jesus Christ (the full name being given, to mark with affectionate solemnity both His person and His office) who supported your spiritual rulers through life even unto their end "yesterday" (in times past), being at once "the Author and the Finisher of their faith" (ch. 12, 2), remains still the same Jesus Christ "to-day," ready to help you also, if like them you walk by "faith" in Him. Cf. "this same Jesus," Acts, 1, 11. He who yesterday (proverbial for the past time) suffered and died, is to-day in glory (Revelation, 1, 18). "As night comes between yesterday and to-day, and yet night itself is swallowed up by yesterday and to-day, so the suffering did not so interrupt the glory of Jesus Christ which was of yesterday, and that which is to-day, as not to continue to be the same. He is the same yesterday, before He came into the world, and to-day, in heaven. Yesterday in the time of our predecessor, and to-day in our age." [BENJAMIN] So the doctrine is the same, not variable; this verse thus forms the transition between v. 7 and 9. He is always "the same" (ch. 1, 12). The same in the Old and in New Testaments. 9. about—rather as oldest MSS. read, "carried aside:" viz., cf. Ephesians, 4, 14. divers—differing from the one faith in the one and the same Jesus Christ, as taught by them who had the rule over you (v. 7), strange—foreign to the truth, doctrines—teachings, established with grace; not with meats—not with observances of Jewish distinctions between clean and unclean meats, to which ascetic Judaizers added in Christian times the rejection of some meats, and the use of others: noticed also by Paul in 1 Corinthians, 8, 8, 13; 6, 13. Romans, 14, 17, an exact parallel to this verse; these are some of the "divers and strange doctrines" of the previous sentence. Christ's body offered once for all for us, is our true spiritual "meat" to "eat" (v. 10), "the stay and the staff of bread" (Jewish, 3, 1), the mean of all "grace," which have not profited—Greek, "in which they who walked were not profited:" viz., in respect to justification, perfect cleansing of the conscience, and sanctification. Cf. on "walked," Acts, 21, 21; viz., with superstitious scrupulosity, as though the worship of God in itself consisted in such legal observances. 10. Christianity and Judaism are so totally distinct, that "they who serve the (Jewish) tabernacle," have no right to eat our spiritual gospel meat, viz., the Jewish priests, and those who follow their guidance in serving the ceremonial ordinance. He says, "Serve the tabernacle," not, "serve is the tabernacle." Contrast with this perivole worship ours, an altar—the cross of Christ, whereon His body was offered. The Lord's table represents this altar, the cross; as the bread and wine represent the sacrifice offered on it. Our meat which we by faith spiritually eat, is the flesh of Christ, in contrast to the typical ceremonial meats. The two cannot be combined (Galatians, 5, 2). That not a literal eating of the sacrifice of Christ is meant in the Lord's supper, but a spiritual is meant, appears from comparing v. 9 with 10, "with GRACE, not with MEATS." 11, 12. For just as "the bodies of these beasts whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by do., are burned without the camp," so "Jesus also that do. suffered without the gate" of ceremonial Judaism of which His crucifixion outside the gate of Jerusalem is a type. For—reason why they who serve the tabernacle, are excluded from share in Christ; because His sacrifice is not like one of those sacrifices in which they had a share, but answers to one which was "wholly burned" outside (the Greek is "burnt completely," "consumed by burning"), and which consequently they could not eat of. Lev. 6, 30, gives the general rule, "No sin offering whereof any of the blood is brought into the tabernacle of the congregation to reconcile withal in the holy place, shall be eaten; it shall be burnt in the fire." The sin offerings are twofold, the outward, whose blood was sprinkled on the outward altar, and of whose bodies the priests might eat, and the inward, the reverse. "the sanctuary—here the Holy of holies, into which the blood of the sin offering was brought on the day of atonement, without the camp—in which were the tabernacle and Levitical priests and legal worshippers, during Israel's journey through the wilderness; replaced afterwards by Jerusalem (containing the temple), outside of whose walls Jesus was crucified. 12. Wherefore Jesus—in order that the Antitype might fulfil the type, sanctify—Though not brought into the temple "sanctuary" (v. 11), His blood has been brought into the heavenly sanctuary, and "sanctifies the people" (ch. 2. 11, 17), by cleansing them from sin, and consecrating them to God, his own—not blood of animals, without the gate—of Jerusalem; as if unworthy of the society of the covenant people. The fiery ordeal of His suffering on the cross, answers to the burning of the victims; thereby His mere fleshly life was completely destroyed, as their bodies were; the second part of His offering was His carrying His blood into the heavenly Holiest before God at His ascension, that it should be a perpetual atonement for the world's sin. 13. therefore—this "therefore," breathes the deliberate fortitude of believers. [ΒΕΒΟΛΚ.] without the camp—"outside the legal polity" [ΤΑΒΕΡΝΑΚΛ] of Judaism (cf. v. 11). "Faith considers Jerusalem itself as a camp, not a city." [ΒΕΒΟΛΚ.] He contrasts with the Jews who serve an earthly sanctuary, the Christians to whom the altar in heaven stands open, whilst it is closed against the Jews. As Jesus suffered without the gate, so spiritually must those who desire to belong to Him, withdraw from the earthly Jerusalem and its sanctuary, as from this world in general. There is a reference to Exodus, 33. 7, when the tabernacle was moved without the camp, which had become polluted by the people's idolatry of the golden calves; so that "every one who sought the Lord went out unto the tabernacle of the congregation (as Moses called the tabernacle outside the camp), which was without the camp;" a lively type of what the Hebrews should do, viz., come out of the carnal worship of the earthly Jerusalem to worship God in Christ in spirit, and of what we all ought to do, viz., come out from all carnalism, worldly formalism, and mere sensuous worship, and know Jesus in His spiritual power apart from wordliness, seeing that "we have no continuing city" (v. 14), bearing—as Simon of Cyrene did, his reproach—the reproach which He bore, and which all His people bear with Him 14 here—on earth. Those Hebrews who clung to the earthly sanctuary, are representatives of all who cling to this earth. The earthly Jerusalem proved to be no "abiding city," having been destroyed shortly after this epistle was written, and with it fell the Jewish civil and religious polity: a type of the whole of our present earthly order of things soon to perish, one to come—(ch. 2. 6; 11. 10, 14, 16; 13. 23; Philippian, 3. 20.) 15. As the "altar" was mentioned in v. 10, so the "sacrifices" here (cf. 1 Peter, 2. 6, viz., praise and doing good, v. 16). (Cf. Psalm 118:106; Romans, 12. 1. By him—as the Mediator of our prayers and praises (John, 14. 13, 14); not by Jewish observances (Psalm 60, 14, 23; 69. 30, 31; 107. 22; 116. 17). It was an old saying of the Rabbis, "At a future time all sacrifices shall cease, but praises shall not cease," praise—for salvation, continually—not merely at fixed seasons, as those on which the legal sacrifices were offered, but throughout all our lives, fruit of our lips—(Isaiah, 57. 19; Hosea, 14. 2.) giving thanks—Greek, "confessing." ΒΕΒΟΛΚ. remarks, the Hebrew, Toda, is beautifully emphatic. It literally means acknowledgment or confession. In praising a creature, we may easily exceed the truth; but in praising God we have only to go on confessing what He really is. Hence it is impossible to exceed the truth, and here is genuine praise. 16. But—But the sacrifice of praise—with the lips (v. 16) is not enough; there must be also doing good (beneficence) and communicating (i. e., imparting a share of your means, Galatians, 6. 6, to the needy, with such—and not mere ritualistic sacrifices. 17. Obey them that have the rule over you—(cf. v. 7, 24.) This threefold mention of the rulers is peculiar to this epistle. In other epistles Paul includes the rulers in his exhortations. But here the address is limited to the general body of the church, in contrast to the rulers to whom they are charged to yield reverent submission. Now this is just what might be expected when the apostle of the Gentiles was writing to the Palestine Christians, among whom James and the eleven apostles had exercised a more immediate authority. It was important he should not seem to set himself in opposition to their guides, but rather strengthen their hands; he claims no authority directly or indirectly over these rulers themselves. [ΒΑΡΚΑ.] "Remember" your deceased rulers (v. 7); "Obey" your living rulers; nay, more, not only obey in cases where no sacrifice of self is required, and where you are persuaded they are right so the Greek for "obey", but "submit yourselves" as a matter of dutiful yielding, when your judgment and natural will incline you in an opposite direction, they—on their part; so the Greek. As they do their part, so do you yours. So Paul exhorts, 1 Thessalonians, 5. 12, 13, watch—"are vigilant" (Greek), for—Greek—"in behalf of," must give account—The strongest stimulus to watchfulness (Mark, 13. 34-37). ΧΡΥΣΟΣΤΟΜ was deeply struck with these words, as he tells us, De Sacrodotio, B. 6. "The fear of this threat continually agitates my soul," do it—"watch for your soul's eternal salvation." It is a perilous responsibility for a man to have to give account for others' deeds, who is not sufficient for his own. [ΕΡΙΤΙΜΑ, from Aquinas] I wonder whether it be possible that any of the rulers should be saved. [ΧΡΥΣΟΣΤΟΜ.] Cf. Paul's address to the elders, Acts, 20. 28; 1 Corinthians, 4. 1-6, where also he connects ministers' responsibility with the account to be hereafter given (cf. 1 Peter, 4. 4), with joy—at your obedience; anticipating, too, that you shall be their "joy" in the day of giving account (Philippians, 4. 1), not with grief—at your disobedience; apprehending also that in the day of account you may be among the lost, instead of being their crown of rejoicing. In giving account, the stewards are liable to blame if ought be lost to the Master. "Mitigate their toil by every office of attention and respect, that with alacrity, rather than with grief, they may fulfil their duty, arduous enough in itself, even though no unpleasantness be added on your part." [ΓΡΟΤΙΟΥ.] that—Grief in your pastors is unprofitable for you, for it weakens their spiritual power; nay, more, "the groans so the Greek for 'grief' of other creatures are heard; how much more of pastors!" [ΒΕΒΟΛΚ.] so God will be provoked to avenge on you their "groaning" (Greek). If they must render God an account of their negligence, so must you for your ingratitude to them. [ΓΡΟΤΙΟΥ.] 18. Pray for us—Paul usually requests the church's intercessions for him in closing his epistles, just as he begins with assuring them of his having them at heart in his prayers (but in this epistle not till v. 20, 21), Romans, 16. 30. "Us" includes both himself and his companions; he passes to himself alone, v. 19. We trust we have a good conscience—in spite of your former jealousies, and the charges of my Jewish enemies at Jerusalem, which have been the occasion of my imprisonment at Rome. In refutation of the Jews' aspersions, he asserts in the same language as here his own conscientiousness before God and man, Acts, 23. 1-3; 24. 16, 20, 21 (wherein he virtually implies, that his reply to Ananias was not sinful impatience; for, indeed, it was a prophecy which he was inspired at the moment to utter, and which was fulfilled soon after). We trust—Greek, "we are persuaded," in the oldest MSS. Good conscience produces confidence, where the Holy Spirit rules the conscience (Romans, 9. 11), honestly—"in a good way." The same Greek word, κα

"good conscience." Lit., rightly, becomingly. 19. the rather—Greek, "I the more abundantly beseech you." to do this—to pray for me, that I may be restored to you—[Philemon, 23]. It is here first in the letter he mentions himself, in a way so unobtrusive, as not to prejudice his Hebrew readers against him, which would have been the result had he commenced this as his other epistles, with authoritatively announcing his name and apostolic commission. 20. Concluding prayer. God of peace—So Paul, Romans, 15, 33; 16, 20; 2 Corinthians, 13, 11; Philippians, 4, 9; 1 Thessalonians, 5, 23; 2 Thessalonians, 3, 16. The Judaizing of the Hebrews was calculated to sow seeds of discord among them, of disobedience to their pastors (v. 17), and of alienation towards Paul. The God of peace by giving unity of true doctrine, will unite them in mutual love, brought again from the dead—Greek, "brought up" &c.; God brought the Shepherd; the Shepherd shall bring the flock. Here only in the epistle he mentions the resurrection. He would not conclude without mentioning the connecting link between the two truths mainly discussed; the one perfect sacrifice and the continual priestly intercession—the depth of His humiliation and the height of His glory—the "altar" of the cross and the ascension to the heavenly Holy of holies. great—[ch. 14.] Shepherd of the sheep—A title familiar to his Hebrew readers, from their Old Testament [Isaiah, 63, 11; LXX.]; primarily Moses, antitypically Christ; already compared together ch. 3, 2-7. The transition is natural from their earthly pastors (v. 17), to the Chief Pastor, as in 1 Peter, 5, 1-4. Cf. Ezekiel, 34, 23 and Jesus' own words, John, 10, 2, 11, 14. through the blood—Greek, "in," in virtue of the blood (ch. 2, 9): it was because of His bloody death for us, that the Father raised and crowned Him with glory. The "blood" was the seal of the everlasting covenant entered into between the Father and Son; in virtue of the Son's blood, first Christ was raised, then Christ's people shall be so [Zechariah, 9, 11, seemingly referred to here; Acts, 20, 28]. everlasting—the everlastingness of the covenant necessitated the resurrection. This clause, "the blood of the everlasting covenant," is a summary retrospect of the epistle (cf. ch. 9, 12). Lord Jesus—the title marking His person and His Lordship over us. But v. 21, "through Jesus Christ." His office, as the Anointed of the Spirit, making Him the medium of communicating the Spirit to us, the holy unction flowing down from the Head on the members (cf. Acts, 2, 28). 21. Make you perfect—properly said of healing a rent: join you together in perfect harmony. [BENNET.] to do his will, working in you—[ch. 10, 36]—rather as Greek, "doing in you." Whatever good we do, God does in us. well-pleasing in his sight—[Isaiah, 53, 10; Ephesians, 5, 10.] through Jesus Christ—"God doing (working) in you that, &c., through Jesus Christ" (Philippians, 1, 11). to whom—Christ. He closes as he began (ch. 1.), with giving glory to Christ. 22. suffer the word—The Hebrews not being the section of the church assigned to Paul (but the Gentiles), he uses gentle entreaty, rather than authoritative command. few words—compared with what might be said on so important a subject. Few, in an epistle which is more of a treatise than an epistle (cf. 1 Peter, 5, 12). On the seeming inconsistency with Galatians, 6, 11, cf. Note there. 23. our brother Timothy—So Paul, 1 Corinthians, 4, 17; 2 Corinthians, 1, 1; Colossians, 1, 1; 1 Thessalonians, 3, 2, is set at liberty—from prison. So Aristarchus was imprisoned with Paul. Buxs translates, "dismissed," "sent away," viz., on a mission to Greece, as Paul promised (Philippians, 2, 19). However, some kind of previous detention is implied before his being let go to Philippi. Paul, though now at Aps, was still in Italy, whence he sends the salutations of Italian Christians (v. 24), waiting for Timothy to join him, so as to start for Jerusalem: we know from 1 Timothy, 1, 3, he and Timothy were together at Ephesus after his departing from Italy eastward. He probably left Timothy there and went to Philippi as he had promised. Paul implies that if Timothy shall not come shortly, he will start on his journey to the Hebrews at once. 24. all—The Scriptures are intended for all, young and old, not merely for ministers. Cf. the different classes addressed, "wives," Ephesians, 5, 22; little children, 1 John, 2, 18; "all," 1 Peter, 3, 8; 5, 3. He says here "all," for the Hebrews whom he addresses were not all in one place, though the Jerusalem Hebrews are chiefly addressed. They of Italy—not merely the brethren at Rome, but of other places in Italy. 25. Paul's characteristic salutation in every one of his other thirteen epistles, as he says himself, 1 Corinthians, 16, 21, 23; Colossians, 4, 18; 2 Thessalonians, 1, 17. It is found in no epistle written by any other apostle in Paul's lifetime. It is used in Revelation, 22, 2, written subsequently, and in Clement of Rome. Being known to be his badge, it is not used by others in his lifetime. The Greek here is, "The grace (viz., of our Lord Jesus Christ) be with you all."

THE GENERAL EPISTLE OF

JAMES.

INTRODUCTION.

THIS is called by Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History, 2, 23, about the year A.D. 330) the first of the Catholic epistles, i.e., the epistles intended for general circulation, as distinguished from St. Paul's epistles, which were addressed to particular churches or individuals. In the oldest MSS. of the New Testament extant, they stand before the epistles of St. Paul. Of them, two only are mentioned by Eusebius as universally acknowledged ("Homologoumena"), viz., the first epistle of St. Peter, and the first epistle of St. John. All, however, are found in every existing MS. of the whole New Testament.

It is not to be wondered at that epistles not addressed to particular churches (and particularly one like that of St. James, addressed to the Israelite believers scattered abroad) should be for a time less known. The first mention of St. James' epistle by name, occurs early in the third century, in Origen (comment on John 1, 19, 4, 306, who was born about 185, and died 253 A.D.). Clement Romanus (first epistle to the Corinthians, ch. 16, cf. James, 2, 21, 23; ch. 11, cf. James, 2, 25; He. 11, 20) quotes it. So also the Shepherd of Hermas quotes ch. 4, 7. Irenæus (Hæreses, 4, 16, 2) is thought to refer to ch. 2, 2. Clement Alexandrinus commented on it, according to Cassiodorus. Ephrem Syrus (Opp. Græc. 3, 51) quotes ch. 5, 1. An especially strong proof of its authenticity is afforded by its forming part of the old Syriac version, which contains no other of the disputed books ("Antilegomena," Eusebius, 3, 25), except the epistle to the Hebrews. None of the Latin fathers before the fourth century quote it; but soon after the council of Nice it was admitted as canonical both by the East and West churches, and specified as such in the councils of Hippo and Carthage (A.D. 397). This is just what we might expect; a writing known only partially at first, when subsequently it obtained a wider circulation, and the proofs were better known of its having been recognised in apostolic churches, having in them men endowed with the discernment of spirits, which qualified them for discriminating between inspired and uninspired writings, was universally accepted. Though doubted by a time, at least the disputed books (St. James, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, and Revelation) were universally and undoubtedly accepted, so that no argument for the Old Testament Apocrypha can be drawn from their case: as to the Jewish church had no doubt; it was known not to be inspired.

Luther's objection to it ("an epistle of straw, and destitute of an evangelic character") was due to his mistaken idea that it (ch. 2.) opposes the doctrine of justification by faith, and not by works, taught by St. Paul. But the two apostles, whilst looking at justification from distinct standpoints, perfectly harmonize and mutually complement the definitions of one another. Faith precedes love and the works of love; but without them it is dead. St. Paul regards faith in the justification of the sinner before God; St. James, in the justification of the believer evidentially before men. The error which James meets, was the Jewish notion that their possession and knowledge of the law of God would justify them, even though they disobeyed it (cf. ch. 1. 22, with Romans, 2. 17-25). Ch. 1. 2, and 4. 1, 12, seem plainly to allude to Romans, 5. 2; 6. 12; 7. 2; 14. 4. Also the tenor of ch. 2., on "justification," seems to allude to St. Paul's teaching, so as to correct false Jewish notions of a different kind from those which he combated, though not unnoticed by him also (Romans, 2. 17, &c.).

St. Paul (Galatians, 2. 9) arranges the names "James, Cephas, John," in the order in which their epistles stand. The St. James who wrote this epistle (according to most ancient writers) is called (Galatians, 1. 19) "the Lord's brother." He was son of Alphaeus or Cleopas (Luke, 24. 13-18) and Mary, sister of the Virgin Mary. Cf. Mark, 15. 40, with John, 19. 25, which seems to identify the mother of James the less with the wife of Cleopas, not with the Virgin Mary, Cephas' wife's sister-Cleopas is the Hebrew, Alphaeus the Greek mode of writing the same name. Many, however, as Hegerippus (Evangelii, Ecclesiastica Historia), distinguish "the Lord's brother" from the son of Alphaeus. But the gospel according to the Hebrews, quoted by Jerome, represents James, the Lord's brother, as present at the institution of the Eucharist, and therefore identical with the apostle James. So the Apocryphal gospel of James. In Acts, James who is put foremost in Jerusalem after the death of James, son of Zebedee, is not distinguished from James, the son of Alphaeus. He is not mentioned as one of the Lord's brethren in Acts, 1. 14; but as one of the "apostles" (Galatians, 1. 19). He is called "the less" (ὁ ἕντις, Mark, 15. 40), to distinguish him from James, the son of Zebedee. Alford considers James, the brother of the Lord, the author of the epistle, to have been the eldest of the sons of Joseph and Mary after Jesus (cf. Matthew, 13. 55), and that James the son of Alphaeus, is distinguished from him by the latter being called "the less," i.e., junior. His arguments against the Lord's brother, the bishop of Jerusalem, being the apostle, are, (1.) The Lord's brethren did not believe on Jesus at a time when the apostles had been already called (John, 7. 3, 5, therefore none of the Lord's brethren could be among the apostles when it does not follow from John, 7. 3, that no one of them believed); (2.) the apostles' commission was to preach the gospel everywhere, not to be bishops in a particular locality (but it is unlikely that one not an apostle should be bishop of Jerusalem, or whenever apostles yield deference, Acts, 15. 13, 19; Galatians, 1. 19; 2. 9, 12. The Saviour's last command to the apostles whenever to preach the gospel everywhere, is not inconsistent with each having a particular sphere of labour in which he should be a missionary bishop, as Peter is said to have been at Antioch).

He was surnamed "the just." It needed peculiar wisdom so to preach the gospel as not to disparage the law. As bishop of Jerusalem writing to the twelve tribes, he sets forth the gospel in its aspect of relation to the law which the Jews so venerated. As St. Paul's epistles are a commentary on the doctrines flowing from the death and resurrection of Christ, so St. James' epistle has a close connexion with His teaching during His life on earth, especially His sermon on the mount. In both, the law is represented as fulfilled in love: the very language is palpably similar (cf. ch. 1. 2, with Matthew, 5. 19; 5. 1. 4, with Matthew, 5. 48; ch. 1. 5; 2. 15, with Matthew, 7. 7-11; ch. 6. 12, with Matthew, 5. 7, and 6. 14, 15; ch. 2. 10, with Matthew, 5. 19; ch. 4. 4, with Matthew, 6. 24; ch. 4. 11, with Matthew, 7. 1, 2; ch. 5. 2, with Matthew, 6. 19). The whole spirit of this epistle breathes the same gospel-righteousness which the sermon on the mount inculcates as the highest realization of the law. St. James' own character as "the just," or legally righteous, disposed him to this coincidence (cf. ch. 1. 20; 1. 19; 2. 18, with Matthew, 5. 20). It also fitted him for presiding over a church still zealous for the law (Acts, 21. 18-24; Galatians, 2. 12). If any could win the Jews to the gospel, he was most likely who presented a pattern of Old Testament righteousness, combined with evangelical faith (cf. also ch. 2. 8, with Matthew, 6. 44, 45). Practice, not profession, is the test of obedience (cf. ch. 2. 17; 4. 17, with Matthew, 7. 21-23). Sins of tongue, however lightly regarded by the world, are an offence against the law of love (cf. ch. 1. 26; 3. 2-18, with Matthew, 5. 22; also any swearing, ch. 5. 12; cf. Matthew, 5. 33-37).

The absence of the apostolic benediction in this epistle, is probably due to its being addressed, not merely to the believing, but also indirectly to unbelieving, Israelites. To the former he commends humility, patience, and prayer; to the latter he addresses awful warnings (cf. 5. 7-11; 4. 9; 5. 1-6).

St. James was martyred at the Passover. The epistle was probably written just before it. The destruction of Jerusalem foretold in it (ch. 5. 1, &c.), ensued a year after his martyrdom, 70 A.D. Hegerippus (quoted in Evangelii, 2. 28) narrates that he was set on a pinnacle of the temple by the scribes and Pharisees, who begged him to restrain the people who were in large numbers embracing Christianity. "Tell us," said they in the presence of the people gathered at the feast, "which is the door of Jesus?" St. James replied with a loud voice, "Why ask ye me concerning Jesus the Son of man? He sitteth at the right hand of power, and will come again on the clouds of heaven." Many thereupon cried, Hosannah to the Son of David. But St. James was cast down headlong by the Pharisees; and praying, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," he was stoned and beaten to death with a fuller's club. The Jews, we know from Acts, were exasperated at St. Paul's rescue from their hands, and therefore determined to wreak their vengeance on St. James. The publication of his epistle to the dispersed Israelites, to whom it was probably carried by those who came up to the periodical feasts, made him obnoxious to them, especially to the higher classes, because it foretold the woes soon about to fall on them and their country. Their taunting question, "Which is the door of Jesus?" (i.e., by what door will He come when He returns?) alludes to his prophecy, "the coming of the Lord draweth nigh . . . behold the Judge standeth before the door" (ch. 5. 8, 9). Hebrews, 12. 7, probably refers to the martyrdom of James, who had been so long bishop over the Jewish Christians at Jerusalem. "Remember them which have (rather, 'had') the rule (spiritually) over you, who have spoken unto you the word of God; whose faith follow, considering the end of their conversation."

His inspiration as an apostle is expressly referred to in Acts, 15. 12, 25, "My sentence is," &c.; "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us," &c. His episcopal authority is implied in the deference paid to him by St. Peter and St. Paul (Acts, 15. 17; 21. 18; Galatians, 1. 19; 2. 9). The Lord had appeared specially to him after the resurrection (1 Corinthians, 15. 7). St. Peter in his first epistle (universally from the first received as canonical) tacitly confirms the inspiration of St. James' epistle, by incorporating with his own inspired writings no less than ten passages from St. James. The "apostle of the circumcision," St. Peter, and the first bishop of Jerusalem, would naturally have much in common. Cf. ch. 1. 1, with 1 Peter, 1. 1; ch. 1. 2, with 1 Peter, 1. 6; 4. 12, 13; ch. 1. 11, with 1 Peter, 1. 24; ch. 1. 18, with 1 Peter, 1. 2; ch. 2. 7, with 1 Peter, 4. 14; ch. 2. 12, with 1 Peter, 2. 19; ch. 4. 1, with 1 Peter, 2. 11; ch. 4. 6, with 1 Peter, 5. 5, 6; ch. 4. 7, with 1 Peter, 5. 6, 9; ch. 4. 10, with 1 Peter, 5; cf. ch. 5, 20, with 1 Peter, 4, 5. Its being written in the purest Greek shows it was intended not only for the Jews at Jerusalem, but also for the Hellenists, i. e., Greek-speaking Jews.

The style is close, curt, and sententious, gnome following after gnome. An Hebraic character pervades the epistle, as appears in the occasional poetic parallelisms (ch. 3, 1-13). Cf. ch. 2, 2, "Assembly," Margis, synagoga. The images are analogical arguments, combining at once logic and poetry. Eloquence and persuasiveness are prominent characteristics.

The similarity to Matthew, the most Hebrew of the gospels, is just what we might expect from the bishop of Jerusalem writing to Israelites. In it the higher spirit of Christianity is seen putting the Jewish law in its proper place. The law is enforced in its everlasting spirit, not in the letter for which the Jews were so zealous. The doctrines of grace, the distinguishing features of St. Paul's teaching to the Hellenists and Gentiles, are less prominent, as being already taught by that apostle. St. James complements Paul's teaching, and shows to the Jewish Christians who still kept the legal ordinances down to the fall of Jerusalem, the spiritual principle of the law, viz., love manifested in obedience. To sketch "the perfect man" containing in the gospel law of liberty, is his theme.

CHAPTER I.

VER. 1-27. INSCRIPTION: EXHORTATION ON HEARING, SPEAKING, AND WRATH. The last subject is discussed in ch. 3, 15-4, 17. 1. James—an apostle of the circumcision, with Peter and John; James in Jerusalem, Palestine, and Syria; Peter in Babylon and the E.; John in Ephesus and Asia Minor. St. Peter addresses the dispersed Jews of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia; St. James, the Israelites of the twelve tribes scattered abroad. servant of God—not that he was not an apostle; for Paul, an apostle, also calls himself so; but as addressing the Israelites generally, including even indirectly the unbelieving, he in humility omits the title "apostle": so Paul in writing to the Hebrews: similarly Jude, an apostle, in his general epistle. Jesus Christ—not mentioned again save in ch. 2, 1: not at all in his speeches (Acts, 15, 14, 15, and 21, 20, 21), lest his introducing the name of Jesus offender should seem to arise from vanity, as being "the Lord's brother." (BENGEI.) His teaching being practical, rather than doctrinal, required less frequent mention of Christ's name, scattered abroad—id., which are in the dispersion. The dispersion of the Israelites, and their connexion with Jerusalem as a centre of religion, was a Divinely ordered means of propagating Christianity. The pilgrim troops of the law became caravans of the gospel. [WORDSWORTH.] greeting—found in no other Christian letter, but in James and the Jerusalem Synod's epistle to the Gentile churches: an undesigned coincidence and mark of genuineness. In the original Greek (chaitaini) for "greeting," there is a connexion with the "joy" to which they are exhorted amidst their existing distresses from poverty and consequent oppression. Cf. Romans, 15, 26, which alludes to their poverty. 2. My brethren—a phrase often found in St. James, marking community of nation and of faith. all joy—cause for the highest joy. (GROTIUS.) Nothing but joy. (PISCATOR.) Count all "divers temptations" to be each matter of joy. (BENGEI.) fail into—unexpectedly, so as to be encompassed by them (so the original Greek) temptations—not in the limited sense of allurements to sin, but trials or distresses of any kind which test and purify the Christian character. Cf. "tempt," i. e., try, Genesis, 22, 1. Some of those to whom St. James writes were "sick," or otherwise "afflicted" (ch. 5, 13). Every possible trial to the child of God is a masterpiece of strategy of the Captain of his salvation for his good. 3. the trying—the testing or proving of your faith, viz., by "divers temptations." Cf. Romans, 5, 3, "tribulation" worketh patience, and patience, experience (in the original dokime, akin to dokimion "trying" here: there it is experience; here the "trying" or testing, whence experience flows). patience—the original implies more: persevering endurance and continuance (cf. Luke, 8, 15). 4. Let endurance have a perfect work taken out of the previous "worketh patience" or endurance i. e., have its full effect, by showing the most perfect degree of endurance, viz., "joy in bearing the cross (MEMORICRUIUS), and enduring to the end (Matthew, 10, 22). [CALVIN.] ye may be perfect—fully developed in all the attributes of a Christian character. For this there is required "joy" (BENGEI), as part of the "perfect work" of probation. The work of God in a man is the man. If God's teaching by patience have had a perfect work in you, you are perfect. [ALFORD.] entire—that which has all its parts complete, wanting no integral part; 1 Thessalonians, 5, 23, "your whole lit., 'entire' spirit, soul, and body:" as "perfect" implies without a blemish in its parts. 5. English Version omits "But," which the Greek has, and which is important. "But as this perfect entireness wanting nothing is no easy attainment; if any," etc., etc.—rather, as the Greek word is repeated after St. James' manner, from v. 4, "wanting nothing," translata, "If any of you want wisdom," viz., the wisdom whereby ye may "count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations," and "let patience have her perfect work." This "wisdom" is shown in its effects in detail, ch. 3, 17. The highest wisdom which governs patience abides in poverty and riches, is described v. 9, 10. ask—(ch. 4, 2.) liberally—So the Greek is rendered by English Version. It is rendered with simplicity, Romans 12 & God gives without adding ought which may take off from the graciousness of the gift. [ALFORD.] God requires the same "simplicity" in His children ("eye-single," Matthew, 6, 22, lit., simple), unbridled not—an illustration of God's giving simply. He gives to the humble suppliant without upbraiding him with his past sin and ingratitude, or his future abuse of God's goodness. The Jews pray, "Let me not have need of the gifts of men, whose gifts are few, but their upbraidings manifold; but give me a prayer for thy large and full hand." Cf. Solomon's offer for "wisdom," and God's gift above what he asked, though God foresaw his future abuse of His goodness would deserve very differently. St. James has before his eye the sermon on the mount (see my Introduction). God hears every true prayer, and grants either the thing asked, or else something better than it: as a good physician consults for his patient's good better by denying something which the latter asks not for his good, than by conceding a temporary gratification to his hurt. 6. ask in faith—i. e., the persuasion that God can and will give. St. James begins and ends with faith. In the middle of the epistle he removes the hindrances to faith, and shows its true character. [BENGEI.] wavering—between belief and unbelief. Cf. the case of the Israelites who seemed to partly believe in God's power, but least more to unbelief by "limiting" it. On the other hand, cf. Acts, 10, 20; Romans, 4, 20 ("staggered not," through unbelief," id., as here, "swayed not"), 1 Timothy, 2, 4, like a wave of the sea—Isaiah, 57, 20; Ephesians 4, 1, where the same Greek word occurs for "tossed to and fro," as is here translated, "driven with the wind," driven with the wind—from without, tossed—from within, by its own instability. [BENGEI.] At one time cast on the shore of faith and hope, at another rolled back into the abyss of unbelief; at one time raised to the height of worldly pride, at another tossed in the sands of despair and affliction. [WIESINGER.] 7. For—Resumed from "for" in v. 6. that man—such a wavering self-deceiver. think—Real faith isometism ban a mere thinking or surmising. any thing—viz. things that he prays for: he does receive many from God, food, raiment, &c., but these are the gifts of His providence: of the things specially in answer to prayer, the wavering shall not receive anything," much less wisdom. 8. double-minded double-souled, the one soul directed towards be other to something else. The Greek favours its translation, "He (the wavering, v. 6) is a man-minded, unstable," &c.; or better, BAZA's, ords in this v. 8 are in apposition with "that v. 7: thus the "is," which is not in the original, it need to be supplied, "A man double-minded, le in all his ways!" The word for "double-1" is found here and ch. 4. 3, for the first time k literature. It is not a hypocrite that is meant, lible, "wavering" man, as the context shows. It ead to the single eye (Matthew, 6. 23). 9, 10. etc. "But let the brother," &c., i.e., the best / against double-mindedness is that Christian /y of spirit whereby the "brother," low in out- /circumstances, may "rejoice" (answering to v. 2) at he is exalted," viz., by being accounted a son /r of God, his very sufferings being a pledge of /ng glory and crown (v. 12), and the rich may "in that he is made low," by being stripped of /ds for Christ's sake (MEROCHUS); or, in that he s, by sanctified trials, low in spirit, which is /ster for rejoicing. [GOMARUS.] The design of /sle is to reduce all things to an equable footing /: 6. 12). The "low," rather than the "rich," is /lled "the brother." [BENGL.] So far as one /y "rich" in worldly goods, "he shall pass /o so far as his predominant character is that of /har," he "abideeth for ever" (1 John, 2. 17). This /ects all ALFORD's objections to regarding "the /re as a "brother" at all. To avoid making the /rother, he translates, "But the rich glories in /mulation," viz., in that which is really his de- /ms (his rich state, Philippiana, 3. 19); just as the /old to rejoice in what is really his exaltation /ly state). 11. Taken from Isaiah, 40. 6-8. heat /r. "the hot wind" in the (E. or) S., which s /vegetation (Luke, 12. 55). The "burning heat" /sun is not at its rising, but rather at noon: /s the scorching Kadim wind is often at sunrise /, 4. 8). [MIDDLETON, Greek Articles.] Matthew, /ses the Greek word for "heat." Isaiah, 40. 7, /st upon it," seems to answer to "the hot wind" /ace of the fashion—i.e., of the external appear- /ce in his ways—referring to the burdensome extant /rich man's devices. [BENGL.] Cf. "his ways," /s course of life, v. 8. 12. Blessed—CF. the beati- /ude sermon on the mount, Matthew, 5. 4, 10, 11. /h temptation—not the "falling into divers temp- /" (v. 2) is the matter for "joy," but the endur- /ng pation "unto the end." Cf. Job, 6. 17. when /ed—lit., when he has become tested or approved, /e has passed through the "trying" (v. 2), his /aving finally gained the victory, the crown— /llusion to the crown or garland given to win- /the games; for this, though a natural allusion /Paul in writing to heathen, among whom such /xisted, would be less appropriate for St. James /aising the Jewish Christians, who regarded / usages with aversion. of life—"life" consti- /es crown, lit., the life, the only true life, the /nd eternal life. The crown implies a kingdom /, 31. 2). The Lord—not found in the best MSS. /rison. The believer's heart fills up the omni- /rout the name needing to be mentioned. The /ni one who promised" (Hebrews, 10. 23). to /at love him—in 2 Timothy, 4. 8. "the crown of /ness to them that love His appearing." Love /e patient endurance: none attest their love more than they who suffer for Him. 13. when...tempted—tried by solicitation to evil. Heretofore the "temptation" meant was that of probation by afflictions. Let no one fancy that God lays upon him an inevitable necessity of sinning. God does not send trials on you in order to make you worse, but to make you better (v. 14, 17). Therefore do not sink under the pressure of evils (1 Corinthians, 10. 13). of God—by agency proceeding from God. The Greek is not "tempted by," but, "from God," implying indirect agency. cannot be tempted with evil, &c.—"Neither do any of our sins tempt God to entice us to worse things, nor does He tempt any of His own accord" (lit., of Himself; of the antithesis, v. 18. "Of His own will He begat us" to holiness, so far as He from tempting us of His own will). [BENGL.] God is said in Genesis, 22. 1, to have "tempted Abraham;" but there the tempting meant is that of trying or proving, not that of seducement. ALFORD translates according to the ordinary sense of the Greek, "God is wassered in evil." But as this gives a less likely sense, English Version probably gives the true sense; for ecclesiastical Greek often uses words in new senses, as the exigencies of the new truths to be taught required. 14. Every man when tempted, is so through being drawn away of (again here, as in v. 12, the Greek for "of" expresses the actual source, rather than the agent of temptation) his own lust. The cause of sin is in ourselves. Even Satan's suggestions do not endanger us before they are made our own. Each one has his own peculiar (so the Greek insist, arising from his own temperament and habit. Lust flows from the original birth-sin in man, inherited from Adam, drawn away—the beginning step in temptation; drawn away from truth and virtue, enticed—lit., taken with a bait, as fish are. The further progress: the man allowing himself (as the Greek middle voice implies) to be enticed to evil. [BENGL.] "Lust" is here personified as the harlot that allures the man. 15. The guilty union is committed by the will embracing the temptress. "Lust," the harlot, then "brings forth sin," viz., of that kind to which the temptation inclines. Then the particular sin (so the Greek implies), "when it is completed, brings forth death," with which it was all along pregnant. [ALFORD.] This "death" stands in striking contrast to the "crown of life" (v. 12) which "patience" or endurance ends in, when it has its "perfect work" (v. 4). He who will fight Satan with Satan's own weapons, must not wonder if he finds himself over-matched. Nip sin in the bud of lust. 16. Do not err in attributing to God temptation to evil; nay (as he proceeds to show), "every good," all that is good on earth, comes from God. 17. gift...gift—Not the same words in Greek; the first, the act of giving, or the gift in its initiatory stage; the second, the thing given, the boon, when perfected. As the "good gift" stands in contrast to "sin" in its initiatory stage (v. 16), so the "perfect boon" is in contrast to "sin when it is finished," bringing forth death (3 Peter, 1. 2), from above—(cf. ch. 3. 15). Father of lights—Creator of the lights in heaven (cf. Job, 38. 28 [ALFORD.]; Genesis, 4. 20, 21; Hebrews, 12. 9). This accords with the reference to the changes in the light of the heavenly bodies alluded to in the end of the verse. Also, Father of the spiritual lights in the kingdom of grace and glory. [BENGL.] These were typified by the supernatural lights on the breast-plate of the high priest, the Urim. As "God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all" (1 John, 1. 5), He cannot in any way be the Author of sin (v. 13), which is darkness (1 John, 3. 19), no variableness...shadow of turning—(Malachi, 3. 6.) None of the alternations of light and shadow which the physical "lights" undergo, and which even the spiritual lights are liable to, as compared with God. "Shadow of turning," lit., the dark shadow-mark cast from one of the heavenly bodies, arising from its turning or revolution, &c., when the man, cattle, and fruits to God; familiar to the Jews addressed, i.e., they are the first of God's regenerated creatures, and the pledges of the ultimate regeneration of the creation. Romans, 8, 19, 23, where also the Spirit, the Divine agent of the believer's regeneration, is termed "the first fruits," i.e., the earnest that the regeneration now begun in the soul, shall at last extend to the body too, and to the lower parts of creation. Of all God's visible creatures, believers are the noblest part, and like the legal "first fruits," sanctify the rest; for this reason they are much tried now. 19. Wherefore—as your evil is of yourselves, but your good from God. However, the oldest MESH, and versions read thus: "YE KNOW IT" (so Ephesians, 4, 5; Hebrews, 12, 17), my beloved brethren; BUT consequently; let every man be swift to hear," i.e., docile in receiving "the word of truth" (v. 18, 21). The true method of hearing is treated of v. 21-27; and ch. 3. slow to speak—(Proverbs, 10, 19; 17, 27, 28; Ecclesiastes, 4, 2.) A good way of escaping one kind of temptation arising from ourselves (v. 13). Slow to speak authoritatively as a master or teacher of others (cf. ch. 3, 1): a common Jewish fault: slow also to speak such haughty things of God, as in v. 13. Two ears are given to us, the Rabbis observe, but only one tongue: the ears are open and exposed, whereas the tongue is walled in behind the teeth, slow to wrath—(ch. 3, 13, 14; 4, 6.) Slow in becoming heated by debate: another Jewish fault (Romans, 2, 8), to which much speaking tends. TRITMANN thinks not so much "wrath" is meant, as an indignant feeling of fretfulness under the calamities to which the whole of human life is exposed: this accords with the "divers temptations" in v. 2. Hastiness of temper hinders hearing God's word: so Naaman, 2 Kings, 6, 11; Luke, 4, 28. 20. Man's angry zeal in debating, as if jealous for the honour of God's righteousness, is far from working that which is really righteousness in God's sight. True "righteousness is sown in peace," not in wrath (ch. 3, 18). The oldest and best reading means "worketh," i.e., practiseth not; the received reading is "worketh," producteth not. 21. Lay apart—ones for all (so the Greek): as a Qualification of the precept, "Be ye doers, not hearers only;" not mere word," but "Be doers" systematically and as if this was your regular business. 23. Again refers to the sermon on the mount 21-28. deserving your own selves—by the [v. 23] (the Greek implies that) that the more harm is needed. 23. Far—The logical self-deceit traded, not a deer—more fit, "a not-deer." The true disciple, say the Rabbis, learns [v. 24] he may do, not in order that he may see teach, his natural face—fit, the counter birth: the face he was born with. As a man's his natural face in a mirror, so the hearer's his moral visage in God's word. This feature of man's soul in Scripture, is the stress the truth of the latter. In it, too, we God's glory, as well as our natural wills holdeth—more fit, "he contemplated himself gone his way," i.e., no sooner has he come image than he is gone his way (v. 11). "Answers to hearing the word: "goeth [v. 25] relaxing the attention after hearing—lets go elsewhere, and the interest of the this away: then forgetfulness follows [ALFORD 23, 21]. An example of doing work, religious... religion—The Greek expresses the external service or exercise of religion, "godliness" being the internal soul of it. "If any man think himself to be so the Greek) religious, i. e., observant of the offices of religion, let him know, these consist not so much in outward observances, as in such acts of mercy and humble piety (Micah, 6, 7, 8) as visiting the fatherless, &c., and keeping one's self unspotted from the world" (Matthew, 23, 23). St. James does not mean that these offices are the great essentials, or sum total of religion; but that, whereas the law-service was merely ceremonial, the very services of the gospel consist in acts of mercy and holiness, and it has light for its garment, its very robe being righteousness. (TRENCH.) The Greek word is only found in Acts, 26, 5. "After the strictest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee." Colossians 2, 18, "Worshipping of angels," brideth not... tongue—Discretion in speech is better than fluency of speech (cf. ch. 3, 2, 3). Cf. Psalm 39, 1. God alone can enable us to do so. St. James, in treating of the law, naturally notices this sin. For they who are free from grosser sins, and even bear the outward show of sanctity, will often exalt themselves by detracting others under the pretence of zeal, whilst their real motive is love of evil-speaking. (CALVIN.) heart—it and the tongue act and react on one another. 27. Para... and undefiled—"Pure" is that love which has in it no foreign admixture, as self-deceit and hypocrisy. "Undefiled" is the means of its being "pure." (TITTMANN.) "Pure" expresses the positive, "undefiled" the negative side of religious service; just as visiting the fatherless and widow is the active, keeping himself unspotted from the world, the passive side of religious duty. This is the nobler shape that our religious exercises take, instead of the ceremonial offices of the law. before God and the Father—lit., "before Him who is (our) God and Father." God is so called to imply that if we would be like our Father, it is not by fasting, &c., for He does none of these things, but in being "merciful as our Father is merciful." CHRYSOSTOM.] visit—in sympathy and kind offices to alleviate their distresses, the fatherless—whose "Father" is God (Psalm 68, 6); peculiarly helpless, and—not in the Greek; so close is the connexion between active works of mercy to others, and the maintenance of personal unworldliness of spirit, word, and deed: no copula therefore is needed. Religion in its rise interests us about ourselves; in its progress, about our fellow-creatures; in its highest stage, about the honour of God. keep himself—with jealous watchfulness, at the same time praying and depending on God as alone able to keep us (John, 17, 15; Jude, 24).

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-26. THE SIN OF RESPECT OF PERSONS: DEAD, UNWORKING FAITH SAVES NO MAN. 1-13. St. James illustrates "the perfect law of liberty" (ch. 1, 25) in one particular instance of a sin against it, concluding with a reference again to that law (v. 12, 13). 1. brethren—the equality of all Christians as "brethren," forms the ground-work of the admonition, the faith of... Christ—i. e., the Christian faith. St. James grounds Christian practice on Christian faith. The Lord of glory—So 1 Corinthians, 2, 8. As all believers, alike rich and poor, derive all their glory from their union with Him, "the Lord of glory," not from external advantages of worldly fortune, the sin in question is peculiarly inconsistent with His "faith." BENGLI, making no ellipsis of the Lord, explains "glory" as in apposition with Christ who is THE GLORY (Luke, 2, 32): the true Shekinah glory of the temple (Romans, 9, 4). English Version is simpler. The glory of Christ resting on the poor believer should make him be regarded as highly by "brethren" as his richer brother; nay, more so, if the poor believer has more of Christ's spirit than the rich brother. with respect of persons—lit., "in respect of persons;" in the practice of partial preferences of persons in various ways and on various occasions. 2. assembly—lit., synagogue: this, the latest honourable use, and the only Christian use of the term in the New Testament, occurs in St. James' epistle, the apostle who maintained to the latest possible moment the bonds between the Jewish synagogue and the Christian church. Soon the continued resistance of the truth by the Jews led Christians to leave the term to them exclusively (Revelation, 3, 9). The "synagogue" implies a mere assembly or congregation not necessarily united by any common tie. "Church," a people bound together by mutual ties and laws, though often it may happen that the members are not assembled. (TRENCH & VITRINGA.) Partly from St. James' Hebrew tendencies, partly from the Jewish Christian churches retaining most of the Jewish forms, this term "synagogue" is used here instead of the Christian term "church" (ecclesia, derived from a root, "called out," implying the union of its members in spiritual bonds, independent of space, and called out into separation from the world; an undesigned coincidence and mark of truth. The people in the Jewish synagogue sat according to their rank, those of the same trade together. The introduction of this custom into Jewish Christian places of worship is here reprobated by St. James. Christian churches were built like the synagogues, the holy table in the east end of the former, as the ark was in the latter; the desk and pulpit were the chief articles of furniture in both alike. This shows the error of comparing the church to the temple, and the ministry to the priesthood: the temple is represented by the whole body of worshippers; the church building was formed on the model of the synagogue. See VITRINGA Synagogue. 2, 3. "If there chance to have come." (ALFORD.) goodly apparel... gay clothing—As the Greek is the same in both, translate both alike, "gay," or "splendid clothing." have respect to him, &c.—though ye know not who he is, when perhaps he may be a heathen. It was the office of the deacons to direct to a seat the members of the congregation. (CLYMENT, Constitut. 2, 67, 68.) unto him—Not in the best MSS. Thus "thou" becomes more demonstratively emphatic, here—near the speaker, there—at a distance from where the good seats are, under my footstool—not literally so; but on the ground, down by my footstool. The poor man must either stand, or if he sits, sit in a degrading position. The speaker has a footstool as well as a good seat. 4. Are ye not... partial—lit., Have ye not made distinctions or differences, so as to prefer one to another. So in Jude, 22, in yourselves—in your minds, i. e., according to your carnal inclination. (GROTIUS.) are become judges of evil thoughts—The Greek words for "judges" and for "partial," are akin in sound and meaning. A similar translation ought therefore to be given to both. Thus, either for "judges," &c., translate, "distinguishers of i. e., according to your) evil thoughts;" or, do ye not partially judge between men, and are become evilly-thinking judges (Mark, 7, 21). The "evil thoughts" are in the judges themselves: as in Luke, 18, 8, the Greek, "judge of injustice," is transl., "unjust judge." ALFORD & WAHL translate, "Did ye not doubt" respecting your faith, which is inconsistent with the distinctions made by you between rich and poor). For the Greek constantly means doubt in all the New Testament. So in ch. 1, 6, "wavering," Matthew, 21, 21; Acts, 10, 20; Romans, 4, 20, "staggered not." The same play on the same kindred words occurs in the Greek of Romans, 14, 10, 23, judge... doubteth. The same blame of being a judge, when one ought to be an obeyer of the law, is found ch. 4, 11. 5. Rearken—St. James brings to trial the self-constituted "judges" (v. 4). poor of this world—the best MSS. read, "those poor in respect to the world." In contrast to "the rich in this world" (1 Timothy, 6. 17). Not of course all the poor; but the poor as a class, furnish more believers than the rich as a class. The rich, if a believer, renounces riches as his portion; the poor, if an unbeliever, neglects that which is the peculiar advantage of poverty (Matthew, 5. 3; 1 Corinthians, 1. 26, 27, 28). rich in faith—their riches consist in faith. Luke, 12. 21. "Rich toward God." 1 Timothy, 6. 18. "Rich in good works" (Revelation, 2. 9; cf. 2 Corinthians, 8. 9). Christ's poverty is the source of the believer's riches. kingdom...promised—(Luke, 12. 32; 1 Corinthians, 2. 9; 2 Timothy, 4. 8.) 6. The world's judgment of the poor contrasted with God's. ye—Christians, from whom better things might have been expected: there is no marvel that men of the world do so. despised—lit., dishonoured. To dishonour the poor is to dishonour those whom God honours, and so to invert the order of God. [CALVIN.] rich—as a class. oppress—lit., abuse their power against you. draw you—translate, "is it not they (those very persons whom ye partially prefer. v. 1-4) that draw you" (see, with violence). [ALFORD.] before—Judgment seats—Instituting persecutions for religion, as well as oppressive lawsuits, against you. 7. "Is it not they that blaspheme, &c., as in v. 6. [ALFORD.] Rich heathen must here chiefly be meant; for none others would directly blaspheme the name of Christ. Only indirectly rich Christians can be meant, who, by their inconsistency, caused His name to be blasphemed: so Ezekiel, 36. 21, 22; Romans, 2. 24. Besides, there were few rich Jewish Christians at Jerusalem (Romans, 16. 26). They who dishonour God's name by wilful and habitual sin, "take or bear the Lord's name in vain" (cf. Proverbs, 30. 9, with Exodus, 20. 7). that worthy name—which is "good before the Lord's saints" (Psalm 52. 9; 64. 6; which ye pray may be "hallowed" (Matthew, 6. 9), and "by which ye are called," lit., which was invoked (or called) upon you (cf. Genesis, 48. 16; Isaiah, 4. 1, Margin; Acts, 15. 17), so that at your baptism "into the name" (so the Greek, Matthew, 28. 19) of Christ, ye became Christ's people (1 Corinthians, 3. 23). 8. The Greek may be translated, "If, however, ye fulfil," &c., i.e., as ALFORD, after ESTIUS, explains, "Still I do not say, hate the rich (for their oppressions); and drive them from your assemblies: if you choose to observe the royal law, &c., well and good; but respect of persons is a breach of that law." I think the translation is, "If in every deed (or indeed on the one hand) ye fulfil the royal law, &c., ye do well, but if (on the other hand) ye respect persons, ye practise sin." The Jewish Christians boasted of, and rested in, the "law" (Acts, 15. 1; 21. 18-24; Romans, 2. 17; Galatians, 2. 12). To this "indeed" alludes. ("Ye rest in the law): If indeed (then) ye fulfil it, ye do well; but if, &c. royal—the law that is king of all laws, being the sum and essence of the ten commandments. The great King, God, is love: His law is the royal law of love, and that law, like Himself, reigns supreme. He "is no respecter of persons;" therefore to respect persons is at variance with Him and His royal law, which is at once a law of love and of liberty (v. 12). The law is the "whole;" "the (particular) Scripture" (Leviticus, 19. 18) quoted is a part. To break a part is to break the whole (v. 10), ye do well—being "blessed in your deed" ("doing," Margin) as a doer, not a forgetful hearer of the law (ch. 1. 25). 9. Respect of persons violates the command to love all alike "as thyself." ye commit sin—lit., "ye work sin." Matthew, 7. 23, to which the reference here is probably, as in ch. 1. 22. Your works are sin, whatever boast of the law ye make in words (Note, v. 8), convinced—Old English for "convicted," as transgressors—not merely of this or that particular command, but of the whole absolutely. 10. The best MSS. read, "Whoever shall have kept the whole law, and yet shall have offended (lit., stumbled; not so strong as 'fall,' Romans, 11. 11) in one point: here, the respecting of persons, is (hereby) become guilty of all." The law is one seamless garment which is rent if you but read a part: or a musical harmony which is spoiled if there be one discordant note (TIRINUS); or a golden chain whose completeness is broken if you break one link. [GATAKER.] You thus break the whole law, though not the whole of the law, because you offend against love, which is the fulfilling of the law. If any part of a man be leprous, the whole man is judged to be a leper. God requires perfect, not partial, obedience. We are not to choose out parts of the law to keep, which suit our whim, whilst we neglect others. 11. He is one who gave the whole law; therefore, they who violate His will in one point, violate it all. [BENGO.] The law and its Author alike have a complete unity. kill...adultery—selected as being the most glaring cases of violation of duty towards one's neighbour. 12. Summing up of the previous reasonings. speak—Referring back to ch. 1. 19, 20; the fuller discussion of the topic is given ch. 3. Judged by the law of liberty—ch. 1. 25—i.e., the gospel law of love, which is not a law of external constraint, but of internal, free, instinctive inclination. The law of liberty, through God's mercy, frees us from the curse of the law, that henceforth we should be free to love and obey willingly. If we will not in turn practise the law of love to our neighbour, that law of grace condemns us still more heavily than the old law, which spake nothing but wrath to him who offended in the least particular (v. 13). Cf. Matthew, 18. 33-35; John, 12. 48; Revelation, 6. 16. "Wrath of the merciful Lamb." 13. The converse of "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy" (Matthew, 5. 7). Translate, "The judgment (which is coming on all of us) shall be without mercy to him who hath showed no mercy." It shall be such toward every one as every one shall have been. [BENGO.] "Mercy" here corresponds to "love," v. 8. mercy rejuvinate against judgment—Mercy, so far from fearing judgment in the case of its followers, actually glorifies against it, knowing that it cannot condemn them. Not that their mercy is the ground of their acquittal, but that the mercy of God in Christ towards them, producing mercy on their part towards their fellowmen, makes them to triumph over judgment, which all in themselves otherwise deserve. 14. St. James here, passing from the particular case of "mercy" or "love" violated by "respect of persons," notwithstanding profession of the "faith of our Lord Jesus" (v. 1), combats the Jewish tendency (transplanted into their Christianity) to substitute a lifeless inoperative acquaintance with the letter of the law, for change of heart to practical holiness, as if justification could be thereby attained (Romans, 2. 3, 13, 25). It seems hardly likely, but that St. James had seen St. Paul's epistles, considering that he uses the same phrases and examples (cf. v. 21, 23, 25, with Romans, 4. 3; Hebrews, 11. 17, 31; and v. 14, 34, with Romans, 3. 28; Galatians, 2. 16). Whether St. James individually designed it or not, the Holy Spirit by him combats not St. Paul, but those who abuse St. Paul's doctrine. The teaching of both alike is inspired, and is therefore to be received without wresting of words; but each has a different class to deal with; St. Paul, self-justifiers; St. James, antinomian advocates of a mere notional faith. St. Paul urged as strongly as St. James the need of works as evidences of faith, especially in the later epistles, when many were abusing the doctrine of faith (Titus, 2. 14; 3. 8). "Believing and doing are blood relatives." [RUTHERFORD.] What doth it profit—lit., "What is the profit?" though a mis say—St. James' expression is not "If a man have faith," but "if a man say he hath faith," referring to a mere profession of faith such as was usually made at baptism. Simon Magnus so "believed and was baptised."

and yet had "neither part nor lot in this matter," for its "heart," as his words and works evinced, was not light in the sight of God. ALFORD wrongly denies that "say" is emphatic. The illustration, v. 16, proves it is: "If one of you say" to a naked brother; "Be ye warmed, notwithstanding ye give not those things needful." The inoperative profession of sympathy answering to the inoperative profession of faith, can save him—rather, "can such a faith (lit., the faith) save him?" the faith you pretend to; the empty name of boasted faith, contrasted with true fruit-producing faith. So that which self-deceivers claim is called "wisdom," though not true wisdom, ch. 3. 15. The "him" also in the Greek is emphatic; the particular man who professes faith without having the works which evidence its vitality. 15. The Greek is, "But lit. &c.": the "but" taking up the argument against such a one as "said he had faith, and yet had no works," which are its fruits, a brother, &c.—a fellow-Christian, to whom we are especially bound to give help, independent of our general obligation to help all our fellow-creatures, be.—The Greek implies "be found, as your access to them." 16. The habit of receiving passively sentimental impressions from sights of woe without carrying them out into active habits only ardens the heart. one of you—St. James brings home the case to his hearers individually. Depart in peace—s if all their wants were satisfied by the mere words addressed to them. The same words in the mouth of Christ, whose faith they said they had, were accompanied by efficient deeds of love. be...warmed—with lothing, instead of being as heretofore "naked" (v. 15; ob. 31. 20). filled—instead of being "destitute of food" (Matthew, 15. 37). what doth it profit—concluding with the same question as at the beginning, v. 14. Justification: kind professions unaccompanied with corresponding acts, as they are of no "profit" to the needy object of them, so are of no profit to the professor himself. So faith consisting in mere profession is unacceptable to God, the object of faith, and profitless to the professor. 17. faith...being alone—ALFORD joins is dead in itself. So BENCKE, "If the works which bring faith produces have no existence, it is a profane faith itself (lit., in respect to itself) has no existence, i. e., that what one boasts of as faith, is dead." Faith is said to be "dead in itself," because when it has works it is alive, and is discerned to be so, not in respect to its works, but in respect to itself. English Version if retained, must not be understood to mean that faith can exist "alone" (i. e., severed from works). But thus: Even so presumed faith, if it have not works, is dead, being by itself "alone," i. e., severed from works of charity; just as the body would be dead if alone, i. e., severed from the spirit (v. 28). So STRONG, 18. "But some one will say: so the Greek, his verse continues the argument from v. 14, 16. One may say he has faith though he have not works. Suppose one were to say to a naked brother, "Be warmed," without giving him needful clothing. "But some one maintaining right views of the need of faith having works joined to it will say" in opposition to the "say" of the professor, &c. show me thy faith without thy works—if thou canst; but thou canst not show, i. e., answer or evidence thy alleged (v. 14, "say") faith without works. "Show" does not mean here prove to me, but exhibit to me. Faith is unseen save by God, who show faith to man, works in some form or other are needed: we are justified judicially by God (Romans, 8. 1); meritoriously, by Christ (Isaiah, 63. 11); mediately, by faith (Romans, 5. 1); essentially, by works. The reason here is not as to the ground on which believers are justified, but about the demonstration of their faith: so in the case of Abraham. In Genesis, 22. It is written God did tempt Abraham, i. e., put to the test of demonstration the reality of his faith, not for the satisfaction of God, who already knew it well, but to demonstrate it before men. The offering of Isaac at that time, quoted here, v. 21, formed no part of the ground of his justification, for he was justified previously on his simply believing in the promise of spiritual heirs, i. e., believers, numerous as the stars. He was then justified: that justification was shown or manifested by his offering Isaac forty years after. That work of faith demonstrated, but did not contribute to his justification. The tree shows its life by its fruits, but it was alive before either fruits or even leaves appeared. 19. Thou—emphatic. Thou self-deceiving claimant to faith without works. that there is one God—rather, "that God is one": God's existence, however, is also asserted. The fundamental article of the creed of Jews and Christians alike, and the point of faith on which especially the former boasted themselves, as distinguishing them from the Gentiles, and hence adduced by St. James here. thou dost well—so far good. But unless thy faith goes farther than an assent to this truth, "the evil spirits (lit., demons): 'Devil' is the term restricted to Satan, their head) believe" so far in common with thee, "and (so far from being saved by such a faith) shudder" (so the Greek), Matthew, 8. 29; Luke, 4. 34; 3 Peter, 2. 4; Jude, 6; Revelation, 20. 10. Their faith only adds to their torment at the thought of having to meet Him who is to consign them to their just doom: so thine (Hebrews, 10. 26, 27, it is not the faith of love, but of fear, that hath torment, 1 John, 4. 18). 20. wilt thou know—"Vain" men are not willing to know, since they have no wish to do the will of God. St. James beseeches such a one to lay aside his perverse unwillingness to know what is palpable to all who are willing to do. vain—who deceiveth thyself with a delusive hope, resting on an unreal faith. without works—The Greek implies separate from the works [ALFORD] which ought to flow from it if it were real. is dead—Some of the best MSS. read, "is idle," i. e., unavailing to effect what you hope, viz., to save you. 21. Abraham...justified by works—essentially, and before men (see Note, v. 18). In v. 23, St. James, like St. Paul, recognises the Scripture truth, that it was his faith that was counted to Abraham for righteousness in his justification before God. when he had offered—rather, "when he offered" [ALFORD], i. e., brought as an offering at the altar; not implying that he actually offered him. 22. Or, "thou seest," how—rather, that. In the two clauses which follow, emphasize "faith" in the former, and "works" in the latter, to see the sense. [BENCKE.] faith wrought with his works—for it was by faith he offered his son. Lit., "was working (at the time) with his works." by works was faith made perfect—not was vivified, but attained its fully consummated development, and is shown to be real. So "my strength is made perfect in weakness," i. e., exerts itself most perfectly, shows how great it is [CAMERON]: so 1 John, 4. 17; Hebrews, 2. 10; 5. 9. The germ really, from the first, contains in it the full grown tree, but its perfection is not attained till it is matured fully. So oh. 1. 4. "Let patience have her perfect work" i. e., have its full effect by showing the most perfect degree of endurance, "that ye may be perfect," i. e., fully developed in the exhibition of the Christian character. ALFORD explains, "Received its realization, was entirely exemplified and filled up." So St. Paul, Philippians, 2. 12. "Work out your own salvation" the salvation was already in germ theirs in their free justification through faith. It needed to be worked out still to fully developed perfection in their life. 23. scriptures was fulfilled—Genesis, 15. 6, quoted by St. Paul, as realized in Abraham's justification by faith; but by St. James, as realized subsequently in Abraham's work of offering Isaac, which, he says, justified him. Mainly, then, St. James must mean by works the same thing as St.

Paul means by faith, only that he speaks of faith at its manifested development, whereas St. Paul speaks of it in its germ. Abraham's offering of Isaac was not a mere act of obedience, but an act of faith. Isaac was the subject of the promises of God, that in him Abraham's seed should be called. The same God calls on Abraham to slay the subject of His own promise, when as yet there was no seed in whom those predictions could be realized. Hence St. James' saying that Abraham was justified by such a work, is equivalent to saying, as St. Paul does, that he was justified by faith itself; for it was in fact faith expressed in action, as in other cases saving faith is expressed in words. So St. Paul states as the mean of salvation faith expressed. The "Scripture" would not be "fulfilled," as St. James says it was, but contradicted by any interpretation which makes man's works justify him before God; for that Scripture makes no mention of works at all, but says that Abraham's belief was counted to him for righteousness. God, in the first instance, "justifies the unpiously" through faith; subsequently the believer is justified before the world as righteous through faith manifested in words and works (cf. Matthew, 25, 35-37, "the righteous," 40). The best authorities read, "But Abraham believed," &c., and he was called the Friend of God—He was not so called in his lifetime, though he was so even then from the time of his justification; but he was called so, being recognised as such by all on the ground of his works of faith. "He was the friend (in an active sense), the lover of God, in reference to his works; and (in a passive sense) loved by God in reference to his justification by works. Both senses are united in John, 15, 14, 15." [BENGL.] 24. Not justified by faith only—i.e., by "faith without (separated from: severed from) works," its proper fruits (Note, v. 20). Faith to justify must, from the first, include obedience in germ (to be developed subsequently), though the former alone is the ground of justification. The scion must be grafted on the stock that it may live; it must bring forth fruit to prove that it does live. 25. It is clear from the nature of Rahab's act, that it is not quoted to prove justification by works as such. She believed assuredly what her other countrymen disbelieved, and this in the face of every improbability that an unwarlike few would conquer well-armed numbers. In this belief she hid the spies at the risk of her life. Hence, Heb. 11, 31, names this as an example of faith, rather than of obedience. "By faith the harlot Rahab perished not with them that believed not." If an instance of obedience were wanting, St. Paul and St. James would hardly have quoted a woman of previously bad character, rather than the many moral and pious patriarchs. But as an example of free grace justifying men through an operative, as opposed to a mere verbal faith, none could be more suitable than a saved "harlot." As Abraham was an instance of an illustrious man and the father of the Jews, so Rahab is quoted as a woman, and one of abandoned character, and a Gentile, showing that justifying faith has been manifested in those of every class. The nature of the works alleged is such as to prove that St. James uses them only as evidences of faith, as contrasted with a mere verbal profession; not works of charity and piety, but works the value of which consisted solely in their being proofs of faith: they were faith expressed in act, synonymous with faith itself, messengers—spies, had received...had sent—rather, "received...thrust them forth" (in haste and fear). [ALFORD.] by another way—from that whereby they entered her house, viz., through the window of her house on the wall, and thence to the mountain. 26. Faith is a spiritual thing: works are material. Hence we might expect faith to answer to the spirit, works to the body. But St. James reverses this. He therefore does not mean that faith is all cases answers to the body; but the FORM of faith without the working reality answers to the body without the animating spirit. It does not follow that living faith derives its life from works, as the body derives its life from the animating spirit.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-18. DANGER OF EAGERNESS TO TEACH, AND OF AN UNBRIDLED TONGUE; TRUE WISDOM SHOWN BY UNCONTENTIOUS MEEKNESS. 1. be not lit., become not: taking the office too hastily, and of your own accord. many—The office is a noble one; but few are fit for it. Few govern the tongue well (v. 2), and only such as can govern it are fit for the office; therefore, "teachers" ought not to be many. masters—rather, "teachers." The Jews were especially prone to this presumption. The idea that faith (so-called) without works (ch. 2.) was all that is required, prompted "many" to set up as "teachers," as has been the case in all ages of the church. At first all were allowed to teach in turns. Even their inspired gifts did not prevent liability to abuse, as St. James here implies; much more is this so, when self-constituted teachers have no such miraculous gifts, knowings—as all might know, we—greater condemnation—St. James, in a humble, conciliatory spirit, includes himself; if see teachers abuse the office, we shall receive greater condemnation than those who are mere hearers (cf. Luke, 12, 49-50). CALVIN, like English Version, translates, "Masters," i.e., self-constituted owners and reprovers of others. Ch. 4, 12 accords with this view. 2. all—The Greek implies "all without exception": even the apostles, offend not—lit., stumbleth not: is void of offence or slip in word; in which respect one is especially tried who sets up to be a "teacher." 3. Behold—The best authorities read, "but if," i.e., Nov whenever (in the case of horses (such is the emphatic position of "horses" in the Greek) we put the bit (so lit., the customary bit) into their mouths that they may obey us, we turn about also their whole body. This is to illustrate how man turns about his whole body with the little tongue. "The same applies to the pen, which is the substitute for the tongue among the absent." [BENGL.] 4. Not only animals, but even ships, the governor listeth—lit., the impulse of the steersman pleaseth. The feeling which moves the tongue corresponds with this. 5. boasteth great things—There is great moment in what the careless think "little" things. [BENGL.] Cf. "a world," "the course of nature," "hell," v. 6, which illustrate how the little tongue's great words produce great mischief. how great a matter a little fire kindleth—The best MSS. read, "how little a fire kindleth how great a," &c. ALFORD, for "matter," translates, "forest." But GROTIIUS translates as English Version, "material for burning": a pile of fuel. 6. Translate, "The tongue, that world of iniquity, is a fire." As man's little world is an image of the greater world, the universe, so the tongue is an image of the former. [BENGL.] so—Omitted in the oldest authorities. is—lit., is constituted. The tongue is (constituted), among the members, the one which defileth, &c. (viz., as fire defiles with its smouldering course of nature—"the orb (cycle) of creation" set on fire...is set on fire—habitually and continually. Whilst a man inflames others, he passes out of his own power, being consumed in the flame himself, of hell—i.e., of the devil. Greek, "Gehenna" found here only and in Matthew, 5, 22. St. James has much in common with the sermon on the mount (Proverbs, 18, 27). 7. every kind—rather, "every nature" (i.e., natural disposition and characteristic power), of beasts—i.e., quadrupeds of every disposition; as distinguished from the three other classes of creation, "birds, creeping things (the Greek includes not merely 'serpents,' as English Version), and things in the sea." tamed, and hath been—is continually being tamed, and hath been so long ago, of mankinds—rather, "by the nature of man's characteristic power taming that of the inferior animals. The olive in the olive may, "Hath contained it to be brought into tame subjection to the nature of men." So it shall be in the millennial world: even now man, by gentle firmness, may tame the inferior animal, and even elevate its nature. 8. no man—lit., no one of men: neither can a man control his neighbours, nor even his own tongue. Hence the truth of v. 3 appears, namely evil—The Greek implies that it is at once restless and incapable of restraint. Nay, though nature has hedged it in with a double barrier of the lips and teeth, it bursts from its barriers to assail and ruin men. [EPICTETUS] deadly—lit., death-bearing. 9. God—The oldest authorities read, "Lord." "Him who is Lord and Father." The uncommonness of the application of "Lord" to the Father, doubtless caused the change in modern texts to "God" (ch. 1. 27). But as Messiah is called "Father," Isaiah, 9. 6, so God the Father is called by the Son's title, "Lord," showing the unity of the Godhead. "Father" implies His paternal love; "Lord," His dominion, mes, which—not "men who," for what is meant is not particular men, but men generally. [ALFORD.] are made after...similitude of God—Though in a great measure man has lost the likeness of God in which he was originally made, yet enough of it still remains to show what once it was, and what in regenerated and restored man it shall be. We ought to reverence this remnant and earnest of what man shall be in ourselves and in others. "Abraham has fallen from his father's favour, but the people still recognise him to be the king's son." [BENJAMIN.] Man resembles in humanity the Son of man, "the express image of His person" (Hebrews, 1. 3), cf. Genesis, 1. 26; 1 John, 4. 20. In the passage, Genesis, 1. 26, "image" and "likeness" are distinct: "image," according to the Alexandrians, was something in which men were created, being common to all, and continuing to man after the fall, while the "likeness" was something toward which man was created, to strive after and attain it: the former marks man's physical and intellectual, the latter his moral pre-eminence. 10. The tongue, says Esop, is at once the best and the worst of things. So in a fable, a man with the same breath blows hot and cold. "Life and death are in the power of the tongue" (cf. Psalm 62. 4). brethren—an appeal to their consciences by their brotherhood—an appeal ought not to be—a mild appeal, leaving it to themselves to understand that such conduct deserves the most severe reprobation. 11. fountain—an image of the heart: as the aperture so the Greek for "place" is lit.: of the fountain is an image of man's mouth. The image here is appropriate to the scene of the epistle, Palestine, wherein salt and bitter springs are found. Though "sweet" springs are sometimes found near, yet "sweet and bitter" (water) do not flow "at the same place" (aperture). Grace can make the same mouth that "sent forth the bitter" once, send forth the sweet for the time to come: as the wood typical of Christ's cross) changed Marah's bitter water into sweet. 12. Transition from the mouth to the heart. Can the fig tree, &c.—Implying that it is an impossibility: as before in v. 10 he had said it "ought not so to be." St. James does not, as Matthew, 7. 16, 17, make the question, "Do men gather figs of thistles?" His argument is, No tree "can" bring forth fruit inconsistent with its nature, as e.g., the fig tree, olive berries: so if a man speaks bitterly, and afterwards speaks good words, the latter must be so only seemingly, and in hypocrisy; they can not be real, so can no fountain... salt... and fresh—The oldest authorities read, "Neither can a salt (water spring) yield fresh." So the mouth that emits cursing, cannot really emit also blessing. 13. Who—(cf. Psalm 34. 12, 13.) All wish to appear "wise," few are so, show—by works, and not merely by profession, referring to ch. 2. 18, out of a good conversation his works—by good "good conduct" manifested in particular works. "Wisdom" and "knowledge," without these being "shown," are as dead as faith would be without works. [ALFORD.] with meekness of wisdom—with the meekness inseparable from true wisdom. 14. If ye have—as is the case (this is implied in the Greek indicative), bitter—Ephesians, 4. 31, "bitterness," envying—rather, "emulation," or lit., zeal: kindly, generous emulation, or zeal, is not condemned, but that which is "bitter," [BENJAMIN.] strife—rather, "rivalry," in your hearts—from which flow your words and deeds, as from a fountain, glory not, and lie not against the truth—to boast of your wisdom is virtually a lying against the truth (the gospel), whilst your lives belie your glorying. Ver. 15, ch. 1. 18, "The word of truth." Romans, 2. 17, 23, speaks similarly of the same contentious Jewish Christians. 15. This wisdom—in which ye "glory," as if ye were "wise" (v. 13, 14), descendeth not from above—lit., "is not one descending," &c.: "from the Father of lights" (true illumination and wisdom), ch. 1. 17; through "the Spirit of truth," John, 15. 26, earthly—opposed to heavenly. Distinct from "earthly," 1 Corinthians, 15. 47. Earthly is what is in the earth; earthly, what is of the earth. sensual—lit., animal-like: the wisdom of the "natural" (the same Greek) man, not born again of God: "not having the Spirit" (John, 19). devilish—in its origin (from "hell," v. 6: not from God, the Giver of true wisdom, ch. 1. 5), and also in its character, which accords with its origin. Earthly, sensual, and devilish, answer to the three spiritual foes of man, the world, the flesh, and the devil. 16. envying—So English Version translates the Greek, which usually means "zeal," "emulation," in Romans, 13. 13. "The envious man stands in his own light. He thinks his candle cannot shine in the presence of another's sun. He aims directly at men, obliquely at God, who makes men to differ." strife—rivalry. [ALFORD.] confusion—lit., tumultuous anarchy: both in society (translated) "commotions," Luke, 21. 9; "tumults," 2 Corinthians, 6. 6), and in the individual mind: in contrast to the "peaceable" composure of true "wisdom," v. 17. St. James does not honour such effects of this earthly wisdom with the name "fruit," as he does in the case of the wisdom from above, Ver. 15; cf. Ga. 5. 19-22, "Works of the flesh...fruit of the Spirit." 17. first pure—lit., chaste, sanctified: pure from all that is "earthly, sensual (animal), devilish" (v. 15). This is put, "first of all," before "peaceable," because there is an unholy peace with the world which makes no distinction between clean and unclean. Cf. "undenied" and "unspotted from the world," ch. 1. 27; 4. 4, 8, "purify...hearts;" 1 Peter, 1. 22, "purified...souls" (the same Greek). Ministers must not preach, before a purifying change of heart, "Peace," where there is no peace. Seven, the perfect number) characteristic peculiarities of true wisdom are enumerated. Purity or sanctity is put first, because it has respect both to God and to ourselves, the six that follow regard our fellowmen. Our first concern is to have in ourselves sanctity; our second, to be at peace with men, gentle—"forbearing;" making allowances for others: lenient towards neighbours, as to the DUTIES they owe us, easy to be entreated—lit., easily persuaded, tractable; not harsh as to a neighbour's FAULTS, full of mercy—as to a neighbour's MISERIES, full of good fruits—contrasted with "every evil work," v. 16, without partially—recurring to the warning against partial "respect to persons," ch. 2. 1, 4. 9. ALFORD translates as the Greek is translated, ch. 1. 6, "swerving" "without doubting." But thus there would be an epithet referring to one's self inserted amidst those referring to one's conduct towards others. English Version is therefore better, without hypocrisy;—Not as ALFORD explains from ch. 2. 1. 23.

"Without deceiving yourselves" with the name without the reality of religion. For it must refer, like the rest of the six epithets, to our relations to others: our peaceableness and mercy towards others must be "without dissimulation." 18. "The peaceable fruit of righteousness." He says righteousness, because it is itself the true wisdom. As in the case of the earthly wisdom, after the characteristic description came its results: so in this verse, in the case of the heavenly wisdom. There the results were present; here, future, fruit..sown—cf. Psalm 97. 11; Isaiah, 61. 3, "trees of righteousness." Anticipatory, i.e., the seed whose "fruit," viz., "righteousness," shall be ultimately reaped, is now "sown in peace." "Righteousness," now in germ, when fully developed as "fruit," shall be itself the everlasting reward of the righteous. As "sowing in peace" (cf. "sown in dishonour," 1 Corinthians, 15. 43) produces the "fruit of righteousness," so conversely "the work" and "effect of righteousness" is "peace," of them that make peace—"by implying also that it is for them, and to their good" they work peace." They, and they alone, are "blessed." "Peace makers," not merely they who reconcile others, but who work peace. "Cultivate peace." [EPIST.] Those truly wise towards God, whilst peaceable and tolerant towards their neighbours, yet make it their chief concern to sow righteousness, not cloaking men's sins, but reproving them with such peaceable moderation as to be the physicians, rather than the executioners, of sinners. [CALVIN.]

CHAPTER IV.

VER. 1-17. AGAINST FIGHTINGS AND THEIR SOURCE: WORLDLY LUSTS: UNCHARITABLE JUDGMENTS, AND PRESUMPTUOUS RECKONING ON THE FUTURE. 1. whence—The cause of quarrels is often sought in external circumstances, whereas internal lusts are the true origin. wars, &c.—contrasted with the "peace" of heavenly wisdom. "Fightings" are the active carrying on of "wars." The best authorities have a second "whence" before "fightings." Tumults marked the era before the destruction of Jerusalem when St. James wrote. He indirectly alludes to these. The members are the first seat of war; thence it passes to conflict between man and man, nation and nation. come they not, &c.—an appeal to their consciences. lusts—lit., pleasures, i.e., the lusts which prompt you to "desire" (Note, v. 2) pleasures: whence you seek self at the cost of your neighbour, and hence flow "fightings," that war—"campaign, as an army of soldiers encamped within" [ALFORD] the soul; tumultuously war against the interests of your fellow-men, whilst lusting to advance self. But whilst warring thus against others, they (without his knowledge) war against the soul of the man himself, and against the Spirit; therefore they must be "mortified" by the Christian. 2. Ye lust—A different Greek word from that in v. 1. "Ye desire" lit., ye set your mind or heart on an object. have not—The lust of desire does not ensure the actual possession. Hence "ye kill" (not as Margine, without any old authority, "envy") to ensure possession. Not probably in the case of professing Christians of that day in a literal sense, but "kill and envy" (as the Greek for "desire to have" should be translated), i.e., harass and oppress through envy. [DREBUS.] Cf. Zechariah, 11. 5, "slay" through envy hate and desire to get out of your way, and so are "murderers" in God's eyes. [EPIST.] If literal murder [ALFORD] were meant, I do not think it would occur so early in the series; nor had Christians then as yet reached so open criminality. In the Spirit's application of the passage to all ages, literal killing is included, flowing from the desire to possess: so David and Ahab. There is a climax: "Ye desire," the individual lust for an object: "ye kill and envy," the feeling and action of individuals against individuals: "ye fight and war," the action of many against many. ye have not, because ye ask not—God promises to those who pray, not to those who fight. The petition of the lustful, murderous, and contentious, is not recognised by God as proper. If ye prayed, there would be no "wars and fightings." Thus this last clause is an answer to the question, v. 1. "Whence come wars and fightings?" 3. Some of them are supposed to say in objection, But we do "ask" (pray), cf. v. 2. St. James replies, It is not enough to ask for good things, but we must ask with a good spirit and intention. "Ye ask amiss, that ye may consume of your object of prayer upon (lit., in) your lusts" (lit., pleasures): not that ye may have the things you need for the service of God. Contrast ch. 1. 5, with Matthew, 6. 31, 32. If ye prayed aright, all your proper wants would be supplied; the improper cravings which produce "wars and fightings" would then cease. Even believers' prayers are often best answered when their desires are most opposed. 4. The oldest MSS. omit "adulterers and," and read simply, "Ye adulteresses." God is the rightful husband; the men of the world are regarded collectively as one adulteress, and individually as adulteresses, the world—in so far as the men of it and their motives and acts are aliens to God, e.g., its selfish "lusts" (v. 3), and covetous, and ambitious "wars and fightings" (v. 1), enmity—not merely "inimical," a state of enmity, and that enmity itself. Cf. 1 John, 2. 15, "love...the world...the love of the Father," whosoever...will be—The Greek is emphatic, "shall be resolved to be." Whether he succeed or not, if his wish be to be the friend of the world, he renders himself, becomes (so the Greek for "is") by the very fact, "the enemy of God." Contrast "Abraham the friend of God." 5. in vain—No word of Scripture can be so. The quotation here, as in Ephesians, 5. 14, seems to be not so much from a particular passage, as one gathered by St. James under inspiration from the general tenor of such passages in both the Old and New Testaments, as Numbers, 11. 29; Proverbs, 21. 10; Galatians, 5. 17. spirit that dwelleth in us—Other MSS. read, "That God hath made to dwell in us" (viz., at Pentecost). If as translated, "Does the (Holy) Spirit that God hath placed in us lust to (towards) envy" (viz., as ye do your worldly "wars and fightings"?) Certainly not: ye are therefore walking in the flesh, not in the Spirit, whilst ye thus lust towards, i.e., with envy against one another. The friendship of the world tends to breed envy: the Spirit produces very different fruit. ALFORD attributes the epithet "with envy," in the unwarrantable sense of jealousy, to the Holy Spirit: "The Spirit jealously desires us for His own." In English Version the sense is, "the (natural) spirit that hath its dwelling in us lusts with (lit., to, or towards) envy." Ye lust, and because ye have not what ye lust after (v. 1, 2), ye envy your neighbour who has, and so the spirit of envy leads you on to "fight." St. James also here refers to ch. 3. 14, 16. 6. But—Nay rather, he—God, gives more grace—ever increasing grace: the farther ye depart from "envy," [BENGL.] be saith—"The same God who causes His spirit to dwell in believers" (v. 5), by the Spirit also speaks in Scripture. The quotation here is probably from Proverbs, 3. 34: as probably Proverbs, 21. 10 was generally referred to in v. 5. In Hebrew it is "scorneth the scorners," viz., those who think "Scripture speaketh in vain," resisteth—lit., setteth Himself in array against: even as they, like Pharaoh, set themselves against Him. God repays sinners in their own coin. "Pride is the mother of 'envy' (v. 5): it is peculiarly apt to, for by it Satan fell, the proud—The Greek means in derivation one who shows himself above his fellows, and so lifts himself against God, the humble—the unenvious, uncovetous, and unambitious as to the world. Contrast v. 4. 7. Submit, to God—ye shall be among "the humble," v. 6; also v. 8; 1 Peter, 5. 6. Resist...devil—Under his banner prevail easy are enlisted in the world; resist his temptations to these. Faith, humble prayer, and heavenly wisdom, are the weapons of resistance. The language is taken from warfare. "Submit" as a good soldier puts himself in complete subjection to his captain. "Resist," stand bravely against, he will flee—translate, "he shall flee." For it is a promise of God, not a mere assurance from man to man. [ALFORD.] He shall flee worsted as he did from Christ. 8. Draw nigh to God—So "cleave unto Him," Deuteronomy, 30. 20. viz., by prayerfully (v. 2, 3) "resisting Satan," who would oppose our access to God. He will draw nigh—propitious. Cleanse...hands—the outward instruments of action. None but the clean-handed can ascend into the hill of the Lord (justified through Christ, who alone was perfectly so, and as such "ascended" thither), purify...hearts—lit., makes chaste of your spiritual adultery (v. 4, i.e., worldliness) your hearts; the inward source of all impurity, double-minded—divided between God and the world. The double minded is at fault in heart; the sinner in his hands likewise. 9. Be afflicted, &c.—lit., Endure misery, i.e., mourn over your wretchedness through sin. Repent with deep sorrow instead of your present laughter. A blessed mourning. Contrast Isaiah, 22. 18, 19; Luke, 6. 25. St. James does not add here, as in ch. 5. 1, "howl," where he foretells the doom of the impatient at the coming destruction of Jerusalem, heaviness—lit., falling of the countenance, casting down of the eyes. 10. In the sight of the Lord—as continually in the presence of Him who alone is worthy to be exalted: recognising His presence in all your ways, the truest incentive to humility. The tree, to grow upwards, must strike its roots deep downwards; so man, to be exalted, must have his mind deep-rooted in humility. In 1 Peter, 5. 6, it is, Humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God, viz., in his dealings of Providence: a distinct thought from that here. lit you up—in part in this world, fully in the world to come. 11. Having mentioned sins of the tongue (ch. 3.), he shows here that evil speaking flows from the same spirit of exalting self at the expense of one's neighbour as caused the "fightings" reprobated in this chapter (v. 1). Speak not evil—lit., Speak not against one another. brethren—Implying the inconsistency of such depreciatory speaking of one another in brethren, speaketh evil of the law—for the law in commanding, "Love thy neighbour as thyself" (ch. 2. 8), virtually condemns evil speaking and judging. [EUSTIUS.] Those who superciliously condemn the acts and words of others which do not please themselves, thus aiming at the reputation of sanctity, put their own moroseness in the place of the law, and claim to themselves a power of censuring above the law of God, condemning what the law permits. [CALVIN.] Such a one acts as though the law could not perform its own office of judging, but he must fly upon the office. [BENGEL.] This is the last mention of the law in the New Testament. ALFORD rightly takes the "law" to be the old moral law applied in its comprehensive spiritual fulness by Christ: "the law of liberty," if thou judge the law, thou art not a doer...but a judge—Setting aside the Christian brotherhood as all alike called to be doers of the law, in subjection to it, such a one arrogates the office of a judge. 12. There is one lawyer—The best authorities read in addition, "And judge." Translate, "There is one (alone) who is (at once) Lawgiver and Judge, (namely) He who is able to save and destroy." Implying, God alone is Lawgiver and therefore Judge, since it is He alone who can execute His judgments; our inability in this respect shows our presumption in trying to act as judges, as though we were God, who art thou? &c.—The order in the Greek is emphatic, "But (inserted in oldest MSS.) thou, who art thou that?" &c. How rashly arrogant in judging thy fellows, and wresting from God the office which belongs to Him over thee and THOU alike. another—The oldest authorities read, "thy neighbour." 13. Go to now—"Come now," said to excite attention, ye that say—"boasting of the morrow." To-day or to-morrow—as if ye had the free choice of either day as a certainty. Others read, "To day and to-morrow," such a city—lit., this the city (viz., the one present to the mind of the speaker). This city here, continue...a year—rather, "spend one year." Their language implies that when this one year is out, they purpose similarly settling plans for years to come. [BENGEL.] buy and sell—Their plans for the future are all worldly. 14. what—lit., of what nature is your life? i.e., how evanescent it is. It is even—Some oldest authorities read, "For ye are," BENGEL, with other old authorities, reads, "For it shall be," the future referring to the "morrow" (v. 13-16). The former expresses, "Ye yourselves are transitory:" so every thing of yours, even your life, must partake of the same transitoriness. Received that has no old authority, and then vanisheth away—"afterwards vanishing as it came;" lit., afterwards (as it appeared) so something. [ALFORD.] 15. lit., "instead of your saying," &c. This refers to "ye that say" (v. 13). we shall live—the best MSS. read, "We shall both live and do," &c. The boasters spoke as if life, action, and the particular kind of action, were in their power, whereas all three depend entirely on the will of the Lord. 16. now—as it is, rejoice in...boasting—"ye boast in arrogant presumptuous," viz., vain confident fancies that the future is certain to you (v. 13), rejoicing—boasting. [BENGEL.] 17. The general principle illustrated by the particular example just discussed is here stated: knowledge without practice is imputed to a man as great and presumptuous sin. St. James reverts to the principle with which he started. Nothing more injures the soul than wasted impressions. Feelings exhaust themselves and evaporate, if not embodied in practice. As we will not act except we feel, so if we will not act out our feelings, we soon shall cease to feel.

CHAPTER V.

VER. 1-20. WOES COMING ON THE WICKED RICH: BELIEVERS SHOULD BE PATIENT UNTO THE LORD'S COMING: VARIOUS EXHORTATIONS. 1. Go to now—Come now. A phrase to call solemn attention, ye rich—who have neglected the true enjoyment of riches, which consists in doing good. St. James intends this address to rich Jewish unbelievers, not so much for themselves, as for the saints, that they may bear with patience the violence of the rich (v. 7), knowing that God will speedily avenge them on their oppressors. [BENGEL.] miseries that shall come—lit., "that are coming upon you" unexpectedly and swiftly, viz., at the coming of the Lord (v. 7); primarily, at the destruction of Jerusalem; finally, at His visible coming to judge the world. 2. corrupted—about to be destroyed through God's curse on your oppression, whereby your riches are accumulated (v. 4). CALVIN thinks the sense is, Your riches perish without being of any use either to others or even to yourselves, for instance, your garments which are moth-eaten in your chests, garments, moth-eaten—Referring to Matthew, 6. 19, 20. 3. is cankered—"rusten through." [ALFORD.] rust... witness against you—in the day of judgment, viz., that your riches were of no profit to any, lying unemployed, and so contracting rust, shall eat your flesh—The rust which once ate your riches, shall then gnaw your conscience, accompanied with punishment which shall prey upon your bodies for ever. as...fire—not with the slow process of rusting, but with the swiftness of consuming fire. for the last days—ye have heaped together, not treasures as ye suppose (cf. Luke, 12. 19), but wrath against the last days, viz., the coming judgment of the Lord. ALFORD translates more lit., "In these last days (before the coming judgment) ye laid up (worldly) treasure" to no profit, instead of repenting and seeking salvation (see Note, v. 3). 4. Behold—calling attention to their coming doom as no vain threat. labourers—lit., workmen. of you kept back—So English Version rightly. Not as ALFORD, "crieth out from you." The "keeping back of the hire" was, on the part of the rich, virtually an act of "fraud," because the poor labourers were not immediately paid. The phrase is therefore not, "kept back by you," but "of you;" the latter implying virtual, rather than overt, fraud. St. James refers to Deuteronomy, 24. 14, 15, "At his day... give his hire, neither shall the sun go down upon it, lest he cry against thee unto the Lord, and it be sin unto thee." Many sins "cry" to heaven for vengeance which men tacitly take no account of, as unchastity and injustice. [BENGL.] Sins peculiarly offensive to God are said to "cry" to Him. The rich ought to have given freely to the poor; their not doing so was sin. A still greater sin was their not paying their debts. Their greatest sin was not paying them to the poor, whose wages is their all. cries of them—a double cry: both that of the hire abstractly, and that of the labourers hired, the Lord of sabbath—Here only in the New Testament. In Romans, 9. 29 it is a quotation. It is suited to the Jewish tone of the epistle. It reminds the rich who think the poor have no protector, that the Lord of the whole hosts in heaven and earth is the guardian and avenger of the latter. He is identical with the "coming Lord" Jesus (v. 7). 5. Translate, "Ye have luxuriated... and wanted." The former expresses luxurious effeminacy; the latter, wantonnness and profligality. Their luxury was at the expense of the defrauded poor (v. 4). on the earth—the same earth which has been the scene of your wantonnness, shall be the scene of the judgment coming on you; instead of earthly delights ye shall have punishments. nourished... hearts—i.e., glutted your bodies like beasts to the full extent of your heart's desire: ye live to eat, not eat to live, as in a day of slaughter—The oldest authorities omit "as." Ye are like beasts which eat to their heart's content on the very day of their approaching slaughter, unconscious it is near. The phrase answers to "the last days," v. 3, which favours ALFORD'S translation there, "in, not" for. 6. Ye have condemned... the just—The Greek aorist expresses, "Ye are accustomed to condemn, &c. the just." Their condemnation of Christ, "the Just," is foremost in St. James' mind. But all the innocent blood shed, and to be shed, is included, the Holy Spirit comprehending St. James himself, called "the just," who was slain in a tumult. See my Introduction. This gives a peculiar appropriateness to the expression in this verse, the same "as the righteous (just) man," v. 16. The justice or righteousness of Jesus and His people is what peculiarly provoked the ungodly great men of the world. He doth not resist you—The very patience of the Just one is abused by the wicked as an incentive to boldness in violent persecution, as if they may do as they please with impunity. God doth "resist the proud" (ch. 4. 6); but Jesus as man, "as a sheep is dumb before the shearer, so He opened not His mouth;" so His people are meek under persecution. The day will come when God will resist lit., set Himself in array against His foes and theirs. 7. Be patient therefore—as judgment is so near (v. 1. 3), ye may well afford to be "patient" after the example of the unresisting Just one (v. 6). brethren—contrasted with the "rich" oppressors, v. 1-6. unto the coming of the Lord—Christ, when the trial of your patience shall cease. husbandman waiteth for—i.e., patiently bears toils and delays through hope of the harvest at last. Its "preciousness" (cf. Psalm 126. 6, "precious seed") will more than compensate for all the past. Cf. the same image, Galatians, 6. 8, 9. hath long patience for it—"over it," in respect to it, until he receive—"until it receive." [ALFORD.] Even if

English Version be retained, the receiving of the early and latter rains is not to be understood as the object of his hope, but the harvest for which those rains are the necessary preliminary. The early rain fell at sowing time, about November or December; the latter rain, about March or April, to mature the grain for harvest. The latter rain that shall precede the coming spiritual harvest, will probably be another Pentecost-like effusion of the Holy Ghost. 8. smag... draweth sigh—The Greek expresses present time and a settled state. 1 Peter, 4. 7, "Is at hand." We are to live in a continued state of expectancy of the Lord's coming, as an event always nigh. Nothing can more "stabilish the heart" amidst present troubles than the realized expectation of His speedy coming. 9. Grudge not—rather, "Murmur not;" "grumble not." The Greek is lit., "groan;" a half-suppressed murmur of impatience and harsh judgment, not uttered aloud or freely. Having exhorted them to patience in bearing wrongs from the wicked, he now exhorts them to a forbearing spirit as to the offences given by brethren. Christians who bear the former patiently, sometimes are impatient at the latter though much less serious. lest... condemned—The best MS. authorities read, "judged." St. James refers to Matthew, 7. 1, "Judge not lest ye be judged." To "murmur against one another" is virtually to judge, and so to become liable to be judged. Judge... before the door—Referring to Matthew, 24. 33. The Greek is the same in both passages, and so ought to be translated here as there, "doors," plural. The phrase means "is near at hand" (Genesis, 4. 7, which in the oldest interpretations (the Targums of Jonathan and Jerusalem) is explained, "thy sin is reserved unto the judgment of the world to come." Cf. "the everlasting doors," Psalm 24. 7, whence He shall come forth). The Lord's coming to destroy Jerusalem is primarily referred to; and ultimately, His coming again visibly to judgment. 10. example of suffering affliction—rather, simply, "of affliction," lit., "evil treatment." the prophets—who were especially persecuted, and therefore were especially "blessed." 11. count them happy—(Matthew, 5. 10.) which endure—The oldest authorities read, "Which have endured," which suits the sense better than English Version: "Those who in past days, like the prophets and Job, have endured trials." Such, not those who "have lived in pleasure and been wanton on the earth" (v. 6), are "happy," patients—rather, "endurance," answering to "endure;" the Greek words similarly corresponding. Distinct from the Greek word for "patience," v. 10. The same word ought to be translated, "endurance," eh. 1. 3. He here reverts to the subject which he began with, Job—This passage shows the history of him is concerning a real, not an imaginary person; otherwise his case could not be quoted as an example at all. Though he showed much of impatience, yet he always returned to this that he committed himself wholly to God, and at last showed a perfect spirit of enduring submission and have seen—(with the eyes of your mind.) ALFORD translates from the old and genuine reading, "See also," &c. The old reading is, however, capable of being translated as English Version. the end of the Lord—the end which the Lord gave. If Job had much to "endure," remember also Job's happy "end." Hence, learn, though much tried, to "endure to the end" that—ALFORD, &c., translates, "inasmuch as," "for," pitiful... of tender mercy—the former refers to the feeling the latter, to the act. His pity is shown in not laying on the patient endurer more trials than he is able to bear; His mercy, in His giving a happy "end" to the trials. [BENGL.] 12. But above all—as swearing is utterly alien to the Christian meek—"endurance" just recommended. swear not—through impatience, which trials may tempt you (v. 10, 11). In contrast this stands the proper use of the tongue, v. 12. St. James here refers to Matthew, 5, 24, &c. Let your yea be yea—do not use oaths in your every day conversation, but let a simple affirmative or denial be deemed enough to establish your word. condemnation—Hil., judgment, viz. of "the Judge" who "standeth before the doors" (v. 9). 13. afflicted—referring to the "suffering affliction" (v. 10). let him pray—not "swear" in rash impetuosity. merry—Joyous in mind. sing psalms—of praise. St. Paul and Silas sang psalms even in affliction. 14. let him call for the elders—not some one of the elders, as Roman Catholics interpret it, to justify their usage in extreme unction. The prayers of the elders over the sick would be much the same as though the whole church which they represent should pray. [BERGEL.] anointing him with oil—the usage which Christ committed to His apostles was afterwards continued with laying on of hands, as a token of the highest faculty of medicine in the church, just as we find in 1 Corinthians, 6, 2, the church's highest judicial function. Now that the miraculous gift of healing has been withdrawn for the most part, to use the sign where the reality is wanting would be unmeaning superstition. Of other apostolic usages now discontinued rightly, 1 Corinthians, 11, 4-15; 16, 20. "Let them use oil who can by their prayers obtain recovery for the sick; let those who cannot do this, abstain from using the empty sign." [WHITTAKER.] Romish extreme unction is administered to those whose lives is despised of, to heal the soul, whereas St. James' unction was to heal the body. Cardinal Cajetan (Commentary) admits that St. James cannot refer to extreme unction. Oil in the East, and especially among the Jews (see the Talmud, Jerusalem and Babylon), was much used as a curative agent. It was also a sign of the Divine grace. Hence it was an appropriate sign in performing miraculous cures, in the name of the Lord—by whom alone the miracle was performed: men were but the instruments. 15. prayer—He does not say the oil shall save: it is but the symbol. save—plainly not as Rome says, "save" the soul, but heal "the sick": as the words, "the Lord shall raise him up," prove. So the same Greek is translated, "made (thee) whole," Matthew, 9, 21, 22, and if...sins—for not all who are sick, are so because of some special sins. Here a case is supposed of one visited with sickness for special sins, have committed—lit., be in a state of having committed sins, i.e., be under the consequences of sins committed. they—rather, it: his having committed sins shall be forgiven him. The connexion of sin and sickness is implied in Isaiah, 33, 24; Matthew, 9, 2-5; John, 5, 14. The absolution of the sick, retained in the Church of England, refers to the sins which the sick man confesses (v. 10) and repents of, whereby outward scandal has been given to the church and the cause of religion; not to sins in their relation to God, the only Judge. 16. The oldest authorities read, "Confess, THEY FORGIVE," &c. Not only in the particular case of sickness, but universally confess. faults—your falls and offences, in relation to one another. The word is not the same as sins. Matthew, 5, 23, 24; Luke, 17, 4, illustrate the precept here. one to another—not to the priest, as Rome insists. The Church of England recommends in certain cases. Rome compels confession in all cases. Confession is desirable in the case of (1.) wrong done to a neighbour; (2.) when under a troubled conscience we ask counsel of a godly minister or friend, as to how we may obtain God's forgiveness and strength to sin no more, or when we desire their intercessory prayers for us: "Pray one for another"; "Confession may be made to any one who can pray" [BERGEL.]; (3.) open confession of sin before the church and the world, in token of penitence. Not auricular confession, that ye may be healed—of your bodily sicknesses. Also that, if your sickness be the punishment of sin, the latter being forgiven on intercessory prayer, "ye may be healed" of the former. Also, that ye may be healed spiritually. effectual—intense and fervent, not "wavering" (ch. 1, 6). [BERGEL.] "When energized" by the Spirit, as those were who performed miracles. [HAMMOND.] This suits the collocation of the Greek words and the sense well. A righteous man's prayer is always heard generally, but his particular request for the healing of another was then likely to be granted when he was one possessing a special charism of the Spirit. ALFORD translates, "Availeth much in its working." The "righteous" is one himself careful to avoid "faults," and showing his faith by works (ch. 2, 24). 17. Elias—like passions as we—therefore it cannot be said that he was so raised above us as to afford no example applicable to common mortals like ourselves. prayed earnestly—lit., prayed with prayer: Hebraism for prayed intensely. Cf. Luke, 22, 15, "With desire I have desired," i.e., earnestly desired. ALFORD is wrong in saying, Elias' prayer that it might not rain "is not even hinted at in the Old Testament history." In 1 Kings, 17, 1, it is plainly implied, "As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word." His prophecy of the fact was according to a divine intimation given to him in answer to prayer. In jealousy for God's honour (1 Kings, 19, 10), and being of one mind with God in his abhorrence of apostasy, he prayed that the national idolatry should be punished with a national judgment, drought; and on Israel's profession of repentance he prayed for the removal of the visitation, as is implied in 1 Kings, 18, 20-42; cf. Luke, 4, 25, three years, &c.—Cf. 1 Kings, 18, 1, "The third year," viz., from Elijah's going to Zarephath; as prophecy (v. 1) was probably about five or six months previously. 18. prayed... and—i.e., and so. Mark the connexion between the prayer and its accomplishment, her fruit—her usual and due fruit, heretofore withheld on account of sin. Three and a half years is the time also that the two witnesses prophecy who "have power to shut and open heaven that it rain not." 19. The blessing of reclaiming an erring sinner by the mutual counsel and intercessory prayer just recommended. do err—more lit., "be led astray," the truth—the gospel doctrine and precepts. one—lit., any; as "any" before. Every one ought to seek the salvation of every one. [BERGEL.] 20. Let him [the converted] know—for his comfort, and the encouragement of others to do likewise, shall save—Future. The salvation of the one so converted shall be manifested hereafter, shall hide a multitude of sins—not his own but the sins of the converted. The Greek verb in the middle voice requires this. Proverbs, 10, 12, refers to charity "covering" the sins of others before men; St. James to one's effecting by the conversion of another that that other's sins be covered before God, viz., with Christ's atonement. He effects this by making the convert partaker in the Christian covenant for the remission of all sins. Though this hiding of sins was included in the previous "shall save," St. James expresses it to mark in detail the greatness of the blessing conferred on the penitent through the convert's instrumentality, and to incite others to the same good deed.

INTRODUCTION.

ITS GENUINENESS is attested by 2 Peter, 3. 1: on the authority of 2 Peter, see the Introduction. Also by Polycarp (in Eusebius, 4. 14), who, in writing to the Philippians, quotes many passages: in ch. 2 he quotes 1 Peter, 1. 13, 21, and 3. 9; in ch. 5, 1 Peter, 2. 11. Eusebius says of Papias, Ecclesiastical History, 3. 39, that he, too, quotes Peter's first epistle. Irenæus (Hæreses 4. 9. 5) expressly mentions it; and in 4. 16. 5, 1 Peter, 2. 16. Clement of Alexandria, Stromata, 1. 3, p. 544, quotes 1 Peter, 2. 11, 12, 15, 16; and p. 593, 1 Peter, 1. 21, 22; and 4, p. 581, 1 Peter, 3. 14-17; and p. 585, 1 Peter, 4. 12-14. Origen, in Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 6. 25, mentions this epistle; in Homily 7, on Joshua, vol. ii., p. 63, he mentions both epistles; and Comment on Psalm 3., and on John, he mentions 1 Peter, 3. 15-17. Tertullian, Scorp., c. 12, quotes expressly 1 Peter, 2. 20, 21; and ch. 14., 1 Peter, 2. 15, 17. Eusebius states it as the opinion of those before him, that this was among the universally acknowledged epistles. The Peshito Syriac Version contains it. The fragment of the canon called Muratorji's, omits it. Excepting this and the Pauline heretics who rejected it, all ancient testimony is on its side. The internal evidence is equally strong. The author calls himself the apostle Peter, ch. 1. 1, and "a witness of Christ's sufferings," and an "elder;" ch. 5. 1. The energy of the style harmonizes with the warmth of Peter's character; and, as Erasmus says, this epistle is full of apostolical dignity and authority, and is worthy of the leader among the apostles.

PETER'S PERSONAL HISTORY.—Simon or Simeon, was a native of Bethsaida on the sea of Galilee, son of Jonas or John. With his father and his brother Andrew, he carried on trade as a fisherman at Capernaum, his subsequent place of abode. He was a married man, and tradition represents his wife's name as Concordia or Perpetua. Clemens Alex., says that she suffered martyrdom, her husband encouraging her to be faithful unto death, "Remember, dear, our Lord." His wife's mother was restored from a fever by Christ. He was brought to Jesus by his brother Andrew, who had been a disciple of John the Baptist, but was pointed to the Saviour as "the Lamb of God" by his master. Jesus, on first beholding him, gave him the name by which chiefly he is known, indicative of his subsequent character and work in the church, "Peter" (Greek) or "Cephas" (Aramaic), a stone. He did not join our Lord finally until a subsequent period. The leading incidents in his apostolic life are well known: his walking on the troubled waters to meet Jesus, but sinking through doubting; his bold and clear acknowledgment of the Divine person and office of Jesus, notwithstanding the difficulties in the way of such belief, whence he was then also designated as the stone, or rock; but his rebuke of his Lord when announcing what was so unpalatable to carnal prejudices, Christ's coming passion and death; his passing from one extreme to the opposite, in reference to Christ's offer to wash his feet; his self-confident assertion that he would never forsake his Lord, whatever others might do, followed by his base denial of Christ thrice with curses; his deep penitence; Christ's full forgiveness and prophecy of his faithfulness unto death, after he had received from him a profession of "love" as often repeated as his previous denial. These incidents illustrate his character as zealous, pious, and ardently attached to the Lord, but at the same time impulsive in feeling, rather than calmly and continuously steadfast. Prompt in action, and ready to avow his convictions boldly, he was hasty in judgment, precipitate, and too self-confident in the assertion of his own steadfastness; the result was that, though he abounded in animal courage, his moral courage was too easily overcome by fear of man's opinion. A wonderful change was wrought in him by his restoration after his fall, through the grace of his risen Lord. His zeal and ardour became sanctified, being chastened by a spirit of unaffected humility. His love to the Lord was, if possible, increased, whilst his mode of manifesting it now was in doing and suffering for His name, rather than in loud protestations. Thus, when imprisoned and tried before the Sanhedrin, for preaching Christ, he boldly avowed his determination to continue to do so. He is well called "the mouth of the apostles." His faithfulness led to his apprehension by Herod Agrippa, with a view to his execution, from which, however, he was delivered by the angel of the Lord.

After the ascension he took the lead in the church; and on the descent of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost, he exercised the designed power of "the keys" of Christ's kingdom, by opening the door of the church, in preaching, for the admission of thousands of Israelites; and still more so in opening (in obedience to a special revelation) an entrance to the "desert" (i. e., Jewish proselyte from heathendom) Gentiles, Cornelius: the forerunner of the harvest gathered in from idolatrous Gentiles at Antioch. This explains in what sense Christ used as to him the words, "Upon this rock I will build my church," &c., on his preaching of Christ, the true "Rock," by connexion with whom only he was given the designation: a title shared in common on the same grounds by the rest of the apostles, as the first founders of the church on Christ, "the chief corner stone." A name is often given in Hebrew, not that the person is actually the thing itself, but has some special relation to it, as Elijah means Mighty Jehovah: so Simon is called Peter "the rock," not that he is so sure by connexion with Jesus, the only true Rock (Isaiah, 28. 16; 1 Corinthians, 3. 11.) As subsequently he identified himself with "Satan," and is therefore called so, in the same way, by his clear confession of Christ, the Rock, he became identified with Him, and is accordingly so called. It is certain that there is no instance on record of Peter's having ever claimed or exercised supremacy; on the contrary, he is represented as sent by the apostles at Jerusalem to confirm the Samaritans baptized by Philip the deacon: again at the council of Jerusalem, not he, but James the president, or leading bishop in the church of that city, pronounced the authoritative decision: Acts, 15. 19, "My sentence is," &c. A kind of primacy, doubtless (though certainly not supremacy), was given him on the ground of his age, and prominent earnestness, and boldness in taking the lead on many important occasions. Hence he is called "first" in enumerating the apostles. Hence, too, arise the phrases, "Peter and the eleven," "Peter and the rest of the apostles;" and Paul, in going up to Jerusalem after his conversion, went to see Peter in particular.

Once only he again betrayed the same spirit of vacillation through fear of man's reproach, which had caused his denial of his Lord. Though at the Jerusalem council he advocated the exemption of Gentile converts from the ceremonial observances of the law, yet he, after having associated in closest intercourse with the Gentiles at Antioch, withdrew from them, through dread of the prejudices of his Jewish brethren who came from James, and timidly dissembled his conviction of the religious equality of Jew and Gentile; for this, Paul openly withstood and rebuked him: a plain refutation of his alleged supremacy and infallibility (except where specially inspired, as in writing his epistles). In all other cases he showed himself to be, indeed, as Paul calls him, "a pillar." Subsequently we find him in "Babylon," whence he wrote this first epistle to the Israelite believers of the dispersion, and the Gentile Christians united in Christ, in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia.

Teresa, de Scripturis Ecclesiasticis 1, states that "Peter, after having been bishop of Antioch, and after having persuaded the believers of the circumcission in Pontus, &c. (plainly inferred from ch. 1. 1), in the second year of Claudius, went to Rome to refute Simon Magus, and for twenty-five years there held the episcopal chair, down to the last year of Nero, i.e., the 14th, by whom he was crucified with his head downwards, declaring himself unworthy to be crucified as his Lord, and was buried in the Vatican, near the triumphal way." Eusebius, Chron. Ann. 2, also asserts his episcopate at Antioch; his assertion that Peter founded that church, contradicts Acts 11. 19-22. His journey to Rome to oppose Simon Magus, across from Justin's story of the statue found at Rome (really the statue of the Sabine god, Semo Sancus, or Hercules, mistaken as if Simon Magus were worshipped by that name, "Simoni Deo Sancto": found in the Tiber in 1674, or on an island in the Tiber in 1682), combined with the account, Acts, 2. 9-34. The twenty-five years' bishopric is chronologically impossible, as it would make Peter, at the interview with Paul at Antioch, to have been then for some years bishop of Rome! His crucifixion is certain from Christ's prophecy, John, 21. 18, 19. Dionysius of Corinth (in Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 2. 26) asserted in an epistle to the Romans, that Paul and Peter planted both the Roman and Corinthian churches, and endured martyrdom in Italy at the same time. So Tertullian, contra Marcion, 4. 8, and prescriptis Hereticorum, c. 22. 23. Also Cains, the Presbyter of Rome, in Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 2. 23, asserts that some memorials of their martyrdom were to be seen at Rome on the road to Ostia. So Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 2. 23, and Demostriatic Evangelion, 2. 116. So Lactantius de mortibus Persecutorum, c. 2. Many of the details are palpably false; whether the whole be so or not is dubious, considering the tendency to concentrate at Rome events of interest. [A]lford! What is certain is, that Peter was not there before the writing of the epistle to the Romans (68 A.D.), otherwise he must have been mentioned in it; nor during Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, otherwise he would have been mentioned in some one of Paul's many other epistles written from Rome; nor during Paul's second imprisonment, at least when he was writing the second epistle to Timothy, just before his martyrdom. He may have gone to Rome after Paul's death, and, as common tradition represents, been imprisoned in the Mamertine dungeons, and crucified on the Janiculum, on the eminence of St. Pietro in Montorio, and his remains deposited under the great altar in the centre of the famous basilica of St. Peter. Ambrose, Ep. 23, Ed. Paris, 1836, p. 1023, relates that St. Peter, not long before his death, being overcome by the sollicitations of his fellow-Christians to save himself, was flying from Rome when he was met by our Lord, and on asking, "Lord, whither goest thou?" received the answer, "I go to be crucified afresh." On this he returned and joyfully went to martyrdom. The church called "Domine quo vadis," on the Appian way, commemorates the legend. It is not unlikely that the whole tradition is built on the connection which existed between Paul and Peter. As Paul, "the apostle of the uncircumcision," wrote epistles to Galatia, Ephesus, and Colosse, and to Philemon at Colosse, making the Gentile Christians the persons prominently addressed, and the Jewish Christians subordinately so; so, vice versa, Peter, "the apostle of the circumcission," addressed the same churches, the Jewish Christians in them primarily, and the Gentile Christians also secondarily.

TO WHOM HE ADDRESSES THIS EPISTLE. — The heading, ch. 1. 1, "to the elect strangers (spiritually pilgrims) of the dispersion" (Greek), clearly marks the Christians of the Jewish dispersion as prominently addressed, but still including also Gentile Christians as grafted into the Christian Jewish stock by adoption and faith, and so being part of the true Israel; ch. 1. 14; 2. 9, 10; 3. 6; and 4. 2, clearly prove this. Thus he, the apostle of the circumcission, sought to unite in one Christ Jew and Gentile, promoting thereby the same work and doctrine as Paul the apostle of the uncircumcision. The provinces are named by Peter in the heading in the order proceeding from North East to South and West. Pontus was the country of the Christian Jew Aquila. To Galatia Paul paid two visits, founding and confirming churches. Onesimus, his companion, went there about the time of Paul's last imprisonment, just before his martyrdom. Ancona was subsequently its ecclesiastical metropolis. Men of Cappadocia, as well as of "Pontus" and "Asia," were among the hearers of Peter's effective sermon on the Pentecost whereon the Spirit descended on the church; these probably brought home to their native land the first tidings of the gospel. Proconular "Asia" included Mysia, Lydia, Caria, Phrygia, Pisidia, and Lyconia. In Lyconia were the churches of Iconium, founded by Paul and Barnabas; of Lystra, Timothy's birth-place, where Paul was stoned at the instigation of the Jews; and of Derbe, the birth-place of Galus, or Calus. In Pisidia was Antioch, where Paul was the instrument of converting many, but was driven out by the Jews. In Caria was Miletus, containing doubtless a Christian church. In Phrygia Paul preached both times when visiting Galatia in its neighbourhood, and in it were the churches of Laodicea, Hierapolis, and Colosse, of which last church Philemon and Onesimus were members, and Archippus and Ephraim leaders. In Lydia was the Philadelphian church favourably noticed, Revelation, 1. 7, &c.; that of Sardis the capital and of Thyatira, and of Ephesus, founded by Paul, and a scene of the labours of Aquila and Priscilla and Apollon, and subsequently of more than two whole years' labour of Paul again, and subsequently censured as falling from its first love in Revelation, 2. 4. Smyrna of Ionia was in the same quarter, and as one of the seven churches receives unqualified praise. In Mysia was Pergamos. Troas, too, is known as the scene of Paul's preaching and aiding Eutychus to life, and of his subsequently staying for a time with Carpus. Of "Bithynia," no church is expressly named in Scripture elsewhere. When Paul at an earlier period "assayed to go into Bithynia," the Spirit suffered him not, but afterwards we infer from ch. 1. 1, the Spirit did impart the gospel to that country, possibly by Peter's ministry. In ornament, these several churches, it appears from this epistle (ch. 5. 1, 2, "feed," &c.), were much in the same state as when Paul addressed the Ephesian "elders" at Miletus (Acts, 20. 17, 26, "feed") in very similar language: elders or presbyter-bishops ruled, whilst the apostle exercised the general superintendence. They were exposed to persecutions, though apparently not systematic, but rather annoyances and reproach arising from their not joining their heathen neighbours in riotous living, into which however some of them were in danger of falling. The evils which existed among themselves, and which are therefore reprov'd, were ambition and inere-seeking on the part of the presbyters (ch. 5. 2, 3), evil thoughts and words among the members in general, and a want of sympathy and generosity towards one another.

HIS OBJECT seems to be, by the prospect of their heavenly portion, and by Christ's example, to afford consolation to the persecuted, and prepare them for a greater approaching ordeal, and to exhort all, husbands, wives, servants, presbyters, and people, to a due discharge of relative duties, so as to give no handle to the enemy to reproach Christianity, but rather to win them to it, and so to establish them in "the true grace of God wherein they stand" (ch. 5. 10). See, however, note there, on the oldest reading. Alford rightly argues, that "exhorting and testifying" there, refer to Peter's shortness throughout the epistle grounded on testimony which he bears to the gospel truth already well known to his readers by the teaching of Paul in those churches. They were already introduced into (so the Greek, ch. 5. 10) this grace of God as their safe standing ground. Cf. 1 Corinthians, 15. 1, "I declare unto you (so the epistle) which ye stand." Therefore he says not, in this epistle, but forth a complete statement of this gospel doctrine of grace but falls back on it as already known. Cf. ch. 1. 8, 18, "Ye know;" 2. 1; 3 Peter, 2. 1. Not that Peter scribbles the style and mode of teaching of Paul, but as an independent witness in his own style, attests the same truth. We may divide the epistle into (I) The inscription (ch. 1, 1, 2). (II) The stirring up of a pure feeling in believers as born again of God. By the motive of hope to which God has regenerated us (s. 3-15); bringing forth the fruit of faith, considering the costly price paid for our redemption from sin (s. 16-21). Being purified by the Spirit unto love of the brethren as begotten of God's eternal word, as spiritual priest-kings, to whom alone Christ is precious (s. 22, ch. 2, 10); after Christ's example in suffering, maintaining a good conversation in every relation (s. 10, ch. 2, 15), and a good profession of faith as having in view Christ's once offered sacrifice, and His future coming to judgment (s. 13, ch. 4, 13); and exhibiting patience in adversity, as looking for future glorification with Christ, (I.) in general as Christians, s. 12-19; (2.) each in his own sphere, ch. 5, 1-11. "The title 'Beloved' marks the separation of the second part from the first, ch. 2, 11; and of the third part from the second," ch. 4, 12. [Ezra.] (III) The conclusion.

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.—It was plainly before the open and systematic persecution of the later years of Nero had begun. That this epistle was written after Paul's epistles, even those written during his imprisonment at Rome ending in A.D. 63, appears from the acquaintance which Peter in this epistle shows he has with them. Cf. ch. 2, 13, with 1 Timothy, 2, 2-4; 2, 18, with Ephesians, 4, 5; 1, 2, with Ephesians, 1, 4-7; 1, 3, with Ephesians, 1, 3; 1, 14, with Romans, 12, 2; 2, 6-10, with Romans, 9, 23, 29; 2, 13, with Romans, 12, 1-4; 2, 16, with Galatians, 2, 19; 2, 18, with Ephesians, 6, 2; 3, 1, with Ephesians, 5, 22; 3, 2, with Romans, 12, 17; 4, 9, with Philippians, 2, 14, and Romans, 12, 13, and Hebrews, 12, 2; 4, 10, with Romans, 12, 6-8; 5, 1, with Romans, 8, 18; 5, 2, with Ephesians, 5, 21; Philippians, 2, 3, 5-6; 5, 8, with 1 Thessalonians, 5, 6; 5, 14, with 1 Corinthians, 16, 20. Moreover, in ch. 5, 13, Mark is mentioned as with Peter in Babylon. This must have been after Colossians, 4, 10 [A.D. 61-63], when Mark was with Paul at Rome, but intending to go to Asia Minor. Again, in 2 Timothy, 4, 11 [A.D. 67 or 68], Mark was in or near Ephesus, in Asia Minor, and Timothy is told to bring him to Rome. So that it is likely it was after this, viz., after Paul's martyrdom that Mark joined Peter, and consequently, that this epistle was written. It is not likely that Peter would have intruded on Paul's field of labour, the churches of Asia Minor, during Paul's lifetime. The death of the apostle of the circumcision, and the consequent need of some one to follow up his teachings, probably gave occasion to the testimony given by Peter to the same churches, collectively addressed, in behalf of the same truth. The relation in which the Pauline Gentile churches stood towards the apostles at Jerusalem favours this view. Even the Gentile Christians would naturally look to the spiritual fathers of the church at Jerusalem, the centre whence the gospel had emanated to them, for counsel wherewith to meet the pretensions of Judaizing Christians and heretics; and Peter, always prominent among the apostles in Jerusalem, would even when elsewhere feel a deep interest in them, especially when they were by death bereft of Paul's guidance. Birks, Horn Evangelist, suggests that false teachers may have appealed from Paul's doctrine to that of James and Peter. Peter then would naturally write to confirm the doctrines of grace and tacitly show there was no difference between his teaching and Paul's. Birks prefers dating the epistle A.D. 58, after Paul's second visit to Galatia, when Silvanus was with him, and so could not have been with Peter (A.D. 51), and before his imprisonment at Rome, when Mark was with him, and so could not have been with Peter (A.D. 63); perhaps when Paul was detained at Caesarea, and so debarred from personal intercourse with those churches. I prefer the view previously stated. This sets aside the tradition that Paul and Peter suffered martyrdom together at Rome. Origen and Eusebius' statement that Peter visited the churches of Asia in person seems very probable.

THE PLACE OF WRITING was doubtless Babylon on the Euphrates (ch. 5, 13). It is most improbable that in the midst of writing matter-of-fact communications and salutations in a remarkably plain epistle, the symbolical language of prophecy (viz., "Babylon" for Rome) should be used. Josephus, Antiquities 15, 2, 2; 3, 1, states that there was a great multitude of Jews in the Chaldean Babylon; it is therefore likely that "the apostle of the circumcision" would at some time or other visit them. Some have maintained that the Babylon meant was in Egypt, for that Mark preached in and around Alexandria after Peter's death, and therefore it is likely he did so along with that apostle in the same region periodically. But no mention elsewhere in Scripture is made of this Egyptian Babylon, but only of the Chaldean one. And though towards the close of Caligula's reign a persecution drove the Jews thence to Seleucia, and a plague five years after still further thinned their numbers, yet this does not preclude their return and multiplication during the twenty years that elapsed between the plague and the writing of the epistle. Moreover, the order in which the countries are enumerated, from North East to South and West, is such as would be adopted by one writing from the Oriental Babylon on the Euphrates, not from Egypt or Rome. Indeed, Cosmas Indicopleustes in the sixth century, understood the Babylon meant to be outside the Roman empire. Silvanus, Paul's companion, became subsequently Peter's, and was the carrier of the epistle.

STYLE.—Fervour and practical truth, rather than logical reasoning, are the characteristics of this epistle as they were of its energetic warm-hearted writer. His familiarity with Paul's epistles shown in the language accords with what we should expect from the fact of Paul's having "communicated the gospel which he preached among the Gentiles" (as revealed specially to him) to Peter among others "of reputation." Individualities occur, such as baptism, "the answer of a good conscience toward God" (ch. 3, 21); "consciousness of God" (Greek) ch. 2, 19, as a motive for enduring sufferings; "living hope" (ch. 1, 3); "an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away" (ch. 1, 4); "king of charity" (ch. 5, 14). Christ is viewed less in relation to His past sufferings than as at present exalted and hereafter to be manifested in all His majesty. Glory and Hope are prominent features in this epistle (ch. 1, 8), so much so that Wade entitles him "the apostle of hope." The realization of future bliss as near causes him to regard believers as but "strangers" and "sojourners" here. Chastened fervour, deep humility, and ardent love appear, just as we should expect from one who had been so graciously restored after his grievous fall. "Being converted" he truly does "strengthen his brethren." His fervour shows itself in often repeating the same thought in similar words.

In some passages he shows familiarity with the epistle of James, the apostle of especial weight with the Jewish legalizing party, whose inspiration he thus confirms (cf. ch. 1, 6, 7, with James, 1, 9, 3; 1, 24, with James, 1, 16, 24; with James, 1, 21; 4, 8, with James, 4, 5, both quoting Proverbs, 10, 12; 5, 5, with James, 4, 6, both quoting Proverbs, 5, 10. In most of these cases Old Testament quotations are the common ground of both. "Strong susceptibility to external impressions, liveliness of feeling, dexterity in handling subjects, dispoise natures like that of Peter to repeat aloud his thoughts of others." [Steiger.]

The diction of this epistle and of his speeches in Acts is very similar; an undesigned coincidence, and so a mark of genuineness (cf. ch. 2, 7, with Acts, 4, 11; 1, 13, with Acts, 5, 32; 2, 24, with Acts, 5, 30; 10, 39; 5, 1, with Acts, 2, 28; 4, 10, 2, 10, with Acts, 2, 18; 10, 43; 1, 21, with Acts, 2, 15; 10, 40; 4, 5, with Acts, 10, 42; 2, 24, with Acts, 2, 19, 26).

There is, too, a recurrence to the language of the Lord at the last interview after His resurrection, recorded in John 21.

OE "the Shepherd . . . of . . . souls," ch. 2: 25; "Feed the flock of God," "the chief Shepherd," ch. 2: 2, 4, with John, 21: 15-17; "Feed my sheep . . . lambs;" also "Whom . . . ye love," ch. 1: 8; 2: 7, with John, 21: 15-17; "Lovest thou me?" and 2 Peter, 1: 14, with John, 21: 15, 16. Wuestner well says, "He who in loving impatience set himself into the sea to meet the Lord. It also the man who most earnestly testifies to the hope of his return; he who dated his own faith from the sufferings of his Master; is never weary in holding up the suffering form of the Lord before his readers to comfort and stimulate them; he before whom the death of a martyr is in assured expectation, is the man who, in the greatest variety of aspects, sets forth the duty, as well as the consolation, of suffering for Christ; as a rock of the church he grounds his readers against the storm of present tribulation on the true Rock of ages."

CHAPTER. I.

Ver. 1-25. ADDRESS TO THE ELECTED OF THE GOD-HEAD: THANKSGIVING FOR THE LIVING HOPE TO WHICH WE ARE BEGOTTEN, PRODUCING JOY AMIDST SUFFERINGS: THIS SALVATION AN OBJECT OF DEEPEST INTEREST TO PROPHETS AND TO ANGELS: ITS COSTLY PRICE A MOTIVE TO HOLINESS AND LOVE, AS WE ARE BORN AGAIN OF THE EVER-ABIDING WORD OF GOD. 1. Peter—Greek form of Cephas, man of rock, an apostle of Jesus Christ—"He who preaches otherwise than as a messenger of Christ, is not to be heard; if he preach as such, then it is all one as if thou didst hear Christ speaking in thy presence." [LUTHER.] to the strangers scattered—i. e., "sojourners of the dispersion;" only in John, 7: 35 and James, 1: 1, in New Testament, and LXX., Psalm 147: 2, "the outcasts of Israel;" the designation peculiarly given to the Jews in their dispersed state throughout the world ever since the Babylonian captivity. These he, as the apostle of the circumcised, primarily addresses, but not in the limited temporal sense only; he regards their temporal condition as a shadow of their spiritual calling to be strangers and pilgrims on earth, looking for the heavenly Jerusalem as their home. So the Gentile Christians, as the spiritual Israel, are included secondarily, as having the same high calling. He (ch. 1: 14; 2: 10; 4: 3) plainly refers to Christian Gentiles (cf. v. 17; ch. 2: 11). Christians, if they rightly consider their calling, must never settle themselves here, but feel themselves travellers. As the Jews in their dispersion diffused through the nations the knowledge of the one God, preparatory to Christ's first advent, so Christians, by their dispersion among the unconverted, diffuse the knowledge of Christ, preparatory to His second advent. "The children of God scattered abroad" constitute one whole in Christ, who "gathers them together in one," now partially and in Spirit, hereafter perfectly and visibly. "Elect," in the Greek order, comes before "strangers;" elect, in relation to heaven, strangers, in relation to the earth. The election here is that of individuals to eternal life by the sovereign grace of God, as the sequel shows. "While each is certified of his own election by the Spirit, he receives no assurance concerning others, nor are we to be too inquisitive [John, 21: 21, 22]; Peter numbers them among the elect, as they carried the appearance of having been regenerated." [CALVIN.] He calls the whole church by the designation strictly belonging only to the better portion of them. [CALVIN.] The election to hearing, and that to eternal life, are distinct. Realization of our election is a strong motive to holiness. The minister invites all, yet does not hide the truth that in none but the elect will the preaching effect eternal blessing. As the chief fruit of exhortations, and even of threatenings, redounds to "the elect;" therefore, at the outset, Peter addresses them. STRANGERS translated, To "the elect pilgrims who form the dispersion in Pontus," &c. The order of the provinces is that in which they would be viewed by one writing from the East from Babylon (ch. 4: 13); from North East southwards to Galatia, South East to Cappadocia, then Asia, and back to Bithynia, West of Pontus. Contrast the order, Acts, 2: 9. He now was ministering to those same peoples as he preached to on Pentecost: "Parthians, Medes, Elamites, dwellers in

Mesopotamia and Judæa," i. e., the Jews now subject to the Parthians, whose capital was Babylon, where he laboured in person; "dwellers in Cappadocia, Pontus, Asia, Phrygia, Bithynia," the Asiatic dispersion derived from Babylon, whom he ministers to by letter. 2. foreknowledge—foreordaining love (v. 20) inseparable from God's foreknowledge, the origin from which, and pattern according to which election takes place. Acts, 2: 23, and Romans, 11: 2, prove "foreknowledge" to be foreordination. God's foreknowledge is not the perception of any ground of action out of himself; still, in it liberty is comprehended, and all absolute constraint departed. [ARNDT to STRONG.] For so the Son of God was "foreknown" (so the Greek for "foreordained," v. 20) to be the sacrificial Lamb, not against, or without His will, but His will rested in the will of the Father; this includes self-conscious action; nay, even cheerful acquiescence. The Hebrew and Greek "know" include approval and acknowledging as one's own. The Hebrew marks the oneness of loving and choosing, by having one word for both, Bacher (LXX., Greek, aisirhio). Peter descends from the eternal "election" of God through the new birth, to the believer's "sanctification" that from this he might again raise them through the consideration of their new birth to a "living hope" of the heavenly "inheritance." [HAEDROGER.] The Divine three are introduced in their respective functions in redemption, through—Greek, "in;" the element in which we are elected. The "election" of God realized and manifested itself "in" their sanctification. Believers are "sanctified through the offering of Christ once for all" (Hebrews, 10: 10). "Thou must believe and know that thou art holy; not, however, through thine own piety, but through the blood of Christ." [LUTHER.] This is the true sanctification of the Spirit, to obey the gospel, to trust in Christ. [BULLINGER.] sanctification—the Spirit's setting apart of the saint as consecrated to God. The execution of God's choice (Galatians, 1: 4). God the Father gives us salvation by gratuitous election; the Son earns it by His blood-shedding; the Holy Spirit applies the merits of the Son to the soul by the gospel word. [CALVIN.] Cf. Numbers, 6: 24-26, the Old Testament triple blessing, unto obediences—the result or end aimed at by God as respects us, the obedience which consists in faith, and that which flows from faith: "obeying the truth through the Spirit" (v. 22, Romans, 1: 5, "obedience to the faith," and obedience the fruit of faith, sprinkling, &c.—not in justification through the atonement once for all, which is expressed in the previous clauses, but (as the order proves) the daily being sprinkled by Christ's blood, and so cleansed from all sin, which is the privilege of one already justified and "walking in the light." Grace—the source of "peace," be multiplied—still further than already, Daniel, 4: 1, "Ye have now peace and grace, but still not in perfection; therefore, ye must go on increasing until the old Adam be dead." [LUTHER.] 3. He begins, like Paul, in opening his epistles with giving thanks to God for the greatness of the salvation; herein he looks forward (L) into the future (v. 3-9); (A) backward into the past (v. 10-12). [ALFORD.] Blessed—A distinct Greek word (eulogatos). "Blessed God" is used of God, from that used of max eulogoumenos, "Blessed is" Father—This whole epistle accords with the Lord's prayer: "Father," ch. 1, 3, 14, 17, 23; 2, 2; "Our," ch. 1, 4, end; "in heaven," ch. 1, 4; "Hallowed be thy name," ch. 1, 15, 16; 3, 15; "Thy kingdom come," ch. 2, 8; "Thy will be done," ch. 2, 15; 3, 17; 4, 2, 19; "daily bread," ch. 4, 7; "forgiveness of sins," ch. 4, 8, 11; "temptation," ch. 4, 12; "deliverance," ch. 4, 13 [BENSON: cf. ch. 3, 7 and 4, 7, for allusions to prayer. Bark, Hebrew "bless," is lit. to kneel. God, as the original source of blessing, must be blessed through all His works. abundant—Greek, "much," "full." That God's "mercy" should reach us, guilty and enemies, proves its fulness. "Mercy" met our misery; "grace," our guilt. begotten us again—of the Spirit by the word (v. 23); whereas we were children of wrath naturally, and dead in sins. unto—so that we have, living—Greek, "living." It has life in itself, gives life, and looks for life as its object. (DR WERTZ.) Living is a favorite expression of St. Peter (v. 23; ch. 2, 4, 8). He delights in contemplating life overcoming death in the believer. Faith and love follow hope (v. 8, 21, 22.) "(unto) a lively hope" is further explained by "(to) an inheritance incorruptible...fadeth not away," and "(unto) salvation...ready to be revealed in the last time." I prefer with BENSON and STRONG to join as in Greek, "unto a hope living (possessing life and vitality) through the resurrection of Jesus Christ." Faith, the subjective means of the spiritual resurrection of the soul, is wrought by the same power whereby Christ was raised from the dead. Baptism is an objective means (ch. 3, 21). Its moral fruit is a new life. The connexion of our sonship with the resurrection appears also in Luke, 20, 36; Acts, 13, 33. Christ's resurrection is the cause of ours, (1.) as an efficient cause (1 Corinthians, 15, 22; (2.) as an exemplary cause, all the saints being about to rise after the similitude of His resurrection. Our "hope" is, Christ rising from the dead hath ordained the power, and is become the pattern of the believer's resurrection. The soul, born again from its natural state into the life of grace, is after that, torn again unto the life of glory. Matthew, 19, 28. "The regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of His glory:" the resurrection of our bodies is a kind of coming out of the womb of the earth and entering upon immortality, a nativity into another life. (BISHOP PEARSON.) The four causes of our salvation are, (1.) the primary cause, God's mercy; (2.) the proximate cause, Christ's death and resurrection; (3.) the formal cause, our regeneration; (4.) the final cause, our eternal bliss. As John is the disciple of love, so Paul of faith, and Peter of hope. Hence, Peter, most of all the apostles, urges the resurrection of Christ: an undesigned coincidence between the history and the epistle, and so a proof of genuineness. Christ's resurrection the occasion of his own restoration by Christ after his fall. 4. To an inheritance—the object of our "hope" (v. 3), which is therefore not a dead, but a "living" hope. The inheritance is the believer's already by title, being actually assigned to him; the entrance on its possession is future, and hoped for as a certainty. Being "begotten again" as a "son," he is an "heir," as earthly fathers beget children who shall inherit their goods. The inheritance is "salvation" (v. 5, 9); "the grace to be brought at the revelation of Christ" (v. 13); "a crown of glory that fadeth not away," incorruptible—not having within the terms of death. Negations of the imperfections which meet us on every side here are the chief means of conveying to our minds a conception of the heavenly things which "have not entered into the heart of man," and which we have not faculties now capable of fully knowing. Peter, sanguine, impulsive, and highly susceptible of outward impressions, was the more likely to feel painfully the deep-seated corruption which, lurking under the outward splendour of the loveliest of earthly things, dooms them soon to rottenness and decay, unfaded—not stained as earthly goods by sin, either in the acquiring, or in the using of them; un-susceptible of any stain. "The rich man is either a dishonest man himself, or the heir of a dishonest man." (JANOWA.) Even Israel's inheritance was defiled by the people's sin. Defilement intrudes even on our holy things now, whereas God's service ought to be undefiled. that fadeth not away—Contrast v. 23. Even the most delicate part of the heavenly inheritance, its bloom, continues unfading. "In substance incorruptible; in purity unfaded; in beauty unfading." (ALPHEUS) reserved—kept up Colossians, 1, 5, "I laid up for you in heaven." 2 Timothy, 4, 8; Greek Perfect, expressing a fixed and abiding state, "which has been and is reserved." The inheritance is in security, beyond risk, out of the reach of Satan, though we for whom it is reserved are still in the midst of dangers. Still if we be believers, we too, as well as the inheritance, are "kept" (the same Greek, John, 17, 12) by Jesus safely (v. 5, 13) in heaven—Greek, "in the heavens," where it can neither be destroyed nor plundered. It does not follow that, because it is now laid up in heaven, it shall not hereafter be on earth also. for you—It is secure not only itself from all misfortune, but also from all alienation, so that no other can receive it in your stead. He had said us (v. 3), he now turns his address direct to the elect, in order to encourage and exhort them. 5. kept—Greek, "who are being guarded." He answers the objection, Of what use is it that salvation is "reserved" for us in heaven, as in a calm secure haven, when we are tossed in the world as on a troubled sea in the midst of a thousand wrecks? (CALVIN.) As the inheritance is "kept" (v. 4) safely for the far distant "heirs," so must they be "guarded" in their persons so as to be sure of reaching it. Neither shall it be wanting to them, nor they to it. "We are guarded in the world as our inheritance is kept in heaven." This defines the "you" of v. 4. The inheritance, remission, belongs only to those who "endure unto the end," being "guarded" by, or in "the power of God, through faith." Contrast Luke, 8, 15. God Himself is our self-guarding power. "It is His power which saves us from ourselves." (BENSON.) Jude, 1, "preserved in Christ Jesus;" Philippians, 1, 6; 4, 7, "keep," Greek, "guard," as here. This guarding is effected, on the part of God, by His "power," the efficient cause; on the part of man, "through faith," the effective means—Greek, "in." The believer lives spiritually in God and in virtue of His power, and God lives in him. "In" marks that the cause is inherent in the means, working organically through them with living influence, so that the means, in so far as the cause works organically through them, exist also in the cause. The power of God which guards the believer is no external force working upon him from without with mechanical necessity, but the spiritual power of God in which he lives, and with whose Spirit he is clothed. It comes down on, and then dwells in him, even as he is in it. (STRONG.) Let none flatter himself he is being guarded by the power of God unto salvation, if he be not walking by faith. Neither speculative knowledge and reason, nor works of seeming charity will avail severed from faith. It is through faith that salvation is both received and kept. unto salvation—the final end of the new birth. "Salvation," not merely accomplished for us in title by Christ, and made over to us on our believing, but actually manifested, and finally completed, ready to be revealed—When Christ shall be revealed, it shall be revealed. The preparations for it are being made now, and began when Christ came: "All things are now ready;" the salvation is already accomplished, and only waits to Lord's time to be manifested: He "is ready to judge," last time—the last day, closing the day of grace; the day of judgment, of redemption, of the restitution of all things, and of perdition of the ungodly. 6. Wherein—in which prospect of final salvation, greatly rejoice—"exult with joy": "are exuberantly glad." Salvation is realized by faith (v. 9) as a thing so actually present as to cause exulting joy in spite of existing afflictions, for a season—Greek, "for a little time." If need be—"if it be God's will that it should be so" [ALFORD], for not all believers are afflicted. One need not invite or lay a cross on himself, but only "take up" the cross which God imposes ("his cross"), 2 Timothy, 3, 12, is not to be pressed too far. Not every believer, nor every sinner, is tried with afflictions. [THROPHYLACT.] Some falsely think that notwithstanding our forgiveness in Christ, a kind of atonement, or expiation by suffering, is needed, ye are in heaviness—Greek, "ye were grieved." The "grieved" is regarded as past, the "exulting joy" present. Because the realized joy of the coming salvation makes the present grief seem as a thing of the past. At the first shock of affliction ye were grieved, but now by anticipation ye rejoice regarding the present grief as past, through—Greek, "in," the element in which the grief has place, manifold—many and of various kinds (ch. 4, 12, 13), temptations—"trials" testing your faith. 7. Aim of the "temptations," trial—testing, proving. That your faith so proved "may be found unshaken: once for all, as the result of its being proved on the judgment-day) unto (eventuating in) praise," &c., viz., the praise to be bestowed by the Judge, than that of gold—rather "than gold," though—"which perisheth, YET is tried with fire." If gold, though perishing (v. 19), is yet tried with fire in order to remove dross and test its genuineness, how much more does your faith, which shall never perish, need to pass through a fiery trial to remove whatever is defective, and to test its genuineness and full value? glory—"Honour" is not so strong as "glory." As "praise" is in words, so "honour" is in deeds: Honorary reward, appearing—Translate as in v. 13, "revelation." At Christ's revelation shall take place also the revelation of the sons of God [Romans, 8, 19, "manifestation," Greek, "revelation," 1 John, 3, 2, Greek, "manifested...manifested," for "appear...appear"]. 8. not having seen, ye love—though in other cases it is knowledge of the person that produces love to him. They are more "blessed that have not seen and yet have believed," than they who believed because they have seen. On Peter's own love to Jesus, cf. John, 21, 15-17. Though the apostles had seen Him, they now ceased to know Him merely after the flesh, in whom—connected with "believing": the result of which is "ye rejoice" (Greek, exult), now—in the present state, as contrasted with the future state when believers "shall see His face." unspeakable—(1 Corinthians, 2, 9.) full of glory—Greek, "glorified." A joy now already encompassed with glory. The "glory" is partly in present possession, through the presence of Christ, "the Lord of glory," in the soul; partly in assured anticipation. "The Christian's joy is bound up with love to Jesus: its ground is faith; it is not therefore either self-seeking nor self-sufficient." [BRUGGER.] 9. Receiving—in sure anticipation; "the end of your faith," i.e., its crowning consummation, finally-completed "salvation" (Peter here confirms Paul's teaching as to justification by faith); also receiving now the title to it and the first-fruits of it. In the next verse (v. 10) the "salvation" is represented as already present, whereas "the prophets" had it not as yet present. It must, therefore, in this verse, refer to the present: Deliverance now from a state of wrath: believers even now "receive salvation," though its full "revelation" is future, of...osis—The immortal soul was what was lost, so "salvation" primarily concerns the soul; the body shall share in redemption hereafter; the soul of the believer is saved already: an additional proof that "receiving...salvation" is here a thing present. 10. The magnitude of this "salvation" is proved by the earnestness with which "prophets" and even "angels" searched into it. Even from the beginning of the world this salvation has been testified to by the Holy Spirit, prophets—Though there is no Greek article, yet English Version is right, "the prophets" generally (including all the Old Testament inspired authors), as "the angels" similarly refer to them in general, enquired—perseveringly: so the Greek. Much more is manifested to us than by diligent enquiry and search the prophets attained. Still it is not said, they searched after it, but "concerning" (so the Greek for "of") it. They were already certain of the redemption being about to come. They did not like us fully see, but they desired to see the one and the same Christ whom we fully see in spirit. "As Simeon was anxiously desiring previously, and tranquil in peace only when he had seen Christ, so all the Old Testament saints saw Christ only hidden, and as it were absent—absent not in power and grace, but inasmuch as He was not yet manifested in the flesh." [CALVIN.] The prophets, as private individuals, had to reflect on the hidden and far reaching sense of their own prophecies; because their words, as prophets, in their public function, were not so much their own as the Spirit's, speaking by and in them: thus Caiaphas. A striking testimony to verbal inspiration: the words which the inspired authors wrote are God's words expressing the mind of the Spirit, which the writers themselves searched into, to fathom the deep and precious meaning, even as the believing readers did. "Searched" implies that they had determinate marks to go by in their search. the grace that should come unto you—viz., the grace of the New Testament: an earnest of "the grace" of perfected "salvation" "to be brought at the (second) revelation of Christ." Old Testament believers also possessed the grace of God; they were children of God, but it was as children in their bondage, so as to be like servants; whereas we enjoy the full privileges of adult sons. 11. what—Greek, "In reference to what, or what manner of time." What expresses the time absolutely: what was to be the era of Messiah's coming; "what manner of time": what events and features should characterise the time of His coming. The "or" implies that some of the prophets, if they could not as individuals discover the exact time, searched into its characteristic features and events. The Greek for "time" is the season, the epoch, the fit time in God's purposes. Spirit of Christ...in them—(Acts, 16, 7, in oldest MSS., "the Spirit of Jesus" Revelation, 19, 10.) So JUSTIN MARTYR says, "Jesus was He who appeared and communed with Moses, Abraham, and the other patriarchs." CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS calls Him "the Prophet of prophets, and Lord of all the prophetic spirit," did signify—"did give intimation," of—Greek, "the sufferings (appointed) unto Christ," or foretold in regard to Christ. "Christ" the anointed Mediator whose sufferings are the price of our "salvation" (v. 9, 10), and who is the channel of "the grace that should come unto you," the glory—Greek, "glories," viz., of His resurrection, of His ascension, of His judgment and coming kingdom, the necessary consequence of the sufferings, that should follow—Greek, "after these (sufferings)," ch. 3, 15-22; 5, 1. Since "the Spirit of Christ" is the Spirit of God, Christ is God. It is only because the Son of God was to become our Christ that He manifested Himself and the Father through Him in the Old Testament, and by the Holy Spirit eternally proceeding from the Father and Himself, spake in the prophets. 12. Not only was the future revealed to plies that we, Christians, may understand the production by the Spirit's aid in their most important part, etc., so far as they have been already fulfilled, with the Holy Ghost sent down—on Pentecost. The oldest MSS. omit the Greek proposition οὐκ ἐστὶν "in?" then translate, "by." The evangelists speaking by the Holy Spirit were infallible witnesses. "The Spirit of Christ" was in the prophets also (c. 11), but not manifestly, as in the case of the Christian church and its first preachers. "skrr down from heaven." How favoured are we in being ministered to, as to "salvation," by prophets and apostles alike, the latter now announcing the same things as actually fulfilled which the former foretold, which things—"the things now reported unto you" by the evangelistic preachers, "Christ's sufferings and the glory that should follow" (c. 11, 12), angels—still higher than "the prophets" (c. 10). Angels do not any more than ourselves possess an INTUITIVE knowledge of redemption. "To look into" in Greek is διεῖν, to bend over so as to look deeply into and see to the bottom of a thing. See note on the same word, James, 1. 25. As the cherubim stood bending over the mercy-seat, the emblem of redemption, in the holiest place, so the angels intently gaze upon and desire to fathom the depths of "the great mystery of godliness, God manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels." Their "ministry to the heirs of salvation" naturally disposes them to wish to penetrate this mystery as reflecting such glory on the love, justice, wisdom, and power of their God and Lord. They can know it only through its manifestation in the church, as they personally have not the direct share in it that we have. "Angels have only the contrast between good and evil, without the power of conversion from sin to righteousness: witnessing such conversion in the church they long to penetrate the knowledge of the means whereby it is brought about." [HOFMAN (vs ALFORD).] 13. Wherefore—Seeing that the prophets ministered unto you in these high gospel privileges which they did not themselves fully share in though "searching" into holy: the creature is holy in so far as it is sanctified by God. God, in giving the command, is willing to give also the power to obey it, viz., through the sanctifying of the Spirit (v. 17. if—i.e., "seeing that ye call on," for all the regenerate pray as children of God, "Our Father who art in heaven," the Father—rather, "Call upon as Father Him who without acceptance of persons (Acts, 10. 34; Romans, 2. 11; James, 2. 1, not accepting the Jew above the Gentile, 3 Chronicles, 19. 7; Luke, 20. 21; properly said of a judge not biased in judgment by respect of persons) judgeth," &c. The Father judgeth by His Son, His Representative, exercising His delegated authority (John, 5. 22). This marks the harmonious and complete unity of the Trinity. work—Each man's work is one complete whole, whether good or bad. The particular works of each are manifestations of the general character of his life-work, whether it was of faith and love whereby alone we can please God and escape condemnation. pass—Greek, "conduct yourselves during," sojourning—the outward state of the Jews in their dispersion is an emblem of the sojourner. His state of all believers in this world, away from our true Fatherland. fear—reverential, not slavish. He who is your Father, is also your Judge—a thought which may well inspire reverential fear. THEOPHYLACT observes, A double fear is mentioned in Scripture: (1.) elementary, causing one to become serious; (2.) perfective: the latter is here the motive by which Peter urges them as sons of God to be obedient. Fear is not here opposed to assurance, but to carnal security; fear producing vigilant caution lest we offend God and backslide. "Fear and hope flow from the same fountain: fear prevents us from falling away from hope." [BENCKE.] Though love has no fear in it, yet in our present state of imperfect love, it needs to have fear going ALONG WITH it as a subordinate principle. This fear drowns all other fears. The believer fears God and so has none else to fear. Not to fear God is the greatest baseness and folly. The martyrs' more than mere human courage flowed from this. 18. Another motive to reverential vigilant fear (v. 17) of displeasing God, the consideration of the costly price of our redemption from sin. Observe, it is we who are bought by the blood of Christ, not heaven. The blood of Christ is not in Scripture said to buy heaven for us; heaven is the "inheritance" (v. 4. given to us as sons, by the promise of God. corruptible—Cf. v. 7, "gold that perisheth," 23. silver and gold—Greek, "or." Cf. Peter's own words, Acts, 3. 6: an undesigned coincidence. redeemed—Gold and silver being liable to corruption themselves can free no one from spiritual and bodily death; they are therefore of too little value. Contrast v. 18, Christ's "precious blood." The Israelites were ransomed with half a shekel each, which went towards purchasing the lamb for the daily sacrifice (Exodus, 30. 12-18; cf. Numbers, 3. 44-46). But the Lamb who redeems the spiritual Israelites does so "without money or price." Devoted by sin to the justice of God, the church of the firstborn is redeemed from sin and the curse with Christ's precious blood (Matthew, 20. 28; 1 Timothy, 2. 6; Titus, 2. 14; Revelation, 5. 9). In all these passages there is the idea of substitution, the giving of one for another by way of ransom or equivalent. Man is "sold under sin" as a slave; shut up under condemnation and the curse. The ransom was, therefore, paid to the righteously-incensed Judge, and was accepted as a vicarious satisfaction for our sin by God, inasmuch as it was His own love as well as righteousness which appointed it. An Israelite sold as a bond-servant for debt might be redeemed by one of his brethren. As therefore, we could not redeem ourselves, Christ assumed our nature in order to become our nearest of kin and brother, and so our Goal or Redeemer. Holiness is the natural fruit of redemption "from our vain conversation;" for He by whom we are redeemed is also He for whom we are redeemed. "Without the righteous abolition of the curse, either there could be found no deliverance, or, what is impossible, the grace and righteousness of God must have come in collision" [STRONGS]; but now, Christ having borne the curse of our sin, frees from it those who are made God's children by His Spirit. "vain—self-deceiving, unreal, and unprofitable: promising good which it does not perform. Cf. as to the Gentiles, Acts, 14. 15; Romans, 1. 21; Ephesians, 4. 17; as to human philosophers, 1 Corinthians, 3. 20; as to the disobedient Jews, Jeremiah, 4. 14. conversation—course of life. To know what our sin is we must know what it cost. received by tradition from your fathers—The Jews' traditions. "Human piety is a vain blasphemy, and the greatest sin that a man can commit" [LUTHER]. There is only one Father to be imitated, v. 17; cf. Matthew, 23. 9, the same antithesis. [BENCKE.] 19. precious—of inestimable value. The Greek order is, "With precious blood, as of a lamb without blemish (in itself); and without spot (contracted by contact with others), [even the blood] of Christ." Though very man, He remained pure in Himself ("without blemish"), and uninfected by any impression of sin from without ("without spot"), which would have unfitted Him for being our atoning Redeemer: so the passover-lamb, and every sacrificial victim; so too, the church, the Bride, by her union with Him. As Israel's redemption from Egypt required the blood of the Paschal Lamb, so our redemption from sin and the curse required the blood of Christ: "foreordained" (v. 20) from eternity, as the passover-lamb was taken up on the tenth day of the month. 20. God's eternal foreordination of Christ's redeeming sacrifice, and completion of it in these last times for us, are an additional obligation on us to our maintaining a holy walk, considering how great things have been thus done for us. Peter's language in the history corresponds with this here: an undesigned coincidence and mark of genuineness. Redemption was no afterthought, or remedy of an unforeseen evil, devised at the time of its arising. God's foreordaining of the Redeemer refutes the slander that, on the Christian theory, there is a period of 4000 years of nothing but an incensed God. God chose us in Christ before the foundation of the world. manifest—in His incarnation in the fulness of the time. He existed from eternity before He was manifested. in these last times—1 Corinthians, 10. 11, "the ends of the world." This last dispensation, made up of "times" marked by great changes, but still retaining a general unity, stretches from Christ's ascension to His coming to judgment. 21. by him—Cf. "the faith which is by Him," Acts, 3. 16. Through Christ; His Spirit, obtained for us in His resurrection and ascension, enabling us to believe. This verse excludes all who do not "by Him believe in God," and includes all of every age and clime that do. Lit., "are believers in God." To believe in (Greek eis) God expresses an internal trust: "by believing to love God, going INTO Him, and cleaving to Him, incorporated into His members. By this faith the ungodly is justified, so that thenceforth faith itself begins to work by love." [P. LOMBARD.] To believe ON (Greek epi, or dative case) God, expresses the confidence which grounds itself on God, reposing on Him. "Faith IN (Greek eis) His blood" (Romans, 3. 25) implies that His blood is the element in which faith has its proper and abiding place. Cf. with this verse, Acts, 20. 21, "Repentance toward (Greek eis, 'into,' turning towards and going into) God and faith toward (Greek eis, 'into') Christ" where, as there is but one article to both "repentance" and "faith," the two are inseparably joined as to other forming one truth; where repentance is, there faith is; when one knows God the Father [BENGER.] gracious—Greek, "good," benignant, kind; as God is revealed to us in Christ, "the Lord" (v. 4), we who are born again ought so to be good and kind to the brethren (ch. 1. 22). "Whosoever has not tasted the word to him it is not sweet: it has not reached the heart; but to them who have experienced it, who with the heart believe, 'Christ has been sent for me and is become my own: my miseries are His, and His life mine,' it tastes sweet." An undesigned coincidence and mark of genuineness. The Spirit foreseeing the Romanist perversion of Matthew, 16. 18 (cf. 16, "Son of the LIVING God," which coincides with his language here, "the LIVING stone"), presently makes Peter himself to refute it. He herein confirms Paul's teach- ing. Omit the us unto of English Version. Christ is positively termed the "living stone," living, as having life in Himself from the beginning, and as raised from the dead to live evermore (Revelation, 1. 18) after His rejection by men, and so the source of life to us. Like no earthly rock, He lives and gives life. Cf. 1 Corin- thians, 10. 4, and the type, Exodus, 17. 6; Numbers, 20. 11. disallowed—rejected, rebprobated; referred to also by Christ Himself; also by Paul: cf. the kindred prophecies, Isaiah, 5. 14; Luke, 2. 31. chosen of God—lit., "with (or in the presence and judgment of) God elect" or chosen out (v. 6). Many are alienated from the gospel, because it is not every where in favour, but is on the contrary rejected by most men. Peter an- swers that, though rejected by men, Christ is peculiarly the stone of salvation honoured by God, first so design- ated by Jacob in his deathbed prophecy. 5. Ye also, as lively stones—partaking of the name and life which is in "THE LIVING STONE" (v. 4; 1 Corinthians, 3. 11). Many names which belong to Christ in the singular are assigned to Christians in the plural. He is "THE SON," "High Priest," "King," "Lamb" they, "sons," "priests," "kings," "sheep," "lamba." So the Shulamite called from Solomon. [BENGER.] are built up—Greek, "are being built up," as in Ephesians, 2. 22. Not as ALFORD, "Be ye built up." Peter grounds his exhortations, v. 2, 11, &c., on their conscious sense of their high privileges as living stones in the course of being built up into a spiritual house (i. e., "the habitation of the Spirit"). priesthood—Christians are at once the spiritual temple and the priests of the temple: There are two Greek words for "temple": hieron (the sacred place), the whole building, including the courts wherein the sacrifice was killed; and naos (the dwell- ing, viz., of God, the inner shrine wherein God peculiarly manifested Himself, and where, in the Holiest place, the blood of the slain sacrifice was presented before Him). All believers alike, and not merely ministers, are now the dwelling of God (and are called the naos Greek; not the hieron) and priests unto God (Revelation, 1. 6). The minister is not, like the Jewish priest (Greek hiericus), admitted nearer to God than the people, but merely for order's sake leads the spiritual services of the people. Priest is the ab- breviation of presbiter in the Church of England Prayer Book, not corresponding to the Aaronic priest (hiericus, who offered literal sacrifices). Christ is the only literal Hiericus-priest in the New Testament through whom alone we may always draw near to God. Cf. v. 9. "a royal priesthood," i. e., a body of priest- kings, such as was Melchisedec. The Spirit never, in New Testament, gives the name hiericus, or sacerdotal priest, to ministers of the gospel. HOLY—consecrated to God. spiritual sacrifices—not the literal one of the mass, as the Romish self-styled disciples of Peter teach. Cf. Isaiah, 56. 7, which cf. with "acceptable to God" here; 19. 21; Psalm 4. 5; 59. 14; 61. 17, 19; Hosea, 14. 2; Philipians, 4. 18. "Among spiritual sacrifices the first place belongs to the general oblation of ourselves. For never can we offer any thing to God until we have offered ourselves (2 Corinthians, 8. 5) in sacrifice to Him. There follow afterwards prayers, giving of thanks, alms-deeds, and all exercises of piety" (CALVIN.) Christian houses of worship are never called temples, because the temple was a place for sacrifice, which has no place in the Christian dispensation; the Christian temple is the congregation of spiritual worshippers. The synagogue (where reading of Scripture and prayer constituted the worship) was the model of the Christian house of worship (cf. Note, James, 1. 2, Greek, "synagogue"; Acts, 13. 21). Our sacrifices are those of prayer, praise, and self-denying services in the cause of Christ (v. 9, end), by Jesus Christ—as our mediating High Priest before God. Connect these words with "offer up." Christ is both precious Himself and makes us accepted. (BENGE.) As the temple, so also the priesthood, is built on Christ (v. 4, 6). [BEZA.] Imperfect as are our services we are not with unbelieving timidity, which is close akin to refined self-righteousness, to doubt their acceptance THROUGH CHRIST. After extolling the dignity of Christians he goes back to CHRIST as the sole source of it. 6. Wherefore also—The oldest MSS. read, "Because that." The statement above is so "because it is contained in Scripture." Behold—Calling universal attention to the glorious announcement of His eternal counsel. elect—So also believers (v. 9, "chosen," Greek, "elect generation"). precious—In Hebrew, Isaiah, 28. 16, "a corner stone of preciousness." See all my Note there. So in v. 7, Christ is said to be, to believers, "precious," Greek, "FERTICANESS," confounded—Same Greek as in Romans, 9. 33 (Peter here as elsewhere confirming Paul's teaching. See Introduction, also Romans, 10. 11, "ashamed." In Isaiah, 28. 16, "make haste," i. e., flee in sudden panic, covered with the shame of confounded hopes. 7. Those who rejected the STONE were all the while in spite of themselves unconsciously contributing to its becoming Head of the corner. The same magnet has two poles, the one repulsive, the other attractive; so the gospel has opposite effects on believers and unbelievers respectively. 8. stone of stumbling, &c.—Quoted from Isaiah, 8. 14. Not merely they stumbled, in that their prejudices were offended; but their stumbling implies the judicial punishment of their rejection of Messiah: they hurt themselves in stumbling over the corner stone, as "stumble" means in Jeremiah, 13. 16; Daniel, 11. 19, at the word—rather join "being disobedient to the word;" so ch. 3. 1; 4. 17. whereas—to penal stumbling; to the judicial punishment of their unbelief. See above. also—an additional thought; God's ordination; not that God ordains or appoints them to sin, but they are given up to "the fruit of their own ways" according to the eternal counsel of God. The moral ordering of the world is altogether of God. God appoints the ungodly to be given up unto sin, and a reprobate mind and its necessary penalty. "Were appointed," Greek, "set," answers to "I lay," Greek, "set," v. 6. God, in the active, is said to appoint Christ and the elect [directly]. Unbelievers, in the passive, are said to be appointed [God acting less directly in the appointment of the sinner's evil course]. (BENGE.) God ordains the wicked to punishment, not to crime. [J. CAPPEL.] "Appointed" or "set" (not here "FORE-ordained" refers, not to the eternal counsel so directly, as to the penal justice of God. Through the same Christ whom sinners rejected, they shall be rejected; unlike believers, they are by God appointed unto wrath as FITTED for it. The lost shall lay all the blame of their ruin on their own sinful perversity, not on God's decree; the saved shall ascribe all the merit of their salvation to God's electing love and grace. 9. Contrast in the privileges and destinies of believers. Cf. the similar contrast with the preceding context, chosen—"elect" of God, even as Christ your Lord is. generation—Implying the unity of spiritual origin and kindred of believers as a class distinct from the world, royal—kingly. Believers, like Christ, the antitypical Melchisedec, are at once kings and priests. Israel, in a spiritual sense, was designed to be the same among the nations of the earth. The full realization on earth of this, both to the literal and the spiritual Israel, is as yet future. holy nation—antitypical to Israel. peculiar people—i. e., "a people for an acquisition," i. e., whom God chose to be peculiarly His; Acts, 20. 28, "purchased," lit., acquired. God's "peculiar treasure" above others, show forth—publish abroad. Not their own praises but His. They have no reason to magnify themselves above others, for once they had been in the same darkness, and only through God's grace had been brought to the light which they must henceforth show forth to others, praises—Greek, "virtues," "excellencies." His glory, mercy (v. 10), goodness (Greek, v. 5; Numbers, 14. 17, 18; Isaiah, 63. 7). The same term is applied to believers 2 Peter, 1. 5. of him who hath called you—(2 Peter, 1. 5.) out of darkness—of heathen and even Jewish ignorance, error, sin, and misery, and so out of the dominion of the prince of darkness, marvelous—Peter still has in mind Psalm 108. 23. light—is he called "His," i. e., God's. Only the spiritual light is created by God, not darkness. In Isaiah, 45. 1, in the physical darkness and evil, not moral, that God is said to create: the punishment of sin, not sin itself. Public with characteristic boldness, brands as darkness what all the world calls light; reason, without the Holy Spirit, in spite of its vaunted power, is spiritual darkness. "It cannot apprehend what faith is: there it is stark blind; it gropes as one that is without eye-sight, stumbling from one thing to another, and knows not what it does." (LUTHEI.) 10. Adapted from Hosea, 1. 9, 10; 2. 23. Peter plainly confirms Paul, who quotes the passage as implying the call of the Gentiles to become spiritually that which Israel had been literally "the people of God." Primarily, the prophecy refers to literal Israel; hereafter to be fully that which in their best days they were only partially, God's people: not obtained mercy—i. e., "who were men not compensated." Implying that it was God's pure mercy, and their merits, which made the blessed change in their state: a thought which ought to kindle their devout gratitude, to be shown with their life, as well as their lips. 11. As heretofore he exhorted them to walk worthily of their calling, in contradistinction to their own former walk, so now he exhorts them to glorify God before unbelievers. [BENGL.] TERTULLIAN contrasts the early Christians and the heathen: enlightened in the bloody gladiatorial spectacles amphitheatre, whereas a Christian was exempted if he went to it at all. No Christian was in prison for crime, but only for the faith. The excluded slaves from some of their religious duties, whereas Christians had some of their presbytery class of slaves. Slavery silently and gradually disappeared by the power of the Christian law of Whatsoever ye would that men should do to ye even so to them." When the pagans do their nearest relatives in a plague, Christians red to the sick and dying. When the Gentiles died unburied after a battle, and cast their dead into the streets, the disciples hastened to the suffering, glorify—forming a high estimate God whom Christians worship, from the conduct of Christians themselves. We must not with a view to our own glory, but to the of God, the day of visitation—of God's grace: od shall visit them in mercy. 13. every ordi—man—"every human institution" [ALFORD], very human creation." For though of divine ment, yet in the mode of nomination and in the exercise of their authority, earthly governors are but human institutions being of men, and in relation to men. The apostle speaks as one raised above all human things. But lest they should think themselves so ennobled by faith as to be raised above subordination to human authorities, he tells them to submit themselves for the sake of Christ, who desires you to be subject, and who once was subject to earthly rulers Himself, though having all things subject to Him, and whose honour is at stake in you as His earthly representatives. Cf. Romans, 13. 5. "Be subject for conscience sake." king—the Roman emperor was "supreme" in the Roman provinces to which this epistle was addressed. The Jewish zealots refused obedience. The distinction between "the king as supreme, and "governors sent by him," implies that "if the king command one thing, and the subordinate magistrate another, we ought rather to obey the superior." [AUGUSTINE vs GROTIUS.] Scripture prescribes nothing upon the form of government, but simply subjects Christians to that everywhere subsisting, without entering into the question of the right of the rulers (thus the Roman emperors had by force seized supreme authority, and Rome had, by unjustifiable means, made herself mistress of Asia), because the de facto governors have not been made by chance, but by the providence of God. 14. governors—subordinate to the emperor, "sent," or delegated by Caesar to preside over the provinces. for the punishment—No tyranny ever has been so unprincipled as that some appearance of equity was not maintained in it: however corrupt a government be, God never suffers it to be so much so as not to be better than anarchy. [CALVIN.] Although bad kings often oppress the good, yet that is scarcely ever done by public authority (and it is of what is done by public authority that Peter speaks), save under the mask of right. Tyranny harasses many, but anarchy overwhelms the whole state. [HORNBEU.] The only justifiable exception is in cases where obedience to the earthly king plainly involves disobedience to the express command of the King of kings. praise of them that do well—every government recognises the excellence of truly Christian subjects. Thus PLINY, in his letter to the emperor Trajan, acknowledges "I have found in them nothing else save a perverse and extravagant superstition." This recognition in the long run mitigates persecution (ch. 3. 13). 15. Guard of his directing them to submit themselves (e. 13). put to silence—i. e., "to muzzle," "to stop the mouth." ignorance—spiritual: not having "the knowledge of God," and therefore ignorant of the children of God, and misconstruing their acts: influenced by mere appearances, and ever ready to open their mouths, rather than their eyes and ears. Their ignorance should move the believer's pity, not his anger. They judge of things which they are incapable of judging through unbelief (cf. v. 12). Maintain such a walk that they shall have no charge against you, except touching your faith; and so their minds shall be favourably disposed towards Christianity. 16. as free—as "the Lord's freemen," connected with v. 16. Doing well as being free. "Well-doing" (e. 15) is the natural fruit of being freemen of Christ, made free by "the truth" from the bondage of sin. Duty is enforced on us to guard against licentiousness, but the way in which it is to be fulfilled, is by love and the holy instincts of Christian liberty. We are given principles, not details. not using—Greek: "not as having your liberty for a veil (cloak) of badness, but as the servants of God," and therefore bound to submit to every ordinance of man (e. 13) which is of God's appointment. 17. [BENGE.] in the sight of God—who looks to inward, not merely outward things, of great price—the results of redemption should correspond to its costly price (ch. 1. 19). 5. after this manner—with the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit (cf. the portrait of the godly wife, Proverbs, 31. 10-31). trusted—Greek, "hoped." "consternation." Act well, and be not thrown into sudden panic, as weak females are apt to be, by any opposition from without. BEZOZI translates, "Not afraid of any fluttering terror coming from without" (v. 13-16). So LXX., Proverbs, 3. 25, uses the same Greek word, which Peter probably refers to. Anger assails men, fear, women. You need fear no man in doing what is right; not thrown into fluttering agitation by any sudden outbreak of temper on the part of your unbelieving husbands, whilst you do well. 7. dwell—Greek, "dwelling"; connected with the verb, ch. 2. 17, "Honour all." knowledge—Christian knowledge: appreciating the due relation of the sexes in the design of God, and acting with tenderness and forbearance accordingly: wisely: with wise consideration. them...giving honour to the wife—translate and punctuate the Greek rather, "Dwelling according to knowledge with the female (Greek adjective, qualifying "vessel": not as English Version, a noun; as with the weaker vessel (Note, 1 Thessalonians, 4. 4. It is slightly different from "humble," in that it marks a conscious effort to be truly humble. 9. evil—in deed, railing—in word, blessing—your revilers: participle, not a noun after "rendering," knowing that—The oldest MSS. read merely, "because," are-Greek, "were called," inherit a blessing—not only passive, but also active: receiving spiritual blessing from God by faith, and in your turn blessing others from love. [GERBARD in ALFORD.] "It is not in order to inherit a blessing that we must bless, but because our portion is blessing." No railing can injure you (v. 13). Imitate God who blesses you. The first fruits of His blessing for eternity are enjoyed by the righteous even now (v. 10). [BENJAMIN.] 10. will love—Greek, "wishes to love." He who loves life (present and eternal), and desires to continue to do so, not involving himself in troubles which will make this life a burden, and cause him to forfeit eternal life. Peter confirms his exhortation, v. 9, by Psalm 34, 13-16. refrain—curb, lit., "cause to cease," implying that our natural inclination and custom is to speak evil. "Men commonly think that they would be exposed to the wantonness of their enemies if they did not strenuously vindicate their rights. But the Spirit promises a life of blessedness to none but those who are gentle and patient of evils." [CALVIN.] evil...guile—First he warns against sins of the tongue, evil speaking and deceitful, double-tongued speaking; next, against acts of injury to one's neighbour. 11. In oldest MSS., Greek, "Moreover (besides his words, in acts) let him," eschew—"turn from," suave—pursue as a thing hard to attain, and that flees from one in this troublesome world. 12. Ground of the promised present and eternal life of blessedness to the meek (v. 10). The Lord's eyes are ever over them for good, ears unto their prayers—(1 John, 3, 14, 15.) face, against—The eyes imply favourable regard; the face of the Lord upon (not as English Version, "against") them that do evil, implies that He narrowly observes them, so as not to let them really and lastingly hurt His people (cf. v. 12). 13. who...will harm you—This fearless confidence in God's protection from harm, Christ, the Head, in His sufferings realized; so His members. If ye be—Greek, "if ye have become," followers—The oldest MSS. read "emulous," "zealous of" (Titus, 2, 14). good—the contrast in Greek is, "Who will do you evil, if ye be zealous of good?" 14. But and if—"But if even." "The promises of this life extend only so far as it is expedient for us that they should be fulfilled." [CALVIN.] So he proceeds to state the exceptions to the promise (v. 10), and how the truly wise will behave in such exceptional cases. "If ye should suffer: if it should so happen: "suffer," a milder word than harm, for righteousness—"not the suffering, but the cause for which one suffers, makes the martyr" [AUGUSTINE]. happy—Not even can suffering take away your blessedness, but rather promotes it, and—Greek, "but," "Do not impair your blessing (v. 9) by fearing man's terror in your times of adversity. Lit." Be not terrified with their terror, "i.e., with that which they try to strike into you, and which strikes themselves when in adversity. This verse and v. 15, is quoted from Isaiah, 8, 12, 13. God alone is to be feared: he that fears God has none else to fear, neither be troubled—the threat of the law. Leviticus, 26, 36; Deuteronomy, 28, 65, 66; in contrast to which the gospel gives the believer a heart assured of God's favour, and therefore untroubled, amidst all adversities. Not only be not afraid, but be not even astounded. 15. sanctify—hallow; honour as holy, enshrining Him in your hearts. So in the Lord's prayer, Matthew, 6, 9. God's holiness is thus glorified in our hearts as the dwelling

Besides this inward sanctification of God in the heart, be also ready always to give, &c. answer—an apologetic answer defending your faith, to every man that asketh you—The last words limit the universality of the "always," not to a railer. But to every one among the heathen who enquires honestly, a reason—a reasonable account. This refutes Rome's dogma, "I believe it, because the church believes it." Credulity is believing without evidence; faith is believing on evidence. There is no repose for reason itself but in faith. This verse does not impose an obligation to bring forward a learned proof and logical defence of revelation. But as believers deny themselves, crucify the world, and brave persecution, they must be braced up by some stout "hope;" men of the world, having no such hope themselves, are moved by curiosity to ask the secret of this hope; the believer must be ready to give an apologetic account "how this hope arose in him, what it contains, and on what it rests" [STRIGER]. with—The oldest MSS. read, "but with." Be ready, but with "meekness." Not perty and arrogantly. meekness—(v. 4) The most effective way; not self-sufficient impetuosity, fear—due respect towards man, and reverence towards God, remembering His cause does not need man's hot temper to uphold it. 16. Having a good conscience—the secret spring of readiness to give account of our hope. So hope and good conscience go together in Acts, 24, 16, 16. Profession without practice has no weight. But those who have a good conscience can afford to give an account of their hope "with meekness," whereas—(ch. 2, 12.) they speak evil of you, as if evil doers—One oldest MSS. reads, "ye are spoken against," omitting the rest, falsely accuse—"calumniate," the Greek expresses malice shown in deeds as well as in words. It is translated, "despitefully use," Matthew, 5, 44; Luke, 6, 28. conversation—life, conduct in Christ—who is the very element of your life as Christians. "In Christ" defines "good." It is your good walk as Christians, not as citizens, that calls forth malice (ch. 4, 4, 5, 14). 17. better—one may object, I would not bear it so ill if I had deserved it. Peter replies, it is better that you did not deserve it. Peter replies that doing well and yet being spoken against, you may prove yourself a true Christian. [GERBARD.] if the will of God be so—rather as the optative is in the oldest MSS., "if the will of God should will it so." Those who honour God's will as their highest law (ch. 2, 16) have the comfort to know that suffering is God's appointment (ch. 4, 19). So Christ Himself; our inclination does not wish it. 18. Confirmation of v. 17, by the glorious results of Christ's suffering innocently. Fe—"Because." That is "better," v. 17, by means of which we are rendered more like to Christ in death and in life; for His death brought the best issue to Himself and to us. [BENJAMIN.] Christ—the Anointed Holy One of God; the Holy suffered for sins, the Just for the unjust, also—as well as yourselves (v. 17). Cf. ch. 1, 21; there His suffering was brought forward as an example to us; here, as a proof of the blessedness of suffering for well-doing, once—for all; never again to suffer. It is "better" for us also once to suffer with Christ, than for ever without Christ. [BENJAMIN.] We now are suffering our "once," it will soon be a thing of the past; a bright consolation to the tried, for you—as though He had Himself committed them. He exposed Himself to death by His "confession," just as we are called on to "give an answer to him that asketh a reason of our hope." This was "well-doing" in its highest manifestation. As He suffered, "the Just," so we ought willingly suffer "for righteousness' sake" (v. 14; cf. v. 12, 17). that he might bring us to God—together with Himself in His ascension to the right hand of God (v. 22). He brings us, "the unjust," justified together with Him into heaven. So the result of Christ's death is His drawing men to Him; spiritual-ly now, in our having access into the Holiest, opened by Christ's ascension, literally hereafter. "Bring us," moreover, by the same steps of humiliation and exaltation through which Himself passed. The several steps of Christ's progress from lowliness to glory are trodden over again by His people in virtue of their oneness with Him (ch. 4, 1-3). "To God," is Greek dative (not the preposition and case), implying that God wishes it. (BENGE.) put to death—the means of His bringing us to God. In the flesh—i.e., in respect to the life of flesh and blood, quickened by the Spirit—The oldest MSS. omit the Greek article. Translate with the preposition "in," as the antithesis to the previous "in the flesh" requires, "IN spirit," i.e., in respect to His Spirit. "Put to death" in the former mode of life, "quickened" in the other. Not that His Spirit ever died and was quickened, or made alive again, but whereas He had lived after the manner of mortal men in the flesh, He began to live a spiritual "resurrection" (v. 21) life, thereby he has the power to bring us to God. Two ways of explaining v. 18, 19, are open to us: I. "Quickened in Spirit," i.e., immediately on His release from the "flesh," the energy of His undying spirit-life was "quickened" by God the Father, into new modes of action, vis. "in the Spirit He went down" (as subsequently He went up to heaven, v. 22, the same Greek verb) and heralded [not salvation, as ALFORD, contrary to Scripture, which every where represents man's state, whether saved or lost, after death irreversible. Nor is any mention made of the conversion of the spirits in prison. See Note, v. 20. Nor is the phrase here 'preached the gospel' (euangelizo), but heralded (ekheruzo) or 'preached': but simply made the announcement of His finished work; so the same Greek in Mark 1. 45, 'publish,' confirming Enoch and Noah's testimony, and thereby declaring the virtual condemnation of their unbelief, and the salvation of Noah and believers; a sample of the similar opposite effects of the same work on all unbelievers, and believers, respectively; also a consolation to those whom Peter addresses, in their sufferings at the hands of unbelievers; specially selected for the sake of 'baptism,' its 'antitype' (v. 21, which, as a seal, marks believers as separated from the rest of the doomed world) to the spirits (His Spirit speaking to the spirits in prison (in Hades or Sheol, awaiting the judgment, 2 Peter, 2. 4), which were of old disobedient when," &c. II. The strongest point in favour of I. is the position of "sometime," i.e., of old, connected with "disobedient;" whereas if the preaching or announcing were a thing long past, we should expect "sometime," or of old, to be joined to "went and preached." But this transposition may express that their disobedience preceded His preaching. The Greek participle expresses the reason of His preaching, "inasmuch as they were sometime disobedient" (cf. cu. 4. 6). Also "went" seems to mean a personal going, as in v. 22, not merely in spirit. But see the answer below. The objections are, "quickened" must refer to Christ's body (cf. v. 21, end), for as His Spirit never ceased to live, it cannot be said to be "quickened." (Cf. John, 5. 21; Romans, 8. 11, and other passages, where "quickened" is used of the bodily resurrection. Also, not His Spirit, but His soul, went to Hades. His Spirit was commended by Him at death to His Father, and was thereupon "in Paradise." The theory I. would thus require that His descent to the spirits in prison should be after His resurrection! Cf. Ephesians, 4. 9, 10, which makes the descent precede the ascent. Also Scripture elsewhere is silent about such a heralding, though possibly Christ's death had immediate effects on the state of both the godly and the ungodly in Hades: the souls of the godly, heretofore in comparative confinement, perhaps then having been, as some fathers thought, translated to God's immediate and heavenly presence; but this cannot be proved from Scripture. Cf. however, John, 3. 13; Colossians, 1. 18. Prison is always used in a bad sense in Scripture. "Paradise," and "Abraham's bosom," the abode of good spirits in Old Testament times, are separated by a wide gulf from Hell or Hades, and cannot be called "prison." Cf. 2 Corinthians, 12. 2, 4, where "paradise" and the "third heaven" correspond. Also, why should the antediluvian unbelievers in particular be selected as the objects of His preaching in Hades? Therefore explain: Quickened in spirit, in which (as distinguished from in person; the words "in which," i.e., in spirit, expressly obviating the objection that "went" implies a personal going) He went in the person of Noah, "a preacher of righteousness," 1 Peter, 2. 5: ALFORD's own note, Ephesians, 2. 17, is the best reply to his argument from "went" that a local going to Hades in person is meant. As "He came and preached peace" by His Spirit in the apostles and ministers after His death and ascension: so before His incarnation He preached in Spirit through Noah to the antediluvians, John, 14. 18, 25; Acts, 26. 23, "Christ should show," lit., "announce light to the Gentiles" and preached unto the spirits in prison, i.e., the antediluvians, whose bodies indeed seemed free, but their spirits were in prison, shut up in the earth as one great condemned cell (exactly parallel to Isaiah, 31. 23, 23, "upon the earth . . . they shall be gathered together as prisoners are gathered in the pit, and shall be shut up in the prison," &c. [just as the fallen angels are judicially regarded as "in chains of darkness," though for a time now at large on the earth, 1 Peter, 2. 4], where v. 18 has a plain allusion to the flood, "the windows from on high are open," cf. Genesis, 7. 11); from this prison the only way of escape was that preached by Christ in Noah. Christ, who in our times came in the flesh, in the days of Noah preached in Spirit by Noah to the spirits then in prison (Isaiah, 61. 1, end, "The Spirit of the Lord God hath sent me to proclaim the opening of the prison to them that are bound"). So in ch. 1. 11, "the Spirit of Christ" is said to have testified in the prophets. As Christ suffered even to death by enemies, and was afterwards quickened in virtue of His "Spirit" (or Divine nature, Romans, 1. 3, 4; 1 Corinthians, 15. 45), which henceforth acted in its full energy, the first result of which was the raising of His body (v. 21, end) from the prison of the grave and His soul from Hades; so the same Spirit of Christ enabled Noah, amidst reproach and trials, to preach to the disobedient spirits fastbound in wrath. That Spirit in you can enable you also to suffer patiently now, looking for the resurrection deliverance. 20. one—Not in the oldest MSS. when . . . the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah—Oldest MSS. Greek, "was continuing to wait on" (if haply men in the 120 years of grace would repent) until the end of His waiting came in their death by the flood. This refutes ALFORD's idea of a second day of grace having been given in Hades. Noah's days are selected, as the ark and the destroying flood answer respectively to "baptism" and the coming destruction of unbelievers by fire, while the ark was a pre-paring—(Hebrews, 11. 7.) A long period of God's "long-suffering and waiting," as Noah had few to help him, which rendered the world's unbelief the more inexcusable, whereto—lit., "by having entered) into which," eight—seven (the sacred number) with ungodly Ham. few—So now, souls—As this term is here used of living persons, why should not "spirits" also? Noah preached to their ears, but Christ in spirit, to their spirits, or spiritual natures, saved by water—The same water which drowned the unbelieving, buoyed up the ark in which the eight were saved. Next as some translate, "were brought safe through the water." However, the sense of the preposition may be as in 1 Corinthians, 3: 15, "they were safely preserved through the water," though having to be in the water. 21. whereunto.—The oldest MSS. read "which;" lit., "which (viz., water, in general; being the anti-type of the water of the flood) is now saving (the salvation being not yet fully realized by us, cf. 1 Corinthians, 10: 1, 2, 5; Jude, 5; puts into a state of probation) us also (two oldest MSS. read 'you' for 'us' You also, as well as Noah and his party, to wit baptism." Water saved Noah not of itself, but by sustaining the ark built in faith resting on God's word: it was to him the sign and mean of a kind of regeneration of the earth. The flood was for Noah a baptism, as the passage through the Red sea was for the Israelites; by baptism in the flood he and his family were transferred from the old world to the new; from immediate destruction to lengthened probation; from the companionship of the wicked to communion with God; from the severing of all bonds between the creature and the Creator to the privileges of the covenant: so we by spiritual baptism. As there was a Ham who forfeited the privileges of the covenant, so many now. The anti typical water, viz., baptism, saves you also, not of itself, nor the mere material water, but the spiritual thing conjoined with it, repentance and faith, of which it is the sign and seal, as Peter proceeds to explain. Cf. the union of the sign and thing signified, John, 3: 5; Ephesians, 5: 26; Titus, 3: 5; Hebrews, 10: 22; cf. 1 John, 5: 6, not the, &c.—"flesh" bears the emphasis. "Not the putting away of the filth of the flesh" (as is done by a mere water-baptism, unaccompanied with the Spirit's baptism, cf. Ephesians, 2: 11), but of the soul. It is the ark (Christ and His Spirit-filled church), not the water, which is the instrument of salvation: the water only flowed round the ark; so not the mere water-baptism, but the water when accompanied with the Spirit. answer—Greek, "interrogation;" referring to the questions asked of candidates for baptism; eliciting a confession of faith "toward God," and a renunciation of Satan [AUGUSTINE, ad Catechumenos, B. 4, c. 1; CYPRIAN, Ep. 7, ad Romanos], which, when flowing from "a good conscience," assure one of being "saved." lit., "a good conscience's interrogation (including the satisfactory answers) toward God." I prefer this to the translation of WAHL, ALFORD, &c., "enquiry of a good conscience after God;" not one of the parallels alleged, not even 2 Samuel, 11: 7, in the LXX., is strictly in point. Recent Byzantine Greek idiom (whereby the term meant (1.) the question; (2.) the stipulation; (3.) the engagement), easily flowing from the usage of the word as Peter has it, confirms the former translation. by the resurrection of Jesus—joined with "saves you;" in so far as baptism applies to us the power of Christ's resurrection. As Christ's death unto sin is the source of the believer's death unto, and so deliverance from, sin's penalty and power; so His resurrection life is the source of the believer's new spiritual life. 22. (Psalm 119. 1; Romans, 8: 34, 35; 1 Corinthians, 15: 24; Ephesians, 1: 21; 3: 10; Colossians, 1: 16; 2: 10-15.) The fruit of His patience in His voluntarily-endured and undeserved sufferings: a pattern to us, v. 17, 18, gone—(Luke, 24. 61.) Proving against rationalists an actual material ascension. lit., "is on the right hand of God, having gone into heaven." The oldest MS. of the Vulgate and the Latin fathers, add what expresses the benefit to us of Christ's sitting on God's right hand, "Who is on the right hand of God, having swallowed up death that we may become heirs of everlasting life;" involving for us a STATE OF LIFE, saved, glorious, and eternal. The GREEK MSS. however, reject the words. Cf. with this verse Peter's speeches, Acts, 2: 32-35; 3: 21, 24; 10:

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-19. LIKE THE BLESSED CHRIST, BELIEVERS HENCEFORTH OUGHT TO HAVE NO MORE TO DO WITH SIN. As the end thereof, cultivate self-restraint, unselfish prayerfulness, charity, hospitality, Scriptural speech, ministering to one another according to your several gifts to the glory of God: Rejoicing patience under suffering. 1. for us—Supported by some oldest MSS. and versions, omitted by others. in the flesh—in His mortal body of humiliation, arm—Ephesians, 6: 11, 13.) the same mind—of suffering with patient willingness what God wills you to suffer. he that hath suffered—for instance, Christ first, and in His person the believer: a general proposition. hath ceased—lit., "has been made to cease," i. e., has obtained by the very fact of His having suffered once for all, a cessation from sin, which had heretofore lain on him (Romans, 6: 6-11, especially 7). The Christian is by faith one with Christ: as then Christ by death is judicially freed from sin; so the Christian who has in the person of Christ died, has no more to do with it judicially, and ought to have no more to do with it actually. "The flesh" is the sphere in which sin has place. 2. That he, &c.—That be (the believer, who has one for all obtained cessation from sin by suffering, in the person of Christ, viz., in virtue of his union with the crucified Christ) should no longer live the rest of his time in the flesh to the lusts of men, but to the will of God as his rule. "Rest of his time in the flesh" the Greek has the preposition "in" here, not in v. 1 as to Christ) proves that the reference is here not to Christ, but to the believer, whose remaining time for glorifying God is short (v. 3). "Live" in the truest sense, for heretofore he was dead. Not as ALFORD, "Arm yourselves, with a view no longer to live the rest of your time." 3. may suffice—Greek, "is sufficient." Peter takes the lowest ground: for not even the past time ought to have been wasted in lust; but since you cannot recall it, at least lay out the future to better account. us—Omitted in oldest MSS. wrought—Greek, "wrought out." Gentiles—heathen; which many of you were. when, &c.—"walking as ye have done [ALFORD] in lasciviousness;" the Greek means petulant, immodest, wantonness, unbridled conduct: not so much filthy lust, excess of wine—"wine-bibblings." [ALFORD.] abominable—"nefarious." "lawless idiosyncrasies, violating God's most sacred law; not that all Peter's readers (Note, ch. 1. 1) walked in these, but many, viz., the Gentile portion of them. 4. Wherein—in respect to which abandonment of your former walk (v. 3, not not with them—eagerly, in troops. [BENGEI.] excess—lit., profusion; a sink: stagnant water remaining after an inundation. riot—profligacy, speaking evil—chasing you with pride, singularity, hypocrisy, and secret crimes (v. 14; 2 Peter, 2: 2). However, there is no "if you" in the Greek, but simply "blaspheming." It seems to me always to be used, either directly or indirectly, in the sense of impious railing against God, Christ, or the Holy Spirit, and the Christian religion, not merely against men as such; Greek, v. 14, below. 5. They who now call you to account falsely, shall have to give account themselves for this very evil speaking (Jude, 15), and be condemned justly. viz., very speedily (v. 7; 2 Peter, 3: 10). Christ's coming is to the believer always near. 6. For—Giving the reason for v. 5, "Judge the dead," gospel preached sin to...dead—as well as to them now living, and to them that shall be found alive at the coming of the Judge. "Dead" must be taken in the same literal sense as in v. 5, which refutes the explanation "dead" is sin. Moreover, the absence of the Greek article does not necessarily restrict the sense of "dead" to particular dead persons, for there is no Greek article in v. 5 also, where "the dead" is universal in meaning. The sense seems to be, Peter, as representing the true attitude of

 has no article: "as oracles of God." This may be due to Greek "God," having no article, it being a principle when a governed noun omits the Greek

 In Acts, 7, 38 also, the Greek article is wanting: thus English Version, "as the oracles of God," etc., the Old Testament, would be right, and the precept is similar to Romans, 12, 6, "prophecy according to the analogy of the faith." But the context suits better thus, "Let him speak as (becomes one speaking) oracles of God." His divinely-inspired words are not his own, but God's, and as a steward (v. 10) having them committed to him, he ought so to speak them. Jesus was the pattern in this respect (Matthew, 7, 29; John, 12, 49; 14, 10; cf. Paul, 2 Corinthians, 2, 17). Note, the very same term as is applied, in the only other passages where it occurs (Acts, 7, 38; Romans, 3, 2; Hebrews, 4, 12), to the Old Testament inspired writings, is here predicated of the inspired words (the substance of which was afterwards committed to writing) of the New Testament

 Jesus Christ—the Mediator through whom all our blessings come down to us, and also through whom all our praises ascend to God. Through Christ alone can God be glorified in us and our sayings and doings, to whom —Christ, be—Greek, "is," for ever and ever—Greek, "unto the ages of the ages." 12, strange—they might think it strange that God should allow his chosen children to be sore tried, fiery trial—like the fire by which metals are tested and their dross removed. The Greek adds "in your case," which is to try you—Greek, "which is taking place for a trial to you." Instead of its "happening to you" as some strange and untoward chance, it "is taking place" with the gracious design of trying you: God has a wise design in it—a consolatory reflection. 13, inasmuch as—The oldest MSS. read, "in proportion as: "in as far as" ye by suffering are partakers of Christ's sufferings, i.e., by faith enter into realizing fellowship with them: willingly for His sake suffering as He suffered. with exulting joy—Greek, "exulting joys" now ye rejoice amidst sufferings: then ye shall exult for ever free from sufferings (ch. 1, 6, 8). If we will not bear suffering for Christ now, we must bear eternal sufferings hereafter. 14. for—Greek, "in the name of Christ," viz., as Christians (v. 16; ch. 3, 14, above): "in my name, because ye belong to Christ." The emphasis lies on this: v. 15, "as a murderer, thief," &c., stands in contrast. Let your suffering be on account of Christ, not on account of evil-doing (ch. 2, 20). reproached—reproach affects noble minds more than loss of goods, or even bodily sufferings. The Spirit... upon you—the same Spirit as rested on Christ (Luke, 4, 18). "The Spirit of glory" is His Spirit, for He is the "Lord of glory" (James, 2, 1). Believers may well overcome the "reproach" (cf. Hebrews, 11, 26), seeing that "the Spirit of glory" rests upon them, as upon Him. It cannot prevent the happiness of the righteous, if they are reproached for Christ, because they retain before God their glory entire, as having the Spirit, with whom glory is inseparably joined. (CALVIX.) and of God—Greek, "and the Spirit of God" implying that the Spirit of glory (which is Christ's Spirit) is at the same time also the Spirit of God, on their part he is evil spoken of, on your part he is glorified—Omitted in the two oldest Greek MSS. and Syriac and Coptic versions, but supported by one very old MS., Vulgate, Sahidic, Cyprian, &c. "Evil spoken of," lit., "blasphemed," not merely do they "speak against you," as in ch. 3, 16, but blasphemously mock Christ and Christianity itself. 15. But—Greek, "For." "Reproached in the name of Christ" I say (v. 14), "FOR let none," &c., as, as, as—the as twice in Italics is not in the Greek. The second Greek "as" distinguishes the class "busybody in other men's matters," from the previous class of delinquents. Christians, from mistaken zeal, under the plea of faithfulness, might readily step out of their own calling and make themselves judges of the acts of unbelievers. lit., "a bishop in what is (not his own, but) another's" province: an allusion to the existing bishops or overseers of the church: a self-constituted bishop in other's concerns. 16. A Christian—the name given in contempt first at Antioch, Acts, 11, 26; 26, 27, 28: the only three places where the term occurs. At first believers had no distinctive name, but were called among themselves "brethren," Acts, 6, 3; "disciples," Acts, 8, 1; "those of the way," Acts, 9, 2; "saints," Romans, 1, 7; by the Jews (who denied that Jesus was the Christ, and so would never originate the name Christian) in contempt, "Nazarenes." At Antioch, where first idolatrous Gentiles (Cornelius, Acts, 10, 16) was not an idolater, but a proselyte) were converted, and wide missionary work began, they could be no longer looked on as a Jewish sect, and so the Gentiles designated them by the new name "Christians." The rise of the new name marked a new epoch in the church's life, a new stage of its development, viz., its missions to the Gentiles. The idle and witty people of Antioch, we know from heathen writers, were famous for inventing nicknames. The date of this epistle must have been when this had become the generally recognized designation among Gentiles: it is never applied by Christians to each other, as it was in after ages—an undesigned proof that the New Testament was composed when it professes, and when the name exposed one to reproach and suffering, though not seemingly as yet to systematic persecution, let him not be ashamed—though the world is ashamed of shame. To suffer for one's own faults is no honour (v. 15; ch. 2, 20)—for Christ, is no shame (v. 14; ch. 3, 14). but let him glorify God—not merely glory in persecution: I eter might have said as the contrast, "but let him esteem it an honour to himself," but the honour is to be given to God, who counts him worthy of such an honour, involving exemption from the coming judgments on the ungodly, on this behalf—The oldest MSS. and Vulgate read, "in this name," i.e., in respect of suffering for such a name. 17. Another ground of consolation for Christians. All must pass under the judgment of God: God's own household first, their chastisement being here, for which they should glorify Him as a proof of their membership in His family, and a pledge of their escape from the end of those whom the last judgment shall find disobedient to the gospel. The time—Greek, "season," "it time." Judgment must begin at the house of God—the church of living believers. Peter has in mind Ezekiel, 9, 6; cf. Amos, 3, 7; Jeremiah, 25, 29. Judgment is already begun, the gospel word, as a "two-edged sword," having the double effect of saving some and condemning others, and shall be consummated at the last judgment. "When power is given to the destroyer, he observes no distinction between the righteous and the wicked; not only so, but he begins first at the righteous." [WERTHEIM from Rabbins.] But God limits the destroyer's power over His people. it...at us, what shall the end be of them, &c.—If even the godly have chastening judgments now, how much more shall the ungodly be doomed to damnable judgments at last. gospel of God—the very God who is to judge them. 18. scarcely—cf. "so as by fire," 1 Corinthians, 3, 10; having to pass through trying chastisements, as David did for his sin. "The righteous" man has always more or less of trial, but the issue is certain, and the entrance into the kingdom abundant at last. The "scarcely" marks the severity of the ordeal, and the unlikelihood in a mere human point of view) of the righteous sustaining it; but the righteousness of Christ and God's everlasting covenant make it all sure, ungodly—having no regard for God: negative description, sinner—loving sin: positive: the same man is at once God-forgetting and sin-loving. appear—in judgment. 19. General conclusion from v. 17, 18. Seeing that the godly know that their sufferings are by God's will, to chasten them that they may not perish with the world, they have good reason to trust God cheerfully amidst sufferings, persevering in well-doing. let them—Greek, "let them also," "let even them," as well as those that are not suffering. Not only under ordinary circumstances, but also in time of suffering, let believers commit, &c. (cf. Note, ch. 3, 14), according to the will of God—(Note, ch. 3, 17). God's will that the believer should suffer (v. 17), is for his good. One oldest MS. and Vulgate read, "In well-doings;" contrast ill-doings, v. 18. Our committing of ourselves to God is to be, not indolent and passive quietism, but accompanied with active well-doings, faithful—to His covenant promises. Creator—who is therefore also our Almighty Preserver. He, not we, must keep our souls. Sin destroyed the original spiritual relation between creature and Creator, leaving that only of government. Faith restores it: so that the believer, living to the will of God (ch. 4, 2), rests implicitly on his Creator's faithfulness.

CHAPTER V.

VER 1-14. EXHORTATIONS TO ELDERS, JUNIORS AND ALL IN GENERAL. (PARTING PRAYER). CONCLUSION. 1. Elders—like in office and age (v. 2). Lay an elder—To put one's self on a level with those whom we exhort, gives weight to one's exhortations (cf. 1 John, 1). Peter, in true humility for the gospel's sake, does not put forward his apostleship here, where he presided over the elders. In the apostleship the presbyters have no successors, for "the signs of an apostle" have not been transmitted. The presidents over the presbyters and deacons, by whatever name designated, angel, bishop, or moderator, &c., though of the same as the presbyters, yet have virtually succeeded in superintendency of the church analogous to exercised by the apostles (this superintendency priority existed from the earliest times after the time [TEXTULIAN]); just as the Jewish synagogue model which the church followed) was governed a council of presbyters, presided over by one of their, "the chief ruler of the synagogue." Cf. RUSSELL, Synagogue, Part II., ch. 3. and 7. witness-ness of Christ's sufferings, and so qualified to set you to believing patience in suffering for well- after His example (ch. 4. 19; 2. 20). This ex- am, the "therefore" inserted in the oldest MSS., "I sists exhort," resuming the exhortation, ch. 4. 19. higher dignity as an apostle is herein delicately and, as eye-witnessing was a necessary qualification needed: cf. Feed— st, "Tend as a shepherd," by discipline and sive. Lead, feed, heed; by prayer, exhortation, ment, and example. The dignity is marked by tern "elder;" the duties of the office, to tend or us, by "bishop." Peter has in mind Christ's in- tion to him, "Feed (tend) my sheep...Feed (pasture) lamb" (John, 21. 16.). He invites the elders to share him the same duty (cf. Acts, 20. 28.). The flock is sive, which is among you—Whilst having a con- for all the church, your special duty is to feed portion of it which is among you, oversight— b, "bishopric," or duty of bishops, i.e., overseer. b construct—necessity is laid upon them, but will- no prevents it being felt, both in undertaking and sive the duty. crown—Greek, stephanos, a garland of victory, the prize in the Grecian games, woven of ivy, parsley, myrtle, olive, or oak. Our crown is distinguished from theirs in that it is "incorruptible" and "fadeth not away," as the leaves of theirs soon did. "The crown of life." Not a kingly crown is different Greek word, diadema: the prerogative of the Lord Jesus (Revelation, 19. 12. glory—Greek, "the glory," viz., to be then revealed (u. 1; ch. 4. 13). 5. ye younger—The deacons were originally the younger men, the presbyters older; but subsequently as presbyter expressed the office of church-ruler or teacher, so Greek neoterios means not (as lit.) young men in age, but subordinate ministers and servants of the church. So Christ uses the term "younger." For He explains it by "he that doth serve," lit., he that ministereth as a deacon; just as He explains "the great- est" by "he that is chief," lit., "he that ruleth," the very word applied to the bishops or presbyters. So "the young men" are undoubtedly the deacons of the church of Jerusalem, of whom, as being all Hebrews, the Hellenistic Christians subsequently complained as neglecting their Grecian widows, whence arose the appointment of the seven others, Hellenistic deacons. So here, Peter, having exhorted the presbyters, or elders, not to lord it over those committed to them, adds, Likewise ye neoterios or younger, i.e., subordinate ministers and deacons, submit cheerfully to the com- mands of the elders. [MOSHEM.] There is no Scrip- ture sanction for "younger" meaning lamben in general as ALFORD explains: its use in this sense is probably of later date. The "all of you" that follows, refers to the congregation generally; and it is likely that, like Paul, Peter should notice, previous to the general con- gregation, the subordinate ministers as well as the presbyters, writing as he did to the same region (Ephesus), and to confirm the teaching of the apostle of the Gentiles. Yea—to sum up all my exhortations in one, be subject—Omitted in the oldest MSS. and Versions, but TISCHKENDORF quotes the Vatican MS. for it. Then translate, "Gird (ch. 1. 13; 4. 1) fast on humility: lowliness of mind: to one another." The verb is lit., "he on with a fast knot." [WAHL.] Or, "gird on humility as the slave dresses (encomboma)" as the Lord girded himself with a towel to perform a servile office of humility and love, washing his disci- ples' feet, a scene in which Peter had played an im- portant part, so that he would naturally have it be- coming his mind. Cf. similarly v. 2, with John, 21. 15-17. Clothing was the original badge of man's sin and shame. Pride caused the need of man's clothing, and pride still returns in dress; the Christian therefore clothes himself in humility (ch. 3. 3, 4). God provides him with the robe of Christ's righteousness, in order to receive which man must be stripped of pride. God resisteth the proud—Quoted, as James, 4. 6, from Proverbs, 3. 31. Peter had James before his mind, and gives his epistle inspired sanction. Cf. v. 9, with James, 4. 7, lit., "arrayeth Himself against." Other sins flee from God: pride alone opposeth itself to God; therefore, God also in turn opposes Himself to the proud. [GERHARD in ALFORD.] Humility is the vessel of all graces. [ACQUINTINE.] 6. under the mighty hand—afflicting you (ch. 3. 15): "accept" His chastise- ments, and turn to Him that smiteth you. He de- presses the proud and exalts the humble, in due time—wait humbly and patiently for His own fit time. One oldest MS. and Vulgate read, "In the season of visita- tion," viz., His visitation in mercy. 7. Casting—once for all: so the Greek artist, care—"anxiety." The advantage flowing from humbling ourselves under God's hand v. 6 is confident reliance on His goodness. Exemption from care goes along with humble submis- sion to God, careth for you—lit., "respecting you." Care is a burden which faith casts off the man on his God. Cf. Psalm 22. 10; 37. 5; 55. 22, to which Peter alludes; Luke, 12, 22, 37; Philipptans, 4, 6, careh—not so strong a Greek word as the previous Greek "anxiety." 8. Peter has in mind Christ's warning to himself to watch against Satan, from forgetting which he fell. Be sober...vigilant—"Care," i.e., anxiety, will intoxicate the soul; therefore be sober, i.e., self-restrained. Yet, lest this freedom from care should lead any to false security, he adds, "Be vigilant" against "your adversary." Let this be your "care." God provides, therefore do not be anxious. The Devil seeks, therefore watch. [BENJEL.] because—Omitted in the oldest MSS. The broken and disjointed sentences are more fervid and forcible. LUCIFER of Cagliari reads as English Version, adversary—lit., opponent in a court of justice [Zechariah, 3, 1]. "Satan" means opponent. "Devil," accuser or slanderer [Revelation, 12, 10]. "The enemy" (Matthew, 13, 39). "A murderer from the beginning" (John, 8, 44). He counteracts the gospel and its agents. "The tempter," rearing lion—implying his violent and insatiable thirst for prey as a hungry lion. Through man's sin he got God's justice on his side against us; but Christ, our Advocate, by fulfilling all the demands of justice for us, has made our redemption altogether consistent with justice. walketh about—(Job, 1, 7; 2, 2.) So the children of the wicked one cannot rest. Evil spirits are in 2 Peter, 2, 4; Jude, 6, said to be already in chains of darkness and in hell. This probably means that this is their doom finally; a doom already begun in part; though for a time they are permitted to roam in the world (of which Satan is prince), especially in the dark air that surrounds the earth. Hence perhaps arises the miasma of the air at times, as physical and moral evil are closely connected. devour—entangle in worldly "care" (v. 7) and other snares, so as finally to destroy. Cf. Revelation, 12, 15, 16, 9. (Luke, 4, 13; Ephesians, 6, 11-17; James, 4, 7.) steadfast—Cf. "established in the truth," 2 Peter, 1, 12. Faith gives strength to prayer, the great instrument against the foe (James, 1, 6, &c.). knowing, &c.—encouragement not to faint in afflictions: your brethren suffer the same; nothing beyond the common lot of Christians befalls you (1 Corinthians, 10, 13). Your fellow-Christians have the same battle of faith and prayer against Satan. in the world—lying in the wicked one, and therefore necessarily the scene of "tribulation" (John, 16, 33), are—are being accomplished according to the appointment of God. 10. Comforting assurance that God will finally "perfect" His work of "grace" in them, after they have undergone the necessary previous suffering. But—Only do you watch and resist the foe: God will perform the rest. [BENJEL.] of all grace—(Cf. ch. 4, 10.) The God to whom as its source all grace is to be referred: who in grace completes what in grace He began. He from the first "called you (so the oldest MSS. read for 'us') unto (with a view to) glory." He will not let His purpose fall short of completion. If He does so in punishing, much more in grace. The three are fitly conjoined: the call, the glory to which we are called, and the way (suffering): the fourth is the ground of the calling, viz., the grace of God in Christ, by—Greek, "in." Christ is He in virtue of whom, and in union with whom, believers are called to glory. The opposite is "in the world" (v. 9; John, 10, 33), after that ye have suffered—Join to "called you": suffering, as a necessary preliminary to glory, was contemplated in God's calling, a while—short and inconsiderable, as compared with the glory, perfect, &c.—The two oldest MSS., and Vulgate and Coptic versions, read, "Shall perfect (so that there shall be nothing defective in you), establish, strengthen, and omit "settle." lit., ground, or fit on a foundation. ALFORD reads it in spite of the oldest MSS. The authority of the latter I prefer: moreover the climax seems to require rather a verb of completing the work of grace, than, as the Greek means, founding it. The Greek has "shall Himself perfect you:" though you are called on to watch and resist the foe, God Himself must really do all in and through you. The same God who begins must Himself complete the work. The Greek for "establish" so as to be "steadfast in the faith," v. 9) is the same as "strengthen," Luke, 22, 32. Peter has in mind Christ's charge, "When thou art converted strengthen thy brethren." His exhortation accords with his name Peter, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church." "Stablish," so as not to waver. "Strengthen" with might in the inner man by the Spirit, against the foe. 11. To him—Emphatic, to Him and Him alone: not to ourselves. Cf. "Himself" Note, v. 10. glory and—Omitted in the oldest MSS. and versions. dominion—Greek, "the might" shown so "perfecting," &c., you, v. 10. 12. Silvanus—Silas, the companion of Paul and Timothy: a suitable messenger by whom to confirm, as Peter here does, Paul's doctrine of "the true grace of God" in the same churches (cf. 2 Peter, 3, 16). We never meet with Silvanus as Paul's companion after Paul's last journey to Jerusalem. His connexion with Peter was plainly subsequent to that journey, as I suppose—Join "faithful unto you" (STRENGTHEN), as I suppose. Silvanus may have stood in a close relation to the churches in Asia, perhaps having taken the oversight of them after Paul's departure, and had afterwards gone to Peter, by whom he is now sent back to them with this epistle. He did not know, by positive observation, Silvanus' faithfulness to them; he therefore says, "faithful to you, as I suppose," from the accounts I hear; not expressing doubt. ALFORD joins "I have written unto you," which the Greek order favours. The seeming uncertainty, thus, is not as to Silvanus' faithfulness, which is strongly marked by the Greek article, but as to whether he or some other would prove to be the bearer of the letter, addressed as it was to five provinces, all of which Silvanus might not reach: "By Silvanus, that faithful brother, as I expect, I have written to you." [BENJEL.] briefly—Greek, "a few words," as compared with the importance of the subject (Hebrews, 13, 22). exhorting—not so much formally teaching doctrines, which could not be done so "few words." testifying—bearing my testimony in confirmation (so the Greek compound verb implies) that truth which ye have already heard from Paul and Silas (1 John, 2, 27). that this—of which I have just written, and of which Paul before testified to you (whose testimony, now that he was no longer in these regions, was called in question probably by some; cf. 2 Peter, 3, 15, 16; 2 Peter, 1, 12, "the present truth" viz., the grace formerly promised by the prophets, and now manifested to you. "Grace" is the key-note of Paul's doctrine which Peter now confirms (Ephesians, 2, 5, 8). Their sufferings for the gospel made them need some attestation and confirmation of the truth that they should not fall back from it, wherein ye stand—The oldest MSS. read imperatively, "Stand ye." lit., "into which (having been already admitted, ch. 1, 5, 21; 2, 7, 9, 10) stand therein." Peter seems to have in mind Paul's words (Romans, 5, 2; 1 Corinthians, 10, 1). "The grace wherein we stand must be true, and our standing in it true also." [BENJEL.] (Cf. STRENGTHEN. "He began his epistle with grace (ch. 1, 5) he finishes it with grace, he has bespoken the middle with grace, that in every part he might teach that the church is not saved but by grace." 13. The... at Babylon—ALFORD, BENJEL, &c., translate, "So that is elected together with you in Babylon," &c.

Peter's wife, whom he led about with him in his missionary journeys. Cf. ch. 3, 7. "Heirs together of the race of life." But why she should be called "elected together with you in Babylon," as if there had been no Christian woman in Babylon besides, is inexplicable in this view. In English Version the sense is clear: "That portion of the whole dispersion (ch. 1, 1, Greek), or church of Christianized Jews, with Gentile converts, which resides in Babylon." As Peter and John were closely associated, Peter addresses the church in John's peculiar province, Asia, and closes with "your elect sister church at Babylon saluteth you;" and John similarly addresses the "elect lady," i.e., the church in Babylon, and closes with "the children of mine elect sister (the Asiatic church) greet thee; cf. introduction to 3 John). EPHRAIMI explains, "Mark who is in the place of a son to me;" cf. Acts, 12, 13, implying Peter's connexion with Mark; whence the mention of him in connexion with the church at Babylon, in which he laboured under Peter before he went to Alexandria, is not unnatural. Papias reports from the presbyter John (E. 3, 39), that Mark was interpreter of Peter, recording in his gospel the facts related to him by Peter. Silvanus or Silas, had been substituted for John Mark, as Paul's companion, because of Mark's temporary unfaithfulness. But now Mark restored is associated with Silvanus, Paul's companion, in Peter's esteem, as Mark was already reinstated in Paul's esteem. That Mark had a spiritual connexion with the Asiatic churches which Peter addresses, and so naturally salutes them, appears from Timothy, 4, 11; Colossians, 4, 10. Babylon—The Chaldean Babylon on the Euphrates. See Introduction, ON THE PLACE OF WRITING this epistle, in proof that Rome is not meant as papists assert; cf. FOOTNOTES sermon. How unlikely that in a friendly allusion the enigmatical title of Rome given in prophecy (John, Revelation, 17, 5), should be used! Babylon was the centre from which the Asiatic dispersion whom Peter addresses was derived. PHILO, Legat. ad Caium, sec. 26, and JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 15, 2, 3; 23, 12, inform us that Babylon contained a great many Jews in the apostolic age (whereas those at Rome were comparatively few, about 8000, JOSEPHUS, 17, 11); so it would naturally be visited by the apostle of the circumcision. It was the head-quarters of those whom he had so successfully addressed on Pentecost, Acts, 2, 9, Jewish "Parthians... dwellers in Mesopotamia" (the Parthians were then masters of Mesopotamian Babylon); these he ministered to in person. His other hearers, the Jewish "dwellers in Cappadocia, Pontus, Asia, Phrygia, Pamphylia" he now ministers to by letter. The earliest distinct authority for Peter's martyrdom at Rome is Dionysius, bishop of Corinth, in the latter half of the second century. The desirableness of representing Peter and Paul, the two leading apostles, as together founding the church of the metropolis, seems to have originated the tradition. CLEMENT of Rome (1 Epistola ad Corinthios, sec. 4, 6), often quoted for, is really against it. He mentions Paul and Peter together, but makes it a distinguishing circumstance of Paul, that he preached both in the East and West, implying that Peter never was in the West. In 2 Peter, 1, 14, he says, "I must shortly put off this tabernacle," implying his martyrdom was near, yet he makes no allusion to Rome, or any intention of his visiting it. 14, kiss of charity—Romans, 16, 16, "an holy kiss;" the token of love to God and the brethren. Love and holiness are inseparable. Cf. the instance, Acts, 20, 37. Peace—Peter's closing salutation; as Paul's is, "Grace be with you," though he accompanies it with "peace be to the brethren." "Peace" (flowing from salvation) was Christ's own salutation after the resurrection, and from Him Peter derives it. He with you all that are in Christ—The oldest MSS. omit "Jesus." In Ephesians, 6, 24, addressed to the same region, the same limitation of the salutation occurs, whence, perhaps, Peter here adopts it. Contrast "Be with you all," Romans, 16, 24; 1 Corinthians, 16, 23.

THE SECOND EPISTLE GENERAL OF

INTRODUCTION.

AUTHENTICITY AND GENUINENESS.—If not a gross imposture, its own internal witness is unequivocal in its favour. It has Peter's name and apostleship in its heading; not only his surname, but his original name, Simon, or Simeon, he thus, at the close of his life, reminding his readers who he originally was before his call. Again, in ch. 1, 16-18, it mentions his presence at the transfiguration, and Christ's prophecy of his death; and in ch. 3, 15, his brotherhood with Paul. Again, in ch. 3, 1, the author speaks of himself as author of the former epistle: it is, moreover, addressed so as to schools (but not to be restricted to) the same persons as the first, whom he presupposes to be acquainted with the writings of Paul, by that time recognised as "Scripture" (ch. 3, 15, "the long-suffering of God" cf. Romans, 2, 4). This necessarily implies a late date, when Paul's epistles (including Romans) already had become generally diffused and accepted as Scripture in the church. The church of the fourth century had, besides the testimony which we have of the doubts of the writer Christians, other external evidence which we have not, and which, doubtless, under God's overruling providence, decided them on accepting it. It is hard to understand how a book palpably false (as it would be, if Peter be not the author) could have been accepted in the Canon as finally established in the councils of Laodicea, 363 A.D. (if the 50th article be genuine), Hippo, and Carthage in the fourth century (384 and 397). The whole tone and spirit of the epistle disprove its being an imposture. He writes as one not speaking of himself, but moved by the Holy Ghost (ch. 1, 21). An attempt such a fraud in the first ages would have brought only shame and suffering, alike from Christians and heathen, on the perpetrator: there was then no temptation to pious frauds as in later times. That it must have been written in the earliest age, is plain from the wide gulf in style which separates it and the other New Testament Scriptures from even the latest and best of the post-apostolic period. Daille well says, "God has allowed a fosse to be drawn by human weakness round the sacred canon to protect it from all invasion."

Traces of acquaintance with it appear in the earliest fathers. Hermas, Similitudes, 6, 4; cf. ch. 2, 13, Greek "luxury in its day...luxuriating with their own deceivings;" and Shepherd, Vision, 3, 7, "They have left their true way" (cf. ch. 2, 15); and Vision, 4, 3, "Thou hast escaped this world" (cf. ch. 2, 19). Clement of Rome, ad Corinthios, c. 7, 9, and 10, as to Noah's reaching and Lot's deliverance, "the Lord making it known that He does not abandon those that trust in Him, but appoints those otherwise inclined to judgment" (cf. ch. 2, 5, 6, 7, 9). Irenaeus, A.D. 178 ("the day of the Lord is as a thousand distinctness of the subjects and objects testified in the same region. The grand antidote is "the full knowledge of our Lord and Saviour," through which we know God the Father, partake of His nature, escape from the pollutions of the world, and have entrance into Christ's kingdom. The aspect of Christ presented is not so much that of the past suffering, as of the future reigning, Saviour: His present power, and future new kingdom. This aspect is taken as best fitted to counteract the theories of the false teachers who should "deny" His Lordship and His coming again, the two very points which, as an apostle and eye witness, Peter attests (His "power" and His "coming"); also, to counteract their evil example in practice, blaspheming the way of truth, despising governments, slaves to covetousness and filthy lusts of the flesh, whilst boasting of Christian freedom, and, worst of all, apostates from the truth. The knowledge of Christ, as being the knowledge of "the way of righteousness," "the right way," is the antidote of their bad practice. Hence "the preacher of righteousness," Noah, and "righteous Lot," are instanced as escaping the destruction which overtook the "unjust" or "unrighteous;" and Balaam is instanced as exemplifying the awful result of "unrighteousness" such as characterised the false teachers. Thus the epistle forms one connected whole, the parts being closely bound together by mutual relation, and the end corresponding with the beginning; cf. ch. 2, 14, 18, with ch. 1, 2, in both "grace" and "peace" being connected with "the knowledge" of our Saviour; cf. also, ch. 2, 17, with 1, 4, 10, 18; and ch. 3, 18, "grow in grace and knowledge," with the fuller ch. 1, 5-8; and ch. 2, 21; and ch. 3, 13, "righteousness," with ch. 1, 1; and ch. 3, 1, with ch. 1, 13; and ch. 3, 2, with ch. 1, 19.

The pernas of Carpocratian and Gnostic heresies already existed, but the actual manifestation of these heresies is spoken of as future (ch. 2, 1, 2, &c.): another proof that this epistle was written, as it professes, in the apostolic age, before the development of the Gnostic heresies in the end of the first, and the beginning of the second centuries. The description is too general to identify the heresies with any particular one of the subsequent forms of heresy, but applies generally to them all.

Though altogether distinct in aim from the first epistle, yet a connexion may be traced. The neglect of the warnings to circumspection in the walk, led to the evils foretold in the second epistle. Cf. the warning against the abuse of Christian freedom, 1 Peter, 2, 16, with ch. 2, 19, "While they promise them liberty, they themselves are the servants of corruption;" also the caution against pride, 1 Peter, 5, 5, 6, with ch. 2, 18, "they speak great swelling words of vanity."

CHAPTER I.

VER. 1-21. ADDRESS: EXHORTATION TO ALL GRACES. AS GOD HAS GIVEN US, IN THE KNOWLEDGE OF CHRIST, ALL THINGS PERTAINING TO LIFE: CONFIRMED BY THE TESTIMONY OF APOSTLES, AND ALSO PROMPTED TO THE POWER AND COMING OF CHRIST, 1. Simon—the Greek form: in oldest MSS., "Symeon" (Hebrew, i.e., hearing; as in Acts, 15, 14. His mention of his original name, accords with the design of this second epistle, which is to warn against the coming false teachers, by setting forth the true "knowledge" of Christ on the testimony of the original apostolic eye-witnesses like himself. This was not required in the first epistle. servant—"slave": so Paul, Romans, 1, 1, to him, &c.—He addresses a wider range of readers (all believers) than in the first epistle, ch. 1, but means to include especially those addressed in the first epistle, as ch. 3, 1 proves, obtained—by grace. Applied by Peter to the receiving of the apostleship, lit., by allotment: as the Greek is, Luke, 1, 9; John, 19, 24. They did not acquire it for themselves; the Divine election is as independent of man's control, as the lot which is cast forth. like precious—"equally precious" to all: to those who believe, though not having seen Christ, as well as to Peter and those who have seen Him. For it lays hold of the same "exceeding great and precious promises," and the same "righteousness of God our Saviour." "The common salvation...the faith once delivered unto the saints" (Jude, 3. with us—apostles and eye-witnesses (v. 18). Though putting forward his apostleship to enforce his exhortation, he with true humility puts himself, as to "the faith," on a level with all other believers. The degree of faith varies in different believers; but in respect to its objects, present justification, sanctification, and future glorification, it is common alike to all. Christ is to all believers "made of God wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption." through—Greek, "in." Translate, as the one article to both nouns requires, "the righteousness of Him who is (at once) our God and (our) Saviour." Peter, confirming Paul's testimony to the same churches, adopts Paul's inspired phraseology. The gospel plan sets forth God's righteousness, which is Christ's righteousness, in the brightest light. Faith is its sphere in it as its peculiar element: God is in redemption "righteous," and at the same time a "Saviour": cf. Isaiah, 45, 21, "a just God and a Saviour." 2. Grace, peace—(1 Peter, 1, 2) through—Greek, "in:" the sphere in which alone grace and peace can be multiplied, knowledge—Greek, "full knowledge," of God, and of Jesus our Lord—the Father is here meant by "God," but the Son in v. 1: marking how entirely one the Father and Son are (John, 14, 7-11). The Vulgate omits "of God and," but oldest MSS. support the words. Still the prominent object of Peter's exhortation is "the knowledge of Jesus our Lord" (a phrase only in Romans, 4, 24, and only secondarily, of the Father through Him (v. 8; ch. 2, 20, v. 18). 3. According as—Seeing that. [ALFORD.] "As He hath given us ALL things (needful) for life and godliness, (so do you give ALL diligence, &c. The oil and flame are given wholly of grace by God, and "taken" by believers; their part henceforth is to "trim their lamps" (cf. v. 3, 4, with 5, &c.). life and godliness—Spiritual life must exist first before there can be true godliness. Knowledge of God experimentally is the first step to life (John, 17, 3). The child must have vital breath first, and then cry to, and walk in the ways of, his father. It is not by godliness that we obtain life, but by life, godliness. To life stands opposed corruption; to godliness, lust (v. 4. called us—v. 10—"calling" (1 Peter, 2, 9. to glory and virtue—rather, "through (His) glory." Thus English Version reads as one oldest MS. But other oldest MSS, and Vulgate read, "By His own (peculiar) glory and virtue;" being the explanation of "His divine power;" glory and mora excellency (the same attribute is given to God in 1 Peter, 2, 9, "praises," lit., virtues; characterise God's "power." "Virtue," the standing word in heathen ethics, is found only once in Paul, Philippians, 4, 8, and in Peter in a distinct sense from his classic usage: it (in the heathen sense; is a term too low and earthly for expressing the gifts of the Spirit. (BRACH Synonymus.) 4. Whereby—By His glory and virtue: His glory making the "promises" to be exceeding great; His virtue making them "precious." (BRACH.) Precious promises are the object of precious faith, given—the promises themselves are a gift: for God's promises are as sure as if they were fulfilled, by these—promises. They are the object of faith, and even now have a sanctifying effect on the believer, assimilating him to God. Still more so, when they shall be fulfilled, might—Greek, "that ye MAY become partakers of the Divine nature," even now in part; hereafter, perfectly; 1 John, 3, 2, "We shall be like Him:" the divine nature—not God's essence, but His holiness, including His "glory" and "virtue," v. 3: the opposite to "corruption through lust." Sanctification is the imparting to us of God Himself by the Holy Spirit in the soul. We by faith

Their faith answering to "knowledge of Him," v. 3; is presupposed as the gift of God (v. 3; Ephesians, 2. 8), and is not required to be ministered by us: in its exercise, virtue is to be, moreover, ministered. Each grace being assumed, becomes the stepping-stone to the succeeding grace; and the latter in turn qualifies and completes the former. Faith leads the band: love brings up the rear. [BENJEL.] The fruits of faith specified are seven, the perfect number. virtues—moral excellency: manly strenuous energy, answering to the virtue (energetic excellency) of God. and to—Greek, "IN;" and in (the exercise of your virtue knowledge," viz., practical discrimination of good and evil: intelligent appreciation of what is the will of God in each detail of practice. 6. Greek, "And in your knowledge self-control." In the exercise of Christian knowledge or discernment of God's will, let there be the practical fruit of self-control as to one's lusts and passions. Incontinence weakens the mind: continence, or self-control, removes weakness and imparts strength. [BENJEL.] "And in your self-control patient endurance" amidst sufferings, so much dwelt on in the first epistle, ch. 2. 3., and 4. "And in your patient endurance godliness?" It is not to be mere stoical endurance, but united to [and flowing from] God-trusting. [ALFORD.] 7. "And in your godliness brotherly kindness;" not suffering your godliness to be moroseness, nor a sullen solitary habit of life, but kind, generous, and courteous. [ALFORD.] Your natural affection and brotherly kindness are to be sanctified by godliness. "And in your brotherly kindness love," viz., to all men, even to enemies. In thought, word, and deed. From brotherly kindness we are to go forward to love. Cf. 1 Thessalonians, 3. 12. "Love one toward another (brotherly kindness), and toward all men" (charity). So charity completes the choir of graces in Colossians, 3. 14. In a retrograde order, he who has love will exercise

He feels there is likely to be more and more need of admonition on account of the increasing corruption (ch. 2, 1, 3). In the present truth—the gospel-truth now present with you: formerly promised to Old Testament believers as about to be, now in the New Testament actually present with, and in, believers, so that they are "established" in it as a "present" reality. Its importance renders frequent admonitions never superfluous: cf. Paul's similar apology, Romans, 16, 14, 16, 12. Yes—Greek. "But," though "you know" the truth (s. 12), this tabernacle—soon to be taken down (3 Corinthians, 5, 1): I therefore need to make the most of my short time for the good of Christ's church. The zeal of Satan against it, the more intense as his time is short, ought to stimulate Christians on the same ground. by—Greek, "in" (cf. ch. 3, 1). 14, shortly I must put off—Greek, "the putting off (as a garment) of my tabernacle is speedy": implying a soon approaching, and also a sudden death (as a violent death). Christ's words, John, 8, 18, 19, "When thou art old," &c., were the ground of his "knowing," now that he was old, that his foretold martyrdom was near. Cf. as to Paul, 2 Ti. 4, 6. Though a violent death, he calls it a "departure" (Greek for "decease," s. 15). cf. Acts, 7, 60, 18. endeavour—"use my diligence," the same Greek word as in s. 10: this is the field in which my diligence has scope. Peter thus fulfils Christ's charge, "Feed my sheep," "decease"—"departure." The very word (exodus) used in the transfiguration, Moses and Elias conversing about Christ's decease (found no where else in the New Testament, but He. 11, 22, "the departing of Israel" out of Egypt, to which the saints' deliverance from the present bondage of corruption answers). "Tabernacle" is another term found here as well as there (Luke, 9, 31, 33): an undesigned coincidence confirming Peter's authorship of this epistle. that ye may be able—by the help of this written epistle: and perhaps also of St. Mark's gospel, which Peter superintended. always—Greek, "on each occasion:" as often as occasion may require, to have...in remembrance—Greek, "to exercise remembrance of." But cf. also ch. 2, 3, "fabled words," fables—as the heathen mythologies, and the subsequent Gnostic "fables and genealogies," of which the germs already existed in the junction of Judaism with Oriental philosophy in Asia Minor. A precautionary protest of the Spirit against the rationalistic theory of the gospel history being myth. when we made known unto you—not that Peter himself had personally taught the churches in Pontus, Galatia, &c.; but he was one of the apostles whose testimony was borne to them, and to the church in general, to whom this epistle is addressed (ch. 1, 1, including, but not restricted, as 1 Peter, to the churches in Pontus, &c.) power—the opposite of "fables": cf. the contrast of "word" and "power," 1 Corinthians, 4, 20. A specimen of His power was given at the transfiguration; also of His "coming" again, and its attendant glory. The Greek for "coming" is always used of His second advent. "His Excellency," Deuteronomy, 32, 26; Psalm 21, 6). in whom—Greek, "in regard to whom" (accusative); but Matthew, 17, 8, "in whom" (dative) centres and rests my good pleasure. Peter also omits, as not required by his purpose, "hear Him," showing his independence in his inspired testimony. I am—Greek aorist, past time. "My good pleasure rested from eternity," 18. we—Emphatical: we, James and John, as well as myself, which came—rather as Greek, "we heard borne from heaven." holy mount—as the transfiguration mount came to be regarded, on account of the manifestation of Christ's divine glory there. 19. and—and so, viz., by this sample of Christ's glory in His humiliation (John, 1, 14), and earnest of His coming glory in His exaltation. We—all believers, a mere sure—rather as Greek, "we have the word of prophecy more sure" (confirmed). Previously we knew its sureness by faith, but, through that visible specimen of its hereafter entire fulfilment, assurance is made doubly sure. Prophecy assures us that Christ's sufferings, now past, are to be followed by Christ's glory, still future: the transfiguration gives us a pledge to make our faith still stronger, that "the day" of His glory will "dawn" ere long. He does not mean to say that "the word of prophecy," or Scripture, is surer than the voice of God heard at the transfiguration, as English Version; for this is plainly not the fact. The fulfilment of prophecy so far in Christ's history makes us the surer of what is yet to be fulfilled, His consummated glory. The word was the "lamp (Greek for 'light,' headed" by Old Testament believers, until a gleam of the "day-dawn" was given at Christ's first coming, and especially in His transfiguration. So the word is a lamp to us still, until "the day" burst forth fully at the second coming of "the Sun of righteousness." The day, when it dawns upon you, makes sure the fact that you saw correctly, though indistinctly, the objects revealed by the lamp, wherunto—to which word of prophecy, primarily the Old Testament in Peter's day; but now also in our day the New Testament, which, though brighter than the Old Testament (cf. 1 John, 2, 8, end), is but a lamp even still as compared with the brightness of the eternal day (cf. ch. 3, 2). Oral teachings and traditions of ministers are to be tested by the written word (Acts, 17, 11). dark—the Greek implies equality, having neither water nor light: such spiritually is the world without, and the smaller world (microcosm) within, the heart in its natural state. Cf. the "dry places," Luke, 11, 24 (viz., unwatered by the Spirit), through which the unclean spirit goeth, dawn—bursting through the darkness. day-star—Greek, "the morning star," as Revelation, 22, 16. The Lord Jesus, in your hearts—Christ's arising in the heart by His Spirit giving full assurance, creates spiritually full day in the heart, the means to which is prayerfully giving heed to the word. This is associated with the coming of the day of the Lord, as being the earnest of it. Indeed, even our hearts shall not fully realize Christ in all His unspeakable glory and felt presence, until He shall come (Malachi, 4, 2). Isaiah, 66, 14, 15, "When you see this, your heart shall rejoice...For, behold, the Lord will come." However, TREKOLLER'S punctuation is best, "Wherunto ye do well to take heed as unto a light shining in a dark place, until the day have dawned and the words

 "private interpretation," contrasted with "moved by the Holy Ghost," here answers to "fables devised by human wisdom," contrasted with "we were eyewitnesses of His majesty," &c., as attested by the "voices from God." The words of the prophetic (and so of all) Scripture-writers were not mere words of the individuals, and therefore to be interpreted by them, but of "the Holy Ghost" by whom they were "moved."
 "Private" is explained, v. 21, "by the will of man" (viz., the individual writer). In a secondary sense the text teaches also, as the word is the Holy Spirit, it cannot be interpreted by its readers any more than by its writers by their mere private human powers, but by the teaching of the Holy Ghost (John, 14. 14). "He who is the author of Scripture is its supreme interpreter." [GERHARD.] ALFORD translates, "Springs not out of human interpretation," i. e., is not a prognostication made by a man, knowing what he means when he utters it, but, &c. (John, 11. 49-52). Rightly: except that the verb is rather, Doth become, or prove to be.
 It not being of private interpretation, you must "give your hearts" (cf. Notes, v. 19). 21. came not in old time [BENGLI.] Judgment before God, not the angels. How great is the dignity of angels who, as Christ's assessors, shall hereafter judge! Meanwhile, railing judgments, though in truth, against dignities, as being uttered merely, are of the nature of "blasphemies" (1 Corinthians, 4. 4. 5). If superior angels dare to bring in the presence of God, the Judge, speak evil of the bad angels, how awful the presumption of those who speak evil blasphemously of good men. 2 Samuel, 16. 7, 8, Shimei; Numbers, 16. 27, 28, &c., referred to also in Jude, 11; Numbers, "Were ye (Aaron and Miriam) not afraid to set off my servant Moses?" Or as Vulgate, CALVIN, &c., 'the luxury which is but for a day:' so Hebrew, 11. 25, 'the pleasures of sin for a season:' and 12. 16, Esau) to be pleasure," i.e., to be their chief good and highest enjoyment. Spots—in themselves, blamishes—disgraces: bringing blame (so the Greek) on the church and on Christianity itself, sporting themselves—Greek, "luxuriating," with—Greek, "in." deceivings—Or else passively, "deceits: luxuries gotten by deceit." Cf. Matthew, 13. 22, "Deceitfulness of riches;" Ephesians, 4. 22, "Deceitful lusts." Whilst deceiving others, they are deceived themselves. Cf. with English Version, Philipians, 3. 19, "Whose glory is in their shame." "Their own" stands in opposition to "you;" "Whilst partaking of the love-feast (cf. Jude, 12) with you," they are at the same time "luxuriating in their own deceivings," or "deceits" (to which latter clause answers Jude, 12, end: Peter presents the positive side, "they luxuriate in their own deceivings;" Jude, the negative, "feeding themselves without fear.") But several of the oldest MSS., Vulgate, Syriac, and Sahidic Versions read (as Jude), "In their own love feasts;" "their own" will then imply that they pervert the love-feasts so as to make them subserve their own self-indulgent purposes. 14. full of adultery—i.e., "full of an adulteress," as though they carried about adulteresses always dwelling in their eyes: the eye being the avenue of lust. Cursing and covetousness, as in Balaam's case, often go together: the curse he designed for Israel, fell on Israel's foes and on himself. True believers bless, and curse not, and so are blessed. 15. have—Some of the seducers are spoken of as already come, others as yet to come. following—out: so the Greek, the way—(Numbers, 22. 23, 32; Isaiah, 66. 11.) son of Boor—the same as Boor (Numbers, 22. 5). This form was adopted, perhaps, because the kindred word Boor means flesh; and Balaam is justly termed son of carnality, as covetous, and the enticer of Israel to lust, loved the wages of unrighteousness—and therefore wished (in order to gain them from Balak) to curse Israel whom God had blessed, and at last gave the hellish counsel, that the only way to bring God's curse on Israel was to entice them to fleshly lust and idolatry, which often go together. 16. was rebuked—Greek, "had a rebuke," or conviction; an exposure of his specious wickedness on his being tested (the root verb of the Greek noun means to convict or testing). his—Greek, "his own:" his own beast convicted him of his own iniquity. —

It was not the words of the ass (for it merely deprecated his beating it), but the miraculous fact of its speaking at all, which withstood Balaam's perversity in desiring to go after God had forbidden him in the first instance. Thus indirectly the ass, and directly the angel, rebuked his worse than asinine obstinacy: the ass turned aside at the sight of the angel, but Balaam, after God had plainly said, Thou shalt not go, persevered in wishing to go for gain; thus the ass, in act, forbade his madness. How awful a contrast—a dumb beast forbidding an inspired prophet! 17. "Clouds" is a transcriber's correction from Jude, 12, where it is appropriate, "clouds ... without water" (promising what they do not perform); but not here, "mists driven along by a tempest." mist—blackness: "the chilling horror accompanying darkness." FABER argues from this that the millennium, &c., must precede Christ's literal coming, not follow it. The Greek may mean "hastening (i.e., urging onward [ALFORD]) the day of God;" not that God's eternal appointment of the time is changeable, but God appoints us as instruments of accomplishing those events which must be first before the day of God can come. By praying for His coming, furthering the preaching of the gospel for a witness to all nations, and bringing in those whom "the long-suffering of God" waits to save, we hasten the coming of the day of God. The Greek verb is always in New Testament used as Neuter (as English Version here), not Active; but the LXX. use it actively. Christ says, "Surely I come quickly. Amen." Our part is to speed forward this consummation by praying. "Even so,

The Pauline epistles were by this time become the common property of all the churches, The "all" seems to imply they were now completed, The subject of the Lord's coming is handled, 1 Thessalonians, 4, 13-5, 11; cf. e. 10, with 1 Thessalonians, 5, 2. When religion is studied as a science, nothing is more abstruse; when studied in order to know our duty and practise it, nothing is easier. unstable—not yet established in what they have learned; shaken by every seeming difficulty; who, in perplexing texts, instead of waiting until God by His Spirit make them plain in comparing them with other Scriptures, hastily adopt distorted views, wrest—strain and twist (properly with a hand-screw) what is straight in itself, e.g., 2 Timothy, 2, 18, other scriptures—Paul's epistles were, therefore, by this time, recognised in the church, as "Scripture;" a term never applied in any of the fifty places where it occurs, save to the Old and New Testament sacred writings. Men in each church having miraculous discernments of spirits would have prevented any uninspired writing from being put on a par with the Old Testament word of God; the apostles' lives also were providentially prolonged, Paul and Peter's at least to thirty-four years after Christ's resurrection, John's to thirty years later, so that fraud in the canon is out of question. The three first Gospels and Acts are included in "the other Scriptures," and perhaps all the New Testament books, save John and Revelation, written later, and their own destruction—not through Paul's fault (ch. 11, 17, Ye—Warned by the case of those "unlearned and unstable" persons (e. 16), knowing...before—the evoked away with—the very term, as Peter remembers, used by Paul of Barnabas' being "carried," Greek, hul away with, Peter and the other Jews in their hypocritical—lawless, as in ch. 2, 7, fall from—grace, Galatians, 3, 4: the true source of "steadfastness" or stability in contrast with the "unstable" (e. 16: "established" (ch. 1, 12): all kindred Greek terms. THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF

SHIP.—Polycarp, the disciple of John (see Philippenses, c. 7), quotes ch. 4. 3. Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, says of Papias, a hearer of John, and friend of Polycarp, "He used testimonies from the first epistle of John."ording to Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 3. 3, often quoted this epistle. So in his work against Heretics (2. 18. 4 from John by name, ch. 2. 18. 4; and in 2. 16. 7, he quotes ch. 4. 1-3; 5. 1, and 2 John, 7. 3. Clement of Stromata, 2. 68, p. 464, refers to ch. 2. 18. 4 as in John's larger epistle. See other quotations, Stromata, 2. 28, 45; Ilian, adversus Marcion, 2. 16, refers to ch. 4. 1, 2; adversus Praxean, c. 15, to 1 John, 1. 1. See his other quotations contra Gnosticos, 12. Cyprian, Epistle 36 (34), quotes, as John's, ch. 2. 3; 4, and de Oratibus Domini, 2. 15-17; and de Opere and Elamos, ch. 1. 8; and de Bono Patientia, 2, quotes ch. 2. 6. Muratori's fragment on ites, "There are two of John (the gospel and epistle 7) esteemed Catholic," and quotes ch. 1. 2. The Prædictio ne it. Origin in Eusebius, 6. 25, speaks of the first epistle as genuine, and "probably the second and third, o not recognise the latter two:" on the Gospel of John, tom, 12., vol. 2, he quotes ch. 1. 5. Dionysius of Alexn's scholar, cites the words of this epistle as those of the Evangelist John. Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 2. n's first epistle and gospel are acknowledged without question by those of the present day, as well as by the also Jerome, in Catalogus Ecclesiasticorum Scriptorum. The opposition of Cosmas Indicopleustes, in the 7, and that of Marcion, because our epistle was inconsistent with his views, are of no weight against such testimony.

mal evidence is equally strong. Neither the gospel, nor our epistle, can be pronounced an imitation; yet both, modes of thought, are evidently of the same mind. The individual notices are not so numerous or obvious writings, as was to be expected in a Catholic epistle; but such as there are, accord with John's position. He postleship, and perhaps alludes to his gospel, and the affectionate tie which bound him as an aged pastor to "children;" and in ch. 2. 18, 19; 4. 1-3, he alludes to the false teachers as known to his readers; and in ch. 1. 1-3; and the germs of docetism, though not fully developed till the second century, were in existence The Spirit, presciently through John, puts the church beforehand on its guard against the coming heresy.

M. ADDRESSED.—Augustine, Quant. Evang., 2. 29, says this epistle was written to the Parthians. Bede, in a the seven Catholic epistles, says that Athanasius attests the same. By the Parthians may be meant the ving beyond the Euphrates in the Parthian territory, outside the Roman empire, "the church at Babylon er with" the churches in the Ephesian region, the quarter to which Peter addressed his epistles. As Peter's flock which John subsequently tended (and in which Paul had formerly ministered), so John, Peter's close ster the ascension, addresses the flock among whom Peter had been when he wrote. Thus "the elect s to "the church elected together." See further confirmation of this view in Introduction to 2 John. It is ly an objection to this view, that John never is known to have personally ministered in the Parthian terri- sither did Peter personally minister to the churches in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, Bithynia, though epistles to them. Moreover, in John's prolonged life, we cannot dogmatically assert that he did not visit Christians, after Peter had ceased to minister to them, on the mere ground of absence of extant testi- effect. This is as probable a view as Alford's, &c., that, in the passage of Augustine, "to the Parthians," red by conjectural emendation; and that the epistle is addressed to the churches at and around Ephesus, on 'the fatherly tone of affectionate address in it, implying his personal ministry among his readers. But his obably the only surviving apostle, accords very well with his addressing, in a Catholic epistle, a cycle of churches ; not have specially ministered to in person, with affectionate fatherly counsel, by virtue of his general apostolic ace of all the churches.

ND PLACE OF WRITING.—This epistle seems to have been written subsequently to his gospel, as it assumes acquaintance with the gospel facts and Christ's speeches, and also with the special aspect of the incarnate I manifest in the flesh, set forth more fully in his gospel. The tone of address, as a father addressing his n" (the continually-recurring term), accords with the view that this epistle was written in John's old age, per- .A.D. In ch. 2. 18, "It is the last time," probably does not refer to any particular event, as the destruction of hich was now many years past, but refers to the nearness of the Lord's coming as proved by the rise of a teachers, the mark of the last time. It was the Spirit's purpose to keep the church always expecting Christ me at any moment. The whole Christian age is the last time in the sense that no other dispensation is to ist come. Cf. "these last days," Hebrews, 1. 2. Ephesus may be conjectured to be the place whence it is ontroversial allusions to the germs of Gnostic heresy, accord with Asia Minor being the place, and the last otologic are the time, of writing this epistle.

TS.—The leading subject of the whole is, fellowship with the Father and the Son (ch. 1. 3). Two principal e noted, (1.) ch. 1. 5, 2. 28: the theme of this portion is stated at the outset, "God is light, and in Him is no ill;" consequently, in order to have fellowship with Him, we must walk in light; connected with which is the d subsequent forgiveness of our sins through Christ's propitiation and advocacy, without which forgiveness s no light or fellowship with God: a further step in thus walking in the light is, positively keeping God's com- the sum of which is love, as opposed to hatred, the same of disobedience to God's word: negatively, he exhorts ng to their several stages of spiritual growth, children, fathers, young men, in consonance with their privileges owing the Father, and having overcome the wicked one, not to love the world, which is incompatible with the the laws of the Father, and to be on their guard against the anti-Christian teachers already in the world, who the church, but of the world, against whom the true defence is, that his believing readers who have the God, should continue to abide in the Son and in the Father. (2.) The second division (ch. 2. 20, 5. 5) discusse s which it opens, "He is righteous;" consequently (as in the first division), "every one that doeth righteousness is born of Him." Sonship in us involves our purifying ourselves as He is pure, even as we hope to see, and therefore to be made like our Lord when He shall appear: in this second, as in the first division, both a positive and a negative side are presented of "doing righteousness as He is righteous," involving a contrast between the children of God and the children of the devil. Hatred marks the latter; love, the former: this love gives assurance of acceptance with God for ourselves and our prayers, accompanied as they are (v. 23) with obedience to His great commandment, to "believe on Jesus, and love one another": the seal (v. 24) of His dwelling in us and assuring our hearts, is the Spirit which He hath given us. In contrast to this (as in the first division), He warns against false spirits, the notes of which are, denial of Christ, and adherence to the world. Sonship, or birth of God, is, then, more fully described: its essential feature is unslavish free love to God, because God first loved us, and gave His Son to die for us, and consequently live for His brethren, grounded on their being sons of God also like ourselves, and so victory over the world: this victory being gained only by the man who believes in Jesus as the Son of God. (3.) The conclusion establishes this last central truth, on which rests our fellowship with God, Christ's having come by the water of baptism, the blood of atonement, and the witnessing Spirit, which is truth. As in the opening, he rested this cardinal truth on the apostles' witness of the eye, the ear, and the touch, so now at the close he rests it on God's witness, which is accepted by the believer, in contrast with the unbeliever who makes God a liar. Then follows his closing statement of his reason for writing (ch. 3. 18; cf. the corresponding ch. 1. 4, at the beginning, namely, that believers in Christ the Son of God may know that they have (now already) eternal life (the source of "joy," ch. 1. 4; cf. similarly his subject in writing the gospel, John, 20. 31), and so have confidence as to their prayers being answered (corresponding to ch. 3. 22 in the second part); for instance, their intercessions for a sinning brother (unless his sin be a sin unto death). His close with a brief summing up of the instruction of the epistle, the high dignity, sanctity, and safety from evil, of the children of God, in contrast to the sinful world, and a warning against idolatry, literal and spiritual: "Keep yourselves from idols."

Though the epistle is not directly polemical, the occasion which suggested his writing was probably the rise of anti-Christian teachers; and, because he knew the spiritual character of the several classes whom he addresses, children, parents, fathers, he feels it necessary to write to confirm them in the faith and joyful fellowship of the Father and Son, and to assure them of the reality of the things they believe, that so they may have the full privileges of believing.

STYLE.—His peculiarity is fondness for aphorism and repetition. His tendency to repeat his own phrases arises partly from the affectionate, hortatory character of the epistle; partly, also, from its Hebraistic form, abounding in parallel clauses, as distinguished from the Grecian and more logical style of Paul; also, from his child-like simplicity of spirit which, full of his one grand theme, repeats, and dwells on it, with fond delight and enthusiasm. Moreover, as Axford well says, the appearance of uniformity is often produced by want of deep enough exegesis to discover the real differences in passages which seem to express the same. Contemplative, rather than argumentative, he dwells more on the general, than on the particular, on the inner, than on the outer Christian life. Certain fundamental truths he recurs again and again to, at one time enlarging on, and applying them, at another time repeating them in their condensed simplicity. The thoughts do not march onward by successive steps, as in the logical style of Paul, but rather in circles drawn round one central thought which he reiterates, ever reverting to it, and viewing it, now under its positive, now under its negative aspect. Many terms which in the gospel are given as Christ's, in the epistle appear as the favourite expressions of John, naturally adopted from the Lord. Thus the contrasted terms, "flesh" and "spirit," "light" and "darkness," "life" and "death," "abide in Him": "fellowship with the Father and Son, and with one another," is a favourite phrase also, not found in the gospel, but in Acts, and Paul's epistles. In him appears the harmonious union of opposites, adapting him for his high functions in the kingdom of God, contemplative repose of character, and at the same time ardent zeal, combined with burning, all-absorbing love: less adapted for active outward work, such as Paul's, than for spiritual service. He handles Christian virtues not as abstract dogmas, but as living realities, personally enjoyed in fellowship with God in Christ, and with the brethren. Simple, and at the same time profound, his writing is in consonance with his spirit, untheoretical, and undialectic, gentle, consolatory, and loving: the reflexion of the Spirit of Him in whose breast he lay at the last supper, and whose beloved disciple he was. Ewald in Axford, speaking of the "unruffled and heavenly repose" which characterizes this epistle, says, "It appears to be the tone, not so much of a father talking with his beloved children, as of a glorified saint addressing mankind from a higher world. Never in any writing has the doctrine of heavenly love, as love working in stillness, ever unwearied, never exhausted, so thoroughly proved itself, as in this epistle."

JOHN'S PLACE IN THE BUILDING UP OF THE CHURCH.—As Peter founded, and Paul propagated, so John completed the spiritual building. As the Old Testament puts prominently forward the fear of God, so John, the last writer of the New Testament, gives prominence to the love of God. Yet, as the Old Testament is not all limited to presenting the fear of God, but sets forth also His love, so John, as a representative of the New Testament, whilst breathing so continually the spirit of love, gives also the plainest and most awful warnings against sin, in accordance with his original character as Boanerges, "son of thunder." His mother was Salome, mother of the sons of Zebedee, probably sister to Jesus' mother (cf. John, 19. 25, "His mother's sister," with Matthew, 27. 56; Mark, 15. 40, so that he was cousin of our Lord; cf. his mother, under God, he may have owed his first serious impressions. Expecting, as she did, the Messianic kingdom of glory, as appears from her petition (Matthew, 20. 30-32), she doubtless tried to fill his young and ardent mind with the same hope. Neander distinguishes three leading tendencies in the development of the Christian doctrine, the Pauline, the Jacobean (between which the Petrine forms an intermediate link), and the Johannine. John, in common with James, was less disposed to the intellectual and dialectic cast of thought which distinguishes Paul. He had not, like the apostle of the Gentiles, been brought to faith and peace through severe conflict; but, like James, had reached his Christian individuality through a quiet development: James however, had passed through a moulding in Judaism previously, which, under the Spirit, caused him to present Christian truth in connexion with the law, in so far as the latter in its spirit, though not letter, is permanent, and not abolished, but established under the gospel. But John, from the first, had drawn his whole spiritual development from the personal view of Christ, the model man, and from intercourse with Him. Hence, in his writings, every thing turns on one simple contrast: divine life in communion with Christ; death in separation from Him, as appears from his characteristic phrases, "life, light, truth; death, darkness, lie." As James and Peter mark the gradual transition from spiritualized Judaism to the independent development of Christianity, and as Paul represents the independent development of Christianity in opposition to the Jewish stand-point, so the contemplative element of John reconciles the two, and forms the closing point in the training of the apostolic church. [Neander.]

CHAPTER I.

E. 1A. THE WRITER'S AUTHORITY AS AN WRITER TO THE COMPE. FACTS, HAVING HEARD, AND HANDLED HIM WHO WAS FROM BEGINNING: HIS OBJECT IN WRITING: HIS MESSAGE. IF WE WOULD HAVE FELLOWSHIP WITH, WE MUST WALK IN LIGHT, AS HE IS LIGHT. Instead of a formal, John adopts a virtual address: 6. To wish joy to the reader was the ancient way address. The sentence begun in v. 1, is cut off by the parenthetic v. 2, and is resumed at with the repetition of some words from v. 1. That was—not "began to be," but was essentially is, not was (was) before He was manifested answering to "Him that is from the beginning" v. 2; so John's gospel, 1. 1, "In the beginning is the Word." Proverbs, 8. 22, "I was set up from the beginning, or ever the earth was." We—apostles. heard... seen... looked upon... 6—A series rising in gradation. Seeing is a more high proof than hearing of; handling, than seeing. "Have heard... have seen" (perfects), as reason still abiding with us; but in Greek (not with Person "have," but simply) "looked upon" is, as of a continuing thing, but aorist, past whilst Christ the incarnate Word was still with them, viz., His glory, as revealed in the trans- action and in His miracles; and His passion and a real body of flesh and blood. "Looked upon" redundant spectacle steadily, deeply, contem- plating: so the Greek. Appropriate to John's con- crete character. hands... handled—Thomas and his disciples on distinct occasions after the resur- rection. John himself had leant on Jesus' breast that supper. Contrast the wisest of the heathen before the same Greek as here; groping after the hand of a happy they might find God. This against Socinians, he is here speaking of the incarnate Word, not of Christ's teaching the beginning of His official life. 6—"concerning" heard. "Heard" is the verb most fit for the purpose of the epistle, viz., the truth which had heard concerning the Word of life, i.e., the Word who is the life. "Heard," viz., from Himself, including all Christ's teachings about it. Therefore he puts "of," or "concerning," "the word of life," which is inapplicable to the verbs except "heard;" also "heard" is the use of the verbs which he resumes at v. 5. 2. the use, "the Word of life," was manifested—who previously been "with the Father." show—trans- lating v. 3, "declares" (cf. v. 5). Declares in the term: write is the particular (v. 4). that eter- nal—Greek, "the life which is eternal." As the begins, so it ends with "eternal life," which is ever enjoy with, and in, Him who is "the life" which—Greek, "the which," the before- mentioned (v. 1) life which was with the Father "from the beginning" (cf. John, 1. 1). This proves the distinct- ness of the First and Second Persons in the one God. 3. That which we have seen and heard—Re- turn v. 1, wherein the sentence, being inter- rupted v. 2, parenthesis, was left incomplete. de- clare you—Oldest MSS. add also: unto you also we have not seen or heard Him. that ye also may have fellowship with us—that ye also who have not seen enjoy: what that fellowship consists in needs to state. "Our fellowship is with the Fa- ther with His Son." Faith realizes what we have as spiritually visible; not till by faith we too know, do we know all the excellency of the true God. He Himself is ours: He in us and we in Him. We are "partakers of the Divine nature." We had only by having fellowship with Him; He

may thus be known, but not comprehended. The repetition of "with" before the "Son," distinguishes the persons, whilst the fellowship or communion with both Father and Son, implies their unity. It is not added, "and with the Holy Ghost;" for it is by the Holy Ghost or Spirit of the Father and Son in us, that we are enabled to have fellowship with the Father and Son (cf. ch. 3. 24). Believers enjoy the fellowship or, but not WITH, the Holy Ghost. "Through Christ God closes up the chasm that separated Him from the human race, and imparts Himself to them in the communion of the Divine life." [NEANDER.] 4. these things—and none other, viz., this whole epistle. write we unto you—Some oldest MSS. omit "unto you," and emphasize "we." Thus the antithesis is between "we" (apostles and eye-witnesses) and "your." We write thus, that your joy may be full. Other oldest MSS. and versions read "OUR joy," viz., that our joy may be filled full by bringing you also into fellowship with the Father and Son. Cf. John, 4. 36, and 1; Philipians, 2. 2, "Full ye my joy." 16; and 4. 1; 2 John, 8. It is possible that "your" may be a cor- rection of transcribers to make this verse harmonize with John, 15. 11; 16. 24; however, as John often repeats favourite phrases, he may do so here, so "your" may be from himself. So 2 John, 12, "your" in oldest MSS. The authority of MSS. and versions on both sides here is almost evenly balanced. Christ Him- self is the source, object, and centre of His people's joy (cf. v. 3, end); it is in fellowship with Him that we have joy, the fruit of faith. 5. First Division of the body of the epistle (cf. Introduction), declares—Greek, "an- nounce;" report in turn: a different Greek word from v. 3. As the Son announced the message heard from the Father as His apostle, so the Son's apostles an- nounce what they have heard from the Son. John no where uses the term "gospel," but the witness or testimony, the word, the truth, and here the message. God is light—What light is in the natural world, that God, the source of even material light, is in the spiritual, the fountain of wisdom, purity, beauty, joy, and glory. As all material life and growth depend on light, so all spiritual life and growth depend on God. As God here, so Christ, in ch. 2. 8, is called "the true light." no darkness at all—Strong negation: Greek, "No, not even one speck of darkness;" no ignorance, error, untruthfulness, sin, or death. John heard this from Christ, not only in express words, but in His acted words, viz., His whole manifestation in the flesh as "the brightness of the Father's glory." Christ Himself was the embodiment of "the message," representing fully in all His sayings, doings, and sufferings, Him who is LIGHT. 6. say—profess, have fellowship with him—(v. 3). The essence of the Chris- tian life, walk—in inward and outward action, whither- soever we turn ourselves. [BANKS], in darkness—Greek, "in the darkness," opposed to "the light" (cf. ch. 2. 8, 11). lie—(ch. 2. 4). do not—in practice, what- ever we say, the truth—(Ephesians, 4. 21; John, 3. 21.) 7. Cf. Ephesians, 5. 8, 11-14. "WE WALK;" "God is essentially in His very nature as "the light," v. 6) in the light." WALKING in the light, the element in which God Himself is, constitutes the test of fellow- ship with Him. Christ, like us, walked in the light (ch. 2. 6). ALFORD notices, Walking in the light as He is in the light, is no mere imitation of God, but an identity in the essential element of our daily walk with the essential element of God's eternal being. we have fellowship one with another—and of course with God (to be understood from v. 6), without having fellow- ship with whom there can be no true and Christian fellowship one with another (cf. v. 3). and—as the result of "walking in the light, as He is in the light." the blood of Jesus... cleanseth us from all sin—daily con- tracted through the sinful weakness of the flesh, and the power of Satan and the world. He is speaking, not of justification through His blood once for all, but of the present sanctification ["cleanseth" is present] which the believer, walking in the light and having fellowship with God and the saints, enjoys as His privilege. Cf. John, 13, 19, Greek, "He that has been bathed, needeth not save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit." Cf. v. 9, "cleanse us from all unrighteousness," a further step besides "forgiving us our sins." Christ's blood is the cleansing mean, whereby gradually, being already justified and in fellowship with God, we become clean from all sin which would mar our fellowship with God. Faith applies the cleansing, purifying blood. Some oldest MSS. omit "Christ," others retain it. 8. The confession of sins is a necessary consequence of "walking in the light" (v. 7). "If thou shalt confess thyself a sinner, the truth is in thee: for the truth is itself light. Not yet has thy life become perfectly light, as sins are still in thee, but yet thou hast already begun to be illuminated, because there is in thee confession of sins." [AUGUSTINE.] That we have no sin—"HAVE," not "have had," must refer not to the past sinful life whilst unconverted, but to the present state wherein believers have sin even still. Observe, "sin" is in the singular; "(confess our) sins" (v. 9) in the plural. Sin refers to the corruption of the old man still present in us, and the stain created by the actual sins flowing from that old nature in us. To confess our need of cleansing from present sin is essential to "walking in the light;" so far is the presence of some sin incompatible with our in the main "walking in light." But the believer hates, confesses, and longs to be delivered from, all sin, which is darkness. "They who defend their sins, will see in the great day whether their sins can defend them," deceive themselves—We cannot deceive God; we only make ourselves to err from the right path. the truth—(ch. 2, 4.) True faith, "The truth respecting God's holiness and our insufficiency, which is the very first spark of light in us, has no place in us." [ALFORD.] 9. confess—with the lips, speaking from a contrite heart; involving also confession to our fellowmen of offences committed against them. he—God, faithful—to His own promises: "true" to His word. Just—Not merely the mercy, but the justice or righteousness of God is set forth in the redemption of the penitent believer in Christ. God's promises of mercy, to which He is faithful, are in accordance with His justice. to—Greek, "in order that." His forgiving us our sins and cleansing us from, &c., is in furtherance of the ends of His eternal faithfulness and justice. forgive—remitting the guilt. cleanse—purify from all filthiness, so that henceforth we more and more become free from the presence of sin through the Spirit of sanctification (cf. Hebrews, 9, 14; and above, Note, v. 7). unrighteousness—offensive to Him who "is just" or righteous: called "sin," v. 7, because "sin is the transgression of the law," and the law is the expression of God's righteousness; so that sin is unrighteousness. 10. Parallel to v. 8, we have not sinned—referring to the commission of actual sins, even after regeneration and conversion; whereas in v. 8, "we have no sin," refers to the present guilt remaining (until cleansed) from the actual sins committed, and to the state of our corrupt old nature still adhering to us. The perfect "have . . . sinned" brings down the commission of sin to the present time, not merely sins committed before, but since, conversion. we make him a liar—A gradation; v. 6, "we lie;" v. 8, "we deceive ourselves," worst of all, "we make Him a liar," by denying His word that all men are sinners (cf. ch. 5, 10). His word is not in us—"His word," which is "the truth" (v. 8), accuses us truly; by denying it we drive it from our hearts (cf. John, 5, 38). Our rejection of "His word" in respect to our being sinners, implies as the consequence our rejection of His word and will revealed in the law and gospel as a whole; for these throughout rest on the fact that we have sinned, and have sin.

VER. 1-29. THE ADVOCACY OF CHRIST IS OUR ANTIDOTE TO SIN WHILST WALKING IN THE LIGHT: FOR TO KNOW GOD, WE MUST KEEP HIS COMMANDMENTS, AND LOVE THE BRETHREN, AND NOT LOVE THE WORLD, NOR GIVE HEED TO ANTICHRISTS, AGAINST WHOM OUR SAFETY IS THROUGH THE INWARD ANOINTING OF GOD TO ABIDE IN GOD: SO AT CHRIST'S COMING WE SHALL NOT BE ASHAMED. 1. (Ch. 5, 18.) My little children—The dimly-veiled expresses the tender affection of an aged pastor and spiritual father. My own dear children, i.e. sons and daughters (Note, v. 12, these things—(ch. 1, 8-10) My purpose in writing what I have just written is, not that you should abuse them as giving a licence to sin; but, on the contrary, "in order that ye may not sin at all" (the Greek aorist implying the absence not only of the habit, but of single acts of sin [ALFORD]. In order to "walk in the light" (ch. 1, 5, 7), the first step is confession of sin (ch. 1, 9), the next (ch. 2, 1) is that we should forsake all sin. The Divine purpose has for its aim, either to prevent the commission of or to destroy sin. [BENGEL.] And—Connected with the former: Furthermore, "if any man sin," let him, whilst loathing and condemning it, not fear to go at once to God, the Judge, confessing it, for "we have an Advocate with Him." He is speaking of a BELIEVER'S occasional sins of infirmity through Satan's fraud and malice. The use of "we" immediately after implies that we all are liable to this, though not necessarily constrained to sin. we have an advocate—Advocacy is God's family blessing; other blessings He grants to good and bad alike, but justification, sanctification, continued intercession, and peace, He grants to His children alone. advocate—Greek, "paraclete," the same term as is applied to the Holy Ghost, as the "other Comforter;" showing the unity of the Second and Third Persons of the Trinity. Christ is the Intercessor for us above; and, in His absence, here below the Holy Ghost is the other Intercessor in us. Christ's advocacy is inseparable from the Holy Spirit's comfort and working in us, as the spirit of intercessory prayer. righteous—As our "advocate," Christ is not a mere suppliant petitioner. He pleads for us on the ground of justice, or righteousness, as well as mercy. Though He can say nothing good of us, He can say much for us. It is His righteousness, or obedience to the law, and endurance of its full penalty for us, on which He grounds His claim for our acquittal. The sense therefore is, "in that He is righteous," in contrast to our sin ("if any man sin"). The Father, by raising Him from the dead, and setting Him at His own right, has once for all accepted Christ's claim for us. Therefore the accuser's charges against God's children are vain. The righteousness of Christ stands on our side; for God's righteousness is, in Jesus Christ, ours. [LUTHER.] 2. And he—Greek, "And Himself." He is our all-prevailing Advocate, because He is Himself "the propitiation," abstract, as in 1 Corinthians, 1, 30: He is to us all that is needed, for propitiation "in behalf of our sins;" the propitiatory sacrifice, provided by the Father's love, removing the estrangement, and appeasing the righteous wrath of God's part, against the sinner. "There is no ingratitude that a father should be offended with that son whom he loveth, and at that time offended with him when he loveth him." [BISHOP PEARSON.] The only other place in the New Testament where Greek propitiation occurs, is ch. 4, 10: it answers in LXX. in Hebrew capbar, to effect an atonement or reconciliation with God; and in Ez. 44, 29, to the sin-offering. In Romans, 3, 25, Greek, it is "propitiatory," i.e. the mercy seat, or lid of the ark whereon God, represented in glory above it, met His people, received the high priest who sprinkled the blood on it. said—Greek "yet" curs—be-the new and highest MOTIVE, instinctive who loved us when enemies. So Jesus calls it "new." John, 13, 34, 35. "Love one another as I have loved you" (the new motive); 15, 12, which thing is true in him and in you—"In Christ all things are always true, and were so from the beginning; but in Christ and in us conjointly the commandment [the love of brethren] is then true when we acknowledge the truth which is in Him, and have the same flourishing in us." [BENCKE.] ALFORD explains, "Which thing (the fact that the commandment is a new one) is true in Him and in you, because the darkness is passing away, and the true light is now shining, i.e., the commandment is a new one, and this is true both in the case of Christ and in the case of you; because in you the darkness is passing away, and in Him the true light is shining; therefore, on both accounts, the commandment is a new one: new as regards you, because you are newly come from darkness into light; new as regards Him, because He uttered it when He came into the world to lighten every man, and began that shining which even now continues." I prefer, as BENCKE, to explain, The new commandment finds its truth in its practical realization in the walk of Christians in union with Christ. Cf the use of "verily," v. 5, John, 4, 42, "indeed," & 55. The repetition of "in" before "you,"

 "in Him and in you," not "in Him and you," implies that the love-commandment finds its realization separately: first it did so "in Him," and then it does so "in us," in so far as we now "also walk even as He walked;" and yet it finds its realization also conjointly, by the two being united in one sentence, even as it is by virtue of the love-commandment having been first fulfilled in Him, that it is also now fulfilled in us, through His Spirit in us: cf. a similar case, John, 20, 17, "My Father and your Father:" by virtue of His being "My Father," He is also your Father. darkness is past—rather, as in ch. 2, 17, "is passing away." It shall not be wholly "past" until "the Sun of righteousness" shall arise visibly: "the light is now shining" already, though but partially until the day bursts forth. 9-11. There is no mean between light and darkness, love and hatred, life and death, God and the world: wherever spiritual life is, however weak, there darkness and death no longer reign, and love supplants hatred; and Luke, 9, 50 holds good: wherever life is not, there death, darkness, the flesh, the world, and hatred, however glossed over and hidden from man's observation, prevail; and Luke, 11, 23 holds good, "Where love is not, there hatred is; for the heart cannot remain a void." [BENCKE.] In the light—as his proper element, his brother—his neighbour, and especially those of the Christian brotherhood. The very title brother is a reason why love should be exercised, even until now—notwithstanding that "the true light already has begun to shine" (v. 8). 10. Abiding in love is abiding in the light; for the gospel light not only illumines the understanding, but warms the heart into love, and occasions of stumbling—in contrast to "He that hateth his brother is in darkness, and walketh in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because that darkness hath blinded his eyes."
 "In him who loves there is neither blindness nor occasion of stumbling [to himself]: in him who does not love, there is both blindness and occasion of stumbling.
 He who hates his brother, is both a stumbling-block to himself, and stumbles against himself and every thing within and without: he who loves has an unimpeded path." [BENCKE.] John has in mind Jesus' words, John, 11, 9, 10. ALFORD well says, "The light and the darkness are within ourselves: admitted into us by the eye, whose singleness fills the whole body with light." 11. is in darkness...walketh—"is" marks his continuing STATE: he has never come out of "the (so Greek) darkness:" "walketh" marks his OUTWARD WALK and acts, whither—Greek, "where:" including not only the destination to which, but the way whereby, hath blinded—rather as Greek aorist, "blinded" of old. Darkness not only surrounds, but blinds him, and that a blindness of long standing. 12. little children—Greek, "little sons," or "dear sons and daughters;" not the same Greek as in v. 13. "little children," "infants" (in age and standing). He calls ALL to whom he writes, "little sons" (ch. 2. 1, Greek: 2. 25; 3. 18; 4. 4; 5. 21); but only in v. 13 and 18 he uses the term "little children," or "infants." Our Lord, whose Spirit John so deeply drank into, used to His disciples (John, 13, 33) the term "little sons," or dear sons and daughters; but in John, 21, 8, "little children." It is an undesigned coincidence with the epistle here, that in John's gospel somewhat similarly the classification, "lambs, sheep, sheep," occurs, are forgiven—"have been, and are forgiven you": ALL God's sons and daughters alike enjoy this privilege, 13, 14. All three classes are first addressed in the present, "I write;" then in the past (aorist) tense, "I wrote" (not "I have written;" moreover, in the oldest MSS, and versions, in the end of v. 13, it is past, "I wrote," not as English Version, "I write"). Two classes, "fathers" and "young men," are addressed with the same words each time (except that the address to the young men has an addition expressing the source and means of their victory); but the "little sons" and "little children" are differently addressed, have known—and do know; so the Greek perfect means. The "I wrote" refers not to a former epistle, but to this epistle. It was an idiom to put the past tense, regarding the time from the reader's point of view; when he should receive the epistle the writing would be past. When he uses "I write," he speaks from his own point of view. Him that is from the beginning—Christ: "that which was from the beginning," overcome.—The fathers, appropriately to their age, are characterized by knowledge. The young men, appropriately to theirs, by activity in conflict. The fathers, too, have conquered; but now their active service is past, and they and the children alike are characterized by knowing (the fathers know Christ, "Him that was from the beginning;" the children know the Father). The first thing that the little children realize is that God is their Father; answering in the parallel clause to "little sons... your sins are forgiven you for His name's sake," the universal first privilege of all those really-dear sons of God. Thus this latter clause includes all, whereas the former clause refers to those more especially who are in the first stage of spiritual life, "little children." Of course these can only know the Father as theirs through the Son (Matthew, 11. 27). It is beautiful to see how the fathers are characterized as reverting back to the first great truth of spiritual childhood, and the sum and ripest fruit of advanced experience, the knowledge of Him that was from the beginning (twice repeated, v. 13, 14). Many of them had probably known Jesus in person, as well as by faith, young men...strong—made so out of natural weakness, hence enabled to overcome "the strong man armed" through Him that is "stronger." Faith is the victory that overcomes the world. This term "overcome" is peculiarly John's, adopted from his loved Lord. It occurs sixteen times in the Apocalypse, six times in the first epistle, only thrice in the rest of the New Testament. In order to overcome the world on the ground, and in the strength, of the blood of the Saviour, we must be willing, like Christ, to part with whatever of the world belongs to us: whence immediately after "ye have overcome the wicked one (the prince of the world)," it is added, "Love not the world, neither the things...in the world." and, &c.—the secret of the young men's strength: the gospel word, clothed with living power by the Spirit who abideth permanently in them; this is "the sword of the Spirit" wielded in prayerful waiting on God. Contrast the mere physical strength of young men, Isaiah, 40, 30, 31. Oral teaching prepared these youths for the profitable use of the word when written. "Antichrist cannot endanger you (v. 18), nor Satan tear from you the word of God," the wicked one—who, as "prince of this world," enthralled "the world" (v. 15-17; ch. 5. 19, Greek, "the wicked one"), especially the young, Christ came to destroy this "prince of the world." Believers achieve the first grand conquest over him when they pass from darkness to light, but afterwards they need to maintain a continual keeping of themselves from his assaults, looking to God by whom alone they are kept safe. BENGEL thinks John refers specially to the remarkable constancy exhibited by youths in Domitian's persecution. Also to the young man whom John, after his return from Patmos, led with gentle, loving persuasion to repentance. This youth had been commended by John, in one of his tours of superintendency, as a promising disciple to the overseers of the church; he had been, therefore, carefully watched up to baptism. But afterwards relying too much on baptismal grace, he joined evil associates, and fell from step to step down, till he became a captain of robbers. When John, some years after, revisited that church, and heard of the youth's sad fall, he hastened to the retreat of the robbers, suffered himself to be seized and taken into the captain's presence. The youth, stung by conscience and the remembrance of former years, fled away from the venerable apostle. Full of love the aged father ran after him, called on him to take courage, and announced to him forgiveness of his sins in the name of Christ. The youth was recovered to the paths of Christianity, and was the means of inducing many of his bad associates to repent and believe. (CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS, Quis dicit salvus? c. 4. 2; EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History Book 3. 20; CHRYSOSTOM, 1 Ehortation to THEODORE, 11.) 15. Love not the world—that lieth in the wicked one (ch. 5. 19), whom ye young men have overcome. Having once for all, through faith, overcome the world (ch. 4. 4; 5. 4), carry forward the conquest by not loving it. "The world" here means "man, and man's world" (ALFORD), in his and its state as fallen from God. "God loved [with the love of compassion] the world," and we should feel the same kind of love for the fallen world; but we are not to love the world with congeniality and sympathy in its alienation from God, we cannot have this latter kind of love for the God-strangled world, and yet have also "the love of the Father in us, neither—Greek, "nor yet." A man might deny in general that he loved the world, whilst keenly following some one of THE THINGS IN IT: its riches, honours, or pleasures; this clause prevents him escaping from conviction. any man—therefore the warning, though primarily addressed to the young, applies to all, love of—i.e., towards "the Father." The two, God and the (sinful) world, are so opposed, that both cannot be congenially loved at once. 16. all that is in the world—can be classed under one or other of the three; the world contains these and no more. lust of the flesh—i.e., the lust which has its seat and source in our lower animal nature. Satan tried this temptation the first on Christ: Luke, 4. 3, "Command this stone that it be made bread." Youth is especially liable to fleshly lusts, lust of the eyes—the avenue through which outward things of the world, riches, pomp, and beauty, inflame us. Satan tried this temptation on Christ when he showed Him the kingdoms of the world in a moment. By the lust of the eyes David (2 Samuel, 11. 2) and Achan fell (Joshua, 7. 21). Cf. David's prayer, Psalm 119. 37; Job's resolve, Psalm 31. 1; Matthew, 5. 28. The only good of worldly riches to the possessor is the beholding them with the eye. Cf. Luke, 14. 18, "I must go and see it," pride in his is assumption; vain-glorious display. Pride is sin whereby he fell, and forms the link of two foes of man, the world (answerable to the eyes) and the devil (as the lust of the first foe). Satan tried this temptation on King Him on the temple-pinnacle that, in ride and presumption, on the ground of a care, He should cast Himself down. The foes appear in the three classes of soil on Divine seed falls: The wayside hearers, the thorns, the world; the rocky under-soil, the world's awful anti-trinity, the "lust of the eye, and the pride of life," simulated in Satan's temptation of Eve; we saw that the tree was good for food, the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make no manifestation of "the pride of life," the now above what God has revealed, Colossian pride of unascended knowledge. spring from "the Father" (used in relation preceding "little children," v. 12, or 13). He who is born of God alone turns to be is of the world turns to the world; the one to God and love to the world, are indistinct. 17. the world—with all who are worldly, passeth away—Greek, "is passing now, the lust thereof—in its threefold on (v. 16). he that doeth the will of God—not by will, or the will of the world, but that is, especially in respect to love, abideth for as God also abideth for ever" (with whom one; cf. Psalm 55, 19, "God, even He of old"); a true comment, which CYPRIAN has added to the text without support of

"In this last hour we will live." [BENGL.] Each successive age has some of the signs of "the last time" which Christ's coming, in order to keep the church waiting for the Lord. The connexion is, There are coming those seducers who world (ch. 4, 5), and would tempt you to go to (v. 19) and deny Christ (v. 22). as ye have the apostles, preachers of the gospel (e.g., v. 2, 3-10; and in the region of Ephesus, 30). shall come—Greek, "cometh," etc., out place. Antichrist is interpreted in two ways: Christ, Matthew, 24, 5, 24), lit., "instead of an adversary of Christ, lit., "against Christ, John never uses pseudo-Christ, or "false antichrist, it is plain he means an adversary, claiming to himself what belongs to wishing to substitute himself for Christ as object of worship. As "cometh" is used here of antichrist, the embodiment in his of all the anti-Christian features and spirit many antichrists" which have been, and runners. John uses the singular of him, No other New Testament writer uses the term. He probably answers to "the little horn having the eyes of a man, and speaking great things" (Daniel, 7, 8, 20); "the man of sin, son of perdition" (2 Thessalonians, 2.); "the beast ascending out of the bottomless pit" (Revelation, 11, 7; 17, 8), or rather, "the false prophet," the same as "the second beast coming up out of the earth" (Revelation, 13, 11-18; 16, 13, 19, out from us—from our Christian communion. Not necessarily a formal secession or going out; thus Rome has spiritually gone out, though formally still of the Christian Church, not of us—by spiritual fellowship (ch. 1, 3). "They are like bad humours in the body of Christ, the church; when they are vomited out, then the body is relieved; the body of Christ is now still under treatment, and has not yet attained the perfect soundness which it shall have only at the resurrection." [AUGUSTINE, Ep. John, Tract, 3, 4.] they would...have continued—implying the indefectibility of grace in the elect. "Where God's call is effectual, there will be sure perseverance." [CALVIN.] Still it is no fatal necessity, but a "voluntary necessity" [DIDYMUS], which causes men to remain, or else go from the body of Christ. "We are either among the members, or else among the bad humours. It is of his own will that each is either an antichrist, or in Christ." [AUGUSTINE.] Still God's actings in eternal election harmonize in a way inexpressible to us, with man's free agency and responsibility. It is man's own evil will that chooses the way to hell; it is God's free and sovereign grace that draws any to Himself and to heaven. To God the latter shall ascribe wholly their salvation from first to last: the former shall reproach themselves alone, and not God's decree, with their condemnation (ch. 3, 9; 5, 18). that they were not of us—This translation would imply that some of the antichrists are of us! Translate, therefore, "That all who are for a time among us) are not of us." Cf. 1 Corinthians, 11, 19, "There must be heresies among you, that they which are approved may be made manifest among you." For "were" some of the oldest MSS. read "are." Such occasions test who are, and who are not, the Lord's people. 20. But—Greek, "And." He here states the means which they as believers have wherewith to withstand antichrists (v. 18), viz., the chrism (so the Greek: a play upon similar sounds), or "anointing unguent," viz., the Holy Spirit (more plainly mentioned further on, as is John's style, ch. 3, 24; 4, 13; 5, 6), which they ("ye" is emphatical in contrast to those apostates, v. 19) have "from the Holy One," Christ (John, 1, 33; 3, 34; 16, 26; 16, 14): "the righteous" (v. 1), "pure" (ch. 3, 3), "the Holy One" (Acts, 3, 14) "of God;" Mark, 1, 24. Those anointed of God in Christ alone can resist those anointed with the spirit of Satan, antichrists, who would sever them from the Father and from the Son. Believers have the anointing Spirit from the Father also, as well as from the Son; even as the Son is anointed therewith by the Father. Hence the Spirit is the token that we are in the Father and in the Son; without it a man is none of Christ's. The material unguent of costliest ingredients, poured on the head of priests and kings, typified this spiritual unguent, derived from Christ, the Head, to us, His members. We can have no share in Him as Jews, except we become truly Christians, and so be in Him as Christ, anointed with that unction from the Holy One. The Spirit poured on Christ the Head, is by Him diffused through all the members. "It appears that we all are the body of Christ, because we all are anointed; and we all in Him are both Christ's and Christ, because in some measure the whole Christ is Head and body," and—therefore, ye know all things—needful for acting aright against antichrist's seductions, and for Christian life and godliness. In the same measure as one hath the Spirit, in that measure through faith is presupposed, as he is pure—unsullied with any uncleanness. The Second Person, by whom both the law and gospel were given. 4. Sin is incompatible with birth from God (v. 1-3). John often sets forth the same truth negatively, which he had before set forth positively. He had shown, birth from God involves self-purification; he now shows where sin, i.e., the want of self-purification, is, there is no birth from God. Whosoever—Greek, "Every one who," &c. commiteth sin—In contrast to v. 3, "Every man that hath this hope in Him purifieth himself;" and v. 7, "He that doeth righteousness," transgresseth...the law—Greek, "committeeth transgression of law." God's law hereafter pure as God is pure, and, therefore, that he is not born of God. for—Greek, "and," sin is...transgression of...law—definition of sin in general. The Greek having the article to both, implies that they are convertible terms. The Greek "sin" (hamartia) is lit., a missing of the mark, God's will being that mark to be ever-aimed at. "By the law is the knowledge of sin." The crookedness of a line is shown by being brought into juxtaposition with a straight ruler. 5.

 Additional proof of the incompatibility of sin and sonship: the very object of Christ's manifestation in the flesh was to take away (by one act, and entirely, sorted) all sins, as the scapegoat did typically, and—Another proof of the same, in his life is sin—not
 "was," but "is," as in v. 7. "He is righteous," and v. 3, "He is pure." Therefore we are to be so. 6. He abideth in him—as the branch in the vine, by vital union living by His life, sinneth not—in so far as he abides in Christ, so far is he free from all sin. The ideal of the Christian. The life of sin and the life of God mutually exclude one another, just as darkness and light. In matter of fact, believers do fall into sins (ch. 1. 8-10; 2. 1, 2; but all such sins are alien from the life of God, and need Christ's cleansing blood, without application to which the life of God could not be maintained. He sinneth not so long as he abideth in Christ, whosoever sinneth hath not seen him—Greek perfect, "has not seen, and does not see Him." Again the ideal of Christian intuition and knowledge is presented (Matthew, 7. 23). All sin as such is at variance with the notion of one regenerated. Not that "whosoever is betrayed into sins has never seen, nor known God;" but in so far as sin exists, in that degree the spiritual intuition and knowledge of God do not exist in him, neither—"not even." To see spiritually is a further step than to know; for by knowing we come to seeing by vivid realization and experimentally. 7.

 8. The same truth stated, with the addition that he who sins is, so far as he sins, "of the devil," let no man deceive you—as antinomians try to mislead men, righteousness—Greek, "the righteousness," viz., of Christ or God, he that doeth...is righteous—not his doing makes him righteous, but his being righteous (justified by the righteousness of God in Christ, Romans, 10. 3-10) makes him to do righteousness: an inversion common in familiar language, logical in reality, though not in form, as in Luke, 7. 47; John, 8. 47.
 Works do not justify, but the justified man works.
 We infer from his doing righteousness that he is already righteous (i.e., has the true and only principle of doing righteousness, viz., faith), and is therefore born of God.

(v. 9): just as we might say, The tree that bears good fruit is a good tree, and has a living root; not that the fruit makes the tree and its root to be good, but it shows that they are so. He—Christ. 8. He that committeth sin is of the devil—in contrast to "He that doeth righteousness," v. 7. He is a son of the devil (v. 10; John, 8, 44). John does not, however, say, "born of the devil," as he does "born of God," for "the devil begets none, nor does he create any; but whoever imitates the devil, becomes a child of the devil by imitating him, not by proper birth." [AUGUSTINE, Tract 4, 10.] From the devil there is not generation, but corruption. [BENGL.] sinneth from the beginning—from the time that any began to sin [ALFORD]: from the time that he became what he is, the devil. He seems to have kept his first estate only a very short time after his creation. [BENGL.] Since the fall of man [at the beginning of our world] the devil is ever sinning—[this is the force of "sineth": he has sinned from the beginning, is the cause of all sins, and still goes on sinning; present]. As the author of sin, and prince of this world, he has never ceased to seduce man to sin. [LUTHER.] destroy—break up and do away with: bruising and crushing the serpent's head, works of the devil—sin, and all its awful consequences. John argues, Christians cannot do that which Christ came to destroy. 9. Whosoever is born of God—life. "Every one that is begotten of God," doth not commit sin—his higher nature, as one born or begotten of God, doth not sin. To be begotten of God and to sin, are states mutually excluding one another. In so far as one sins, he makes it doubtful whether he be born of God. his seed—the living word of God, made by the Holy Spirit the seed in us of a new life, and the continual mean of sanctification, remaineth—abideth in him (Note, cf. v. 6; John, 5, 38). This does not contradict ch. 1, 8, 9; the regenerate show the utter incompatibility of sin with regeneration, by cleansing away every sin into which they may be betrayed by the old nature, at once in the blood of Christ. cannot sin, because he is born of God—"because it is of God that he is born" (so the Greek order, as compared with the order of the same words in the beginning of the verse); not "because he was born of God" (the Greek is perfect, which is present in meaning, not aorist); it is not said, Because a man was once for all born of God he never afterwards can sin; but, Because he is born of God, the seed abiding now in him, he cannot sin; so long as it energetically abides, sin can have no place. Cf. Genesis, 29, 9, Joseph, "How can I do this great wickedness and sin against God?" The principle within me is at utter variance with it. The regenerate life is incompatible with sin, and gives the believer a hatred for sin in every shape, and an unceasing desire to resist it. "The child of God in this conflict receives indeed wounds daily, but never throws away his arms or makes peace with his deadly foe." [LUTHER.] The exceptional sins into which the regenerate are surprised, are owing to the new life principle being for a time suffered to lie dormant, and to the sword of the spirit not being drawn instantly. Sin is ever active, but no longer reigns. The normal direction of the believer's energies is against sin; the law of God after the inward man is the ruling principle of his true self, though the old nature, not yet fully deadened, rebels and sins. Contrast ch. 5, 15, with John, 8, 34; cf. Psalm 18, 22, 23; 32, 2, 3; 119, 113, 176. The magnetic needle, the nature of which is always to point to the pole, is easily turned aside, but always seeks the pole, children of the devil—(Note, v. 8; Acts, 13, 10). There is no middle class between the children of God and the children of the devil. doeth not righteousness—Contrast ch. 2, 29. he that loveth not his brother—(ch. 4, 8)—a particular instance of that love which is the sum and fulfilment of all righteousness, and the token (not Love, on our part, is the evidence of our justification and regeneration, not the cause of them. "Let each go to his own heart; if he find there love to the brethren, let him feel assured that he has passed from death unto life. Let him not mind that his glory is only hidden; when the Lord shall come, then shall he appear in glory. For he has vital energy, but it is still winter time; the tree has vigour, but the branches are as it were dry; within there is marrow which is vigorous within are leaves, within fruits, but they must wait for summer." [AUGUSTINE.] He that loveth not—Most of the oldest MSS. omit "his brother," which makes the statement more general. abideth—still in death—"in the (spiritual) death" (ending in eternal death) which is the state of all by nature. His want of love evidences that no saving change has passed over him. 15. hateth—equivalent to "loveth not" (v. 10) there is no medium between the two. "Love and hatred, like light and darkness, life and death, necessarily replace, as well as necessarily exclude, one another." "Whereas, v. 16 desires us to lay down our lives for the brethren; duels require one (lawful to say!) to risk his own life, rather than not deprive another of life." [BENGL.] God regards the inward disposition as tantamount to the outward act which would flow from it. Whosoever one hates, one wishes to be dead. hath—such a one still "abideth in death." It is not his future state, but his present, which is referred to. He who hates (i.e., loveth not) his brother (v. 14), cannot in this his present state have eternal life abiding in him. 16. Our superfluities should yield to the necessities: our comforts, and even our necessities in some measure, should yield to the extreme wants of our brethren. "Faith gives Christ to me; love flowing from faith gives me to my neighbour." 18. When the venerable John could no longer walk to the meetings of the church, but was borne thither by his disciples, he always uttered the same address to the church; he reminded them of that one commandment which he had received from Christ Himself, as comprising all the rest, and forming the distinction of the new covenant, "My little children, love one another." When the brethren present, wearied of hearing the same thing so often, asked why he always repeated the same thing, he replied, "Because it is the commandment of the Lord, and if this one thing be attained it is enough." [JEROME] 18. in word—Greek, "with word...with tongue, but in deed and truth." 19. hereby—Greek, "herein" in our loving in deed and in truth (v. 16). We know—in the oldest MSS. have "we shall know," etc., if we fulfil the command (v. 18). of the truth—that we are real disciples of, and belonging to, the truth, as it is in Jesus: begotten of God with the word of truth. Having herein the truth radically, we shall be sure not to love merely in word and tongue (v. 18). assure—lit., persuade, viz., so as to cease to condemn us; satisfy the questionings and doubts of our consciences as to whether we be accepted before God or not (cf. Matthew, 28. 14; Acts, 12. 20, "Having made Eleazar their friend," lit., "persuaded"). The "heart," as the seat of the feelings, is our inward judge; the conscience, as the witness, acts either as our justifying advocate, or our condemning accuser, before God even now. John, 8. 9, has "conscience," but the passage is omitted in most old MSS. John no where else uses the term conscience. Peter and Paul alone use it, before him—as in the sight of Him, the omniscient Searcher of hearts. Assurance is designed to be the ordinary experience and privilege of the believer. 20. LUTHER & BERNOLI take this verse as conso- lating the believer whom his heart condemns; and who, therefore, like Peter, appeals from conscience to Him who is greater than conscience, "Lord, thou knowest all things: thou knowest that I love thee." Peter's conscience, though condemning him of his sin in denying the Lord, assured him of his love; but fearing the possibility, owing to his past fall, of de- ceiving himself, he appeals to the all-knowing God: so Paul, 1 Corinthians, 4. 3, 4. So if we be believers, even if our heart condemn us of sin in general, yet having the one sign of sonship, love, we may still as- sure our hearts: some oldest MSS. read heart, v. 19, as well as v. 20; as knowing that God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things. But thus the same Greek is translated "because" in the beginning, and "we know, that" in the middle of the verse, and if the verse were consolatory, it probably would have been, "Because EVEN if our heart condemn us," &c. There- fore translate, "Because (rendering the reason why it has been stated in v. 19 to be so important to assure our hearts before Him) if our heart condemn (Greek, 'know (saugh) against us': answering by contrast to 'we shall know that we are of the truth') us (it is) be- cause God is greater than our heart and knoweth all things." If our heart judges us unfavourably, we may be sure that He, knowing more than our heart knows, judges us more unfavourably still. [ALFORD.] A similar ellipsis ("it is") occurs 1 Corinthians, 14. 21; 2 Corinthians, 1. 6; 2. 23. The condemning testimony of our conscience is not alone, but is the echo of the voice of Him who is greater and knoweth all things. Our hypocrisy in loving by word and tongue, not in deed and truth, does not escape even our conscience, though weak and knowing but little, how much less God who knows all things? Still the consolatory view may be the right one. For the Greek for "we shall assure our hearts" (see Note, v. 19), is gain over, per- suade so as to be stilled, implying that there was a previous state of self-condemnation by the heart (v. 20), which, however, is got over by the consolatory thought, "God is greater than my heart" which condemns me, and "knows all things," (Greek ginosket, "knows," not kataginosket, "condemns"), and therefore knows my love and desire to serve Him, and knows my frame so as to pity my weakness of faith. This gaining over of the heart to peace is not so advanced a stage as the having CONFIDENCE towards God, which flows from a heart condemning us not. The first "because" thus applies to the two alternative cases, v. 20, 21 (giving the ground of saying, that having love we shall gain over, or assure our minds before Him, v. 19); the second "be- cause" applies to the first alternative alone, vts., if our heart condemn us. When he reaches the second alternative, v. 21, he states it independently of the former "because" which had connected it with v. 19, inasmuch as CONFIDENCE toward God is a farther stage than persuading our hearts, though always pre- ceded by it. 21. Beloved—There is no But contrasting the two cases, v. 20, 21, because "Beloved" sufficiently marks the transition to the case of the brethren walk- ing in the full confidence of love (v. 18). The two re- sults of our being able to "assure our hearts before Him" (v. 19), and of "our heart condemning us not" (of insincerity as to the truth in general, and as to LOVE in particular) are, (1.) confidence toward God; (2.) a sure answer to our prayers. John does not mean that all whose heart does not condemn them, are therefore safe before God; for some have their con- science seared, others are ignorant of the truth, and it is not only sincerity, but sincerity in the truth which can save men. Christians are those meant here: knowing Christ's precepts and testing themselves by them. 22. we receive—as a matter of fact, according to His promise. Believers, as such, ask only what is in accordance with God's will; or if they ask what God wills not, they bow their will to God's will, and so God grants them either their request, or something better than it, because we keep his commandments—Cf. Psalm 66. 18; 34. 15; 145. 18, 19. Not as though our merits earned a hearing for our prayers, but when we are believers in Christ, all our works of faith being the fruit of His Spirit in us, are "pleasing in God's sight;" and our prayers being the voice of the same Spirit of God in us, naturally and necessarily are answered by Him. 23. Summing up of God's commandments under the gospel dispensation in one commandment, this is his commandment—singular: for faith and love are not separate commandments, but are indissolubly united. We cannot truly love one another without faith in Christ, nor can we truly believe in Him with- out love. believe—once for all: Greek anist, on the name of his Son—on all that is revealed in the gospel concerning Him, and on Himself in respect to His person, offices, and atoning work, as he—as Jesus gave us commandment, 24. dwelleth in him—The believer dwellth in Christ, and he in him—Christ in the believer. Reciprocity. "Thus he returns to the great key-note of the epistle, abide in Him, with which the former part concluded" (ch. 2, 28). Hereby—"herein we (believers) know that He abideth in us, viz., from the presence in us of) the Spirit which He hath given us." Thus he prepares, by the mention of the true Spirit, for the transition to the false "spirits," ch. 4, 1-6; after which he returns again to the subject of love.

CHAPTER IV.

VER. 1-21. TESTS OF FALSE PROPHETS. LOVE THE TEST OF BIRTH FROM GOD, AND THE NECESSARY FRUIT OF KNOWING HIS GREAT LOVE IN CHRIST TO US. 1. Beloved—The affectionate address wherewith he calls their attention, as to an important subject. every spirit—which presents itself in the person of a prophet. The Spirit of truth, and the spirit of error, speak by men's spirits as their organs. There is but one Spirit of truth, and one spirit of antichrist. try—by the tests (v. 2, 3). All believers are to do so: not merely ecclesiastics. Even an angel's message should be tested by the word of God; much more men's teachings, however holy the teachers may seem, because, &c.—the reason why we must "try," or test the spirits, many false prophets—Not "prophets" in the sense "foretellers," but organs of the spirit that inspires them, teaching accordingly either truth or error: "many antichrists," are gone out—as if from God, into the world—said alike of good and bad prophets (2 John, 7). The world is easily seduced (v. 4, 5). 2. "Herein," know, the Spirit of God—whether He be, or not, in those teachers professing to be moved by Him. Every spirit—i.e., Every teacher claiming inspiration by the HOLY SPIRIT, confesseth—the truth is taken for granted as established. Man is required to confess it, i.e., in his teaching to profess it openly. Jesus Christ is come in the flesh—a twofold truth confessed, that Jesus is the Christ, and that He is come (the Greek perfect implies not a mere past historical fact, as the aorist would, but also the present continuance of the fact and its blessed effects) in the flesh ("clothed with flesh": not with a mere seeming humanity, as the Docete afterwards taught: He therefore was, previously, something far above flesh). His flesh implies His death for us, for only by assuming flesh could He die (for as God He could not), Hebrews, 2, 9, 10, 14, 16; and His death implies His love for us (John, 15, 13). To deny the reality of His flesh, is to deny His love, and so cast away the root which produces all true love on the believer's part (v. 9-11, 10). Rome, by the doctrine of the Immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, denies Christ's proper humanity. 3. confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh—IRENÆUS (3, 8). LUCIFER, ORIGIN, on Matthew, 25, 14, and Vulgate read, "Every spirit which destroys laets aside, or does away with) Jesus (Christ)." CYPRIAN and POLYCARP support English Version text. The oldest extant MSS., which are, however, centuries after POLYCARP, read, "Every spirit that confesseth not (i.e., refuses to confess) Jesus" (in His person, and all His offices and divinity), omitting "is come in the flesh." ye have heard—from your Christian teachers, already is it in the world—in the person of the false prophets (v. 1). 4. Ye—Emphatical: Ye who confess Jesus: in contrast to "them," the false teachers, overcome them—(ch. 5, 4, 5)—instead of being "overcome and brought into (spiritual) bondage" by them (2 Peter, 2, 19). John, 10, 8, 9, "The sheep did not hear them;" "A stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him: for they know not the voice of strangers." he that is in you—God, of whom ye are. he that is in the world—the spirit of antichrist, the Devil, "the prince of this world." 5. of the world—they derive their spirit and teaching from the world, "unregenerate human nature, ruled over and possessed by SATAN, the prince of this world." [ALFORD.] speak...of the world—they draw the matter of their conversation from the life, opinions, and feelings of the world. the world teacheth them—John, 15, 18, 19.) The world loves its own. 6. We—True teachers of Christ: in contrast to them, as of God—and therefore speak of God: in contrast to "speak they of the world," v. 5. knoweth God—as his Father, being a child "of God" (ch. 2, 13, 14). hearth us—Cl. John, 18, 27, "Every one that is of the truth, heareth my voice." Hereby—v. 2-6.—By their confessing, or not confessing, Jesus: by the kind of reception given them respectively by those who know God, and by those who are of the world and not of God. spirit of truth—the Spirit which comes from God and teaches truth. spirit of error—the spirit which comes from Satan and seduces into error. 7. Resumption of the main theme (ch. 2, 29). Love, the sum of righteousness, is the test of our being born of God. Love flows from a sense of God's love to us: cf. v. 9, with ch. 3, 16, which also resumes; and v. 13, with ch. 3, 24, which similarly v. 13 resumes. At the same time, v. 7-21 is connected with the immediately preceding context, v. 2 setting forth Christ's incarnation, the great proof of God's love (v. 10). Beloved—an address appropriate to his subject, "love." love—all love is from God as its fountain: especially that embodiment of love, God manifest in the flesh. The Father also is love (v. 8). The Holy Ghost sheds love as its first fruit abroad in the heart, knoweth God—spiritually, experimentally, and habitually. 8. knoweth not—Greek aorist: not only knoweth not now, but never knew, has not once for all known God. God is love—There is no Greek article to love, but to God; therefore we cannot translate, Love is God. God is fundamentally and essentially LOVE: not merely is loving, for then John's argument would not stand; for the conclusion from the premises then would be this, This man is not loving: God is loving; therefore he knoweth not God IN SO FAR AS GOD IS LOVING: still he might know Him in His other attributes. But when we take love as God's essence, the argument is sound: This man doth not love, and therefore knoweth not love: God is essentially love, therefore he knoweth not God. 9. toward us—Greek, "in our case," sent—thrust, "hath sent," into the world—A proof against Socinians, that the Son existed before He was "sent into the world." Otherwise, too, He could not have been our life (v. 9), our "propitiation" (v. 10), or our "Saviour" (v. 14). It is the grand proof of God's love. His having sent His only-begotten Son, that we might live through Him, who is the Life, and who has redeemed our forfeited life; and it is also the grand motive to our mutual love. 10. Herein is love—love in the abstract: Love, in its highest ideal, is herein. The love was all on God's side, none on ours. not that we loved God—though so altogether worthy of love. he loved us—though so altogether unworthy of love. The Greek aorist expresses, Not that we did any act of love at any time to God, but that He did the act of love to us in sending Christ. 11. God's love to us is the grand motive for our love to one another (ch. 3, 16). ye all admit as a fact. we...also—as being born of God, and therefore resembling our Father who is love. In proportion as we appreciate God's love to us, we love Him and also the brethren, the children (by our generation) of the same God, the representatives of the unseen God. 12. God, whom no man hath seen at any time, hath appointed His children as the visible recipients of our outward kindness which flows from love to Himself, "whom not having seen, we love," cf. Note, v. 11, 20. Thus v. 12 explains why, instead (v. 11) of saying, "If God so loved us, we ought also to love God," he said, "We ought also to love one another." If we love one another, God dwelleth in us—for God is love; and it must have been from Him dwelling in us that we drew the real love we bear to the brethren (v. 5, 20).

sending His Son (Greek aorist of a definite act at a point of time). He was the first to love us: this thought ought to create in us love casting out fear (v. 18). 20. loveth not...brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen.—It is easier for us, influenced as we are here by sense, to direct love towards one within the range of our senses, than towards One unseen, appreciable only by faith. “Nature is prior to grace; and we by nature love things seen, before we love things unseen.” [EURIUS.] The eyes are our leaders in love. “Seeing is an incentive to love.” [EUCUMENIUS.] If we do not love the brethren, the visible representatives of God, how can we love God, the invisible One, whose children they are? The true ideal of man, lost in Adam, is realized in Christ, in whom God is revealed as He is, and man as he ought to be. Thus, by faith in Christ, we learn to love both the true God and the true man, and so to love the brethren as bearing His image. hath seen—and continually sees. 21. Besides the argument (v. 20) from the common feeling of men, he here adds a stronger one from God’s express commandment (Matthew, 23, 39). He who loves, will do what the object of his love wishes. he who loveth God—he who wishes to be regarded by God as loving Him.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-21 WHO ARE THE BROTHERN ESPECIALLY TO BE LOVED (ch. 4, 21): OBEDIENCE, THE TEST OF LOVE, EASY THROUGH FAITH, WHICH OVERCOMES THE WORLD. LAST PORTION OF THE EPISTLE. THE SPIRIT’S WITNESS TO THE BELIEVER’S SPIRITUAL LIFE. TRUTHS REPEATED AT THE CLOSE: FAR-WELL WARNING. 1. Reason why our “brother” (ch. 4, 21) is entitled to such love, viz., because he is “born (begotten) of God:” so that if we want to show our love to God, we must show it to God’s visible representative. Whosoever—Greek, “Every one that.” He could not be our “Jesus” (God-Saviour) unless He were “the Christ;” for He could not reveal the way of salvation, except He were a prophet: He could not work out that salvation, except He were a priest: He could not confer that salvation upon us, except He were a king: He could not be prophet, priest, and king, except He were the Christ. [PEARSON on the Creed.] born—translate, “begotten,” as in the latter part of the verse, the Greek being the same. Christ is the “only-begotten Son” by generation: we become begotten sons of God by regeneration and adoption, every one that loveth him that beget—sincerely, not in mere profession (ch. 4, 20). loveth him also that is begotten of him—viz., “his brethren” (ch. 4, 21). 2. By—Greek, “In this.” As our love to the brethren is the sign and test of our love to God, so (John here says) our love to God (tested by our “keeping His commandments”) is, conversely, the ground and only true basis of love to our brother. we know—John means here, not the outward criteria of genuine brotherly love, but the inward spiritual criteria of it, consciousness of love to God manifested in a hearty keeping of His commandments. When we have this inwardly-and-outwardly-confirmed love to God, we can know assuredly, that we truly love the children of God. “Love to one’s brother is prior, according to the order of nature (Note, ch. 4, 20); love to God is so, according to the order of grace (ch. 5, 2).
At one time the former is more immediately known, at another time the latter, according as the mind is more engaged in human relations, or in what concerns the divine honour.” [EURIUS.] John shows what true love is, viz., that which is referred to God as its first object. As previously John urged the effect, so now he urges the cause. For he wishes mutual love to be ...the Father expresses the universal will, or aggregate of the regenerate, regarded as one collective body: John, 3, 6; 6, 37, 39, where BESALET remarks, that in Jesus' discourses, what the Father has given Him is called, in the singular number and neuter gender, all whatsoever; those who come to the Son are described in the masculine gender and plural number, they all, or singular, every one. The Father has given, as it were, the whole mass to the Son, that all whom He gave may be one whole: that universal whole the Son singly evolves, in the execution of the Divine plan, overcometh—habitually, the world—all that is opposed to keeping the commandments of God, or draws us off from God, in this world, including our corrupt flesh, on which the world's blas-phemies or threats act, as also including Satan, the prince of this world. This is the victory that overcometh —Greek aorist: "...that hath (already) overcomes the world:" the victory (where faith is) hereby is implied as having been already obtained (ch. 2, 13; 4, 4). 5. Who —"Who" else—"but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God"—"the Christ" (v. 17) Confirming, by a triumphant question defying all contradiction, as an undeniable fact, v. 4, that the victory which overcomes the world is faith. For it is by believing that we are made one with Jesus the Son of God, so that we partake of His victory over the world, and have dwelling in us One greater than he who is in the world (ch. 4, 4).

"Survey the whole world, and show me even one of whom it can be affirmed with truth that he overcomes the world, who is not a Christian, and endowed with this faith." [EPICORPIUS IN ALFORD.] 6. This—The Person mentioned in v. 5. This Jesus, he that came by water and blood—"by water," when His ministry was inaugurated by baptism in the Jordan, and He received the Father's testimony to His Messiahship and Divine Sonship. Cf. v. 6. "Believeth that Jesus is the Son of God," with John, 1, 33, 34. "The Spirit remaining on Him...I saw and bare record that this is the Son of God;" and v. 8, below, "There are three that bear witness in earth, the spirit, and the water, and the blood." Corresponding to this is the baptism of water and blood. It is the Spirit that bears Christ, now permanently in the church inspired New Testament Scriptures, an of believers, and in the spiritual recepand the Lord's supper, because the Spirit His essential truth which gives His w-

The only Greek MSS. in any form whiwords, "in heaven, the Father, the anus of Dublin, copied evidently from Latin Vulgate, the Ravianus, copied plutensian Polyglot; a MS. at Naples, translation of the accompanying Latin. sions omit them: the earliest Vulgate MS., being Wizanburgensis, 99, of the eight did not arise from fraud; for in the MSS., "there are three that bear recoliant notices, the word "three" is cause the three things (the Spirit, the blood) are SYMBOLS OF THE TRINITY." 196, also refers, "Of the Father, Son, a

THE TRINITY was the truth meant iference: the triad specified pointing t-marginal comment to complete the s-testimony, however, could only be be-men, not in heaven. The marginal cy to Jesus' Sonship and Messiahship they the sacramental grace in the water of baptism by the penitent believer by the atoning of His blood, and by the internal witness of the Spirit (v. 10): answering to the testimony given to Sonship and Messiahship by His baptism, His death, and the Spirit's manifestations in Him (v. 6). It was by His coming by water (i.e., His baptism in Jordan) that Jesus was solemnly inaugurated, and revealed Himself as Messiah: this event has been peculiarly important in John's estimation, and was first led to Christ by the testimony of the Spirit. By the baptism then received by Christ, His redeeming blood-shedding, and by that of the Spirit of God, whose witness is infallible, and still effects, by Him, the Spirit, the union of the blood, unite, as the threefold witness, to the Divine Messiahship. [NEANDER.] 9. If we do not accept (and rightly so) the witness of men, fallible though they be, much more to accept the infallible witness of God (the

 "The testimony of the Father is, as it were, of the testimony of the Word and of the Spirit; just as the testimony of the Spirit is, as the basis of the testimony of the water and of the blood.") [BENGLER.] 10.—This principle applies in all cases. FOR, &c. which—in the oldest MSS., He hath given testimony concerning His Son, that testimony is we find above in v. 1, 6, and below in v. 10. hath the witness—of God, by His Spirit in himself—God a Spirit dwelling in him and saying that "Jesus is the Lord," "the Christ," "Son of God" (v. 1, 6). The witness of the Spirit to the believer himself to his own sonship is not a new witness, but follows as a consequence of believing the witness of God to Jesus' Divine Sonship.
 Not God—credits not His witness, made him consequence which many who virtually, or unwarily, do not believe, may well startle back at the blasphemous and presumption (ch. 1, 10). not the record—Greek, "believeth not IN the witness." Refusal to credit God's testimony is not God's ("I") is involved in refusal to believe one's trust in Jesus Christ, the object of our faith or testimony. "Divine faith is an assent to something as credible upon the testimony of God is the highest kind of faith; because the highest credibility, because grounded upon the testimony of God which is infallible." [PEAR-SON.] "The authority on which we believe is the doctrine which we follow is divine." Ave—Greek, "hath testified, and now testifies." giving 11, hath given—Greek aorist: "Gave" all. Not only "promised" it, life is in his nature (John, 1, 4; 11, 25; 14, 6); bodily (Co-2, 9); operatively (2 Timothy, 1, 10). [LANG-STON.] It is in the second Adam, the Son of God, this life is secured to us, which, if left to decay, we should lose, like the first Adam. 12, the Greek, "THE life." BENGLER remarks, The two clauses: In the former the Son is mentioned without the addition "of God," for believers the Son; in the second clause the addition "of God," that unbelievers may know thereby serious thing it is not to have Him. In the sense "has" bears the emphasis; in the second, have the Son is to be able to say as the bridegroom, "Beloved's, and my Beloved is mine." Faith whereby the regenerate HAVE Christ as a possession, and in having Him have life in and reality now, and shall have life in its eloped manifestation hereafter. Eternal life is initial, and is an earnest of that which is to be the intermediate state (2.) partial, belonging but to a part of a man, though that is his nobler part, the soul separated from the body; at and after the resurrection (3.) perfectional. This life is not only natural, consisting of the union of the soul and the body (as that of the reprobate in eternal pain, which ought to be termed death eternal, not life), but also spiritual, the union of the soul to God, and supremely blessed for ever (for life is another term for happiness.

 [PEARSON ON CREED.] 13. These things—This epistle.
 He, towards the close of his gospel (John, 20, 30, 31), wrote similarly, stating his purpose in having written.
 In ch. 1, 4, he states the object of his writing this epistle to be, "that your joy may be full." To "know that we have eternal life" is the sure way to "joy in God." 13. The oldest MSS. and versions read, "These things have I written unto you (omitting that believe on the name of the Son of God) that ye may know that ye have eternal life (cf. v. 11), THOSE (of you I mean) who believe (not as English Version reads, and that ye may believe) on the name of the Son of God." English Version, in the latter clause, will mean, "that ye may continue to believe," &c. (cf. v. 12). 14. the confidence—"boldness" (ch. 4, 17) in prayer, which results from knowing that we have eternal life v. 13; ch. 3, 19, 22. according to his will—which is the believer's will, and which is therefore no restraint to his prayers. In so far as God's will is not our will, we are not abiding in faith, and our prayers are not accepted. ALFORD well says, If we knew God's will thoroughly, and submitted to it heartily, it would be impossible for us to ask anything for the spirit or for the body, which He should not perform: it is this ideal state which the apostle has in view. It is the Spirit who teaches us inwardly, and Himself in us asks according to the will of God.
 15. hear—Greek, "that He heareth us." we have the petitions that we desired of Him—we have, as present possessions, everything whatsoever we desired (asked; from Him. Not one of our past prayers offered in faith, according to His will, is lost. Like Hannah, we can rejoice over them as granted even before the event; and can recognise the event when it comes to pass, as not from chance, but obtained by our past prayers. Cf. also Jehoshaphat's believing confidence in the issue of his prayers, so much so that he appointed singers to praise the Lord beforehand. 16. If any...see—on any particular occasion: Greek aorist, his brother—a fellow-Christian, sinning—in the act of sinning, and continuing in the sin: present, not unto death—provided that it is not unto death, he shall give—The asker shall be the means, by his intercessory prayer, of God giving life to the sinning brother. Kindly reproof ought to accompany his intercessions. Life is in process of being forfeited by the sinning brother, when the believer's intercession obtained its restoration, for them—Resuming the proviso put forth in the beginning of the verse, "Provided that the sin is not unto death." "Shall give life," I say, to, i.e., obtain life "for" (in the case of), them that sin not unto death." I do not say that he shall pray for it—The Greek for "pray" means a REQUEST as of one on an equality, or at least on terms of familiarity, with him from whom the favour is sought. "The Christian intercessor for his brethren, St. John declares, shall not assume the authority which would be implied in making request for a sinner who has sinned the sin unto death (1 Samuel, 15, 35; 16, 1; Mark, 3, 29; that it might be forgiven him." [TRENCH, Synonyms of New Testament.] Cf.
 Deuteronomy, 3, 26. Greek "ask" implies the humble petition of an inferior: so that our Lord never uses it, but always uses (Greek) "request." Martha, from ignorance, once uses "ask" in His case (John, 11, 22).
 "Asking" for a brother sinning not unto death, is a humble petition in consonance with God's will. To "request" for a sin unto death (intercede, as it were, authoritatively for it, as though we were more merciful than God) would save or presumption; prescribing to God in a matter which lies out of the bounds of our brotherly yearning (because one sinning unto death would thereby be demonstrated not to be, nor ever to have been, truly a brother, ch. 2. 19, how He shall inflict and withhold His righteous judgments." Jesus Himself intercedes, not for the world which hardens itself in unbelief, but for those given to Him out of the world. 17. "Every unrighteousness (even that of believers, cf. ch. 1. 9; 3. 4. Every coming short of right) is sin" (but not every sin is the sin unto death, and there is a sin not unto death—in the case of which, therefore, believers may intercede, Death and life stand in correlative opposition (v. 11-13). The sin unto death must be one tending "towards" (so the Greek), and so resulting in, death. ALFORD makes it to be an appreciable ACT of sin, vis., the denying Jesus to be the Christ, the Son of God (in contrast to confessing this truth, v. 1, 5), ch. 2. 19, 22; 4. 2, 3; 5. 10. Such wilful deniers of Christ are not to be received into one's house, or wished "God speed." Still, I think with BEXELL, not merely the act, but also the state of apostasy accompanying the act, is included—a "state of soul in which faith, love, and hope, in short, the new life, is extinguished. The chief commandment is faith and love. Therefore, the chief sin is that by which faith and love are destroyed. In the former case is life; in the latter, death. As long as it is not evident (Note see, v. 16 that it is a sin unto death, it is lawful to pray. But when it is a deliberate rejection of grace, and the man puts it from him life thereby, how can others procure for him life?" Contrast James, 5. 14-15. Cf. Matthew, 12. 31, 32, as to the wilful rejection of Christ, and resistance to the Holy Ghost's plain testimony to Him as the Divine Messiah. Jesus, on the cross, pleaded only for those who KNEW NOT what they were doing in crucifying Him, not for those wilfully resisting grace and knowledge. If we pray for the impenitent, it must be with humble reference of the matter to God's will, not with the intercessory request which we should offer for a brother when erring. 18. (Ch. 3. 9.) We know—Thrice repeated emphatically, to enforce the three truths which the words preface, as matters of the brethren's joint experimental knowledge. This v. 18 warns against abusing v. 16, 17, as warranting carnal security, whosever—Greek, "every one who," &c. Not only advanced believers, but every one who is born again, "sinneth not." he that is begotten—Greek aorist, "has been (once for all in past time) begotten of God;" in the beginning of the verse it is perfect, "is begotten," or "born" as a continuing state, keepeth himself—The Vulgate translates, "The having been begotten of God keepeth him" so one of the oldest MSS. reads; so ALFORD, Lit., "He having been begotten of God nominative present, (if the divine generation implied in the nominative) keepeth him." So ch. 3. 9. "His seed remaineth in him. Still in English Version reading, God's working by His Spirit inwardly, and man's working under the power of that Spirit as a responsible agent, is what often occurs elsewhere. That God must keep us, if we are to keep ourselves from ev. 1, is certain. Cf. John, 17. 15, especially with this verse, that wicked one toucheth him not—so as to hurt him. In so far as he realizes his regeneration-life, the prince of this world hath nothing in him to fasten his deadly temptations on, as in Christ's own case. His Divine regeneration has severed once for all his connexion with the prince of this world. 19. world lieth in wickedness—rather, "lieth in the wicked one," as the Greek is translated v. 18; ch. 2. 13, 14; cf. ch. 4. 4; John, 17. 14, 15. The world lieth in the power of, and abiding in, the wicked one, as the resting-place and lord of his slaves; cf. "abideth in death," ch. 3. 14; contrast v. 20. "We are in Him that is true." Whilst the believer has been delivered out of his power, the whole world lieth helpless and motionless still in it, just as it was; including the wise, great, respectable, and all who are not by vital union in Christ. 20. Summary of our Christian privileges, is come—is present, having come. "He is here—all is full of Him—His incarnation, work, and abiding presence, is to us a living fact." [ALFORD.] given us an understanding—Christ's office is to give the inner spiritual understanding to discern the things of God, that we may know—Some oldest MSS. read, "So that we know," him that is true—God, as opposed to every kind of idol or false god (v. 21). Jesus, by virtue of His oneness with God, is also "He that is true" (Revelation, 3. 7). even—we are in the true God, by virtue of being "in His Son Jesus Christ." This is the true God—"This Jesus Christ (the last named Person) is the true God" (identifying Him thus with the Father in His attributes, "the only true God," John, 17. 3, primarily attributed to the Father); and eternal life—Predicated of the Son of God; ALFORD wrongly says, He was the life, but not eternal life. The Father is indeed eternal life as its source, but the Son also is that eternal life manifested, as the very passage (ch. 1. 2) which ALFORD quotes, proves against him. Cf. also v. 11, 12. Plainly it is the Mediator of ETERNAL LIFE to us that Christ is here contemplated. The Greek is, "The true God and eternal life is this" Jesus Christ, &c. In believing in Him we believe in the true God, and have eternal life. The Son is called "He that is true," Revelation, 3. 7, as here. This naturally prepares the way for warning against false gods (v. 21). Jesus Christ is the only "express image of God's person" which is sanctioned, the only true visible manifestation of God. All other representations of God are forbidden as idols. Thus the epistle closes as it began (ch. 1. 1, 2). 21. Affectionate parting caution, from idols—Christians were then everywhere surrounded by idolaters with whom it was impossible to avoid intercourse. Hence the need of being on their guard against any even indirect compromise or act of communion with idolatry. Some at Lamos, in the region whence John wrote, fell into the snare of eating things sacrificed to idols. The moment we cease to abide "in Him that is true" by abiding in Jesus Christ, we become part of "the world that lieth in the wicked one," given up to spiritual, if not to bodily, sacrifices idolatry (Ephesians, 5. 5; Colossians, 3. 5.)

INTRODUCTION TO II. & III. JOHN.

AUTHENTICITY.—That these two epistles were written by the same author, appears from their similarity of tone, style, and sentiments. That John, the beloved disciple, was the author of the second and third epistle, as of the first epistle, appears from Irenæus, adversus Hæreses, l. 16. 3, who quotes 2 John, 10, 11; and in 3. 16. 8, he quotes 2 John, 7, mistaking it, however, as if occurring in 1 John. Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 190), Stromata 2. 66, implies his knowledge of John epistles of John besides the first epistle; and in fragments of his admirations (p. 1011), he says, "John's second epistle which was written to the virgin Græc parthenous; perhaps Parthos is what was meant; it is the simplest; but it was written to a certain Babylonian named the Elect lady." Dionysius of Alexandria (in Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 7, 28), observes that John never names himself in his epistles, "not even in the second and third epistles, although they are short epistles, but simply calls himself the presbyter," a confutation of those who think John the apostle distinct from John the presbyter. Alexander of Alexandria, cites 3 John, 10, 11, as John's (Socrates, Historia Ecclesiastica, 1. 6). Cyprian, de Hæreticis Baptizandis, in referring to the bishops at the council of Carthage, says, "John the apostle, in his epistle, has said, 'If any come to you'" (3 John, 10); so that this epistle, and therefore its twin sister, 2 John, was recognised as apostolic in the North African church. The Muratori fragment is ambiguous. The second and third epistles were not in the Peshito or old Syriac version; and Cosmas Indicopleustes in the sixth century, says, that in his time the Syriac church only acknowledged three out of the Catholic epistles, 1 Peter, 1 John, and James. But Ephrem Syrus quotes the second epistle of John. Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, reckons both epistles among the antilegomena or controverted Scriptures, as distinguished from the homologoumena or universally acknowledged from the first. Still his own opinion was that the two minor epistles were genuine, remarking as he does in Demonstratio Evangelica, 2, 2, that in John's "epistles" he does not mention his own name, nor calls himself an apostle or evangelist, but an "elder" (3 John, 1; 2 John, 1). Origen (in Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 6, 25, mentions the second and third epistles, but adds "not all admit [implying that most authorities do] their genuineness." Jerome, de Vita Illustribus, 9, mentions the two latter epistles as attributed to John the presbyter, whose papucius was shown among the Ephesians in his day. But the designation "elder," was used of the apostles by others (e.g. Papias in Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 3, 29), and is used by St. Peter, an apostle, of himself (1 Peter, 5, 1). Why, then, should not John also use this designation of himself, in consonance with the humility which leads him not to name himself or his apostleship even in the first epistle? The antilegomena were generally recognised as canonical soon after the council of Nice (A.D. 325). Thus Cyril of Jerusalem, A.D. 319, enumerates fourteen epistles of Paul, and seven Catholic epistles. So Gregory of Nazianzum, in A.D. 368. The councils of Hippo, 393, and Carthage, 397, adopted a catalogue of New Testament books exactly agreeing with our canon. So our oldest extant Greek MSS. The second and third epistles of John from their brevity (which Origen notices), and the private nature of their contents, were less generally read in the earliest Christian assemblies, and were also less quoted by the fathers; hence arose their non-universal recognition at the first. Their private nature makes them the less likely to be spurious, for there seems no purpose in their forgery. The style and colouring too accord with the style of the first epistle.

TO WHOM ADDRESSED.—The third epistle is directed to Gaius or Caius; whether Gaius of Macedonia (Acts, 19, 29), or Gaius of Corinth (Romans, 16, 23; 1 Corinthians, 1, 14), or Gaius of Derbe (Acts, 20, 4), it is hard to decide. Mill believes Gaius bishop of Pergamos (Apostolic Constitutions, 7, 40), to be the person addressed in 3 John.

The address of the second epistle is more disputed. It opens, "The Elder unto the Elect lady." And it closes, "The children of thy elect sister greet thee." Now, 1 Peter, 1, 1, 2, addresses the elect in Asia, &c., and closes (1 Peter, 5, 13), "The church that is at Babylon, elected together with you, saluteth you." Putting together these facts, with the quotations (above) from Clement of Alexandria, and the fact that the word "church" comes from a Greek word (kyriaque) cognate to the Greek for "lady" (kyria, belonging to the Lord, kyrios), Wordsworth's view is probable. As Peter in Babylon had sent the salutations of the elect church in the then Parthian (see above on Clement of Alexandria) Babylon to her elect sister in Asia. So John, the metropolitan president of the elect church in Asia, writes to the elect lady, i.e., church, in Babylon. Newman, Alford, &c., think the Greek kyria not to mean "lady," but to be her proper name; and that she had a "sister, a Christian matron," then with John.

DATE AND PLACE OF WRITING.—Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 3, 25, relates that John, after the death of Domitian, returned from his exile in Patmos to Ephesus, and went on missionary tours into the heathen regions around, and also made visitations of the churches around, and ordained bishops and clergy. Such journeys are mentioned, 3 John, 12; 3 John, 10, 14. If Eusebius be right, both epistles must have been written after the Apocalypse in his old age, which harmonizes with the tone of the epistles, and in or near Ephesus. It was on one of his visitation tours that he designed to rebuke Diotrephes (3 John, 9, 10).

VER. 1-13. ADDRESS: GREETING: THANKSGIVING FOR THE ELECT LADY'S FAITHFULNESS IN THE TRUTH: ENJOINS LOVE: WARNS AGAINST DECEIVERS, LET US LOVE OUR REWARD: CONCLUSION. 1. The elder—in a familiar letter John gives himself a less authoritative designation than "apostle," so 1 Peter, 5, 1. lady—BENDEL takes the Greek as a proper name Kyria, answering to the Hebrew "Martha." Being a person of influence, "deceivers" (v. 7) were insinuating themselves into her family to seduce her and her children from the faith (THINK), whence John felt it necessary to write a warning to her. (But see my Introduction, and 1 Peter, 5, 13.) A particular church, probably that at Babylon, was intended. "Church" is derived from Greek Kyriake, akin to Kyria, or Kyria here: the latter word among the Romans and Athenians means the same as ecclesia, the term appropriated to designate the church assembly. love in the truth—Christian love rests on the Christian truth (v. 3, end). Not merely "I love in truth," but "I love in the truth," all—All Christians form one fellowship, rejoicing in the spiritual prosperity of one another. "The communion of love is as wide as the communion of faith." [ALFORD.] 2. For the truth's sake—Joined with "I love," v. 1. "They who love in the truth, also love on account of the truth." dwelleth in us, and shall be with us for ever—in consonance with Christ's promise. 3. Grace be with you—One of the oldest MSS. and several versions have "us" for you. The Greek is lit., "Grace shall be with us," i.e., with both you and me. A prayer, however, is implied besides a confident affirmation, gr. ec. mercy...peace—"Grace" covers the sins of men; "mercy," their miseries. Grace must first do away with man's guilt before his misery can be relieved by mercy. Therefore grace stands before mercy. Peace is the result of both, and therefore stands third in order. Casting all our care on the Lord, with thanksgiving, maintains this peace. The Lord—the oldest MSS. and most of the oldest versions omit "the Lord." John never elsewhere uses this title in his epistles, but "the Son of God," in truth and love—the element or sphere in which alone grace, mercy, and peace, have place. He mentions truth in v. 4; love, in v. 5. Paul uses FAITH and love: for faith and truth are close akin. 4. I found—probably in one of his missionary tours of superintendence. See Introduction at the end, and v. 12; 3 John, 10, 14, of thy children—some, in truth—i.e., in the gospel truth, as—even as. "The Father's commandment" is the standard of "the truth." 5. I beseech—Rather vel. Note, 1 John, 1, 10.

"I request thee," implying some degree of authority, not a new commandment—It was old in that Christians heard it from the first in the gospel preaching; new, in that the gospel rested love on the new principle of filial imitation of God who first loved us, and gave Jesus to die for us; and also in that love is now set forth with greater clearness than in the Old Testament dispensation. Love performs both tables of the law, and is the end of the law and the gospel alike (cf. Note, 1 John, 2, 7, 8). that we—implying that he already had love, and urging her to join him in the same Christian grace. This verse seems to me to decide that a church, not an individual lady, is meant. For a man to urge a woman ("THEE," not thee and thy children) that he and she should love one another, is hardly like an apostolic precept, however pure may be the love enjoined; but all is clear "If the lady" represent a church. 6. "Love is the fulfilling of the law," and the fulfilling of the law is the sure test of love. This is the commandment—Greek. "The commandment is this," viz., love, in which all God's other commandments are summed up. 7. As love and truth go hand in hand (v. 3, 4), he feels it needful to give warning against teachers of untruth. For—Giving the reason why he dwelt on truth and on love, which manifests itself in keeping God's commandments (v. 6). many—(1 John, 2, 18; 4, 1.) are entered—The oldest MSS. read, "have gone forth," viz., from us. confess not... Jesus...in the flesh—the token of antichrist. is come—Greek, "coming." He who denies Christ's coming in the flesh, denies the possibility of the incarnation; he who denies that he has come, denies its actuality. They denied the possibility of a Messiah's appearing, or coming, in the flesh. [NEANDER.] I think the Greek present participle implies both the first and the second advent of Christ. He is often elsewhere called the Coming One (Greek). Matthew, 11, 3; Hebrews, 10, 37. The denial of the reality of His manifestation in the flesh, at His first coming, and of His personal advent again, constitutes antichrist. "The world turns away from God and Christ, busily intent upon its own husks; but to OPPOSE God and Christ is of the leaven of Satan." [BENGLI.] This is a—Greek, "This [such a one as has been just described] is the deceiver and the antichrist." The many who in a degree fulfil the character, are forerunners of the final personal antichrist, who shall concentrate in himself all the features of previous anti-Christian systems. 8. Look to yourselves—amidst the wide-spread prevalence of deception so many being led astray. So Christ's warning, Matthew, 24, 4, 5, 24. we lose not... we receive—The oldest MSS. and versions read, "That ye lose not, but that ye receive," which we have wrought—So one oldest MS. reads. Other very old MSS., versions, and fathers, read, "which ye have wrought." The we being seemingly the more difficult reading is less likely to have been a transcriber's alteration. Look that ye lose not the believing state of "truth and love," which we (as God's workmen, 2 Corinthians, 6, 1; 2 Timothy, 2, 15) were the instruments of working in you. a full reward—of grace, not of debt. Fully consummated glory. If "which ye have wrought" be read with very old authorities, the reward meant is, that of their "work (of faith) and labour of love." There are degrees of heavenly reward proportioned to the degrees of capability of receiving heavenly blessedness. Each vessel of glory hanging on Jesus shall be fully happy. But the larger the vessel, the greater will be its capacity for receiving heavenly bliss. He who with one pound made ten, received authority over ten cities. He who made five pounds received five cities: each according to his capacity of rule, and in proportion to his faithfulness. Cf. 1 Corinthians, 15, 41. "There is no half reward of the saints. It is either lost altogether, or received in full: in full communion with God." [BENGLI.] Still no service of minister or people shall fail to receive its reward. 9. The loss (v. 8) meant is here explained: the not having God, which results from abiding not in the doctrine of Christ. transgresseth—The oldest MSS. and versions read, "Every one who takes the lead; lit., goes, or leads on before; cf. 1 John, 10, 4. "He goeth before them" not the same Greek. Cf. 3 John, 9. "Loveth to have the pre-eminence," hath not God—(1 John, 2, 23; 5, 15.) The second "of Christ" is omitted in the oldest MSS., but is understood in the sense. he—Emphatical: He and He alone. 10. If there come any—as a teacher or brother. The Greek is indicative, not subjunctive: implying that such persons do actually come, and are sure to come: when any comes, as there will. True love is combined with hearty renunciation and separation from all that is false, whether persons or doctrines. receive him not... neither bid him God speed—This is not said of those who were always aliens from the church, but of those who wish to be esteemed brethren, and subvert the true doctrine. [GROTIUS.] The greeting salutation forbidden in the case of such a one is that used among Christian brethren in those days, not a mere formality, but a token of Christian brotherhood. 11. By wishing a false brother or teacher "God (or good) speed," you imply that he is capable as such of good speed and joy (the lit. meaning of the Greek), and that you wish him it whilst opposing Christ; so you identify yourself with "his evil deeds." The Greek of "partaker" is "having communion with." We cannot have communion with saints and with antichrist at once. Here we see John's naturally fiery zeal directed to a right end. POLYCARP, the disciple of John, told contemporaries of IRENEUS, who narrates the story on their authority, that on one occasion when John was about to bathe, and heard that Cerinthus, the heretic, was within, he retired with abhorrence, exclaiming, Surely the house will fall in ruins since the enemy of the truth is there. 12. I would not write—a heart full of love pours itself out more freely face to face, than by letter. paper—made of Egyptian papyrus. Pens were then reeds split. ink—made of soot and water, thickened with gum. Parchment was used for the permanent MSS. in which the epistles were preserved. Writing tablets were used merely for temporary purposes, as our slates, face to face—lit., "mouth to mouth." full—Greek, "filled full." Your joy will be complete in hearing from me in person the joyful gospel truths which I now defer communicating till I see you. On other occasions his writing the glad truths was for the same purpose. 13. ALFORD confesses, The mention of the "lady" herself here seems rather to favour the hypothesis that a church is meant.

THE THIRD EPISTLE OF JOHN.

1:14. ADDRESS: WISH FOR CAIUS' PROSPERITY: JOY AT HIS WALKING IN THE TRUTH. HIS FIDELITY TO THE BRETHREN AND STRANGERS, FRUIT OF LOVE. DIOTREPHES' OPPOSITION AND DOX. PRAISE OF DEMETRIUS. CONCLUSION. 1. I speak: I personally, for my part. On Caius or see Introduction before second epistle. love in this—3 John, 1.) "Beloved" is repeated often in this, indicating strong affection (v. 1, 2, 6, 11). 2. all things—Greek, "concerning all things" so edit in all respects. But WAHL justifies English as cf. 1 Peter, 4, 8). Of course, since his soul's safety is presupposed, "above all things" does not mean John wishes Caius' bodily health above his soul, but as the first object to be desired for spiritual health. I know you are prospering concerns of your soul, I wish you similar safety in your body. Perhaps John had heard his brethren (v. 3) that Caius was in bad health, he tried in other ways (v. 10), to which the wish, then, proper—in general, be in health—in particular, testified of the truth that is in thee—Greek, "of thy truth;" thy share of that truth in which walkest. [ALFORD.] even as thou—in contrast Diotrophes (v. 9). 4. my children—members of the church: confirming the view that the elect lady is a church, & faithfully—an act becoming a faithful man. 5. over thou doest—A distinct Greek word from the "doest;" translate, "workest" whatsoever labour of love, thou doest perform. So Matthew, 23. "She hath wrought a good work upon me." strangers—The oldest MSS., "And that (i.e., and brethren) strangers." The fact of the brethren then didst entertain being "strangers," the love manifested in the act. 6. borne witness sheweth before the church—to stimulate others by good example. The brethren so entertained by Diotrophes missionary evangelists (v. 7); and, probably, course of narrating their missionary labours for the edification of the church where John then was, Diotrophes mentioned the loving hospitality shown by Caius. bring forward on their journey—"if ye witness to) forward on their journey" by giving provisions for the way, after a goodly sort—Greek, manner worthy of God," whose ambassadors ye, and whose servant thou art. He who is God's missionary servants (v. 7), honours his name's sake—Christ's, went forth—as missionaries, taking nothing—refusing to receive aught of pay, or maintenance, though justly entitled to Paul at Corinth and at Thessalonica. Gentile Christians just gathered out by their labours among the heathen. As Caius himself was a convert, "the Gentiles" here must mean the people just made from the heathen, the Gentiles to whom they had gone forth. It would have been inexact to have taken aught (the Greek meden implies, they got nothing, though they had desired it, it was of their own choice they took nothing) infant churches among the heathen: the case is different in receiving hospitality from Caius. 8. contradiction to "the Gentiles" or "heathen" to, v. 7, therefore—as they take nothing of Gentiles or heathen, receive—"The oldest MSS., "take up." As they take nothing from the

Gentiles, we ought to take them up so as to support them, fellow-helpers—with them, to the truth—i.e., to promote the truth. 9. I wrote—The oldest MSS. add "something;" a communication, probably, on the subject of receiving the brethren with brotherly love (v. 8, 10). That epistle was not designed by the Spirit for the universal church, or else it would have been preserved, unto the church—of which Caius is a member, loveth... pre-eminence—through ambition. Evidently occupying a high place in the church where Caius was (v. 10), among them—over the members of the church, receiveth us not—virtually, viz., by not receiving with love the brethren whom we recommended to be received (v. 8, 10; cf. Matthew, 10, 40). 10. If I come—(v. 14.) I will remember—lit., "I will bring to mind" before all, by stigmatizing and punishing, prating—with mere silly tattle, neither doth he... receive the brethren—with hospitality. "The brethren" are the missionaries on their journey, forbiddest them that would—receive them, casteth them—those that would receive the brethren, by excommunication from the church, which his influence, as a leading man (v. 9) in it, enabled him to do. NEANDER thinks that the missionaries were Jews by birth, whence it is said in their praise they took nothing from the GENTILES: in contrast to other Jewish missionaries who abused ministers' right of maintenance elsewhere, as Paul tells us, 2 Corinthians, 11, 32; Philipians, 3, 2, 6, 10. Now in the Gentile churches there existed an ultra-Pauline party of anti-Jewish tendency, the forerunners of Marcion; Diotrophes possibly stood at the head of this party, which fact, as well as his domineering spirit, may account for his hostility to the missionaries, and to the apostle John, who had, by the power of love, tried to harmonize the various elements in the Asiatic churches. At a later period Marcion, we know, attached himself to Paul alone, and paid no deference to the authority of John. 11. follow not that which is evil—as manifested in Diotrophes (v. 9, 10), but... good—as manifested in Demetrius (v. 12), is of God—is born of God, who is good, hath not seen God—spiritually, not literally. 12. of all men—who have had opportunity of knowing his character, of the truth itself—The gospel standard of truth bears witness to him that he walks conformably to it, in acts of real love, hospitality to the brethren (in contrast to Diotrophes, &c. Cf. John, 3, 21, "He that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God" we also—besides the testimony of "all men," and of "the truth itself," ye know—The oldest MSS. read, "thou knowest." 13. I will not—rather as Greek, "I wish not...to write" more. 14. face to face—Greek, "mouth to mouth." peace—Peace inward of conscience, peace fraternal of friendship, peace supernal of glory [LYRA], friends—a title seldom used in the New Testament, as it is absorbed in the higher title of "brother, brethren." Still Christ recognises the relation of friend also, based on the highest grounds, obedience to Him from love, and entailing the highest privileges, admission to the intimacy of the holy and glorious God and sympathizing Saviour: so Christians have "friends" in Christ. Here in a friendly letter, mention of "friends" appropriately occurs, by name—no less than if their names were written. [BENJEL.]

AUTHENTICITY.—Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 3. 25, reckons it among the Antilegome tures, "though recognised by the majority." The reference to the contest of Michael, the arch the body of Moses, not mentioned elsewhere in the Old Testament, but found in the apocrypha lably raised doubts as to its authenticity, as Jerome, Catalogus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, 4, being addressed to one particular church, or individual, caused it not to be so immediately rec

"the elder." For the same reason James and Jude call themselves "servants of Jesus Christ." Clemens Alexandrinus, Adumbrations, in Ep. Jud., p. 1007, says, "Jude, through reverential awe, did not call himself brother, but servant, of Jesus Christ, and brother of James."

Tertullian, de Cultu Fuminarum, c. 3, cites the epistle as that of the apostle James. Clemens Alexandrinus quotes it (v. 8, 17) as Scriptura. Stromata 2, s. 11; and (v. 5) in Palaogopus 2, s. 44. The Muratori fragment asserts its canonicity. [Bouth, Reliquia Sacra, 1. 306.] Origen, Commentary on Matthew 13 55, says, "Jude wrote an epistle of few letters, but one filled full of the strong words of heavenly grace." Also, in Commentary on Matthew, 22, 23, he quotes v. 6; and on Matthew, 28. 10, he quotes v. 1. He calls the writer "Jude the apostle," in the Latin remains of his works (cf. Davidson, Introduction III. 496). Jerome, Catalogus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, 4, reckons it among the Scriptures. Though the oldest MSS. of the Peschito omit it, Ephrem Syrus recognizes it. Wordsworth reasons for its genuineness thus: St. Jude, we know, died before St. John, i. e., before the beginning of the second century. Now Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 3. 22, tells us that St. James was succeeded in the bishopric of Jerusalem by Symeon his brother: and also that Symeon sat in that see till A. D. 107, when as a martyr he was crucified in his 150th year. We find that the epistle to Jude was known in the East and West in the second century; it was therefore circulated in Symeon's lifetime. It never would have received currency such as it had, nor would Symeon have permitted a letter bearing the name of an apostle, his own brother Jude, brother of his own apostolical predecessor St. James, to have been circulated, if it were not really St. Jude's.

TO WHOM ADDRESSED.—The references to Old Testament history, v. 5, 7, and to Jewish tradition, v. 14, &c., make it likely that Jewish Christians are the readers to whom Jude mainly (though including also all Christians, v. 1) writes, just as the kindred epistle, 2 Peter, is addressed primarily to the same class; cf. Introductions to 1 and 2 Peter. The persons stigmatized in it were not merely Hartines (as Alford thinks), though no doubt that was one of their prominent characteristics, but heretics in doctrine, "denying the only Lord God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ." Hence he urges believers "earnestly to contend for the faith once delivered unto the saints." Insubordination, self-seeking, and licentiousness, the fruit of Antinomian teachings, were the evils against which Jude warns his readers; reminding them that, to build themselves in their most holy faith, and to pray in the Holy Ghost, are the only effectual safeguards. The same evils, along with mocking scepticism, shall characterize the last days before the final judgment, even as in the days when Enoch warned the ungodly of the coming flood. As Peter was in Babylon in writing 1 Peter, v. 13, and probably also in writing 2 Peter (cf. Introductions to 1 and 2 Peter), it seems not unlikely that Jude addressed his epistle primarily to the Jewish Christians in and about Mesopotamian Babylon (a place of great resort to the Jews in that day), or else to the Christian Jews dispersed in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, the persons addressed by Peter. For Jude is expressly said to have preached in Mesopotamia (Jerome, Annotations in Matthew), and his epistle, consisting of only twenty-five verses, contains in them no less than eleven passages from 2 Peter (see the list in my Introduction to 2 Peter). Probably in v. 4 he writes to the fulfillment of Peter's prophecy, "There are certain men crept in unawares, who were before of old ordained (rather as Greek, 'forewritten,' i. e., announced beforehand by the apostle Peter's written prophecy) to this condemnation, ungodly men denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ." Cf. 2 Peter, 2. 1. "There shall be false teachers among you who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction." Also, v. 17, 18, plainly refers to the very words of 2 Peter, 3. 3, "Remember the words which were spoken before of the apostles of our Lord Jesus; how they told you there should be mockers in the last time who should walk after their own ungodly lust." This proves, in opposition to Alford, that Jude's epistle is later than Peter's (whose inspiration he thus confirms, just as Peter confirms Paul's, 2 Peter, 3. 15, 16; not vice versa).

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.—Alford thinks, that, considering St. Jude was writing to Jews and citing slight instances of divine vengeance, it is very unlikely he would have omitted to allude to the destruction of Jerusalem, if he had written after that event which uprooted the Jewish polity and people. He conjectures from the tone and references, that the writer lived in Palestine. But as to the former, negative evidence is doubtful; for neither does John allude in his epistles, written after the destruction of Jerusalem, to that event. Mill fixes on A. D. 90, after the death of all the apostles, save John. I incline to think from v. 17, 18, that some time had elapsed since the second epistle of Peter (written probably about A. D. 68 or 69) when Jude wrote, and, therefore, that the epistle of Jude was written after the destruction of Jerusalem.

VER. 1-25. ADDRESS: GREETING: HIS OBJECT IN WRITING: WARNING AGAINST SEDUCERS IN DOCTRINE AND PRACTICE FROM GOD'S VENGEANCE ON APOMTATES, ISRAEL, THE FALLEN ANGELS, SODOM AND GOMORRAH. DESCRIPTION OF THESE BAD MEN, IN CONTRAST TO MICHAEL: LIKE CAIN, BALAZAR, AND CORE: ENOCH'S PROPHECY AS TO THEM: THE APOSTLES' FOREWARNING: CONCLUDING EXHORTATION AS TO PRESERVING THEIR OWN FAITH, AND TRYING TO SAVE OTHERS: DOXOLOGY. 1. Servant of Jesus Christ—as His minister and apostle. Brother of James—who was more widely known as Bishop of Jerusalem and "brother of the Lord" (i. e., either cousin, or stepbrother, being son of Joseph by a former marriage; for ancient traditions universally agree that Mary, Jesus' mother, continued perpetually a virgin). Jude therefore calls himself modestly "brother of James." See my Introduction, to them . . . sanctified by God the Father.—The oldest MSS. and versions, ORIGEN, LUCIFER, &c., read "beloved" for sanctified. If English Version be read, cf. Colossians, 3. 12; 1 Peter, 1. 2. The Greek is not "by," but "in." God, the Father's love, is the element in which they are "beloved." Thus the conclusion, v. 21, responds, "Keep yourselves in the love of God." Cf.

"Beloved of the Lord" 2 Thessalonians, 2. 13. perceived in Jesus Christ—"kept." Translate not "in," but as Greek, "FOR Jesus Christ." "Kept continually" (so the Greek perfect participle means) by God the Father for Jesus Christ, against the day of His coming. Jude, beforehand, mentions the source and guarantee for the final accomplishment of believers' salvation, lest they should be disheartened by the dreadful evils which he proceeds to announce. [BAGNELL] and called—Pronounced of "them that are beloved in God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ; who are called." God's effectual calling in the exercise of His Divine prerogative, guarantees their eternal safety. 2. Mercy;—in a time of wretchedness. Therefore mercy stands first: the mercy of Christ (v. 21), peace—in the Holy Ghost (v. 20), love—of God (v. 21). The three answer to the Divine Trinity, be multiplied—in you and towards you. 3. Design of the epistle (cf. v. 20, 21.) all diligence—(2 Peter, 1. 5.) As the minister is to give all diligence to admonish, so the people should, in accordance with his admonition, give all diligence to have all Christian graces, and to make their calling sure. The common salvation—wrought by Christ. Cf. Note, "obtained like precious faith," 2 Peter, 1. 1. This community of faith, and of the object of faith, salvation, forms the ground of mutual exhortation by appeals to common hopes and fears. It was needful for me—rather, "I felt it necessary to write now at once: so the Greek aorist means; the present infinitive "to write," which precedes, expresses merely the general fact of writing; exhorting you." The reason why he felt it necessary "to write with exhortation," he states v. 4, "For there are certain men crept in," &c. Having intended to write generally of the common salvation, he found it necessary from the existing evils in the church, to write specially that they should contend for the faith against those evils, earnestly contend—Cf. Philippians, 1. 27, "striving together for the faith of the gospel." once—Greek "once for all delivered," &c. No other faith or revelation is to supersede it. A strong argument for resisting heretical innovators (v. 4). Believers, like Nehemiah's workmen, with one hand "build themselves up in their most holy faith," with the other they "contend earnestly for the faith" against its foes, the saints—all Christians, holy i. e., consecrated to God by their calling, and in God's design, 4. crept in unawares—stealthily and unlawfully. Note, 2 Peter, 2. 1, "privily shall bring in damnable heresies," certain men—implying disparagement, before... ordained—Greek, "fore-written," viz., in Peter's prophecy, v. 17. is; and in Paul's before that, 1 Timothy, 4. 1; 2 Timothy, 3. 1; and by implication in the judgments which overtook the apostate angels. The disobedient Israelites, Sodom and Gomorrah, Balaam, and Core, and which are written "for an example" (v. 7, and 5, 6, 11). God's eternal character as the Punisher of sin, as set forth in Scripture "of old," is the ground in which such apostate characters are ordained to condemnation. Scripture is the reflexion of God's book of life in which believers are "written among the living." "Fore-written" is applied also in Romans, 5. 4, to the things written in Scripture. Scripture itself reflects God's character from everlasting, which is the ground of His decrees from everlasting. BEGGIE explains it as an abbreviated phrase for, "They were of old foretold by Enoch (v. 14, who did not write his prophecies, and afterwards marked out by the written word." to this condemnation—Jude graphically puts their judgment as it were present before the eyes, "THIS" Enoch's prophecy comprises the "ungodly men" of the last days before Christ's coming to judgment, as well as their forerunners, the "ungodly men" before the flood, the type of the last judgment (Matthew, 24. 37-39; 2 Peter, 3. 3-7). The disposition and the doom of both correspond, the grace of our God—A phrase for the gospel especially sweet to believers who appropriate God in Christ as "our God," and so rendering the more odious the vile perversity of those who turn the gospel state of grace and liberty into a ground of licentiousness, as if their exemption from the law gave them a licence to sin. denying the only Lord—The oldest MSS., versions, and fathers omit "God," which follows in English Version. Translate as the Greek, "the only Master;" here used of Jesus Christ, who is at once Master and "Lord" (a different Greek word). So 2 Peter, 2. 1. Note. By virtue of Christ's perfect oneness with the Father, He, as well as the Father, is termed "the ONLY God and MASTER." Greek "Master," implies God's absolute ownership to dispose of His creatures as He likes. 5. (Hebrews, 3. 16-18.) therefore—Other oldest MSS. and Vulgate read, "But" in contrast to the ungodly, v. 4. though ye once—rather, "once for all." Translate, "I wish to remind you, as knowing ALL (viz., that I am referring to. So the oldest MSS., versions, and fathers) once for all." As already they know all the facts once for all, he needs only to "remind" them, the Lord—The oldest MSS. and versions read, "Jesus." So "Christ" is said to have accompanied the Israelites in the wilderness; so perfectly is Jesus one with the God of the Israelite theocracy, saved—brought safely, and into a state of safety and salvation. afterward—Greek, "secondly," in the next instance "destroyed them that believed not," as contrasted with His in the first instance having saved them. 6. (2 Peter, 2. 4.) kept not their first estate—Vulgate translates, "their own principality," which the fact of angels being elsewhere called "principalities," favours; "their own" implies that, instead of being content with the dignity once for all assigned to them under the Son of God, they aspired higher. ALFORD thinks the narrative in Genesis, 6. 2 is alluded to, not the fall of the devil and his angels, as he thinks "giving themselves over to fornication" (v. 7) proves: cf. Greek, "in like manner to these," viz., to the angels (v. 6). It seems to me more natural to take "sons of God" (Genesis, 6. 2) of the Sethites, than of angels who, as "spirits," do not seem capable of carnal connexion. The parallel, 2 Peter, 2. 4, plainly refers to the fall of the apostate angels. And "in like manner to these," v. 7, refers to the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, "the cities about them" sinning "in like manner" as they did. (EUSTIUS & CALVIN.) Even if Greek "these," v. 7, refer to the angels, the sense of "in like manner as these" will be, not that the angels carnally fornicate with the daughters of men, but that their ambition whereby their affections went away from God and they fell, is in God's view a sin of like kind spiritually as Sodom's going away from God's order of nature after strange flesh; the sin of the apostate angels after their kind is analogous to that of the human Sodomites after their kind. Of the somewhat similar spiritual connexion of whoremongers and covetousness. The apocryphal book of Enoch interprets Genesis, 6. 2, as ALFORD. But though Jude accords with it in some particulars, it does not follow that he accords with it in all. The Hebrews name the fallen angels Aza and Azazel, left-of their own accord, their own—Greek, "their proper," habitation—Heaven, all bright and glorious, as opposed to the "darkness" to which they now are doomed. Their ambitious designs seem to have had a peculiar connexion with this earth, of which Satan before his fall may have been God's viceroy, whence arises his subsequent connexion with it as first the Tempter, then "the prince of this world," reserved—As the Greek is the same, and there is an evident reference to their having "kept not their first estate," translate, "He hath kept." Probably what is meant is, He hath kept them in His purpose: that is their sure doom; moreover, as yet, Satan and his demons roam at large on the earth. An earnest of their doom is their having been cast out of heaven, being already restricted to "the darkness of this present world," the "air" that surrounds the earth, their peculiar element now. They lurk in places of gloom and death, looking forward with agonising fear to their final torment in the bottomless pit. He means not literal chains and darkness, but figurative in this present world where, with restricted powers and liberties, shut out from heaven, they, like condemned prisoners, await their doom. 7. Even so—ALFORD translates, "I wish to remind you, v. 6 that," &c. Sodom, &c.—(2 Peter, 2. 6.) giving themselves over to fornication—following fornication unlawfully, i. e., out of the order of nature. Or "in like manner to them" (Greek), cf. Note, v. 6. (i. e. spiritual fornication, "so a whoring from thee," Psalm, 73. 27. going after strange flesh—departing from the course of nature, and going after that which is unnatural.  naturally uses the same language as his Lord. As Satan (adversary in court) or the Devil (accuser) accuses alike the church collectively, and "the brethren" in-Israel's, and all believers' full justification, and the accuser's being rebuked finally, is yet future. Joss-PHUS, Antiquities, 4, 8, states that God hid Moses' been made an idol of. Jude, in this account, either adopts it from the apocryphal "assumption of Moses" (as ORIGEN, concerning Principalities, 3, 2, thinks, or else from the ancient tradition on which that work was founded. Jude, as inspired, could distinguish how much of the tradition was true, how much false.

 We have no such means of distinguishing, and therefore can be sure of no tradition, save that which is in the written word. 10. (2 Peter, 2, 12.) these things

 "animal senses and faculties," 11. Woe—Note, 2 Peter, of whose sin was hatred and envy of the godly, as it is the sin of these seducers, ran greedily—lit., "have been poured forth" like a torrent that has burst its

 When we read of Korah perishing by gatsaying, we read virtually also of these perishing in like manner through the same: for the same seed bears the same harvest. 12. spots—So 2 Peter, 2, 13, Greek, spiloi: but here the Greek is spilades, which elsewhere, in secular writers, means rocks, viz., on which the Christian love-feasts were in danger of being shipwrecked. The oldest MS. prefixes the article emphatically, "THE rocks."
 The reference to "clouds...winds...waves of the sea," accords with this image of rocks. Fwgate seems to have been misled by the similar sounding word to translate, as English Version, "spots": cf. however, v. 23, which favours English Version. If the Greek will bear it. Two oldest MSS., by the transcriber's effort to make Jude say the same as Peter, read here "deceivings" for "love-feasts," but the weightiest MS. and authorities support English Version reading. The love-feast accompanied the Lord's supper (1 Corinthians, 11, end). Korah the Levite not satisfied with his ministry, aspired to the sacrificing priesthood also; so ministers in the Lord's supper have sought to make it a sacrifice, and themselves the sacrificing priests, usurping the function of our only Christian sacerdotal Priest, Christ Jesus. Let them beware of Korah's doom! without fear—Join these words not as English Version, but with "feast." Sacred feasts especially ought to be celebrated with fear. Feasting is not faculty in itself (BRONZ), but it needs to be accompanied with fear of forgetting God, as Job in the case of his sons' feasts, feeding themselves—Greek, "pasturing (tending) themselves." What they look to is the pampering of themselves, not the feeding of the flock. clouds—from which one would expect refreshing rains. 2 Peter, 2, 17, "wells without water." Professors without practice, carried about—The oldest MSS have "carried aside," i.e., out of the right course (cf. Ephesians, 4, 14). trees whose fruit withereth—rather, "trees of the late (or waning) autumn," viz., when there are no longer leaves or fruits on the trees (BRONZ), &c. without fruit—having no good fruit of knowledge and practice.

sometimes used of what is positively bad. twice dead—First when they cast their leaves in autumn and seem during winter dead, but revive again in spring; secondly, when they are "plucked up by the roots." So these apostates, once dead in unbelief, and then by profession and baptism raised from the death of sin to the life of righteousness, but now having become dead again by apostasy, and so hopelessly dead. There is a climax. Not only without leaves, like trees in late autumn, but without fruit; not only so, but dead twice; and to crown all, "plucked up by the roots." 13. R. glog.—Wild. Jude has in mind Isaiah. 57. 20. shame—plural in Greek, "shames" (cf. Philip. 3. 19). wandering stars—instead of moving on in a regular orbit, as lights to the world, bursting forth on the world like erratic comets, or rather meteors of fire, with a strange glare, and then doomed to fall back again into the blackness of gloom. 14. See Introduction on the source whence Jude derived this prophecy of Enoch. The Holy Spirit, by Jude, has sealed the truth of this much of the matter contained in the book of Enoch, though probably that book as well as Jude, derived it from tradition (cf. Note, v. 9). There are reasons given by some for thinking the book of Enoch copied from Jude rather than vice versa. It is striking how, from the first, prophecy hastened towards its consummation. The earliest prophecies of the Redeemer dwell on His second coming in glory, rather than His first coming in lowliness (cf. Genesis, 3. 15, with Romans, 16. 20). Enoch in his translation without death, illustrated that truth which he all his life preached to the unbelieving world, the certainty of the Lord's coming, and the resurrection of the dead, as the only effectual antidote to their scepticism and self-wise confidence in nature's permanence. And—Greek, "Moreover, also Enoch," &c. of these—in relation to these. The reference of his prophecies was not to the antediluvians alone, but to all the ungodly (v. 15). His prophecy applied primarily indeed to the flood, but ultimately to the final judgment, seventh from Adam—Sevens is the sacred number. In Enoch, freedom from death and the sacred number are combined: for every seventh object is most highly valued. Jude thus shows the antiquity of the prophecy. Cf. "of old" Note, v. 4. There were only five fathers between Enoch and Adam. The seventh from Adam prophesied the things which shall close the seventh age of the world. [BENJEL] comes—lit., "came." Prophecy regards the future as certain as if it were past—angels—Holy angels (cf. Deuteronomy, 33. 2; Daniel, 7. 10; Zechariah, 14. 5; Matthew, 23. 31; Hebrews, 12. 22). 15. This verse and the beginning of Enoch's prophecy, is composed in Hebrew poetic parallelism, the oldest specimen extant. Some think Lamech's speech, which is also in poetic parallelism, was composed in mockery of Enoch's prophecy; as Enoch foretold Jehovah's coming to judgment, so Lamech presumes on impunity in polygamy and murder (just as Cain the murderer seemed to escape with impunity), convince—convict, hard speeches—such as are noticed in v. 8, 10, 16; Malachi, 3. 12, 14; contrast 16, 17. ungodly sinners—not merely sinners, but proud despisers of God; impious, against him—They who speak against God's children are regarded by God as speaking against Himself. 16. murderers—in secret; nothing murmurs against God's ordinances and ministers in church and state. Cf. v. 8, "speak evil of dignities," 15, "hard speeches;" against the Lord. complain—never satisfied with their lot (Numbers, 11. 1; cf. the penalty, Deuteronomy, 28. 47, 48), walking after their own lusts—(v. 18). The secret of their murmuring and complaining is the restless insatiability of their desires, great-swelling words—(2 Peter, 2. 18) men's persons—their mere outward appearances and rank, see us of advantage—for the sake of what they may gain from them. Whilst they talk great swelling words, they are really mean and fawning towards those of wealth and rank. 17. But ye, beloved—in contrast to those reproaches, v. 20, again, remember—Implying that his readers had been contemporaries of the apostles. For Peter uses the very same formula in reminding the contemporaries of himself and the other apostles, spoken before—spoken already before now. The apostles—Peter (Acts, 2 Peter, 3. 2, 3), and Paul before Peter (Acts, 20. 29; 1 Timothy, 4. 1; 2 Timothy, 3. 1). Jude does not exclude himself from the number of the apostles here, for in v. 18, immediately after, he says, "they told YOU," not us rather as Greek, "used to tell you;" implying that Jude's readers were contemporaries of the apostles who used to tell them, 18, mockers—in the parallel, 2 Peter, 3. 3, the same Greek is translated "scoffers." The word is found nowhere else in the New Testament. How ALFORD can deny that 2 Peter, 3. 2, 3, is referred to (at least in part), I cannot imagine, seeing that Jude quotes the very words of Peter as the words which the apostles used to speak to his (Jude's) readers. walk after their own ungodly lusts—lit., "after (according to) their own lusts of ungodliness." 19. These be they—Showing that their characters are such as Peter and Paul had foretold, separate themselves—from church communion in its vital, spiritual reality; for outwardly they took part church ordinances (v. 12). Some oldest MSS. omit "themselves;" then understand it, "separate," cast out members of the church by excommunication (Isaiah, 65. 5; 66. 5; Luke, 6. 22; John, 9. 34; cf. "casteth them out of the church," 3 John, 10). Many, however, understand "themselves," which indeed is read in some of the oldest MSS. as English Version has it. Arrogant setting up of themselves, as having greater sanctity and a wisdom and peculiar doctrine, distinct from others, is implied, sensual—lit., "animal-souled;" as opposed to the spiritual, or "having the Spirit." It is translated "the natural man," 1 Corinthians, 2. 14. In the three-fold division of man's being, body, soul, and spirit, the due state in God's design is, that "the spirit," which is the recipient of the Holy Spirit uniting man to God, should be first, and should rule the soul, which stands intermediate between body and spirit; but in the animal, or natural man, the spirit is sunk into subservency to the animal-soul, which is earthly in its motives and aims. The "carnal" sink somewhat lower, for in these the flesh, the lowest element and corrupt side of man's bodily nature, reigns paramount, not having the Spirit—in the animal and natural man the spirit, his higher part, which ought to be the receiver of the Holy Spirit, is not so; and therefore, his spirit not being in its normal state, he is said not to have the spirit (cf. John, 3. 5. 6). In the completion of redemption the parts of redeemed man shall be placed in their due relation; whereas in the ungodly, the soul severed from the spirit, shall have for ever animal life without union to God and heaven—a living death. 20. Assuming a it, building up yourselves—the opposite to the "separate themselves" (v. 19); as "in the Holy Ghost" is opposed to "Having not the Spirit," on—as on a foundation. Building on THE FAITH is equivalent to building on Christ, the object of faith, praying in the Holy Ghost—(Romans, 8. 26; Ephesians, 6. 18.). The Holy Spirit teaches what we are to pray for, and how. None can pray aright save by being in the Spirit, i.e., in the element of His influence. CHRYSOSTOM states that, among the charms bestowed at the beginning of the New Testament dispensation, was the gift of prayer, bestowed on some one who prayed in the name of the rest, and taught others to pray. Moreover, their prayers so conceived and often used, were received and preserved among Christians, and out of these words of prayer were framed. Such is the origin of liturgies. [HAMMOND.] 21. In v. 20, 21, Jude combines the Father, the Son, and Holy Ghost; and faith, hope, and love. Keep yourselves—not in your own strength, but “in the love of God,” i. e., God’s love to you and all His believing children, the only guarantee for their being kept safe. Man’s need of watching is implied: at the same time he cannot keep himself, unless God in His love keep him, looking for—in hope, the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ—to be fully manifested at His coming. Mercy is usually attributed to the Father; here to the Son; so entirely one are they, 22, 23. None but those who “keep themselves” are likely to “save” others, have compassion—So one oldest MSS. reads. But two oldest MSS., Vulgate, &c., read, “convict;” “reprove to their conviction;” “confute, so as to convince,” making a difference—The oldest MSS. and versions read the accusative for the nominative, “when separating themselves” [WAHL], referring to v. 19; or “when contending with you,” as the Greek is translated, v. 9. 23. save with fear—The oldest MSS. do not read “with fear” in this position: but after “snatching them out of the fire” (with which, cf. Amos, 4. 11; 1 Corinthians, 3. 16; Zechariah, 3. 2, said of a most narrow escape), they add the following words, forming a THIRD class, “and others compassionate with (IN) fear.” Three kinds of patients require three kinds of medical treatment. Ministers and Christians are said to “save” those whom they are made the instruments of saving; the Greek for “save” is present, therefore meaning: “try to save.” Jude already (v. 9) had reference to the same passage (Zechariah, 3. 1-3). The three classes are: (1.) Those who contend with you (accusative in oldest MSS.), whom you should convict; (2.) those who are as brands already in the fire, of which hell-fire is the consummation: these you should try to save by snatching them out; (3.) those who are objects of compassion, whom accordingly you should compassionate (and help if occasion should offer), but at the same time not let pity degenerate into complacency at their error. Your compassion is to be accompanied “with fear” of being at all defiled by them, hating—Even hatred has its legitimate field of exercise. Sin is the only thing which God hates: so ought we, even the garment—a proverbial phrase: avoiding the most remote contact with sin, and hating that which borders on it. As garments of the apostles wrought miracles of good in healing, so the very garment of sinners metaphorically, i. e., anything brought into contact with their pollution, is to be avoided. Cf. as to lepers and other persons defiled, Leviticus, 13. 52-57; 15. 4-17: the garments were held pointed; and any one touching them was excluded, until purified, from religious and civil communion with the sanctified people of Israel. Christians who received at baptism the white garment in token of purity, are not to defile it by any approach to what is defiled, 24, 25. Concluding doxology. Now—Greek, “But.” you—ALFORD, on inferior authority, reads “them.” You is in contradiction to those ungodly men mentioned above. Keep... from falling—rather, “guard... (so as to be) without falling,” or stumbling, before the presence of his glory—i. e., before Himself, when He shall be revealed in glory, faultless—Greek, “blameless,” with exceeding joy—id., “with exultation” as of those who leap for joy. To the only... God our Saviour—The oldest MSS. add, “through Jesus Christ our Lord.” The transcribers fancying that “Saviour” applied to Christ alone, omitted the words. The sense is, To the only God (the Father) who is our Saviour through (i. e., by the mediation of; Jesus Christ our Lord.” dominion—Greek, “might,” power—authority: legitimate power. The oldest MSS. and Vulgate, after “power,” have “before all the ages,” i. e., before all time as to the past; “and now,” as to the present; “and to all the ages,” i. e., for ever, as to the time to come.

THE REVELATION

OF S. JOHN THE DIVINE.

INTRODUCTION.

AUTHENTICITY.—The author calls himself John (ch. 1. 1, 4, 9; 22. 5). Justin Martyr, Dialogue, p. 206 (A. D. 130-167), quotes from the Apocalypse, as John the apostle’s work, the prophecy of the millennium of the saints, to be followed by the general resurrection and judgment. This testimony of Justin is referred to also by Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 4. 18. Justin, in the early part of the second century, held his controversy with Trypho, a learned Jew, at Ephesus, where John had been living (thirty or thirty-five years before: he says that “the Revelation had been given to John, one of the twelve apostles of Christ.” Melito, bishop of Sardis (about 171 A. D.), one of the seven churches addressed, a successor, therefore, of one of the seven angels, is said by Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 4. 26, to have written treatises on the Apocalypse of John. The testimony of the Bishop of Sardis is the more impartial, as Sardis is one of the churches severely reproved ibid. 2. 11. So also Theophilus of Antioch (about 180 A. D.), according to Eusebius 4. 26, quoted testimonies from the Apocalypse of John. Eusebius says the name of Apollonius, who lived in Asia Minor in the end of the second century. Irenæus (about 180 A. D.), a hearer of Polycarp, the disciple of John, and supposed by Archbishop Usher to be the angel of the church of Smyrna, is most decided again and again in quoting the Apocalypse as the work of the apostle John (Hæreses 4. 20. 11; 4. 21. 3; 4. 20. 4; 2. 26. 1; 5. 20. 3; 3. 23. 9). In 2. 30. 1, alluding to the mystical number of the beast, 666 (ch. 12. 18), found in all old copies, he says, “We do not hazard a confident theory as to the name of Antichrist; for if it had been necessary that his name should be proclaimed openly at the present time, it would have been declared by him who saw the apocalyptic vision; for it was seen at no long time back, but almost in our generation, towards the end of Domitian’s reign.” In his work against heresies, published ten years after Polycarp’s martyrdom, he quotes the Apocalypse twenty times, and makes long extracts from it, as inspired Scripture. These testimonies of persons contemporary with John’s immediate successors, had more or less connected with the region of the seven churches to which Revelation is addressed, are most convincing. Tertullian, of north Africa (about 220 A. D.), adversus Marcion 3. 14, quotes the apostle John’s description in the Apocalypse of the sword proceeding out of the Lord’s mouth (ch. 19. 15), and 21, the heavenly city (ch. 21). Cf. de Resurrectione 17; de Anima 2. 9, &c.; de Præscriptione hæreticorum 23. The Muratori fragment of the canon (about A. D. 200) refers to John the apostle writing to the seven churches. Hippolytus, bishop of Ostia, near Rome (about 240 A. D.), de Antichristo, p. 67, quotes ch. 17. 1-18, as the writing of John the apostle. Among Hippolytus’ works, there is specified in the catalogue on his statue, a treatise “on the Apocalypse and gospel according to John.” Clement of Alexandria (about 200 A. D.), Stromata 6. 12, alludes to the twenty-four seats on which the elders sit as mentioned by John in the Apocalypse (ch. 4. 10).

away. Jerome, in Letter to Iovinianus, includes in the Canon the Apocalypse, adding, "It has as a work of Ad. praise this short of its merits. In each of its words he hid manifold senses." Thus an authentic work from the apostolic period, confirms its eminence and authenticity.

The Arian Euphrosinus Hierosolym., and Cyprian the Roman presbyter (Eusebius 5 28), towards the end beginning of the third century, rejected St. John's Apocalypse on mere captious grounds. Cyprian, according to Vita Iulianus, about 310 A. D., attributed it to Cerinthus, on the ground of its supporting the millennial Dionysius of Alexandria mentions many before his time who rejected it because of its obscurity, and to support Cerinthus' dogma of an earthly and carnal kingdom; whom they attributed it to Cerinthus, a scholar of Origen, and bishop of Alexandria (A. D. 207), admits its inspiration (in Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 7 25), but attributes it to some John distinct from John the apostle, on the ground of its difference of style and compared with St. John's gospel and epistle, as also because the name John is several times mentioned in the book, which is always kept back in both the gospel and epistle; moreover, neither does the epistle make any allusion to the Apocalypse to the epistle; and the style is not pure Greek, but abounds in barbarisms and not wavers in opinion (Ecclesiastical History 24, 26) as to whether it is, or is not, to be ranked among the undoubted Scriptures. His antipathy to the millennial doctrine would give an unconscious bias to his judgment. Cyril of Jerusalem (A. D. 386), Catechesis 4, 28, 26, omits the Apocalypse in enumerating the New Testament read privately as well as publicly. "Whatever is not read in the churches, that do not even read by the ancient bishops of the church who transmitted them to us were far wiser than thou art." Hence, day, the Apocalypse was not read in the churches. Yet in Catechesis 1, 4, he quotes ch. 2, 7, 17; and in 12, he draws the prophetic statement from ch. 17, 11, that the king who is to humble the three kings the eighth king. In a 12, and 27, he similarly quotes from ch. 12, 3, 4. Alford conjectures that Cyril changed his opinion, and that these references to the Apocalypse were slips of memory whereby he ret which belonged to his former, not his subsequent views. The sixtieth canon (if genuine) of the 1 in the middle of the fourth century, omits the Apocalypse from the canonical books. The Easter doubted, the Western church, after the fifth century, universally recognised, the Apocalypse. Cyril Adorationes, 146, though implying the fact of some doubting its genuineness, himself undoubtedly assent of St. John. Andreas of Caesarea in Cappadocia, recognised as genuine and canonical, and wrote the finest commentary on, the Apocalypse. The sources of doubt seem to have been, (1.) the antagonism of symbolism, which is set forth in it; (2.) its obscurity and symbolism having caused it not to be read in the church to the young. But the most primitive tradition is unequivocal in its favour. In a word, the object cidedly for it, the only arguments against it seem to have been subjective.

The personal notices of John in the Apocalypse occur ch. 1, 1, 4, 9; 22, 6. Moreover, the writer's churches of Proconsular Asia (ch. 2, 1), accord with the concurrent tradition, that after John's return Patmos, at the death of Domitian, under Nerva, he resided for long, and died at last in Ephesus, in (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 3, 20, 22). If the Apocalypse were not the inspired work of John, perhaps an address from their superior to the seven churches of Proconsular Asia, it would have assuredly been; whereas the earliest testimonies in those churches are all in its favour. One person alone was a stage of authority such as is addressed to the seven angels of the churches, namely, John, as the last and superintendent of all the churches. Also, it accords with John's manner to assert the accuracy of his the beginning and end of his book (cf. ch. 1, 2, 3, and 22, 8, with John, 1, 14; 21, 24; 1 John, 1, 1, 9). Again the view of the writer being an inspired apostle, that he addresses the angels or presidents of the seven writings alone is Christ called directly "the Lamb" (John, 1. 29, 36). In 1 Peter, 1. 19, He is called "as a lamb without blemish," in allusion to Isaiah, 53. 7. So the use of "witness," or "testimony" (ch. 1. 2, 9; 6. 9; 11. 7, 8; cf. John, 1. 7, 8, 15, 19, 26; 1 John, 1. 3; 4. 14; 5. 6-11). "Keep the word," or "commandments" (ch. 2. 6, 10; 12. 17, &c.; cf. John. 8. 51, 58; 14. 15). The assertion of the same thing positively and negatively (ch. 2. 2, 6, 8, 13; 3. 8, 17, 18; cf. John, 1. 3, 6, 7, 20; 1 John, 2. 7, 28). Cf. also 1 John, 2. 30, 27, with ch. 2. 12, as to the spiritual anointing. The seeming solecisms of style are attributable to that inspired elevation which is above mere grammatical rules, and are designed to arrest the reader's attention by the peculiarity of the phrase, so as to pause and search into some deep truth lying beneath. The vivid earnestness of the inspired writer, handling a subject so transcending all others, raises him above all servile adherence to ordinary rules, so that at times he abruptly passes from one grammatical construction to another, as he graphically sets the thing described before the eye of the reader. This is not due to ignorance of grammar, for he "has displayed a knowledge of grammatical rules in other much more difficult constructions." [Wiser.] The concision of thought is more attended to than mere grammatical concision. Another consideration to be taken into account is, that two-fifths of the whole being the recorded language of others, he moulds his style accordingly. Cf. Tregelles' Introduction to Revelation from Heathen Authorities.

Tregelles well says (New Testament Historic Evidence). "There is no book of the New Testament for which we have such clear, ample, and numerous testimonies in the second century, as we have in favour of the Apocalypses. The more closely the witnesses were connected with the apostle John (as was the case with Irenaeus), the more explicit is their testimony. That doubts should prevail in after ages, must have originated either in ignorance of the earlier testimony, or else from some supposed intuition of what an apostle ought to have written. The objections on the ground of internal style can weigh nothing against the actual evidence. It is in vain to argue a priori, that St John could not have written this book, when we have the evidence of several competent witnesses that he did write it."

RELATION OF THE APOCALYPSE TO THE REST OF THE CANON.—Gregory Nyssen, tom. 2. p. 601, calls Revelation "the last book of grace." It completes the volume of inspiration, so that we are to look for no further revelation till Christ Himself shall come. Appropriately the last book completing the Canon was written by John, the last survivor of the apostles. The New Testament is composed of the historical books, the gospels and Acts, the doctrinal epistles, and the one prophetic book, Revelation. The same apostle wrote the last of the gospels, and probably the last of the epistles, and the only prophetic book of the New Testament. All the books of the New Testament had been written, and were read in the church assemblies, some years before John's death. His life was providentially prolonged that he might give the final attestation to Scripture. About the year 100 A.D., the bishops of Asia (the angels of the seven churches) came to John at Ephesus, bringing him copies of the three gospels, Matthew, Mark, and Luke, and desired of him a statement of his apostolical judgment concerning them; whereupon he pronounced them authentic, genuine, and inspired, and at their request added his own gospel to complete the fourfold aspect of the gospel of Christ (cf. Muratori's Canon; Eusebius 2. 26; Jerome, Prologus in Matthew; Victorinus on the Apocalypses; Theodore, Mopsestina. A Greek divine, quoted in Alliance, calls Revelation "the Seal of the whole Bible." The Canon would be incomplete without Revelation. Scripture is a complete whole, its component books, written in a period ranging over 1600 years, being mutually connected. Unity of aim and spirit pervades the entire, so that the end is the necessary sequence of the middle, and the middle of the beginning. Genesis presents before us man and his bride in innocence and blessedness, followed by man's fall through Satan's subtlety, and man's consequent misery, his exclusion from Paradise and its tree of life and delightful rivers. Revelation presents, in reverse order, man first liable to sin and death, but afterwards made conqueror through the blood of the Lamb; the first Adam and Eve, represented by the second Adam, Christ, and the church, His spotless bride, in Paradise, with free access to the tree of life and the crystal water of life that flows from the throne of God. As Genesis foretold the bruising of the serpent's head by the woman's seed, so Revelation declares the final accomplishment of that prediction (chs. 12, 20).

PLACE AND TIME OF WRITING.—The best authorities among the fathers state that John was exiled under Domitian (Irenaeus 5. 30; Clement of Alexandria; Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 3. 20). Victorinus says that he had to labour in the mines of Patmos. At Domitian's death, 96 A.D. he returned to Ephesus under the emperor Nerva. Probably it was immediately after his return that he wrote, under Divine inspiration, the account of the visions vouchsafed to him in Patmos (ch. 1. 2, 9). However, ch. 10. 4 seems to imply that he wrote the visions immediately after seeing them. Patmos is one of the Sporades. Its circumference is about thirty miles. "It was fitting that when forbidden to go beyond certain bounds of the earth's lands, he was permitted to penetrate the secrets of heaven" (Bede, Explic. Apocalypses on ch. 1) The following arguments favour an earlier date, etc., under Nero: (1.) Eusebius, in Evangelical Demonstrations, unites in the same sentence John's banishment with the stoning of James and the beheading of Paul, which were under Nero. (2.) Clement Alexandrian's story of the robber reclaimed by John, after he had pursued, and with difficulty overtaken him accords better with John then being a younger man, than under Domitian, when he was 100 years old. Arcthan, in the sixth century, applies the sixth seal to the destruction of Jerusalem (70 A.D.), adding that the Apocalypses was written before that event. So the Syriac version states he was banished by Nero the Camsar. Laodicea was overthrown by an earthquake, 60 A.D., but was immediately rebuilt, so that its being called "rich and increased with goods" is not incompatible with this book having been written under the Neronian persecution (64 A.D.). But the possible allusions to it in Hebrews, 10. 37; cf. ch. 1. 4; 4. 8; 5. 2; 13; Hebrews, 11. 10; cf. ch. 21. 14; Hebrews, 12. 22, 23; cf. ch. 14. 1; Hebrews, 8. 1, 2; cf. ch. 11. 19; 15. 6; 21. 8; Hebrews, 4. 13; cf. ch. 1. 16; 2. 13, 16; 19. 13, 15; Hebrews, 4. 9; cf. ch. 20; also 1 Peter, 1. 7, 13; 4. 13, with ch. 1. 1; 1 Peter, 2. 9, with ch. 5. 10; 2 Timothy, 4. 8, with ch. 2. 26, 27; 2. 21; 11. 18; Ephesians, 6. 12, with ch. 12. 7-18; Philippians, 4. 3, with ch. 3. 5; 13. 8; 17. 8; 30. 13, 15; Colossians, 1. 18, with ch. 1. 8; 1 Corinthians, 15. 23, with ch. 10. 7; 11. 15-18, make a date before the destruction of Laodicea possible. Cerinthus is stated to have died before John: as then he borrowed much in his Pseudo-Apocalypses from John's, it is likely the latter was at an earlier date than Domitian's reign. See Tillich's Introduction to Apocalypses. But the Pauline benediction (ch. 1. 4) implies it was written after Paul's death under Nero.

TO WHAT READERS ADDRESSED.—The inscription states that it is addressed to the seven churches of Asia, i. e., Proconsular Asia. St John's reason for fixing on the number seven (for there were more than seven churches in the region meant by "Asia," for instance, Magnesia and Tralles), was doubtless because seven is the sacred number implying totality and universality: so it is implied that John, through the medium of the seven churches, addresses in the Spirit the church of all places and ages. The church in its various states of spiritual life or deadness, in all ages and places, is represented by the seven churches, and is addressed with words of consolation or warning accordingly. Smyrna and Philadelphia alone of the seven are honoured with unmix'd praise, as faithful in tribulation, and rich in good works. Hecateia of a dead kind had by this time arisen in the churches of Asia, and the love of many had waxed cold, whilst others had advanced to greater zeal, and one had sealed his testimony with his blood.

OBJECT.—It begins with admonitory addresses to the seven churches from the Divine Son of man, whom John saw in vision, after a brief introduction which sets forth the main subject of the book, viz., to "show unto His servants things which must shortly come to pass" (chs. 1-3). From ch. 4. to the end is mainly prophecy, with practical exhortations and consolations, however, interspersed, similar to those addressed to the seven churches (the representatives of the universal church of every age), and so connecting the body of the book with its beginning, which therefore forms its appropriate introduction.

Three schools of interpretation exist: (1) The Preterists, who hold that almost the whole has been fulfilled. (2) The Historical Interpreters, who hold that it comprises the history of the church from St. John's time to the end of the world, the seals being chronologically succeeded by the trumpets, and the trumpets by the vials. (3) The Futurists, who consider almost the whole as yet future, and to be fulfilled immediately before Christ's second coming. The first theory was not held by any of the earliest fathers, and is only held now by Rationalists, who limit John's vision to things within his own horizon, Pagan Rome's persecutions of Christians, and its consequently anticipated destruction. The futurist school is open to this great objection: it would leave the church of Christ unprotected with prophetic guidance or support under her fiery trials for 1260 or 1800 years. New God has said, "Surely He will do nothing, but He revealeth His secrets unto His servants the prophets." The Jews had a succession of prophets who guided them with the light of prophecy: what their prophets were to them, that the apocalyptic Scriptures have been, and are, to us.

Alford, following Isaac Williams, draws attention to the parallel connection between the Apocalypse and Christ's discourse on the mount of Olivet recorded in Matthew, 24. The seals plainly bring us down to the second coming of Christ, just as the trumpets also do (cf. ch. 8. 12-17; 9. 1. &c; 11. 15), and as the vials also do (ch. 16. 17): all three run parallel and end in the same point. Certain "catchwords" (as Wordsworth calls them) connect the three series of symbols together. They do not succeed one to the other in historical and chronological sequence, but move side by side, the subsequent ones filling up in detail the same picture which the preceding series had drawn in outline. So Victorinus (on ch. 7. 2, the earliest commentator on the Apocalypse, says, "The order of the things said is not to be regarded, since after the Holy Spirit, whom He has run to the end of the last time, again returns to the same times, and supplies what He has less fully expressed." And Primasius, of Apocryphus in gen., "In the trumpets he gives a description by a pleasing repetition, as in his custom."

At the very beginning, St. John hastens by anticipation (as was the tendency of all the prophets, to the great consummation. Ch. 1. 7, "Behold, He cometh with clouds," &c.; v. 8, 17, "I am the beginning and the ending—the first and the last." So the seven epistles exhibit the same anticipation of the end. Ch. 3. 12, "Him that overcometh, I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven:" cf. at the close, ch. 21. 3. So also ch. 2. 28, "I will give him the morning star;" cf. at the close, 22. 16, "I am the bright and morning star."

Again, the earthquake that ensues on the opening of the sixth seal, is one of the catchwords, i. e., a link connecting chronologically this sixth seal with the sixth trumpet (ch. 9. 13; 11. 13): cf. also the seventh vial, ch. 16. 17, 18. The consummation of the opening of the sixth seal, it is plain, in no full and exhaustive sense apply to any event, save the terrors which shall overwhelm the ungodly just before the coming of the Judge.

Again, the beast out of the bottomless pit, between the sixth and seventh trumpets, connects this series with the section, chs. 12, 13, 14, concerning the church and her adversaries.

Again, the sealing of the 144,000 under the sixth seal, connects this seal with the section, chs. 12-14.

Again, the loosing of the four winds by the four angels standing on the four corners of the earth, under the sixth seal, answers to the loosing of the four angels at the Euphrates, under the sixth trumpet.

Moreover, links occur in the Apocalypse connecting it with the Old Testament. For instance, the "mouth speaking great things," connects the beast that blasphemes against God, and makes war against the saints, with the little horn, or his king, who, arising after the ten kings, shall speak against the Most High, and wear out the saints; also, of the "forty-two months" (ch. 12. 6), or "a thousand two hundred and threescore days" (ch. 12. 6), with the "time, times, and the dividing of time," of Daniel, 7. 25. Moreover, the "forty-two months," ch. 11. 2, answering to ch. 12. 6, and 13. 5, link together the period under the sixth trumpet, to the section, chs. 12, 13, 14.

Aubertin observes, "The history of salvation is mysteriously governed by holy numbers. They are the scaffolding of the organic edifice. They are not merely outward indications of time, but indications of nature and essence. Not only nature, but history, is based in numbers. Scripture and antiquity put numbers as the fundamental forms of things, when we put ideas." As number is the regulator of the relations and proportions of the natural world, so does it enter most frequently into the revelations of the Apocalypse, which sets forth the harmonies of the supernatural, the immediately divine. Thus the most supernatural revelation leads us the farthest into the natural, as was to be expected, seeing the God of nature and of revelation is one. Seven is the number for perfection (cf. ch. 1. 4; 4. 5, the seven Spirits before the throne; also, ch. 5. 6, the Lamb's seven horns and seven eyes). Thus the seven churches represent the church Catholic in its totality. The seven seals—trumpets—vials, are severally a complete series each in itself, fulfilling perfectly the Divine course of judgment. Three-and-a-half implies a number opposed to the divine (seven), but broken in itself, and which, in the moment of its highest triumph, is overwhelmed by judgment and utter ruin. Four is the number of the world's extension; seven is the number of God's revelation in the world. In the four beasts of Daniel there is a recognition of some power above them, at the same time that there is a mimicry of the four cherubs of Ezekiel, the heavenly symbols of all creation in its due subjection to God (ch. 4. 6-8). So the four corners of the earth, the four winds, the four angels loosed from the Euphrates, and Jerusalem lying "four-square," represent world-wide extension. The sevenfoldness of the Spirits on the part of God corresponds to the fourfold cherubim on the part of the created. John, seeing more deeply into the essentially God-opposed character of the world, presents to us, not the four beasts of Daniel, but the seven heads of the beast, whereby it arrogates to itself the sevenfold perfection of the Spirits of God: at the same time that, with characteristic self-contradiction, it has as horns, the number peculiar to the world-power. Its unjust usurpation of the sacred number seven, is marked by the addition of an eighth to the seven heads, and also by the beast's own number, 666, which in units, tens, and hundreds, repeats upon, but falls short of, seven. The judgments on the world are complete in six: after the sixth seal, and the sixth trumpet, there is a pause. When seven comes, there comes "the kingdom of our Lord and His Christ." Six is the number of the world given to judgment. Moreover, six is half of twelve, as three-and-a-half is the half of seven. Twelve is the number of the church: cf. the twelve tribes of Israel, the twelve stars on the woman's head (ch. 12. 1), the twelve gates of new Jerusalem. Six thus symbolises the world broken, and without solid foundation. Twice twelve is the number of the heavenly elders; twelve times twelve thousand, the number of the sealed elect; the tree of life yields twelve manner of fruit. Doubtless, besides this symbolic force, there is a special chronological meaning in the numbers; but as yet, though a con-subject of investigation, they have received no solution which we can be sure is the true one. They are intended to a reverent enquiry, not to gratify idle speculative curiosity; and when the event shall have been fulfilled, they will divine wisdom of God who ordered all things in minutely harmonious relations, and left neither the times nor to hap-hazard.

arguments for the year-day theory are as follows: Dan. 9. 24, "Seventy weeks are determined upon," where the may be seventy weeks; but Mede observes, the Habres word means always seven of days, and never seven of years or, 12. 8; Deuteronomy, 16. 9, 10, 16. Again, the number of years' wandering of the Israelites was made to correspond number of days in which the spies searched the land, vis., forty: cf. "each day for a year," Numbers, 14. 33, 34. So in 4. 5, 6, "I have laid upon thee the years of their iniquity, according to the number of the days, three hundred and sixty-four days: I have appointed thee each day for a year." St. John, in Revelation itself, uses days in a sense hardly be literal. Ch. 2. 10, "Ye shall have tribulation ten days:" the persecution of ten years recorded by Eusebius, correspond to it. In the year-day theory there is still quite enough of obscurity to extend the patience and profaith, for we cannot say precisely when the 1,260 years begin: so that this theory is quite compatible with Christ's Of that day and hour knoweth no man," &c. However, it is a difficulty in this theory that "a thousand years," in 7, can hardly mean 1000 by 360 days, i. e., 360,000 years. The first resurrection there must be literal, even as it taken literally, "the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished." To interpret the spiritually, would entail the need of interpreting the latter so, which would be most improbable; for it would imply rest of the (spiritually) dead lived not spiritually until the end of the thousand years, and then, that they did ritually to life. 1 Corinthians, 15. 23, "they that are Christ's at His coming," confirms the literal view.

CHAPTER I.

1-20. TITLE: SOURCE AND OBJECT OF THIS VISION: BLESSING ON THE READER AND KEEPER AS THE TIME IS NEAR: INSCRIPTION TO THE CHURCHES: APOSTOLIC GREETING: KEY—"BEHOLD HE COMETH" (cf. at the close, 0, "Surely I come quickly"); INTRODUCTORY OF THE SON OF MAN IN GLORY, AMIDST SEVEN CANDLESICKS, WITH SEVEN STARS IN HIS RIGHT HAND. 1. Revelation—An apocalypse of those things which had been veiled. festo of the kingdom of Christ. The travelling of the church for the Gentile Christian times. detailed history of the future, but a representation of the great epochs and chief powers in development of God in relation to the world. The historical view goes counter to the great principle Scripture interprets itself. Revelation is to us to understand the times, not the times to in us the Apocalypse, although it is in the nature case that a reflex influence is exerted here understood by the prudent. [AUBERLEN.] It is in a series of parallel groups, not in chronological succession. Still there is an organic historical development of the kingdom of God. In this book other books of the Bible end and meet: in its summation of all previous prophecy. Daniel is as to Christ and the Roman destruction of em, and the last antichrist. But John's Revelation up the intermediate period, and describes the intermediate and final state beyond antichrist. Daniel, prophetically, views the history of God's in relation to the four world-kingdoms. John, apostle, views history from the Christian Church.

The term Apocalypse is applied to no Old Testament book. Daniel is the nearest approach to what Daniel was told to seal and shut up till the end of the end, St. John, now that the time is at hand, is directed to reveal, of Jesus Christ—commends Him. Jesus Christ, not John the writer, author of the Apocalypse. Christ taught many before His departure; but those which were able for announcement at that time He brought into the Apocalypse. [BENGL.] Cf. His ep. to John, 15. 15, "All things that I have heard of her, I have made known unto you;" also, John, "The Spirit of truth will show you things to come."

The Gospels and Acts are the books, really, of His first advent, in the flesh, and in the epistles are the inspired comment on them. The Apocalypse is the book of His second advent and its preliminary to it. which God gave unto him, and which He reveals Himself and His will in, and by,

His Son. to show—The word recurs ch. 22. 6: so entirely have the parts of Revelation reference to one another. It is its peculiar excellence that it comprises in a perfect compendium future things, and those widely differing: things close at hand, far off, and between the two; great and little: destroying and saving: repeated from old prophecies and new; long and short, and these interwoven with one another, opposed and mutually agreeing; mutually involving and evolving one another: so that in no book more than in this would the addition, or taking away, of a single word or clause (ch. 22. 18, 19), have the effect of marring the sense of the context and the comparison of passages together. [BENGL.] his servants—not merely to "His servant John," but to all His servants (cf. ch. 22. 3). shortly—Greek, "speedily," tit., "in," or "with speed." Cf. "The time is at hand," v. 3, ch. 22. 6, "shortly;" 7, "Behold I come quickly." Not that the things prophesied were according to man's computation near; but this word "shortly" implies a corrective of our estimate of worldly events and periods. Though a "thousand years" (ch. 20.) at least are included, the time is declared to be at hand. Luke, 18. 8, "speedily." The Israelite church hastened eagerly to the predicted end, which premature eagerness prophecy restrains (cf. Daniel, 9.). The Gentile church needs to be reminded of the transitoriness of the world, which it is apt to make its home, and the nearness of Christ's advent. On the one hand Revelation saith, "the time is at hand;" on the other, the succession of seals, &c., show that many intermediate events must first elapse. he sent—Jesus Christ sent, by his angel—joined with "sent." The angel does not come forward to "signify" things to John until ch. 17. 1; 19. 9, 10. Previously to that St. John receives information from others. Jesus Christ opens the Revelation, v. 10, 11; ch. 4. 1; in ch. 6. 1, one of the four living creatures acts as his informant; in ch. 7. 13, one of the elders; in ch. 10. 8, 9, the Lord and His angel who stood on the sea and earth. Only at the end (ch. 17. 1) does the one angel stand by Him (cf. Daniel, 8. 16; 9. 21; Zechariah, 1. 19). 2. bare record of—"testified the word of God" in this book. Where we should say "testifies," the ancients in epistolary communications use the past tense. The word of God constitutes his testimony; in v. 3, "the words of this prophecy." The testimony of Jesus—"the Spirit of prophecy" (ch. 19. 10). and of all things that—The oldest MSS. omit "and." Translates, "Whatever things he saw," in apposition with "the word of God and the testimony of Jesus Christ." 3. he that readeth, and they that hear—etc. the public reader in church assemblies, and his hearers. In the first instance, he by whom John sent the book.

from Patmos to the seven churches, read it publicly: a usage most Scriptural and profitable. A special blessing attends him who reads or hears the apocalyptic "prophecy" with a view to keeping the things therein (as there is but one article to "they that hear and keep those things," not two classes, but only one is meant: "they who not only hear, but also keep those things," Romans, 2. 13), even though he find not the key to its interpretation, he finds a stimulus to faith, hope, and patient waiting for Christ. Note, the term "prophecy" has relation to the human medium or prophet inspired, here John: "Revelation" to the Divine Being who reveals His will, here Jesus Christ. God gave the revelation to Jesus: He by His angel revealed it to John, who was to make it known to the church. 4. John—the apostle. For none but he (supposing the writer an honest man) would thus sign himself nakedly without addition. As sole survivor and representative of the apostles and eye-witnesses of the Lord, he needed no designation save his name, to be recognised by his readers. seven churches—not that there were not more churches in that region, but the number seven is fixed on as representing totality. These seven represent the universal church of all times and places. See TRINCHINI'S (Epistles to Seven Churches) interesting Note, ch. 1. 29, on the number seven. It is the covenant number, the sign of God's covenant relation to mankind, and especially to the church. Thus, the seventh day, Sabbath, Genesis, 2. 3; Ezekiel, 20. 12. Circumcision, the sign of the covenant, after seven days (Genesis, 17. 12). Sacrifices, Numbers, 23. 1, 14, 29; 2 Chronicles, 29. 21. Cf. also God's acts typical of His covenant, Joshua, 6. 4, 15, 16; 2 Kings, 5. 10. The feasts ordered by seven of time, Deuteronomy, 16. 1; 16. 9, 13, 15. It is a combination of three, the Divine number (thus the Trinity: the thrice Holy, Isaiah, 6. 3; the blessing, Numbers, c. 24-26) and four the number of the organised world in its extension (thus the four elements, the four seasons, the four winds, the four corners or quarters of the earth, the four living creatures, emblems of redeemed creaturely life, ch. 4. 6; Ezekiel, 1. 5, 6, with four faces and four wings each; the four beasts, and four metals, representing the four world-empires, Daniel, 2. 32, 33; 7. 3; the four-sided gospel designed for all quarters of the world; the sheet tied at four corners, Acts, 10. 11; the four horns, the sum of the world's forces against the church, Zechariah, 1. 18). In the Apocalypse, where God's covenant with His church comes to its consummation, appropriately the number seven recurs still more frequently than elsewhere in Scripture. Asia—Proconular, governed by a Roman proconsul: consisting of Phrygia, Mysia, Caria, and Lydia: the kingdom which Attalus III. had bequeathed to Rome. Græc... peace—Paul's apostolical greeting. In his pastoral epistles he inserts "mercy" in addition: so 2 John, 5. him which is... was... is to come—A periphrasis for the incommunicable name JEHOVAH, the self-existing One, unchangeable. In Greek the indeclinability of the designation here implies His unchangeableness. Perhaps the reason why "He which is to come" is used, instead of "He that shall be," is because the grand theme of Revelation is the Lord's coming (c. 7). Still it is THE FATHER as distinguished from "Jesus Christ" (c. 5) who is here meant. But so one are the Father and Son, that the designation "which is to come," more immediately applicable to Christ, is used here of the Father. the seven Spirits which are before his throne—the oldest MSS. omit "are." before—lit., "in the presence of." The Holy Spirit in His sevenfold (i.e., perfect, complete, and universal) energy. Corresponding to "the seven churches." One in His own essence, manifold in His gracious influences. The seven eyes resting on the stone laid by Jehovah (ch. 6. 6). Four is the number of the creature world (cf. the fourfold cherubim); seven the number of God's revelation in the world. 5. the faithful witness—of His truth concerning Himself and His mission as Prophet, Priest, and King Saviour. "He was the faithful witness, because all things that He heard of the Father he faithfully made known to His disciples. Also, because He taught the way of God in truth, and cared not for man, nor regarded the persons of men. Also, because the truth which He taught in words He confirmed by miracles. Also, because the testimony to Himself on the part of the Father He denied not even in death. Lastly, because He will give true testimony of the works of good and bad at the day of judgment." [RICHARD OF ST. VICTOR IN TRENCH.] The nominative in Greek standing in apposition to the genitive, "Jesus Christ," gives majestic prominence to "the faithful witness," the first-born of the dead—(Colossians, 1. 18). Lazarus rose to die again. Christ rose to die no more. The image is not as if the grave was the womb of His resurrection-birth [ALFORD]; but as Acts, 13. 33; Romans, 1. 4, treat Christ's resurrection as the epoch and event which fulfilled the Scripture, Psalm 2. 7, "This day (at the resurrection) have I begotten thee." It was then that His Divine Sonship as the God-man was manifested and openly attested by the Father. So our resurrection and our manifested sonship, or generation, are connected. Hence "regeneration" is used of the resurrection-state as the restitution of all things (Matthew, 19. 28), the Prince—or Ruler. The kingship of the world which the Tempter offered to Jesus on condition of doing homage to him, and so shunning the cross. He has obtained by the cross. "The kings of the earth" conspired against the Lord's Anointed (Psalm 2. 2): these He shall break in pieces (Psalm 2. 9). Those who are wise in time and kiss the Son shall bring their glory unto Him at His manifestation as King of kings, after He has destroyed His foes. Unto him that loved us—The oldest MSS. read the present, "...loeveth us." It is His ever-continuing character. He loeveth us, and ever shall love us—His love rests evermore on His people. washed us—The two oldest MSS. read "freed (loosed as from a bond, us," so Andreas and Primasius. One very old MS., Vulgate, and Coptic read as English Version, perhaps drawn from ch. 7. 14. "Loosed us (in virtue of) His blood," being the harder reading to understand, is less likely to have come from the transcribers. The reference is thus to Greek lutros, the ransom paid for our release (Matthew, 20. 28). In favour of English Version reading is the usage whereby the priests, before putting on the holy garments and ministering, washed themselves: so spiritually believers, as priests unto God, must first be washed in Christ's blood from every stain before they can serve God aright now, or hereafter minister as dispensers of blessing to the subject nations in the millennial kingdom, or minister before God in heaven. 6. And hath—rather as Greek, "And (He) hath," made us kings—the oldest MSS. read, "a kingdom." One oldest MS. reads the dative, "for us." Another reads "us," accusative: so Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and Andreas. This seems preferable. "He made us (to be) a kingdom." So Exodus, 19. 6, "a kingdom of priests;" 1 Peter, 2. 9, "a royal priesthood." The saints shall constitute peculiarly a kingdom of God, and shall themselves be kings (ch. 5. 10). They shall share His King-Priest throne in the millennial kingdom. The emphasis thus falls more on the kingdom than on priests; whereas in English Version reading it is equally distributed between both. This book lays prominent stress on the saints' kingdom. They are kings because they are priests: the priesthood is the continuous ground and legitimization of their kingship: they are kings in relation to man, priests in relation to God, serving His day and night in His temple (ch. 7. 15; & 16).  less estimated it. The African Church being more exposed to the cross always made much of it. [BENin the Spirit—in a state of ecstasy: the outer world being shut out, and the inner and higher life or spirit, being taken full possession of by God's Spirit, so that an immediate connexion with the invisible world is established. Whilst the prophet "speaks in the Spirit, the apocalyptic seer is in the Spirit in his whole person. The spirit only (that which connects us with God and the invisible world) is active, or rather recipient, in the apocalyptic state. With Christ this being "in the Spirit" was not the exception, but His continual state. on the Lord's day—Though forcibly detained from church-communion with the brethren in the sanctuary on the Lord's day, the weekly commemoration of the resurrection, John was holding spiritual communion with them. This is the earliest mention of the term "the Lord's day." But the consecration of the day to worship, almsgiving, and the Lord's supper, is implied Acts, 20. 7; 1 Corinthians, 16. 2; cf.

 John, 20. 19-26. The name corresponds to "the Lord's supper." 1 Corinthians, 11. 20. IGHATIUS seems to allude to "the Lord's day" (ad Magne, 9), and IRENÆUS in the Quæst. ad Orthod. 116 (in JUSTIN MARTYR).

(second century), wrote a book on the Lord's day (Eusebius, 4. 26). Also, DIODORUS of Corinth, in Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, 4. 21, 8; CLEMENT of Alexandria, Stromata, 8, and I. 12; ORIGEN, c. Cels. 8. 22. The theory that the day of Christ's second coming is meant, is untenable. "The day of the Lord" is different in the Greek from "the Lord's (an adjective) day," which latter in the ancient church always designates our Sunday, though it is not impossible that the two shall coincide (at least in some parts of the earth), whence a tradition is mentioned in JEROME, on Matthew, 25., that the Lord's coming was expected especially on the Paschal Lord's day. The visions of the Apocalypse, the seas, trumpets, and visits, &c., are grouped in sevens, and naturally begin on the first day of the seven, the birthday of the church, whose future they set forth. [WORDSWORTH.] great voice—summoning solemn attention: Greek order, "I heard a voice behind me great (loud) as that of a trumpet." The trumpet summoned to religious feasts, and accompanied God's revelations of Himself. 11. I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last; and—The oldest MSS. omit all this clause. write in a book—To this book, having such an origin, and to the other books of Holy Scripture, who is there that gives the weight which their importance demands, referring them to the many books of the world? [BENGE.] seven churches—As there were many other churches in Proconsular Asia (e. g., Miletus, Magnesia, Tralles, besides the seven specified, doubtless the number seven is fixed upon because of its mystical signification, expressing totality and universality. The words "which are in Asia" are rejected by the oldest MSS., A, B, C, CYPRIAN, Vulgate, and Syriac; Coptic alone supports them of old authorities. These seven are representative churches; and, as a complex whole, ideally complete, embody the chief spiritual characteristics of the church, whether as faithful or unfaithful, in all ages. The churches selected are not taken at random, but have a many-sided completeness. Thus, on one side we have Smyrna, a church exposed to persecutions unto death; on the other Sardis, having a high name for spiritual life and yet dead. Again, Laodicea, in its own estimate rich and having need of nothing, with ample talents, yet lukewarm in Christ's cause; on the other hand, Philadelphia, with but a little strength, yet keeping Christ's word and having an open door of usefulness set before it by Christ Himself. Again, Ephesus, intolerant of evil and of false apostles, yet having left its first love; on the other hand, Thyatira, abounding in works, love, service, and faith, yet suffering the false prophetess to seduce many. In another aspect, Ephesus in conflict with false freedom, i. e., fleshly licentiousness (the Nicolaitanes); so also Pergamos in conflict with Balaam-like tempters to fornication and idol-meats; and on the other side, Philadelphia in conflict with the Jewish synagogue, i. e., legal bondage. Finally, Sardis and Laodicea without any active opposition to call forth their spiritual energies; a dangerous position, considering man's natural indolence. In the historic scheme of interpretation, which seems fanciful, Ephesus meaning "the beloved" or "desired" (STRIBER) represents the waning period of the apostolic age. Smyrna ("myrrh" bitter suffering, yet sweet and costly perfume, the martyr period of the Decian and Diocletian age. Pergamos in "castle" or "tower", the church possessing earthly power and decreasing spiritually from Constantine's time until the seventh century. Thyatira ("unwearied about sacrifices"), the Papal church in the first half of the middle ages; like "Jezebel," keen about its so-called sacrifice of the mass, and slaying the prophets and witnesses of God. Sardis, from the close of the twelfth century to the Reformation. Philadelphia ("brotherly love"), the first century of the Reformation. Laodicea, the Reformed church after its first zeal had become lukewarm. 12. see the voice—i. e., ascertain whence the voice came: to see who was it from whom the voice proceeded. that—Greek, "of what kind it was which." The voice is that of God the Father, as at Christ's baptism and transfiguration, so here in presenting Christ as our High Priest, speaks—The oldest MSS. versions, and fathers read, "was speaking," being—"having learned," seven, candlesticks—"lamp-stands" [KELLY.] The stand holding the lamp. In Exodus, 25. 31, 32, the seven are united in ONE candlestick or lamp-stand, i. e., six arms and a central shaft; so Zechariah, 4. 2. 11. Here the seven are seven candlesticks, typifying, as that one, the entire church, but now no longer as the Jewish church represented by the one sevenfold candlestick: restricted to one outward unity and one place: the several churches are mutually independent as to external ceremonies and government provided all things are done to edification, and schisms or needless separations are avoided, yet one in the unity of the Spirit and the Headship of Christ. The candlestick is not light, but the bearer of light, holding it forth to give light around. The light is the Lord's, not the church's: from Him she receives it. She is to be a light-bearer to His glory. The candlestick stood in the Holy place, the type of the church on earth, as the Holiest place was type of the church in heaven. The Holy place's only light was derived from the candlestick, day-light being excluded: so the Lord God is the church's only light: her's is the light of grace, not nature. "Golden" symbolises at once the greatest preciousness and sanctity; so that in the Zend Avesta "golden" is synonymous with heavenly or divine. [TRENCH.] 13. His glorified form as man could be recognised by John, who had seen it at the transfiguration, in the midst—Implying Christ's continual presence and ceaseless activity in the midst of His people on earth. In ch. 4., when He appears in heaven, His insignia undergo a corresponding change; yet even there the rainbow reminds us of His everlasting covenant with them. seven—Omitted in two of the oldest MSS., but supported by one. Son of man—The form which John had seen enduring the agony of Gethsemane, and the shame and anguish of Calvary, he now sees glorified. His glory as Son of man is merely Son of God: the result of His humiliation as Son of man. down to the feet—A mark of high rank. The garment and girdle seem to be emblems of His priesthood. Cf. Exodus, 28. 2, 4, 31; LXX. Aaron's robe and girdle were "for glory and beauty," and combined the insignia of royalty and priesthood, the characteristics of Christ's antitypical priesthood "after the order of Melchisedec." His being in the midst of the candlesticks (only seen in the temple, show that it is a king-priest He is so attired. This priesthood He has exercised ever since His ascension; and therefore, here wears its emblems. As Aaron wore these insignia when life came forth from the sanctuary to bless the people (Leviticus, 16. 4, 23, 24, the chitoneth, or holy linen coat), so when Christ shall come again, He shall appear in the similar attire of "beauty and glory" (Margin, Isaiah, 4. 2). The angels so attired somewhat like their Lord (ch. 18. 6). The ordinary girding for one actively engaged, was at the loins; but JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 3. 7. 2, expressly tells us that the Levitical priests were girt higher up, about the breasts or paps, appropriate to calm, majestic movement. The girdle bracing the frame together, symbolises collected powers. Righteousness and faithfulness are Christ's girdle. The high priest's girdle was only interwoven with gold, but Christ's are all of gold: the antitype exceeds the type. 14. Greek, "But" or "And," like wool—Greek, "like white wool." The silver is the point of comparison: signifying purity and glory. So in Isaiah, 1. 18. "Not eye, for heavy hair are the sign of decay. eyes...as...flame—all-searching and penetrating like fire: at the same time, also, implying consuming indignation against sin, especially at His coming "in flaming fire, taking vengeance" on all the ungodly, which is confirmed, as the meaning here, by Revelation, 19, 11, 12, 15. the brass—Greek, "chalco-hoanna," derived by some from two Greek words, brass and frankincense: derived by Bochart from Greek chalco, brass, and Hebrew libben, to whiten; hence, brass, which in the furnace has reached a white heat. Thus it answers to "burnished (flashing, or glowing) brass" Ezekiel, 1, 7; Revelation, 10, 1, "His feet as pillars of Arr." Translate, "Glowing brass, as if they had been made fiery (red-hot) in a furnace." The feet of the priests were bare in ministering in the sanctuary. So our great High Priest here, voice as...many waters—Ezekiel, 43, 2; in Daniel, 10, 6. It is "like the voice of a multitude." As the bridegroom's voice, so the bride's, ch. 14, 2; 10, 6; Ezekiel, 1, 24, the cherubim, or redeemed creation. His voice, however, is here regarded in its terribleness to His foes. Contrast Song of Solomon, 2, 8; 6, 2, with which, cf. ch. 3, 20. 16, he had—Greek, "having." St. John takes up the description from time to time, irrespective of the construction, with separate strokes of the pencil. [ALFORD.] In...right hand seven stars—(v. 20; ch. 2, 1; 3, 1.) He holds them as a star-studded "crown of glory," or "royal diadem," in His hand; so Isaiah, 62, 3. He is their Possessor and Upholder, out of...mouth went—Greek "going forth," not wielded in the hand, His WORD is omnipotent in executing His will in punishing sinners. It is the sword of His Spirit, reproof and punishment, rather than its converting winning power, is the prominent point. Still as He encourages the churches, as well as threatens, the former quality of the Word is not excluded. Its two edges (back and front) may allude to its double efficacy, condemning some, converting others. TERTULLIAN, adv. Jud., takes them of the Old and the New Testament. RICHARD OF St. Victor, "the Old Testament cutting externally our crystal, the New Testament internally our spiritual sins." sword—Greek, Romphaia, the Thracian long and heavy broad sword: six times in Revelation, once only elsewhere in New Testament, viz., Luke, 2, 35. saw...in his strength—in unclouded power. So shall the righteous shine, reflecting the image of the Sun of righteousness. TRENCH notices that this description, sublime as a purely mental conception, would be intolerable if we were to give it an outward form. With the Greeks, Æsthetic taste was the first consideration, to which all others must give way. With the Hebrews, truth and the full representation ideally of the religious reality were the paramount consideration, that representation being designed not to be outwardly embodied, but to remain a purely mental conception. This exalting of the essence above the form marks their deeper religious earnestness. 17. So fallen is man that God's manifestation of His glorious presence overwhelms him. laid his right hand upon me—So the same Lord Jesus did at the transfiguration to the three prostrate disciples, of whom John was one, saying, Be not afraid. The "touch" of His hand, as of old, imparted strength, unto me—Omitted in the oldest MSS. the first...the last—(Isaiah, 41, 4; 44, 6; 49, 12.) From eternity, and enduring to eternity: "the First by creation, the Last by retribution: the First, because before me there was no God formed; the Last, because after me there shall be no other: the First, because from me are all things; the Last, because to me all things return." [RICHARD OF St. Victor.] 18. Translate as Greek, "And the LIVING ONE," connected with last sentence, v. 17. and was—Greek, "and (yet) I became dead." alive for evermore—Greek, "living unto the ages of ages: not merely 'I live,' but I live and am the source of it to my people. "To Him belongs absolute being, as contrasted with the relative being of the creature: others may share, He only hath immortality; being in essence, not by mere participation, immortal. [THEODORÉTUS vs TRENCH.] One oldest MS. with English Version, reads "Amen" Two others, and most of the oldest versions and fathers, omit it. His having passed through death as one of us, and now living in the infinite plenitude of life, reassures His people, since through Him death is the gate of resurrection to eternal life, have...keys of hell—Greek, "Hades;" Hebrew, "Sheol." "Hell" in the sense, the place of torment, answers to a different Greek word, viz., Gehenna. I can release from the unseen world of spirits and from DEATH whom I will. The oldest MSS. read by transposition, "Death and Hades," or Hell. It is death (which came in by sin, robbing man of his immortal birthright, Romans, 5, 12) that peoples Hades, and therefore should stand first in order. Keys are emblems of authority, opening and shutting at will "the gates of Hades" (Psalm, 9, 13, 14; Isaiah, 38, 10; Matthew, 16, 18), 19. The oldest MSS. read, "Write therefore" (inasmuch as I, "the First and the Last, have the keys of death, and vouchsafe to thee this vision for the comfort and warning of the church, things which are—" the things which thou hast seen" are those narrated in this chapter (cf. v. 11). "The things which are" imply the present state of things in the churches when John was writing, as represented chs. 2 and 3. "The things which shall be hereafter," the things symbolically represented concerning the future history of the chs. 4-22. ALFORD translates, "What things they signify," but the antithesis of the next clause forbids this, "the things which shall be hereafter," Greek, "which are about to come to pass." The plural (Greek) "are," instead of the usual Greek construction singular, is owing to churches and persons being meant by "things" in the clause, "the things which are." 20. in—Greek, "upon my right hand," the mystery, caudesticks—in opposition to, and explaining, "the things which thou hast seen," governed by "Write." Mystery signifies the hidden truth veiled under this symbol, and now revealed: its correlative is revelation. Stars symbolize lordship (Numbers, 24, 17; cf. Daniel, 12, 3, of faithful teachers; ch. 8, 10; 12, 4; Jude, 13). angels—Not as ALFORD, from ORIGEN, Homily 13 on Luke, and 20 on Numbers, the guardian angels of the churches, just as individuals have their guardian angels. For how could heavenly angels be charged with the delinquencies laid here to the charge of these angels? Then, if a human angel be meant: as the Old Testament, analogy favours, Haggal, 1, 13, "the Lord's Messenger in the Lord's message;" Malachi, 2, 7; 3, 1, the bishop, or superintendent pastor, must be the angel. For whereas there were many presbyters in each of the larger churches (as e.g., Ephesus, Smyrna, &c., there was but one angel, whom, moreover, the Chief Shepherd and Bishop of souls holds responsible for the spiritual state of the church under him. The term angel, designating an office, is, in accordance with the enigmatic symbolism of this book, transferred from the heavenly to the earthly superior ministers of Jehovah: reminding them that, like the heavenly angels above, they below should fulfil God's mission zealously, promptly and efficiently. "Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven!"

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-29. EPISTLES TO EPHESUS, SMYRNA, PEGAMON, THYATIRA. Each of the seven epistles in this chapter and ch. 3, commences with "I know thy works." Each contains a promise from Christ, "To him that overcometh." Each ends with "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." The title of our Lord in each case accords with the nature of the address, and is mainly taken from the imagery of the vision, ch. 1. Each address has a threat or a promise, and most of the addresses have both. Their order seems to be ecclesiastical, civil, and geographical: Ephesus first, as being the Asiatic metropolis (termed "the light of Asia," and "first city of Asia"), the nearest to Patmos, where John received the epistle to the seven churches, and also as being that church with which John was especially connected; then the churches on the West coast of Asia; then those in the interior. Smyrna and Philadelphia alone receive unqualified praise. Sardis and Laodicea receive almost solely censure. In Ephesus, Pergamos, and Thyatira, there are some things to praise, others to condemn, the latter element preponderating in one case (Ephesus), the former in the two others (Pergamos and Thyatira). Thus the main characteristics of the different states of different churches, in all times and places, are portrayed, and they are suitably encouraged or warned. 1. Ephesus—famed for the temple of Diana, one of the seven wonders of the world. For three years Paul laboured there. He subsequently ordained Timothy superintending overseer or bishop there: probably his charge was but of a temporary nature. St. John, towards the close of his life, took it as the centre from which he superintended the province. holdeth—Greek, "holdeth fast," as in v. 25; ch. 3. 11; cf. John, 10. 28, 29. The title of Christ here as "holding fast the seven stars" (from ch. 1. 16: only that, for having is substituted holding fast in His grasp), and walking in the midst of the seven candlesticks," accords with the beginning of his address to the seven churches representing the universal church. Walking expresses His unwearied activity in the church, guarding her from internal and external evils, as the high priest moved to and fro in the sanctuary. 2. I know thy works—expressing His omniscience. Not merely "thy professions, desires, good resolutions" (ch. 14. 13, end), thy labour—Two oldest MSS. omit "thy": one supports it. The Greek means "labour unto weariness," patience—persevering endurance, bear—Evil men are a burden which the Ephesian church regarded as intolerable. We are to "bear" (the same Greek, Galatians, 6. 2) our another's burdens" in the case of weak brethren; but not to bear false brethren, tried—by experiment: not the Greek for "test," as 1 John, 4. 1. The apostolical churches had the miraculous gift of discerning spirits. Cf. Acts, 20. 28-30, wherein Paul presciently warned the Ephesian elders of the coming false teachers, as also in writing to Timothy at Ephesus. TRUTLIAN de baptism., 17, and JEROME, in Catal. Vir. Illustr. in Luca 7, record of John, that when a writing, professing to be a canonical history of the acts of St. Paul, had been composed by a presbyter of Ephesus, John convicted the author and condemned the work. So on one occasion he would not remain under the same roof as Cerinthus the heretic, say they are apostles—probably Judaizers. JONATIUS, ad Ephesum, 6, says subsequently, "Onesimus praises exceedingly your good discipline that do heresy dwells among you;" and 9, "Ye did not permit those having evil doctrine to sow their seed among you, but closed your ears." 3. borne...patience—The oldest MSS. transpose these words. Thus, translate as Greek, "persevering endurance...borne." "Thou hast borne" my reproach, but "thou canst not bear the evil" (v. 2). A beautiful antithesis, and...hast laboured, and hast not fainted—The two oldest MSS. and oldest versions read, "and...hast not laboured," omitting "and hast fainted." The difficulty which transcribers by English Version reading tried to obviate, was the seeming contradiction, "I know thy labour...and thou hast not laboured." But what is meant is, "Thou hast not been wearied out with labour." 4. somewhat...because—translate, "I have against thee (this) that," &c. It is not a mere "somewhat": it is everything. How characteristic of our gracious Lord, that He puts foremost all He can find to approve, and only after this notes the shortcomings, left thy first love—to Christ, Cf. 1 Timothy, 5. 12, "cast off their first faith." See the Ephesian's first love, Ephesians, 1. 15. This epistle was written under Domitian, when thirty years had elapsed since Paul had written his epistle to them. Their warmth of love had given place to a lifeless orthodoxy. Cf. Paul's view of faith so-called without love, 1 Corinthians, 13. 2, 5, whence—from what a height, do the first works—the works which flowed from thy first love. Not merely "feel thy first feelings," but do works flowing from the same principle as formerly, "faith which worketh by love," quickly—Omitted in two oldest MSS., Visigate and Coptic versions: supported by one oldest MS. I will come—Greek, "I am coming" is special judgment on thee. remove thy candlestick out of his place—I will take away the church from Ephesus and remove it elsewhere. "It is removal of the candlestick, not extinction of the candle, which is threatened here; judgment for some, but that very judgment the occasion of mercy for others. So it has been. The seat of the church has been changed, but the church itself survives. What the East has lost, the West has gained. One who lately visited Ephesus found only three Christians there, and these so ignorant as scarcely to have heard the names of St. Paul or St. John." (TRINCH.) 6. But—How graciously, after necessary censure, He returns to praise for our consolation, and as an example to us, that we should show, when we reprove, we have more pleasure in praising than in fault-finding. hatest the deeds—We should hate men's evil deeds, not hate the men themselves. NICOLAITANES—IRENEUS, Haereseis, 1. 28. 2 and TRUTLIAN, Prescriptions Haereticorum, 9, make these followers of Nicolaus one of the seven (honourably mentioned, Acts, 6. 5, 6). They, CLEMESS ALEXANDRINUS, Stromata, 2. 20. 3, 4; and EPIPHANES Haereseis, 25, evidently confound the later Gnostic Nicolaitanes, or followers of one Nicolaus, with those Revelation. MICHAELIS' view is probable: Nicolaus (conqueror of the people) is the Greek version of Balaam, from Hebrew Belang Am, Destroyer of the people. Revelation abounds in such duplicate Hebrew and Greek names: as Apollyon, Abaddon; Devil, Satan; Yea (Greek Nai), Amen. The name like other names, Egypt, Babylon, Sodom, is symbolic. Cf. v. 14, 15, which shows the true sense of Nicolaitanes; they are not a sect, but professing Christians who, like Balaam of old, tried to introduce into the church a false freedom, i. e., licentiousness; this was a reaction in the opposite direction from Judaism, the first danger to the church combated in the council of Jerusalem, and by Paul in the epistle to Galatians. These symbolical Nicolaitanes, or followers of Balaam, abused Paul's doctrine of the grace of God into a plea for lasciviousness (2 Peter, 2. 15, 16, 19; Jude, 4, 11; who both describe the same sort of seducers as followers of Balaam). The difficulty that they should appropriate a name branded with infamy in Scripture is met by TRINCH. The Antinomian Gnostics were so opposed to John as a Judaizing apostle, that they would assume as a name of chiefest honour one which John branded with dishonour. 7. He that hath an ear—This clause precedes the promise in the first three addresses, succeeds to it in the last four. Thus the promises are enclosed on both sides with the precept urging the deepest attention as to the most momentous truths. Every man "hath an ear" naturally, but he alone will be able to hear spiritually to whom God has given "the hearing ear;" whose "ear God hath wakened" and "opened." Cf. "Faith, the ears of the soul." (CLEMENT ALEXANDRINUS.) The Spirit saith—what Christ saith, The Spirit saith: so one are the Second and Third Persons, and the churches—not merely to the particular, but to the universal church. give...tree of life

As elsewhere, so at bitterly opposed Christianity; and at martyrdom they joined the heathens in or his being cast to the lions; and when

As the Jews more and more opposed Christi- anity, and it more and more rooted itself in the Gentile world, the term "synagogue" was left altogether to the former, and Christians appropriated exclusively the honourable term "church;" contrast an earlier time, when the Jewish theocracy is called "the church in the wilderness." Cf. Numbers, 16. 3; 20. 4, "congrega- tion of the Lord." Even in James, 2. 2 it is "your (not the Lord's) assembly." The Jews, who might have been "the church of God," had now, by their opposition and unbelief, become "the synagogue of Satan." So "the throne of Satan" (v. 18) represents the heathen's opposi- tion to Christianity; "the depths of Satan" (v. 24), the opposition of heretics. 10. none—The oldest MSS. read, "Fear not those things" &c. "The Captain of our sal- vation never keeps back what those who faithfully witness for Him, may have to bear for His names' sake: never entices recruits by the promise they shall find all things easy and pleasant there" (TRENCH), devil—"the accuser." He acted, through Jewish accusers, against Christ and His people. The conflict of the latter was not with mere flesh and blood, but with the rulers of the darkness of this world, tried— with temptation by "the devil." The same event is often both a temptation from the devil, and a trial from God—God sifting and winnowing the man to separate his chaff from his wheat, the Devil sifting him in the hope that nothing but chaff will be found in him (TRENCH), ten days—Not the ten persecutions from Nero to Diocletian. LYRA explains ten years on the year-day principle. The shortness of the duration of the persecution is evidently made the ground of consolation. The time of trial shall be short, the duration of your joy shall be for ever. Cf. the use of "ten days" for a short time, Genesis, 24. 66; Numbers, 11. 19. Ten is the number of the world-powers hostile to the church: cf. the ten horns of the beast, ch. 13. 1. unto death—so as even to endure death for my sake, crown of life—James, 1. 12; 2 Timothy, 4. 8, "crown of righteousness;" 1 Peter, 5. 4, "crown of glory." The crown is the garland, the mark of a conqueror, or of one rejoicing, or at a feast; but diadem is the mark of a king. 11. shall not be hurt—Greek, "shall not by any means (or possibly) be hurt," the second death—"the lake of fire." "The death in life of the lost, as con- trasted with the life in death of the saved." (TRENCH.) The phrase "the second death" is peculiar to the Apo- calypses. What matter about the first death, which sooner or later must pass over us, if we escape the second death. "It seems that they who die that death shall be hurt by it; whereas, if they were annihilation, and so a conclusion of their torments, it would be no way hurtful, but highly beneficial to them. But the living torments are the second death." (BISOP PEARSON.) "The life of the damned is death." (AUGUSTINE.) Smyrna (meaning myrrh) yielded its sweet perfume in being bruised even to death. Myrrh was used in embalming dead bodies (John, 19. 39): was an ingredient in the holy anointing oil (Exodus, 30. 23): a perfume of the heavenly Bridegroom (Psalm, 45. 8), and of the bride (Song of Solomon, 3. 6). "Afflic- tion, like it, is bitter for the time being, but salutary; preserving the elect from corruption, and seasoning them for immortality, and gives scope for the exercise of the fragrantly-breathing Christian virtues." (VIR- TRINGA.) POLYCARP's noble words to his heathen judges who wished him to recant, are well known, "Fourscore and six years have I served the Lord, and He never wronged me, how then can I blaspheme Him

King and Sarient? Sozryna's faithfulness is rewarded by its candlestick not having been removed out of its place v. 12; Christianity has never wholly left it: whence the Turks call it "Infidel Sozryna." 12. TRENCH prefers writing Pergamos, or rather, Pergamos, on the river Gestrus. It was capital of Achaia the Second's kingdom, which was bequeathed by him to the Romans, B.C. 131. Famous for its library, founded by Eumenes (197-189), and destroyed by Caliph Omar. *Parchment, i.e., Pergamene charts, were here discovered for book purposes. Also famous for the magnificent temple of Esculapius, the healing god. I know thy works—Two oldest MSS. omit this clause: one old MS. retains it. Balak's seat—rather as the Greek is translated all through Revelation, "Throne." Satan, in impious mimicry of God's heavenly throne, sets up his earthly throne (ch. 4, 2). Esculapius was worshipped there under the serpent form; and Satan, the old serpent, as the instigator of v. 16 of fanatical devotees of Esculapius, and, through them, of the supreme magistracy at Pergamos, persecuted one of the Lord's people (Antipas) even to death. Thus, this address is an anticipatory preface to ch. 12, 1-17; Note, "Throne...the dragon, Satan...war with her seed" 4, 9, 17, even in those days—Two oldest MSS. omit "even" two retain it. waters—Two oldest MSS. omit this then translate, "in the days of Antipas, my faithful witness," or "martyr"; two retain it. Two oldest MSS. read, "My witness, my faithful one;" two read as English Version. Antipas is another form for Antipater. Simon Metaphrastes has a palpably legendary story, unknown to the early fathers, that Antipas, in Domitian's persecution, was shut up in a red-hot brazen bull, and eeded his life in thanksgivings and prayers. Hengstenberg makes the name, like other apocalyptic names, symbolical, meaning one standing out "against all" for Christ's sake. 14. few—in comparison of the many tokens of thy faithfulness. hold the doctrine of Balak—"the teaching of Balak," viz., that which he "taught Balak." Cf. "the counsel of Balak," Numbers, 31, 16. Balak is dative in the Greek, whence Bengel translates, "taught (the Moabites) for i.e., to please Balak." But though in Numbers it is not expressly said he taught Balak, yet there is nothing said inconsistent with his having done so; and JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 4, 6, 6, says he did so. The dative is a Hebraism for the accusative. children—Greek, "sons of Israel," stumbling-block—lit., that part of a trap on which the bait was laid, and which, when touched, caused the trap to close on its prey; then any enticement to the foot. (TRENCH, 1. eat things sacrificed unto idols—the act common to the Israelites of old, and the Nicolaitans in St. John's day: he does not add what was peculiar to the Israelites, viz., that they sacrificed to idols. The temptation to eat idol-meats was a peculiarly strong one to the Gentile converts. For not to do so involved almost a withdrawal from partaking of any social meal with the heathen around. For idol-meats, after a part had been offered in sacrifice, were nearly sure to be on the heathen entertainer's table; so much so, that the Greek "to kill" (thuein) meant originally "to sacrifice." Hence arose the decree of the council of Jerusalem forbidding to eat such meats; subsequently some at Corinth ate unscrupulously and knowingly of such meats, on the ground that the idol is nothing; others needlessly tortured themselves with scruples, lest unknowingly they should eat of them, when they got meat from the market, or in a heathen friend's house. St. Paul handles the question, 1 Corin-*

As Balak and the Moabites of old led Balak and his followers literally, so Antipas also them that hold the same Balakite or Nicolaitan doctrine spiritually or symbolically. Liberal eater of idol-meats and formation in Pergamos, was accompanied by spiritual idolatry and formation. 5. TRENCH explains. But I prefer taking it, "unto also," as well as Ephesus ("in like manner" as Epiphanius see below the oldest reading, heath...Nicolaitans, with this important difference, Ephesus, as a church, loath them, and casts them out, but thou "Antipas," viz., in the church, doctrine—teaching (John, 8, 41; viz., 9 tempt God's people to idolatry, which thing I hate—it is sin not to hate what God hates. The Ephesian church (v. 6) had this point of superiority to Pergamos. But the three oldest MSS., and Fulgent and Symon read instead of "which I hate," "IN LIKE MANNER," 16. The three oldest MSS. read, "Repent, therefore." Not only the Nicolaitans, but the whole church of Pergamos is called on to repent of not having held the Nicolaitan teaching and practice. Contrast St. Paul, Acts, 20, 28. I will come—I am coming. fight against them—Greek, "war with them;" with the Nicolaitans primarily; but including also chastisement of the whole church at Pergamos; cf. "unto them," with the word of my mouth—Returned from ch. 1, 16, but with an allusion to the drawn sword with which the angel of the Lord confronted Balak on his way to curse Israel: an earnest of the sword by which he and the seduced Israelites fell at last. The spiritual Balakites of St. John's day are to be smitten with the Lord's spiritual sword, the word or "rod of His mouth." 17. to be omitted in the three oldest MSS., the hidden manna—the heavenly food of Israel, in contrast to the idol-meats (v. 14). A pot of manna was laid up in the Holy place "before the testimony." The allusion is here in this: probably also to the Lord's discourse (John, 4, 21-35). Translate, "The manna which is hidden." As the manna hidden in the sanctuary was by Divine power preserved from corruption, so Christ in His incorruptible body has passed into the heavens, and is hidden there until the time of His appearing. Christ Himself is the manna "hidden" from the world, but revealed to the believer, so that he has already a foretaste of His preciousness. Cf. as to Christ's own hidden food on earth, John, 4, 32, 34, and Job, 23, 12. The full manifestation shall be at His coming. Believers are now hidden, even as their meat is hidden. As the manna in the sanctuary, unlike the other manna, was incorruptible, so the spiritual feast offered to all who reject the world's dainties for Christ, is everlasting; an incorruptible body and life for ever in Christ at the resurrection. white stone—new name...no man knoweth saving he, &c.—TRENCH's explanation seems best. White is the colour and livery of heaven. "New" implies something altogether renewed and heavenly. The white stone is a glittering diamond, the Urim borne by the high priest within the chasubles or breastplate of judgment, with the twelve tribes' names of the twelve precious stones, next the heart. The word Urim means light, answering to the colour white. None but the high priest knew the name written upon it, probably the incommunicable name of God, "Jehovah." The high priest consulted it in some divinely-appointed way to get direction from God when directed. The "new name" is Christ's (cf. ch. 3, 12. "I will write upon him my new name"); some new revelation of Himself which shall hereafter be imparted to His people, and which they alone are capable of receiving. The connexion with the "hidden manna" will thus be clear, as none save the high priest had access to the "manna hidden" in the sanctuary. Believers, as spiritual priests unto God, shall enjoy the heavenly

Her spiritual counterpart at Thyatira lured God's "servants" by pretended utterances of inspiration to the same libertinism, fornication, and eating of idol-meats, as the Balaamites and Nicolaitanes (v. 6, 14, 15). By a false spiritualism these seducers led their victims into the grossest carnality, as though things done in the flesh were outside the true man, and were, therefore, indifferent. "The deeper the church penetrated into heathenism, the more she herself became heathenish: this prepares us for the expressions 'harlot' and 'Babylon,' applied to her afterwards." [AUSKLESEN] to teach and to seduce—The three oldest MSS. read, "And she teaches and seduces, or "deceives." "Thyatira was just the reverse of Ephesus. There, much zeal for orthodoxy, but little love; here, activity of faith and love, but insufficient zeal for godly discipline and doctrine, a patience of error even where there was not a participation in it." [TRENCH.] 21. space—Greek, "time," of her fornication...she repented not—The three oldest MSS. read, "And she willeth not to repent of (it, out of, i. e., so as to come out of her fornication." Here there is a transition from literal to spiritual fornication, as appears from v. 23. The idea arose from Jehovah's covenant relation to the Old Testament church being regarded as a marriage, any transgression against which was, therefore, harlotry, fornication, or adultery. 22. Behold—Calling attention to her awful doom to come. I will—Greek present, "I cast her," a bed—The place of her sin shall be the place of her punishment. Or the bed of the grave, and of the hell beyond, where the worm dieth not. them that commit adultery with her—spiritually: including both the eating of idol-meats and fornication. "With her," in the Greek, implies participation with her in her adulteries, viz., by suffering her (v. 20), or letting her alone, and so virtually encouraging her. Her punishment is distinct from theirs: she is to be cast into a bed, and her children to be filled; whilst those who make themselves part-takers of her sin by tolerating her, are to be cast into great tribulation. except they repent—Greek aorist, "repent" at once: shall have repented by the time limited in my purpose, their deeds—Two of the oldest MSS. and most ancient versions read "her." Thus, God's true servants, who, by connivance, are incurring the guilt of her deeds, are distinguished from her. One oldest MS., ANDREAS, and CYPRIAN, support "their." 23. her children—(Isaiah, 67. 3; Ezekiel, 23. 46, 47.) Her proper adherents: not those who suffer her, but those who are begotten of her. Note there), whose sin was less direct, being that only of connivance. kill...with death—Cf. the disaster that overtook the literal Jezebel's votaries of Baal, and Ahab's sons, 1 Kings, 18. 40; 2 Kings, 10. 6, 7, 24, 25. Kill with death is a Hebraism for slay with most sure and awful death: so "dying thou shalt die" (Genesis, 2. 17). Not "die the common death of men" (Numbers, 16. 29). all the churches shall know—Implying that these addresses are designed for the Catholic church of all ages and places. So palpably shall God's hand be seen in the judgment on Thyatira, that the whole church shall recognise it as God's doing. I am he—the "I" is strongly emphatical: "that it is I am He who." &c. searcheth...hearts—God's peculiar attribute is given to Christ. The "reins" are the seat of the desires; the "heart," that of the thoughts. The Spirit here declares their so-called "depths" (viz., of knowledge of Divine things) to be really "depths of Satan," just as in v. 9. He says, instead of "the synagogue of God," "the synagogue of Satan." HENOSTENBERG thinks the teachers themselves professed to fathom the depths of Satan, giving loose rein to fleshly lusts, without being hurt thereby. They who thus think to fight Satan with his own weapons always find him more than a match for them. The words, "as they speak," i.e., "as they call them," coming after not only "depths," but "depths of Satan," seem to favour this latter view, otherwise I should prefer the former, in which case, "as they speak," or "call them," must refer to "depths" only, not also "depths of Satan." The original sin of Adam was a desire to know evil as well as good: so in HENOSTENBERG'S view, those who professed to know "the depths of Satan." It is the prerogative of God alone to know evil fully, without being hurt or defiled by it. I will put—Two oldest MSS. have "I put," or "cast." One oldest MS. reads as English Version. none other burden—save abstinence from, and protestation against, these abominations: no "depths" beyond your reach, such as they teach, no new doctrine, but the old faith and rule of practice once for all delivered to the saints. Exaggerating and perfecting Paul's doctrine of grace without the law as the source of justification and sanctification, these false prophets rejected the law as a rule of life, as though it were an intolerable "burden." But it is a "light" burden. In Acts, 15, 28, 29, the very term "burden," as here, is used of abstinence from fornication and idol-meats: to this the Lord here refers. 25. that which ye have already—(Jude, 3, end.) hold fast—do not let go from your grasp, however false teachers may wish to wrest it from you. till I come—when your conflict with evil will be at an end. Luke, 19, 17. Have thou authority the same word as here: over ten cities." 27. From Psalm, 2, 8, 9. rule—hit, "rule as a shepherd." In Psalm, 2, 9, it is, "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron." The LXX. pointing the Hebrew word differently, read as Revelation here. The English Version of Psalm, 2, 9 is doubtless right, as the parallel word, "dash in pieces," proves. But the Spirit in this case sanctions the additional thought as true, that the Lord shall mingle mercy to some, with judgment on others: beginning by destroying His anti-Christian foes. He shall reign in love over the rest. "Christ shall rule them with a sceptre of iron, to make them capable of being ruled with a sceptre of gold: first, that grace may come after" (TRENCH, who thinks we ought to translate "sceptre" for "rod," as in Hebrews, 1, 6). "Shepherd" is used in Jeremiah, 4, 3, of hostile rulers: so also Zechariah, 11, 18. As severity here is the primary thought, "rule as a shepherd" seems to me to be used thus: He who would have shepherded them with a pastoral rod, shall, because of their hardened unbelief, shepherd them with a rod of iron. shall they be broken—So the oldest MS., Vulgata, Syriac, and Coptic versions read. But two oldest MSS. read, "As the vessels of a potter are broken to shivers." A potter's vessel dashed to pieces, because of its failing to answer the design of the maker, is the image to depict God's sovereign power to give reprobates to destruction, not by caprice, but in the exercise of His righteous judgment. The saints shall be in Christ's victorious "armies" when He shall inflict the last decisive blow, and afterwards shall reign with Him. Having by faith "overcome the world," they shall also rule the world. even as I—as I also have received of (from) my Father, etc. in Psalm, 2, 7-9. Jesus had refused to receive the kingdom without the cross at Satan's hands: He would receive it from none but the Father, who had appointed the cross as the path to the crown. As the Father has given the authority to me over the heathen and uttermost parts of the earth, so I impart a share of it to my victorious disciple. 28. The morning star—i.e., I will give unto him Myself, who am "the morning star" (ch. 22, 16); so that reflecting my perfect brightness, He shall shine like me, the morning star, and share my kingly glory (of which a star is the symbol, Numbers, 24, 17; Matthew, 2, 2). Cf. v. 17, "I will give him the hidden manna," i.e., Myself, who am that manna (John, 6, 31-33).

CHAPTER III.

VER. 1-22. THE EPISTLES TO SARDIS, PHILADELPHIA, AND LAODICEA. 1. Sardis—the ancient capital of Lydia, the kingdom of wealthy Croesus, on the river Pactolus. The address to this church is full of rebuke. It does not seem to have been in vain: for Melito, bishop of Sardis in the second century, was eminent for piety and learning. He visited Palestine to assure himself and his flock as to the Old Testament canon, and wrote an epistle on the subject (EUSEBIUS, 4; HE also wrote a commentary on the Apocalypse (EUSEBIUS, 4, 26; JEROME, Catalogus Scripturarum Ecclesiasticarum, 24.) he that hath the seven Spirits of God—i.e., he who hath all the fulness of the Spirit (ch. 1, 4, 5; 6, 6, with which cf. Zechariah, 3, 9; 4, 10, proving His Godhead). This attribute implies His infinite power by the Spirit to convict of sin and of a heathen profession, and the seven stars—(ch. 1, 16, 20.) His shining the seven stars, or presiding ministers, flows, as a consequence, from His having the seven Spirits, or the fulness of the Holy Spirit. The human ministry is the fruit of Christ's sending down the gifts of the Spirit. Stars imply brilliancy and glory: the fulness of the Spirit, and the fulness of brilliant light in Him, form a designed contrast to the formality which He reproves. name—lives, dead—(1 Timothy, 6, 6; 2 Timothy, 2, 2; Titus, 1, 16; cf. Ephesians, 2, 1, 5; 5, 14.) "A name," i.e., a reputation. Sardis was famed among the churches for spiritual vitality; yet the Heart-searcher, who seeth not as man seeth, pronounces her dead: how great searchings of heart should her case create among even the best of us! Laodicea deceived herself as to her true state (v. 17), but it is not written that she had a high name among the other churches, as Sardis had. 2. Be—Greek, "Become," what thou art not, "wasteful," or "wakeful," hit, "waking," the things which remain—Strengthen those thy remaining few guests, which, in thy spiritual deadly slumber, are not yet quite extinct. Cf. also Ephesians, 5. 27, as to the spotlessness of the church when she shall be presented to Christ; and ch. 19. 8, as to the "fine linen, clean and white, the righteousness of the saints," in which it shall be granted to her to be arrayed; and "the wedding garment." Meanwhile she is not to sully her Christian profession with any defilement of flesh or spirit, but to "keep her garments." For no defilement shall enter the heavenly city. Not that any keep themselves here wholly free from defilement; but, as compared with hollow professors, the godly keep themselves unspotted from the world; and when they do contract it, they wash it away, so as to have their "robes white in the blood of the Lamb" (ch. 7. 14). The Greek is not "to stain" (Greek stainen), but to "defile," or besmear (Greek molu-men). Song of Solomon, 6. 2, they shall walk with me in white—The promised reward accords with the character of those to be rewarded: keeping their garments undefiled and white through the blood of the Lamb now, they shall walk with Him in white hereafter. On "with me," of the very same words, Luke, 23. 42; John, 17. 24. "Walk" implies spiritual life, for only the living walk: also liberty, for it is only the free who walk at large. The grace and dignity of flowing long garments is seen to best advantage when the person "walks": so the graces of the saint's manifested character shall appear fully when he shall serve the Lord perfectly hereafter (ch. 22. 3). they are worthy—with the worthiness (not their own, but that which Christ has put on them (ch. 7. 14). Ezekiel, 16. 14, "perfect through my comeliness which I had put upon thee." Grace is glory in the bud. "The worthiness here denotes a congruity between the saints' state of graces on earth, and that of glory, which the Lord has appointed for them, about to be estimated by the law itself of grace" [VITRINGA]. Contrast Acts, 13. 46. 5, white—not a dull white, but glittering, dazzling white. [GROTIUS.] Cf. Matthew, 13. 43. The body transfigured into the likeness of Christ's body, and emitting beams of light reflected from Him, is probably the "white raiment" promised here. the same—Greek, "THIS man," he and he alone. So one oldest MS. reads. But two oldest MSS., and most of the ancient versions, "shall THIS be clothed," &c. raiment—Greek, "garments." "He that overcometh" shall receive the same reward as they who "have not defiled their garments" (v. 4); therefore, the two are identical. I will not—Greek, "I will not by any means," blot out... name out of...book of life—of the heavenly city. A register was kept in ancient cities of their citizens: the names of the dead were of course erased. So those who have a name that they live and are dead (v. 1), are blotted out of God's roll of the heavenly citizens and heirs of eternal life: not that in God's electing decree they ever were in His book of life. But, according to human conceptions, those who had a high name for piety would be supposed to be in it, and were, in respect to privileges, actually among those in the way of salvation; but these privileges, and the fact that they once might have been saved, shall be of no avail to them. As to the book of life, cf. ch. 13. 8; 17. 8; 20. 12, 15; 21. 27; Exodus, 32. 33; Psalm 69. 28; Daniel, 12. 1. In the sense of the call, many are enrolled among the called to salvation, who shall not be found among the chosen at last. The pale of salvation is wider than that of election. Election is fixed. Salvation is open to all, and is pending (humanly speaking) in the case of those mentioned here. But ch. 20. 15; 21. 27, exhibit the book of the elect alone in the narrower sense, after to persevering faithfulness, and the consolation under present trials, that...which thou hast—"The word of my patience" or "endurance" (v. 10; which He had just commended them for keeping, and which involved with it the attaining of the kingdom; this they would lose if they yielded to the temptation of exchanging consistency and suffering for compromise and ease, that no man take thy crown—either otherwise thou wouldst receive: that no tempter cause thee to lose it: not that the tempter would thus secure it for himself (Colossians, 2. 18). 12. pillar in the temple—in one sense there shall be "no temple" in the heavenly city, because there shall be no distinction of things into sacred and secular, for all things and persons shall be holy to the Lord. The city shall be all one great temple, in which the saints shall be not merely stones, as in the spiritual temple now on earth, but all eminent as pillars: immovably firm (unlike Philadelphia, the city which was so often shaken by earthquakes, Strabo, 12. and 13.), like the colossal pillars before Solomon's temple, Boas (i. e., "In it is strength") and Jachin ("It shall be established"); only that those pillars were outside, these shall be within the temple. My God—(Note, ch. 2. 7.) go no more out—The Greek is stronger, never more at all. As the elect angels are beyond the possibility of falling, being now under (as the schoolmen say) "the blessed necessity of goodness," so shall the saints be. The door shall be once for all shut, as well to shut safely in for ever the elect, as to shut out the lost (Matthew, 25. 10; John, 8. 35; cf. Isaiah, 22. 23, the type, Elakim). They shall be priests for ever unto God (ch. 1. 6. "Who would not yearn for that city out of which no friend departs, and into which no enemy enters." [AUGUSTINE in TRENCH.] write upon him the name of my God—as belonging to God in a peculiar sense (ch. 7. 3; 9. 4; 14. 1; and especially 22. 4), therefore secure. As the name of Jehovah ("Holiness to the Lord") was on the golden plate on the high priest's forehead (Exodus, 28. 36-38): so the saints in their heavenly royal priesthood shall bear His name openly, as consecrated to Him. Cf. the caricature of this in the brand on the forehead of the beast's followers (ch. 13. 16, 17), and on the harlot (ch. 17. 5; cf. 20. 4). name of the city of my God—as one of its citizens (ch. 21. 2, 3, 10, which is briefly alluded to by anticipation here). The full description of the city forms the appropriate close of the book. The saints' citizenship is now hidden, but then it shall be manifested: he shall have the right to enter in through the gates into the city (ch. 22. 14). This was the city which Abraham looked for. new-Greek kaine. Not the old Jerusalem, once called "the holy city," but having forfeited the name. Greek nea would express that it had recently come into existence; but Greek kaine, that which is new and different, superseding the worn out old Jerusalem and its polity. "John, in the gospel, applies to the old city the Greek name Hierosolyma. But in the Apocalypse, always, to the heavenly city the Hebrew name Hierosalems. The Hebrew name is the original and holier one: the Greek, the recent and more secular and political one." [BRUGER.] my new name—at present incommunicable, and only known to God: to be hereafter revealed and made the believer's own in union with God in Christ. Christ's name written on him denotes he shall be wholly Christ's. New also relates to Christ, who shall assume a new character (answering to His "new name") entering with His saints on a kingdom—not that which He had with the Father before the world, but that earned by His humiliation as Son of man. Gibbon, the infidel (Decline and Fall, ch. 64), gives an unwilling testimony to the fulfilment of the prophecy as to Philadelphia in a temporal point of view. "Among the Greek colonies and churches of Asia, Philadelphia is still erect,—a column in a scene of ruins—a pleasing example that the paths of honour and safety may sometimes be the same." 13. (Note, ch. 2. 7.) 14. Laodiceans—The city was in the South-West of Phrygia, on the river Lycus, not far from Colosse, and lying between it and Philadelphia. It was destroyed by an earthquake, 63 A.D., and rebuilt by its wealthy citizens without the help of the state. [TAQIRUS, Annales, 14. 27.] This wealth (arising from the excellence of its wools, led to a self-satisfied, lukewarm state in spiritual things, as v. 17 describes. See Note on Colossians, 4. 16, on the epistle which is thought to have been written to the Laodicean church by Paul. The church in later times was apparently flourishing; for one of the councils at which the canon of Scripture was determined, was held in Laodicea in 361 A.D. Hardly a Christian is now to be found on or near its site. the Amen—(Isaiah, 66. 16, Hebrew, "Bless Himself in the God of Amen...swear by the God of Amen;" 2 Corinthians, 1. 20.) He who not only says, but is, the Truth. The saints used Amen at the end of prayer, or in assenting to the word of God; but none, save the Son of God, ever said, "Amen, I say unto you" for it is the language peculiar to God, who avers by Himself, The New Testament formula, "Amen, I say unto you," is equivalent to the Old Testament formula, "as I live, saith Jehovah." In St. John's gospel alone He uses (in the Greek) the double "Amen," John, 1. 51; 3. 3, &c., in English Version, "Verily, verily." The title happily harmonizes with the address. His unchanging faithfulness as "the Amen" contrasts with Laodicea's wavering of purpose, "neither hot nor cold" (v. 16). The angel of Laodicea has with some probability been conjectured to be Archippus, to whom, thirty years previously, Paul had already given a monition, as needing to be stirred up to diligence in his ministry. So the Apostolic Constitutions, 8. 46, name him as the first bishop of Laodicea: supposed to be the son of Philemon (Philemon, x., faithful and true Witness—As "the Amen" expresses the unchangeable truth of His promises; so "the faithful and true witness," the truth of His revelations as to the heavenly things which He has seen and testified. "Faithful" i. e., trustworthy (2 Timothy, 2. 11, 12). "True" is here (Greek alithinos; not truth-speaking (Greek alethes), but "perfectly realizing all that is comprehended in the name Witness" (1 Timothy, 6. 13). Three things are necessary for this: (1.) To have seen with his own eyes what He attests; (2.) to be competent to relate it to others; (3.) to be willing truthfully to do so. In Christ all these conditions meet. [TRENCH.] beginning of the creation of God—not He whom God created first, but as in Colossians, 1. 15-18 (cf. Notes there), the Beginner of all creation, its originating instrument. All creation would not be represented adoring Him, if He were but one of themselves. His being the Creator is a strong guarantee for His faithfulness as "the Witness and Amen." 15. neither cold—The antithesis to "hot," lit., boiling ("fervent," Acts, 18. 25; Romans, 12. 11; cf. Song of Solomon, 8. 6; Luke, 24. 32), requires that "cold" should here mean more than negatively cold; it is rather, positively, icy cold: having never yet been warmed. The Laodiceans were in spiritual things cold comparatively, but not cold as the world outside, and as those who had never belonged to the church. The lukewarm state, if it be the transitional stage to a warmer, is a desirable state (for a little religion, if real, is better than none); but most fatal when, as here, an abiding condition, for it is mistaken for a safe state (v. 17). This accounts for Christ's desiring that they were cold rather than lukewarm. For then there would not be the same "danger of mixed motive and disregarded principle." [ALFORD.] Also, there is more hope of the cold, i. e., those who are of the world, and not yet warmed by the gospel call; for, when called, they may become hot and fervent Christians: such did the once-it in my mind: involving graciously the possibility of the throat not being executed, if only they repent at once. His dealing towards them will depend on their towards Him. "spite Lee out of my mouth—reject with righteous indignation, as Canaan spelt out its inhabitants for their abominations. Physicians used lukewarm water to cause vomiting. Cold and hot drinks were common at feasts, but never lukewarm. There were hot and cold springs near Laodicea. 17. Self-sufficiency is the fatal danger of a lukewarm state (Note, c. 16). thou sayest—virtually and mentally; if not in so many words. increased with goods—Greek, "have become enriched," implying self-praise in self-acquired riches. The Lord alludes to Hosea, 12. 6. The riches on which they prided themselves were spiritual riches; though, doubtless, their spiritual self-sufficiency ("I have need of nothing") was much fostered by their worldly wealth; as, on the other hand, poverty of spirit is fostered by poverty in respect to worldly riches. knowest not that thou—in particular, above all others. The "THOU" in the Greek is emphatical. art wretched—Greek, "art the wretched one." miserable—So one oldest MS. reads. But two oldest MSs. prefix "the." Translate, "the pitiable." "the one especially to be pitied." How different Christ's estimate of men, from their own estimate of themselves. "I have need of nothing" blind—whereas Laodicea boasted of a deeper than common insight into Divine things. They were not absolutely blind, else eye-salve would have been of no avail to them; but short-sighted. 18. Gentle and loving irony. Take my advice, thou who fanciest thyself in need of nothing. Not only art thou not in need of nothing, but art in need of the commonest necessities of existence. He graciously stoops to their modes of thought and speech: Thou art a people ready to listen to any counsel as to how to buy to advantage: then, listen to my counsel (for I am "Counsellor," Isaiah, 9. 8), "buy of me" (he whom, according to Paul's epistle written to the neighbouring Colosse, and intended for the Laodicean church also, Colossians, 2. 1, 3; 4. 14, are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge). "Buy" does not imply that we can, by any work or merit of ours, purchase God's free gift; nay, the very purchase-money consists in the renunciation of all self-righteousness, such as Laodicea saive, collyrium, a roll of ointment eyes." Christ has for Laodicea an o precious than all the costly unguents eye is here the conscience or inner I According as it is sound and "single "simple", or otherwise, the man se ally, or does not. The Holy Spirit's ancient eye-salve's, first smarts with then heals: He opens our eyes first to wretchedness, then to the Saviour's man. TRIMON notices that the most of the seven, viz., Sardis and Laodicea which alone there are specified, no without, nor herules from within. much to God's overruling Providence so often internal and external foes, selves, to promote His cause by callig ies in contending for the faith once saints. Peace is dearly bought at the stagnation, where there is not intense religion to contend about it at all. Proverbs, 2. 11, 12; Hebrews, 12. 4, 6. of Manasseh 2 Chronicles, 32. 11-13. "He scourgeth every son whom He shall thou be an exception? If except the scourge, thou art excepted from sons." [AUGUSTINE.] This is an e Laodicea not to despair, but to regard taken for good, if she profit by it. desire for the sinner's salvation. He who is Himself "the Door," and who bids us "knock" that it may be "opened unto" us, is first Himself to knock at the door of our hearts. If He did not knock first, we should never come to knock at His door. Cf. Song of Solomon, 5. 4-8, which is plainly alluded to here; the Spirit thus in Revelation sealing the canonicity of that mystical book. The spiritual state of the bride there, between waking and sleeping, slow to open the door to her Divine lover, answers to that of the lukewarm Laodiceans here. "Love in regard to men emptied (humbled) God; for He does not remain in His place and call to Himself the servant whom He loved, but He comes down Himself to seek him, and He who is all-rich arrives at the lodging of the pauper, and with His own voice intimates His yearning love, and seeks a similar return, and withdraws not when disowned, and is not impatient at insult, and when persecuted still waits at the door." [NICOLAUS CABASILAS to TRENCOR.] my voice—He appeals to the sinner not only with His hand (His providences) knocking, but with His voice (His word read or heard: or rather, His Spirit inwardly applying to man's spirit the lessons to be drawn from His providences and His word). If we refuse to answer to His knocking at His door now, He will refuse to hear our knocking at His door hereafter. In respect to His second coming also, He is even now at the door, and we know not how soon He may knock; therefore, we should always be ready to open to Him immediately. If any man hear—for man is not compelled by irresistible force: Christ knocks, but does not break open the door, though the violent take heaven by the force of prayer (Matthew, 11. 12): whosoever does hear, does so not of himself, but by the drawings of God's grace (John, 6. 44): repentance is Christ's gift (Acts, 5. 31). He draws, not drags. The Sun of righteousness, like the natural sun, the moment that the door is opened, pours in His light, which could not previously find an entrance. Cf. HILARY ON PSALM 118. 89. I will come in to him—as I did to Zacchæus, sup with him, and he with me—Delightful reciprocity. Cf. "dwelleth in me, and I in Him," John, 6. 56. Whereas, ordinarily the admitted guest sups with the admittor, here the Divine guest becomes Himself the host, for He is the bread of life, and the Giver of the marriage feast. Here again He alludes to the imagery of the Song of Solomon, 4. 10, where the Bride invites Him to eat pleasant fruits, even as He had first prepared a feast for her, "His fruit was sweet to my taste." Cf. the same interchange, John, 21. 9-13, the feast being made up of the viands that Jesus brought, and those which the disciples brought. The consummation of this blessed intercommunion shall be at the Marriage Supper of the Lamb, of which the Lord's supper is the earnest and foretaste. 21. sit with me in my throne—(ch. 2. 26, 27; 20. 6; Matthew, 19. 28; 20. 23; John, 17. 22, 24; 2 Timothy, 2. 12.) The same whom Christ had just before threatened to spue out of His mouth, is now offered a seat with Him on His throne! "The highest place is within reach of the lowest: the faintest spark of grace may be fanned into the mightiest flame of love." [TRENCOR.] even as I also—Two thrones are here mentioned, (1.) His Father's, upon which He now sits, and has sat since His ascension, after His victory over death, sin, the world: upon this none can sit save God, and the God-man Christ Jesus, for it is the incommunicable prerogative of God alone; (2.) the throne which shall be peculiarly His as the once humbled and then glorified Son of man, to be set up over the whole earth (heretofore usurped by Satan) at His coming again: in this the victorious saints shall share (1 Corinthians, 6. 2). The transfigured elect church shall with Christ judge and reign over the nations in the flesh, and Israel the foremost of them: ministering blessings to them as angels were the Lord's mediators of blessing and administrators of His government in setting up His throne in Israel at Sinai. This privilege of our high calling belongs exclusively to the present time whilst Satan reigns, when alone there is scope for conflict and for victory (2 Timothy, 2. 11, 12). When Satan shall be bound (ch. 20. 4) there shall be no longer scope for it, for all on earth shall know the Lord from the least to the greatest. This, the grandest and crowning promise, is placed at the end of all the seven addresses, to gather all in one. It also forms the link to the next part of the book, where the Lamb is introduced seated on His Father's throne (ch. 4. 2, 3; 6. 5, 6). The eastern throne is broader than ours, admitting others besides him who, as chief, occupies the centre. TRENCOR notices, The order of the promises in the seven epistles corresponds to that of the unfolding of the kingdom of God from its first beginnings on earth to its consummation in heaven. To the faithful at Ephesus, (1) the tree of life in the Paradise of God is promised (ch. 2. 7), answering to Genesis, 2. (2.) Sin entered the world and death by sin; but to the faithful at Smyrna it is promised, they shall not be hurt by the second death (ch. 2. 11.). The promise of the hidden manna (ch. 2. 17) to Pergamos (3) brings us to the Mosaic period, the church in the wilderness. (4.) That to Thyatira, vic., triumph over the nations (ch. 2. 26, 27), forms the consummation of the kingdom in prophetic type, the period of David and Solomon characterized by this power over the nations. Here there is a division, the seven falling into two groups, four and three, as often, e. g., the Lord's prayer, three and four. The scenery of the last three passes from earth to heaven, the church contemplated as triumphant, with its steps from glory to glory. (6.) Christ promises to the believer of Sardis not to blot out his name out of the book of life, but to confess him before His Father and the angels at the judgment day, and clothe him with a glorified body of dazzling whiteness (v. 4, 5). To the faithful at Philadelphia (6.) Christ promises, they shall be citizens of the new Jerusalem, fixed as immovable pillars there, where city and temple are one (v. 12): here not only individual salvation is promised to the believer, as in the case of Sardis, but also privileges in the blessed communion of the church triumphant. (7.) Lastly, to the faithful of Laodicea is given the crowning promise, not only the two former blessings, but a seat with Christ on His throne, even as He has sat with His Father on His Father's throne (v. 21).

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-11. VISION OF GOD'S THRONE IN HEAVEN: THE FOUR AND TWENTY ELDERS: THE FOUR LIVING CREATURES. Here begins the Revelation proper; and first, chs. 4. and 5. set before us the heavenly scenery of the succeeding visions, and God on His throne, as the covenant God of His church, the Revealer of them to His apostle through Jesus Christ. The first great portion comprises the opening of the seals and the sounding of the trumpets (chs. 4.-11.). As the communication respecting the seven churches opened with a suitable vision of the Lord Jesus as Head of the church, so the second part opens with a vision suitable to the matter to be revealed. The scene is changed from earth to heaven. 1. After this—Greek, "After these things," marking the opening of the next vision in the succession. Here is the transition from "the things which are" (ch. 1. 19), the existing state of the seven churches, as a type of the church in general, in John's time, to "the things which shall be hereafter," vis., in relation to the time when John wrote. I looked—rather as Greek, "I saw" in vision: not as English Version means, I directed my look that way, was—Omit, as not being in the Greek, opened—"standing open" not as though John saw it in the act of being opened. Cf. Ezekiel, 1. 1; Matthew, 3. 16; Acts,

7. 16; 10. 11. But in those visions, the heavens opened, disclosing the visions to those below on earth. Whereas here, heaven, the temple of God, remains closed to those on earth, but John is transported in vision through an open door up into heaven, whence he can see things passing on earth or in heaven, according as the scenes of the several visions require. The first voice which I heard—the voice which I heard at first, viz., in ch. 1. 10; the former voice, was as it were—Omit was, it not being in the Greek. "Behold" governs in sense both "a door," &c., and "the first voice which," &c. Comes up hither—through the "open door," be—come to pass. Hereafter—Greek, "after these things;" after the present time (ch. 1. 10). 2. And—Omitted in the two oldest MSS., Fulgate, Syriac. I was—Greek, "I became in the Spirit" (Notes, ch. 1. 10): I was completely rapt in vision into the heavenly world. Was set—not was placed, but was situated, lit., lay. one sat on the throne—the Eternal Father; the Creator (v. 11): also, cf. v. 8, with ch. 1. 4, where also the Father is designated "Which is, and was, and is to come." When the Son, "the Lamb," is introduced, ch. 5. 6, a new song is sung which distinguishes the Sitter on the throne from the Lamb, "Thou hast redeemed us to God," & c. 13, "Unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb." So also in ch. 5. 7, as in Daniel, 7. 13, the Son of man brought before the Ancient of days is distinguished from Him. The Father in essence is invisible, but in Scripture at times is represented as assuming a visible form. 3. was—Omitted in the two oldest MSS., but supported by Fulgate and Coptic, to look upon—Greek, "in sight," or "appearance." Jasper—From ch. 21. 11, where it is called most precious, which the jasper was not, ENARD infers it was a diamond. Ordinarily, the jasper is a stone of various wavy colours, somewhat transparent; in ch. 21. 11, it represents watery crystalline brightness. The sardine, our cornelian, or else a fiery red. As the watery brightness represents God's holiness, so the fiery red His justice executing fiery wrath. The same union of white or watery brightness and fiery redness, appears in ch. 1. 14; 10. 1; Ezekiel, 1. 4; 8. 2; Daniel, 7. 2. rainbow round about the throne—forming a complete circle (type of God's perfection and eternity; not a half circle as the earthly rainbow) surrounding the throne vertically. Its various colours, which combined form one pure solar ray, symbolize the varied aspects of God's providential dealings uniting in one harmonious whole. Here, however, the predominating colour among the prismatic colours is green, the most refreshing of colours to look upon, and so symbolizing God's consolatory promises in Christ to His people amidst judgments on His foes. Moreover, the rainbow was the appointed token of God's covenant with all flesh, and His people in particular. Hereby God in type renewed to man the grant originally made to the first Adam. The antitype will be the "new heavens and the new earth" restored to redeemed man, just as the earth, after the destruction by the flood, was restored to Noah. As the rainbow was first reflected on the waters of the world's ruin, and continues to be seen only when a cloud is brought over the earth, so another deluge, viz., of fire, shall precede the new heavens and earth; the Lord, as here, on his throne, whence (v. 6) proceed "lightnings and thunderings," shall issue the commission to rid the earth of its oppressors; but then, amidst judgment, when other men's hearts fall them for fear, the believer shall be reassured by the rainbow, the covenant token, round the throne (cf. De BURON, Rev.). The heavenly bow speaks of the shipwreck of the world through sin; it speaks also of calm and sunshine after the storm. The cloud is the regular token of God's and Christ's presence, z.p., in the Tabernacle-Holiest place; on Mount Sinai at the giving of the law; at the ascension (Acts, 1. 9); at His coming again (ch. 1. 7). 4. sapphire as the Greek is translated in this very verse, "thrones," of course lower and smaller than the grand central throne. So ch. 16. 16, "the seat (rather throne) of the beast," in hellish parody of God's throne. four and twenty elders—Greek, "the four and twenty for as one oldest MS., 'twenty-four' elders;" the well-known elders. [ALFORD.] But TRIGELLUS translates, "Upon the twenty-four thrones (I saw) omitted in two oldest MSS.) elders sitting;" which is more probable, as the twenty-four elders were not mentioned before, whereas the twenty-four thrones were. They are not angels, for they have white robes and crowns of victory, implying a conflict and endurance, "Thou hast redeemed us"; they represent the Heads of the Old and New Testament churches respectively, the Twelve Patriarchs (cf. ch. 7. 6-8, not in their personal, but in their representative character), and Twelve Apostles. So in ch. 15. 3, "the song of Moses, and of the Lamb," the double constituents of the church are implied, the Old Testament and the New Testament. "Elders" is the very term for the ministry both of the Old and New Testament, the Jewish and the Catholic Gentile church. The tabernacle was a "pattern" of the heavenly antitype; the Holy place, a figure of HEAVEN ITSELF. Thus Jehovah's throne is represented by the mercy-seat in the Holiest, with the Shekinah cloud over it. "The seven lamps of fire before the throne" (v. 6) are antitypical to the seven-branched candlestick also in the Holiest, emblem of the manifold Spirit of God; "the sea of glass" (v. 6) corresponds to the molten sea before the sanctuary, wherein the priests washed themselves before entering on their holy service; so introduced here in connection with the redeemed "priests unto God" (cf. Note, ch. 15. 2). The "four living creatures" (v. 6, 7) answers to the cherubim over the mercy-seat. So the twenty-four throned and crowned elders are typified by the twenty-four chiefs of the twenty-four courses of priests, "Governors of the sanctuary, and governors of God" (1 Chronicles, 24. 5; 25.). 5. proceeded—Greek, "proceed," thunderings and thunderings.—The two oldest MSS. transpose, "voices and thunderings." Cf. at the giving of the law on Sinai, Exodus, 10. 16. "The thunderings express God's threats against the ungodly: there are voices in the thunders (ch. 10. 3), i.e., not only does He threaten generally, but also predicts special judgments." (GROT.) seven lamps...seven Spirits—The Holy Spirit in His sevenfold operation, as the light-and-life-giver (cf. ch. 5. 6, seven eyes...the seven Spirits of God; 1. 4; 21. 2; Psalm 119. 105) and fiery-purifier of the godly, and consumer of the ungodly (Matthew, 3. 11). 6. Two oldest MSS., A. B, Fulgate, Coptic, and Syriac, read, "As it were a sea of glass." like...crystal—not imperfectly transparent as the ancient common glass, but like rock crystal. Contrast the turbid "many waters" on which the harlot "sitteth" (ch. 17. 1). Cf. Job, 37. 18, "the sky...as a molten looking-glass." Thus, primarily, the pure ether which separates God's throne from St. John, and from all things before it, may be meant, symbolizing the "purity, calmness, and majesty of God's rule." [ALFORD.] But see the analogue in the temple, the molten sea before the sanctuary (Note, v. 4, above). There is in this sea depth and transparency, but not the fluidity and instability of the natural sea (cf. ch. 21. 1). It stands solid, calm, and clear. God's judgments are called "a great deep" (Psalm 36. 6). In ch. 15. 2, it is a "sea of glass mingled with fire." Thus there is symbolized here the purificatory baptism of water and the Spirit of all who are made "kings and priests unto God." In ch. 15. 2, the baptism with the fire of trial is meant. Through both all the kings-priests have to pass in coming to God: His judgments, which overwhelm the ungodly, they stand firmly upon, as on a solid sea of glass; able like Christ to walk on the sea, as though it were solid, round about the throne—one in the midst of each side of the throne, four beasts—The Greek for "beasts," ch. 13, 1, 11, is different, therion, the symbol for the carnal man by opposition to God losing his true glory, as lord, under Him, of the lower creatures, and degraded to the level of the beast. Here it is zoon, "living creatures": not beasts. 7, caif—"a steer." [ALFORD.] The LXX. often use the Greek term here for an ox (Exodus, 32, 1; 29, 10, &c.), as a man—The oldest MSS. have "as of a man," 8, about him—Greek, "round about him." ALFORD connects this with the following sentence: "All round and within (their wings) they are (so two oldest MSS., A. B. and Vulgate read, full of eyes." St. John's object is to show that the six wings in each did not interfere with that which he had before declared, viz., that they were "full of eyes before and behind." The eyes were round the outside of each wing, and up the inside of each when half expanded, and of the part of body in that inward recess, rest not—lit., "have no rest." How awfully different the reason why the worshippers of the beast "have no rest day nor night," viz., "their torment for ever and ever." Holy, holy, holy—The "tris-hagion" of the Greek liturgies. In Isaiah, 6, 3, as here, it occurs; also Psalm 99, 3, 5, 9, where He is praised as "holy," (1.) on account of His majesty (v. 1) about to display itself, (2.) His justice (v. 4) already displaying itself, (3.) His mercy (v. 6-8) which displayed itself in time past. So here "Holy," as He "who was;" "Holy," as He "who is;" "Holy," as He "who is to come." He showed Himself an object of holy worship in the past creation of all things; more fully He shows Himself so in governing all things: He will, in the highest degree, show Himself so in the consummation of all things. "Of (from) Him, through Him, and to Him, are all things: to whom be glory for ever. Amen." In Isaiah, 6, 3 there is added, "the whole EARTH is full of His glory." But in Revelation this is deferred until the glory of the LORD fills the earth, His enemies having been destroyed. [BENGLI.] Almighty—Answering to "Lord of hosts" (Sabaoth), Isaiah, 6, 3. The cherubim here have six wings, like the seraphim in Isaiah, 6; whereas the cherubim in Ezekiel, 1, 6 had four wings each. They are called by the same name, "living creatures." But whereas in Ezekiel each living creature has all four faces, here the four belong severally one to each. See my Note, Ezekiel, 1, 6. The four living creatures answer by contrast to the four world-powers represented by four beasts. The fathers identified them with the four gospels, Matthew the lion, Mark the ox, Luke the man, John the eagle; these symbols, thus viewed, express not the personal character of the evangelists, but the manifold aspect of Christ in relation to the world (four being the number significant of world-wide extension, e.g., the four quarters of the world, presented by them severally: the lion expressing royalty, as Matthew gives prominence to this feature of Christ; the ox, laborious endurance, Christ's prominent characteristic in Mark; man, brotherly sympathy with the whole race of man, Christ's prominent feature in Luke; the eagle, soaring majesty, prominent in John's description of Christ as the Divine Word. But here the context best suits the view which regards the four living creatures as representing the redeemed election-church in its relation of ministering king-priests to God, and ministers of blessing to the redeemed earth, and the nations on it, and the animal creation, in which man stands at the head of all, the lion at the head of wild beasts, the ox at the head of tame beasts, the eagle at the head of birds and of the creatures of the waters. Cf. ch. 5, 8-10, "Thou hast redeemed us by thy blood out of every kindred... and hast made us unto our God kings and priests: and we shall reign on the earth," and ch. 20, 4, the partakers with Christ of the first resurrection, who conjointly with Him reign over the redeemed nations that are in the flesh. Cf. as to the happy and willing subjection of the lower animal world, Isaiah, 11, 6-8; 65, 25; Ezekiel, 34, 26; Hosea, 2, 18. Jewish tradition says, the "four standards" under which Israel encamped in the wilderness, to the East Judah, to the North Dan, to the West Ephraim, to the South Reuben, were respectively a lion, an eagle, an ox, and a man, whilst in the midst was the tabernacle containing the Shekinah symbol of the Divine presence. Thus we have "the picture of that blessed period when—the earth having been fitted for being the kingdom of the Father—the court of heaven will be transferred to earth, and the 'tabernacle of God shall be with men' (ch. 21, 3), and the whole world will be subject to a never-ending theocracy" (cf. Dr BURTON, Rev.). The point of union between the two views given above is, Christ is the perfect realization of the ideal of man: Christ is presented in His fourfold aspect in the four rospeis respectively. The redeemed election-church (who shall reign) when in and through Christ (with whom she shall reign) she realizes the ideal of man, shall combine in herself human perfections having a fourfold aspect: (1.) kindly righteousness with hatred of evil and judicial equity, answering to the "lion;" (2.) laborious diligence in every duty, the "ox;" (3.) human sympathy, the "man;" (4.) the contemplation of heavenly truth, the "eagle." As the high-soaring intelligence, the eagle, forms the contrasted complement to practical labour, the ox bound to the soil; so holy judicial vengeance against evil, the lion springing suddenly and terribly on the doomed, forms the contrasted complement to human sympathy, the man. In Isaiah, 6, 2, we read, "Each had six wings: with twain he covered his face (in reverence, as not presuming to lift up his face to God), with twain he covered his feet (in humility, as not worthy to stand in God's holy presence), and with twain he did fly (in obedient readiness to do instantly God's command)." 9-11. The ground of praise here is God's eternity, and God's power and glory manifested in the creation of all things for His pleasure. Creation is the foundation of all God's other acts of power, wisdom, and love, and therefore forms the first theme of His creatures' thankgivings. The four living creatures take the lead of the twenty-four elders, both in this anthem, and in that new song which follows on the ground of their redemption (ch. 5, 8-10). 9, when—i.e., whensoever: as often as. A simultaneous giving of glory on the part of the beasts, and on the part of the elders, give—"shall give" in one oldest MS. for ever and ever—Greek, "unto the ages of the ages," 10, fall—immediately. Greek, "shall fall down;" implying that this acclamation of praise shall be repeated onward to eternity. So also "Shall worship... shall cast their crowns," viz., in acknowledgment that all the merit of their crowns (not kingly diadems, but the crowns of conquerors) is due to Him. 11, O Lord—The two oldest MSS., A. B. Vulgate, and Syriac, add, "And our God." "Our" by virtue of creation, and especially redemption. One oldest MS., B. and Syriac, insert "the Holy one." But another, A. Vulgate, and Coptic, omit this, as English Version does, glory, &c.—"the glory—the honour—the power," thou—Emphatical in the Greek: "It is thou who didst create." all things—Greek, "the all things": the universe. for—Greek, "on account of:" "for the sake of thy pleasure," or "will." English Version is good Greek. Though the context better suits, it was because of thy will, that "they were" (so one oldest MS., A. Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic read, instead, of English Version "are": another oldest MS., B. reads, "They were not, and were created," were created out of nothing, i.e., were creatio, as contrasted with their previous non-existence. With God to will is to effect; to determine is to perform. So in Genesis, 1, 3, "Let there be light, and there was light;" in Hebrew an expressive tautology, the same word and tense and letters being used for "let there be," and "there was," marking the simultaneity and identity of the will and the effect. D. LONGINUS, on the Sublime, sec. 9, a heathen, praises this description of God's power by "the lawgiver of the Jews, no ordinary man," as one worthy of the theme, were created—by thy definite act of creation at a definite time.

CHAPTER V.

VER. 1-14. THE BOOK WITH SEVEN SEALS: NONE WORTHY TO OPEN IT BUT THE LAMB: HE TAKES IT AMIDST THE PRAISES OF THE REDEEMED, AND OF THE WHOLE HEAVENLY HOST. 1. in—Greek, "lying" upon the right hand, &c. His right hand was open, and on it lay the book. On God's part there was no withholding of His future purposes as contained in the book: the only obstacle to unsealing it stated v. 2. [ALFORD.] book—rather, as accords with the ancient form of books, and with the writing on the backside, "a roll." The writing on the back implies fulness and completeness, so that nothing more needs to be added (ch. 22. 18). The roll, or book, appears from the context to be "the title deed of man's inheritance" [DE BURGH] redeemed by Christ, and contains the successive steps by which He shall recover it from its usurper, and obtain actual possession of the kingdom already "purchased" for Himself and His elect saints. However, no portion of the roll is said to be unfolded and read; but simply the seals are successively opened, giving final access to its contents being read as a perfect whole, which shall not be until the events symbolized by the seals shall have been past, when Ephesians, 3. 10 shall receive its complete accomplishment, and the Lamb shall reveal God's providential plans in redemption in all their manifold beauties. Thus the opening of the seals will mean the successive steps by which God in Christ clears the way for the final opening and reading of the book at the visible setting up of the kingdom of Christ. Cf., at the grand consummation, ch. 20. 12, "Another book was opened... the book of life;" 22. 19. None is worthy to do so save the Lamb, for He alone as such has redeemed man's forfeited inheritance, of which the book is the title deed. The question (v. 2) is not (as commonly supposed), Who should reveal the destinies of the church (for this any inspired prophet would be competent to do); but, Who has the worth to give man a new title to his lost inheritance? [DE BURGH.] sealed... seven seals—Greek, "sealed up," or "firmly sealed," &c. The number seven (divided into four, the world-wide number, and three, the Divine) abounds in Revelation, and expresses completeness. Thus, the seven seals, representing all power given to the Lamb; the seven trumpets, by which the world-kingsdoms are shaken and overthrown, and the Lamb's kingdom ushered in; and the seven vials, by which the beast's kingdom is destroyed. 2. strong—[Psalm 103. 20.] His voice penetrated heaven, earth, and Hades (ch. 10. 1-3). 3. no man—Greek, "no one." Not merely no man, but also no one of any order of beings, in earth—Greek, "upon the earth," under the earth—viz., in Hades. look thereon—to look upon the contents, so as to read them. 4. and to read—inserted in English Version Greek text without good authority. One oldest MS., ORIGEN, CYPRIAN, and HILARY, omit the clause. To read would be awkward standing between "to open the book" and "to look thereon." St. John having been promised a revelation of "things which must be hereafter," keeps now at his earnest desire being apparently frustrated. He is a pattern to us to imitate, as an eager and teachable learner of the Apocalypse. 5. one of—Greek, "one from among." The "elder" meant is, according to some (in LXX), Matthew. With this accords the description here given of Christ, "the lion, which is (so the Greek of the tribe of Juda, the root of David, the royal,

David-descended, lion-aspect of Christ being that prominent in Matthew, whence the lion among the four-fold cherubim is commonly assigned to him. GEAHARD in BENGEL thought Jacob to be meant, being, doubtless, one of those who rose with Christ and ascended to heaven [Matthew, 27. 52, 53]. The elders in heaven round God's throne know better than John, still in the flesh, the far-reaching power of Christ. Root of David—[Isaiah, 11. 1, 10.] Not merely "a sucker come up from David's ancient root" (as ALFORD limits it), but also including the idea of His being Himself the root and origin of David: cf. these two truths brought together, Matthew, 22. 42-45. Hence He is called not merely Son of David, but also David. He is at once "the branch" of David, and "the root" of David, David's Son and David's Lord, the Lamb slain and therefore the Lion of Juda; about to reign over Israel, and thence over the whole earth. prevailed—Greek, "conquered" absolutely, as elsewhere (ch. 2. 2): gained the victory: His past victory over all the powers of darkness entitles Him now to open the book. to open—i.e., so as to open, &c. One oldest MS., B, reads, "He that openeth," i.e., whose office it is to open, but the weight of oldest authorities is with English Version reading, viz., A, Vulgate, Coptic, and ORIGEN. 6. I beheld, and, lo—One oldest MS., A, omits "and, lo." Another B, CYPRIAN, &c., support "and, lo," but omit "and I beheld," in the midst of the throne—i.e., not on the throne (cf. v. 7), but in the midst of the company (ch. 4. 4) which was "round about the throne." Lamb—Greek arnion; always found in Revelation exclusively, except in John, 21. 15 alone: it expresses endearment, viz., the endearing relation in which Christ now stands to us, as the consequence of His previous relation as the sacrificial Lamb. So also our relation to Him: He the precious Lamb, we His dear Lambs, one with Him. BENGEL thinks there is in Greek arnion, the idea of taking the lead of the flock. Another object of the form Greek arnion, the Lamb, is to put Him in the more marked contrast to Greek therion, the Beast. Elsewhere Greek arnos is found, applying to Him as the paschal, sacrificial Lamb [Isaiah, 53. 7, LXX; John, 1. 29, 36; Acts, 8. 32; Peter, 1. 19], as it had been slain—bearing marks of His past death-wounds. He was standing, though bearing the marks of one slain. In the midst of heavenly glory Christ crucified is still the prominent object. seven horns—i.e., perfect might, "seven" symbolizing perfection; "horns," might. In contrast to the horns of the anti-Christian world-powers, ch. 17. 3, &c.; Daniel, 7. 7, 20; 8. 3. seven eyes. the seven Spirits—sent forth—So one oldest MS., A. But B reads, "being sent forth." As the seven lamps before the throne represent the Spirit of God immanent in the Godhead, so the seven eyes of the Lamb represent the same sevenfold Spirit proflorent from the incarnate Redeemer in His world-wide energy. The Greek for "sent forth," apostellomena, or else apostelamenois, is akin to the term apostle, reminding us of the Spirit-impelled labours of Christ's apostles and ministers throughout the world: if the present tense be read, as seems best, the idea will be that of those labours continually going on unto the end. "Eyes" symbolize His all-watchful and wise providence for His church, and against her foes. 7. The book lay on the open hand of Him that sat on the throne for any to take who was found worthy. [ALFORD.] The Lamb takes it from the Father in token of formal investiture into His universal and everlasting dominion as Son of man. This introductory vision thus presents before us, in summary, the consummation to which all the events in the seals, trumpets, and vials converge, viz., the setting up of Christ's kingdom visibly. Prophecy ever hurries to the grand crisis or end, and dwells on intermediate events only in their typical relation to, and representation of, the end. 8. had taken—Greek, "took." 10

Vials—"bowls" censers. odours—Greek, "incense." —as the angel offers their prayers (ch. 8, cf. Psalm 141, 2). This gives not the to Rome's dogma of our praying to they be employed by God in some way to present our prayers (nothing is said ding for us), yet we are told to pray h. 19, 10; 22, 8, 9). The remaining six (the whole being seven, the number for perfection and completeness) are all, as well as "power," ranged under the one Greek article, to mark that they form one complete aggregate belonging to God and His coequal, the Lamb. Cf. ch. 7, 12, where each of all seven has the article, riches—both spiritual and earthly. Blessing—Ascribed praise: the will on the creature's part, though unaccompanied by the power, to return blessing for blessing conferred. [ALFORD.] 13. The universal chorus of creation, including the outermost circles as well as the inner (of saints and angels), winds up the doxology. But A omits this, in the sea—Greek, "upon the sea;" the sea animals which are regarded as being on the surface. [ALFORD.] all that are in them—So Vulgate reads. A omits "all (things)" here (Greek pantia), and reads, "I heard all (Greek pantias) saying:" implying the harmonious concert of all in the four quarters of the universe. Blessing, &c.—Greek, "the blessing, the honour, and the glory, and the might to the ages of the ages." The four-fold ascription indicates world-wide universality. 14, said—So A, Vulgate, and Syriac, read. But B, and Coptic read, "[I heard] saying." Amen—So A reads. But B reads, "the (accustomed) Amen." As in ch. 4, 11, the four and twenty elders asserted God's worthiness to receive the glory, as having created all things, so here the four living creatures ratify by their "Amen" the whole creation's ascription of the glory to Him. four and twenty—Omitted in the oldest MSS.; Vulgate supports it. him that liveth for ever and ever—Omitted in all the MSS.: inserted by commentators from ch. 4, 9. But there, where the thanksgiving is expressed, the words are appropriate; but here less so, as their worship is that of silent prostration. "Worshiped" (viz., God and the Lamb). So in ch. 11, 1, "worship" is used absolutely.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-17. THE OPENING OF THE FIRST SIX OF THE SEVEN SEALS. Cf. Note, ch. 5, 1. Many (MEXE, FLEMING, NEWTON, &c.) hold that all these seals have been fulfilled, the sixth having been so by the overthrow of Paganism and establishment of Christianity under Constantine's edict, 313 A.D. There can, however, be no doubt that at least the sixth seal is future, and is to be at the coming again of Christ. The great objection to supposing the seals to be finally and exhaustively fulfilled (though, probably, particular events may be partial fulfillments typical of the final and fullest one), is that, if so, they ought to furnish as the destruction of Jerusalem, according to Christ's prophecy, does) a strong external evidence of Revelation. But it is clear they cannot be used for this, as hardly any two interpreters of this school are agreed on what events constitute the fulfilment of each seal. Probably not isolated facts, but classes of events preparing the way for Christ's coming kingdom, are intended by the opening of the seals. The four living creatures severally cry at the opening of the first four seals, "Come;" which fact marks the division of the seven, as often occurs in this sacred number, into four and three. 1, one of the seals—The oldest MSS., A, B, C, Vulgate, and Syriac read, "one of the seven seals." note—The three oldest MSS. read this in the nominative or dative, not the genitive as English Version, "I heard one from among the four living creatures saying, as (it were) the voice (or, as with the voice) of thunder." The first living creature was like a lion (ch. 4, 7); his voice is in consonance. Implying the lion-like boldness with which, in the successive great revivals, the faithful have testified for Christ, and especially a little before His coming shall testify. Or, rather, their earnestness in praying for Christ's coming. Come and see—One oldest MS. B. has "And see." But A, C, and Vulgate reject it. ALFORD rightly objects to English Version reading, "Whither was John to come? Separated as he was by the glassy sea from the throne, was he to cross it?" Contrast the form of expression, ch. 10. 8. It is much more likely to be the cry of the redeemed to the Redeemer, "Come" and deliver the groaning creature from the bondage of corruption. Thus, v. 2 is an answer to the cry, veni (lat., come) forth corresponding to "Come." "Come," says GROTIUS, is the living creature's address to John, calling his earnest attention. But it seems hard to see how "Come" by itself can mean this. Cf. the only other places in Revelation where it is used, ch. 4. 1; 22. 17. If the four living creatures represent the four gospels, the "Come" will be their invitation to every one (for it is not written that they addressed John) to accept Christ's salvation whilst there is time, as the opening of the seals marks a progressive step towards the end (cf. ch. 22. 17). Judgments are foretold as accompanying the preaching of the gospel as a witness to all nations (ch. 14. 6-11; Matthew, 24. 6-14). Thus the invitation, "Come," is aptly parallel to Matthew, 24. 14. The opening of the four first seals are followed by judgments preparatory for His coming. At the opening of the fifth seal, the martyrs above express the same (v. 9, 10; cf. Zechariah, 1. 10). At the opening of the sixth seal, the Lord's coming is ushered in with terrors to the ungodly. At the seventh, the consummation is fully attained (ch. 11. 15). 2. Evidently Christ, whether in person, or by His angel, preparatory to His coming again, as appears from ch. 19. 11, 12, bow—(Psalm 45. 4, 5.) crowns—Greek stephanos, the garland or wreath of a conqueror, which is also implied by His white horse, white being the emblem of victory. In ch. 19. 11, 12, the last step in His victorious progress is represented: accordingly there He wears many diadems (Greek diademata; not merely Greek stephanos, crowns or wreaths), and is personally attended by the hosts of heaven. Cf. Zechariah, 1. 8; especially v. 10 below, with Zechariah, 1. 12; also cf. the colours of the four horses, and to conquer—i.e., so as to gain a lasting victory. All four seals usher in judgments on the earth, as the power which opposes the reign of Himself and His church. This, rather than the work of conversion and conviction, is primarily meant, though doubtless, secondarily, the elect will be gathered out through His word and His judgments. 3, and see—Omitted in the three oldest MSS., A, B, C, and Vulgate. 4, red—the colour of blood. The colour of the horse in each case answers to the mission of the rider. Cf. Matthew, 10. 24-26, "Think not I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword." The white horse of Christ's bloodless victories is soon followed, through man's perversion of the gospel, by the red horse of bloodshed; but this is overruled by the clearing away of the obstacles to Christ's coming kingdom. The patient ox is the emblem of the second (living creature) who, at the opening of this seal, saith, "Come." The saints amidst judgments on the earth in patience "endure to the end," that they should kill—The Greek is indicative future, "that they may, as they also shall, kill one another." 5. Come and see—The two oldest MSS., A, C, and Vulgate, omit "and see." B retains the words, black—implying sadness and want, had—Greek, "having," a pair of balances—the symbol of scarcity of provisions, the bread being doled out by weight. 6. a voice—Two oldest MSS., A, C, read, "as if were a voice." B reads as English Version. The voice is heard "in the midst of the four living creatures" (as Jehovah in the Shekinah cloud manifested

His presence between the cherubim); because it is only for the sake of, and in connexion with, His redeemed, that God mitigates His judgments on the earth. A measure—"A chenix." Whilst making food scarce, do not make it so much so that a choenix (about a day's provision of wheat, variously estimated at two or three pints) shall not be to be got "for a penny" (denarius, eight-and-a-half pence of our money, probably the day's wages of a labourer). Famine generally follows the sword. Ordinarily, from sixteen to twenty measures were given for a denarius. The sword, famine, noxious beasts, and the pestilence, are God's four judgments on the earth. A spiritual famine, too, may be included in the judgment. The "Come," in the case of this third seal, is said by the third of the four living creatures, whose likeness is a man; indicative of sympathy and human compassion for the sufferers. God in it tempers judgment with mercy. Cf. Matthew, 24. 7, which indicates the very calamities foretold in these seals, nations rising against nations (the sword), famines, pestilences (v. 8), and earthquakes (v. 12), three measures of barley for a penny—the cheaper and less nutritious grain, bought by the labourer who could not buy enough wheat for his family with his day's wages, a denarius, and, therefore, buys barley. see thou hurt not the oil and the wine—the luxuries of life, rather than necessities; the oil and wine were to be spared for the refreshment of the sufferers. 7, and see—Supported by K. Omitted by A, C, and Vulgate. The fourth living creature, who was "like a flying eagle," introduces this seal: implying high-soaring intelligence, and judgment descending from on high fatally on the ungodly, as the king of birds on his prey. 8, pale—"livid." (ALFORD.) Death—personified. Hell—Hades personified, saw them—Death and Hades. So A, C, read, But B and Vulgate read, "to him." Fourth part of the earth—Answering to the first four seals; his portion as one of the four, being a fourth part. death—pestilence—of Ezekiel, 14. 21, with the four judgments here, the sword, famine, pestilence, and wild beasts: the famine the consequence of the sword; pestilence, that of famine; and beasts multiplying by the consequent depopulation. with the beasts—Greek, by: more direct agency. These four seals are marked off from the three last by the four living creatures introducing them with "Come." The calamities indicated are not restricted to one time, but extend through the whole period of church history to the coming of Christ, before which last great and terrible day of the Lord they shall reach their highest aggravation. The first seal is the summary, Christ going forth conquering till all enemies are subdued under Him, with a view to which the judgments subsequently specified accompany the preaching of the gospel for a witness to all nations. 2. The three last seals relate to the invisible, as the first four to the visible world; the fifth, to the martyrs who have died as believers; the sixth, to those who have died, or who shall be found at Christ's coming, unbelievers, viz., "the kings...great men...bondman...freeman;" the seventh, to the silence in heaven. The scene changes from earth to heaven: so that interpretations which make these three last consecutive to the first four seals, are very doubtful. I saw—in spirit. For souls are not naturally visible. under the altar—As the blood of sacrificial victims slain on the altar was poured at the bottom of the altar, so the souls of those sacrificed for Christ's testimony are symbolically represented as under the altar, in heaven; for the life or animal soul is in the blood, and blood is often represented as crying for vengeance (Genesis, 4. 10). The altar in heaven, antitypical to the altar of sacrifice, is Christ crucified. As it is the altar that sacrifices the gift, so it is Christ alone who makes our obedience, and even our sacrifice of life for the truth, acceptable to God. The sacrificial altar was not in the sanctuary, but outside: so Christ's literal sacrifice, and the figurative sacrifice of the martyrs took place, not in the heavenly sanctuary, but outside, here on earth. The only altar in heaven is that antitypical to the temple-altar of incense. The blood of the martyrs cries from the earth under Christ's cross, whereon they may be considered virtually to have been sacrificed: their souls cry from under the altar of incense, which is Christ in heaven, by whom alone the incense of praise is accepted before God. They are under Christ, in His immediate presence, shut up unto Him in joyful eager expectancy until He shall come to raise the sleeping dead. Cf. the language of 2 Macc. 7. 36, as indicating Jewish opinion on the subject, Our brethren who have now suffered a short pain are dead under [Greek] God's covenant of everlasting life, testimony which they held—i.e., which they bore, as committed to them to bear. Cf. ch. 12. 17, "Have some Greek as here) the testimony of Jesus." 10. How long—Greek, "Until when?" As in the parable the woman (symbol of the church) cries day and night to the unjust judge for justice against her adversary who always oppressing her cf. below, ch. 12. 10: so the elect (not only on earth, but under Christ's covering, and in His presence in Paradise) cry day and night to God, who will assuredly, in His own time, avenge His and their cause, "though He bear long with them." This passage need not be restricted to some particular martyrdoms, but have been, and are receiving, and shall receive partial fulfillments, until their last exhaustive fulfillment before Christ's coming. So as to the other events foretold here. The glory even of those in Paradise shall only be complete when Christ's and the church's foes are cast out, and the earth become Christ's kingdom at His coming to raise the sleeping saints. Lord—Greek, "Master;" implying that He has them and their foes and all His creatures as absolutely at His disposal, as a master has his slaves: hence, in v. 11, "fellow-servants" or fellow-slaves follows. holy—Greek, "the Holy one." avenged—"exact vengeance for our blood." on—Greek, "from them," that dwell on the earth—the ungodly, of earth earthy, as distinguished from the church, whose home and heart are even now in heavenly places. 11. white robes—The three oldest MSS., A, B, C, read, "A white robe was given." every one of—One oldest MS. B, omits this. A, C, read, "unto them, unto each," i.e., unto them severally. Though their joint cry for the riddance of the earth from the ungodly is not yet granted, it is intimated that it will be so in due time; meanwhile, individually they receive the white robe, indicative of light, joy, and triumphant victory over their foes: even as the Captain of their salvation goes forth on a white horse conquering and to conquer; also of purity and sanctity through Christ. Maimonides says that the Jews used to array priests, when approved of, in white robes: thus the sense is, they are admitted among the blessed ones, who, as spotless priests, minister unto God and the Lamb, should—So Creugas. But A, B, "shall rest," a little season—One oldest MS. B, omits "little." A, C, support it. Even if it be omitted, is it to be inferred that the "season" is short as compared with eternity. BEZEL fancifully made a season (Greek chronos, the word here used; to be one thousand one hundred and eleven one-ninth years, and a time (ch. 12. 14, Greek kaivos to be a fifth of a season, i.e., two hundred and twenty-two two-ninths years. The only distinction in the Greek is, a season (Greek chronos) is a sort of aggregate of times. Greek kaivos, a specific time, and so of short duration. As to their rest, cf. ch. 14. 13 (the same Greek anapauomai); Isaiah, 57. 2; Daniel, 12. 13. until their...brethren...be fulfilled—in number. Until their full number shall have been completed. The number of the elect is definitely fixed:

perhaps to fill up that of the fallen angels. But this is mere conjecture. The full blessedness and glory of all the saints shall be simultaneous. The earlier shall not anticipate the later saints. A, C, read, "shall have been accomplished;" B, N, read, "shall have accomplished (their course)." 12. As v. 4, 5-8, the sword, famine, and pestilence, answer to Matthew, 24. 6, 7; and v. 9, 10, as to martyrdoms, answer to Matthew, 24. 9, 10; so this passage, v. 12-17, answers to Matthew, 24. 29, 30, "the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven...then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming." &c.; imagery describing the portents of the immediate coming of the day of the Lord; but not the coming itself until the elect are sealed, and the judgments invoked by the martyrs descend on the earth, the sea, and the trees (ch. 7.), and, lo—So A reads. But B, C, omit "lo." earthquakes—Greek, "shaking" of the heavens, the sea, and the dry land; the shaking of these mutable things being the necessary preliminary to the setting up of those things which cannot be shaken. This is one of the catchwords (WORDSWORTH) connecting the sixth seal with the sixth trumpet (ch. 11. 13) and the seventh vial (ch. 16. 17-21); also the seventh seal (ch. 8. 6), sack-cloth—One kind made of the "hair" of Cilician goats, was called "cilicium," or Cilician cloth, and was used for tents, &c. Paul, a Cilician, made such tents (Acts, 16. 3). moon—A, B, C, and oldest versions read, "the whole moon;" the full moon; not merely the crescent moon, as blood—(Joel, 2. 31.) 13. stars...fell, as a fig tree casteth her...figs—(Isaiah, 34. 4; Nahum, 3. 12.) The church shall be then ripe for glorification, the anti-Christian world for destruction, which shall be accompanied with mighty phenomena in nature. As to the stars falling to the earth, Scripture describes natural phenomena as they would appear to the spectator, not in the language of scientific accuracy; and yet, whilst thus adapting itself to ordinary men, it drops hints which show that it anticipates the discoveries of modern science. 14. departed—Greek, "was separated from" its place: "was made to depart." Not as ALFORD, "parted asunder;" for, on the contrary, it was rolled together as a scroll which had been open is rolled up and laid aside. There is no "asunder one from another" here in the Greek, as in Acts, 15. 39, which ALFORD copies, mountain...moved out of...places—(Psalm 121. 1, Margin; Jeremiah, 3. 23; 4. 24; Nahum, 1. 6.) This total disruption shall be the precursor of the new earth, just as the pre-Adamic convulsions prepared it for its present occupants. 15. kings...hid themselves—Where was now the spirit of those whom the world had so greatly feared? (BENZEL) great men—statesmen, and high civil officers, rich men... chief captains—The three oldest MSS., A, B, C, transpose thus, "chief captains...rich men," mighty—The three oldest MSS., A, B, C, read, "strong" physically (Psalm 33. 16). in—into, into: ran into, so as to hide themselves in dens—"caves." 16. from the face—(Psalm 34. 16.) On the whole verse, cf. Hosea, 10. 8; Luke, 23. 30. 17. Lit., "the day, the great day)" which can only mean the last great day. After the Lord has exhausted all His ordinary judgments, the sword, famine, pestilence, and wild beasts, and still sinners are impenitent, the great day of the Lord itself shall come. Matthew, 24, plainly forms a perfect parallelism to the six seals, not only in the events, but also in the order of their occurrence: v. 3, the first seal v. 6, the second seal; v. 7, the third seal; v. 7, end, the fourth seal; v. 9, the fifth seal, the persecutions and abounding iniquity under which, as well as consequent judgments accompanied with gospel-preaching to all nations as a witness, are particularly detailed v. 9-28; v. 29, the sixth seal, to stand—to stand justified, and not condemned before the Judge. Thus the sixth seal brings us to the verge of the Lord's coming. The ungodly "tribes of the earth" tremble at the signs of His immediate approach. But before He actually inflicts the blow in person, "the elect" must be "gathered" out.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-17. SEALING OF THE ELECT OF ISRAEL. THE COUNTLESS MULTITUDE OF THE GENTILE ELECT. 1. And—So Band Syriac. But A, C, Vulgate, and Coptic, omit "and," after these things—A, B, C, and Coptic, read, "after this." The two visions in this chapter come in as an episode after the sixth seal, and before the seventh seal. It is clear that, though "Israel" may elsewhere designate the spiritual Israel, "the elect (church) on earth" [ALFORD], here, where the names of the tribes one by one are specified, these names cannot have any but the literal meaning. The second advent will be the time of the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, when the times of the Gentiles shall have been fulfilled, and the Jews shall at last say, "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." The period of the Lord's absence has been a blank in the history of the Jews as a nation. As then Revelation is the Book of the Second Advent [DE BURON] naturally mention of God's restored favour to Israel occurs among the events that usher in Christ's advent, earth...res—The judgments to descend on these are in answer to the martyrs' prayer under the fifth seal. Cf. the same judgments under the fifth trumpet, the sealed being exempt (ch. 9. 4). on any tree—Greek, "against any tree" (Greek epi tis dendron): but "on the earth." Greek epi tes ges. 2. from the east—Greek, "...the rising of the sun." The quarter from which God's glory oftenest manifests itself. 3. Hurt not—by letting loose the destructive winds. till we have sealed the servants of our God—Parallel to Matthew. 24. 31, "His angels...shall gather together His elect from the four winds." God's love is such, that He cannot do any thing in the way of judgment, till His elect are secured from hurt (Genesis, 19. 22). Israel, at the eye of the Lord's coming, shall be found re-embodied as a nation; for its tribes are distinctly specified (Joseph, however, being substituted for Dan; whether because Antichrist is to come from Dan, or because Dan is to be Antichrist's especial tool [ARETHAS, tenth century], cf. Genesis, 49. 17; Jeremiah, 8. 16; Amos, 8. 14; just as there was a Judas among the Twelve). Out of these tribes a believing remnant will be preserved from the judgments which shall destroy all the anti-Christian confederacy (ch. 6. 12-17), and shall be transfigured with the elect church of all nations, viz., 144,000 (or whatever number is meant by this symbolical number, who shall faithfully resist the seductions of Antichrist, whilst the rest of the nation, restored to Palestine in unbelief, are his dupes, and at last his victims. Previously to the Lord's judgments on Antichrist and his hosts, these latter shall destroy two-thirds of the nation, one-third escaping, and, by the Spirit's operation through affliction, turning to the Lord, which remnant shall form the nucleus on earth of the Israelite nation that is from this time to stand at the head of the millennial nations of the world. Israel's spiritual resurrection shall be "as life from the dead" to all the nations. As now a regeneration goes on here and there of individuals, so there shall then be a regeneration of nations universally, and this in connexion with Christ's coming. Matthew, 24. 34, "this generation (the Jewish nation) shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled," which implies that Israel can no more pass away before Christ's advent, than Christ's own words can pass away (the same Greek), Matthew, 34. 35. So exactly Zechariah, 13. 8, 9; 14. 2-4, 9-21; cf. 12. 2-14; 13. 1, 2. So also Ezekiel, 10. 17, 18; 41. 7, especially v. 4. Cf. also Ezekiel, 10. 2, with ch. 8. 6, where the final judgments actually fall on the earth, with the same accompaniment, the fire of the altar cast into the earth, including the fire scattered over the city. So again ch. 14. 1, the same 144,000 appear on Zion with the Father's name in their forehead, at the close of the section, chs. 12, 13, 14, concerning the church and her foes. Not that the saints are exempt from trial; v. 14 proves the contrary; but their trials are distinct from the destroying judgments that fall on the world from these they are exempted, as Israel was from the plagues of Egypt, especially from the last, the Israelite doors having the protecting seal of the blood-mock, foreheads—the most conspicuous and noblest part of man's body; whereon the helmet, "the hope of salvation," is worn. 4. Twelve is the number of the tribes, and appropriate to the church: 3 by 4 = 3, the Father number, multiplied by 4, the number for world-wide extension, 12 by 12 implies sixty and completeness, which is taken a thousand-fold in 144,000. A thousand implies the world perfectly permeated by the Divine; for it is ten, the world number, raised to the power of three, the number of God, of all the tribes—360, "out of every tribe" not 144,000 of each tribe, but the aggregate of the 12,000 from every tribe. children—Greek, "sons of Israel." Ch. 3. 12; 21. 12, are no objection, as ALFORD thinks, to the literal Israel being meant; for, in consummated glory, still the church will be that "built on the foundation of the (Twelve) apostles (Israelites), Jesus Christ (an Israelite) being the chief corner-stone." Gentle believers shall have the same of Jerusalem written on them, in that they shall share the citizenship antitypical to that of the literal Jerusalem. 5-8. Judah (meaning praise) stands first, as Jesus' tribe. Benjamin, the youngest, is last; and with him is associated second last, Joseph. Reuben, as originally first-born, comes next after Judah, to whom it gave place, having by sin lost its primogeniture-right. Besides the reason given above, another akin for the omission of Dan, is, its having been the first to lapse into idolatry (Judges, 18.); for which same reason the name Ephraim, also (cf. Judges, 17; Hosea, 4. 17), is omitted, and Joseph substituted. Also, it had been now for long almost extinct. Long before, the Hebrews say (GROTIUS), it was reduced to the one family of Huzim, which perished subsequently in the wars before Ezra's time. Hence it is omitted 1 Chronicles, 4-8. Dan's small numbers are joined here to Naphtali's, whose brother he was by the same mother. (BENGL.) The twelve times twelve thousand sealed ones of Israel are the nucleus of transfigured humanity [AUBRELEN], to which the elect Gentiles are joined, "a multitude which no man could number," v. 9 &c., the church of Jews and Gentiles indiscriminately, in which the Gentiles are the predominant element. Luke, 21. 24. The word "tribes," Greek, implies that believing Israelites are in this countless multitude. Both are in heaven, yet ruling over the earth, as ministers of blessing to its inhabitants; whilst upon earth the world of nations is added to the kingdom of Israel. The twelve apostles stand at the head of the whole. The upper and the lower congregation, though distinct, are intimately associated. 9. no man—Greek, "no one," of all nations—Greek, "out of every nation." The human race is one nation by origin, but afterwards separated itself into tribes, peoples, and tongues; hence the one singular stands first, followed by the three plurals, kindreds—Greek, "tribes," people—Greek, "peoples." The "first-fruits unto the Lamb," the 144,000 (ch. 14. 1-4) of Israel, are followed by a copious harvest of all nations, an election out of the Gentiles, as the 144,000 are an election out of Israel (Note, v. 5. white robes—(Note, ch. 6. 11; also ch. 3. 5, 18; 4. 4.) palms in...hands—the antitype to Christ's entry into Jerusalem amidst the palm-bearing multitude. This shall be just when He is about to come visibly and take possession of His kingdom. The palm-branch is the symbol of joy and triumph. It was used at the feast of tabernacles, on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, when they kept feast to God in thanksgiving for the ingathered fruits. The antitype shall be the completed gathering in of the harvest of the elect redeemed here described. Cf. Zechariah, 14. 16, whence it appears that the earthly feast of tabernacles will be renewed, in commemoration of Israel's preservation in her long wilderness-like sojourn among the nations from which she shall now be delivered, just as the original typical feast was to commemorate her dwelling for forty years in booths or tabernacles in the literal wilderness. 10. cried—Greek, "cry," in the three oldest MSS. A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic. It is their continuing, ceaseless employment. Salvation—lit., "THE salvation;" all the praise of our salvation ascribed to our God. At the Lord's entry into Jerusalem, the type, similarly salvation is the cry of the palm-bearing multitudes. Hosanna means save us now: taken from Psalm 118. 25, in which Psalm (14, 15, 22, 26) the same connexion occurs between salvation, the tabernacles of the righteous, and the Jews' cry to be repeated by the whole nation at Christ's coming, "Blessed be He that cometh in the name of the Lord." 11. The angels, as in ch. 5. 11, in their turn take up the anthem of praise. There it was "many angels," here it is "all the angels," stood—"were standing." [ALFORD.] 12. Greek, "The blessing, the glory, the wisdom, the thanksgiving, the honour, the power, the might (the doxology is sevenfold, implying its totality and completeness), unto the ages of the ages." 13. answered—viz., to my thoughts; spoke, asking the question which might have been expected to arise in John's mind from what has gone before. One of the twenty-four elders, representing the Old and New Testament ministry, appropriately acts as interpreter of this vision of the glorified church. What, &c.—Greek order, "These which are arrayed in white robes, who are they?" 14. Sir—Greek, "Lord." B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic versions, and CYPRIAN read, "MY Lord." A omits "My," as English Version, thou knowest—Taken from Ezekiel, 37. 3. Comparatively ignorant ourselves of divine things, it is well for us to look upwards for divinely-communicated knowledge. came—rather as Greek, "come;" implying that they are just come. great tribulation—Greek, "THE great tribulation;" "the tribulation, the great one," viz., the tribulation to which the martyrs were exposed under the fifth seal, the same which Christ foretells as about to precede His coming (Matthew, 24. 21, great tribulation), and followed by the same signs as the sixth seal (Matthew, 24. 29, 30), cf. Daniel, 12. 1: including also retrospectively all the tribulation which the saints of all ages have had to pass through. Thus this seventh chapter is a recapitulation of the vision of the six seals, ch. 6., to fill up the outline there given in that part of it which affects the faithful of that day. There, however, their number was waiting to be completed, but here it is completed, and they are seen taken out of the earth before the judgments on the anti-Christian apostasy: with their Lord, they, and all His faithful witnesses and disciples of past ages, wait for His coming and their coming to be glorified and reign together with Him. Meanwhile, in contrast with their previous sufferings, they are exempt from the hunger, thirst, and scorching heats of their life on earth (v. 16), and are fed and refreshed by the Lamb of God Himself (v. 17; ch. 14. 1-4, 13): an earnest of their future perfect blessedness in both body and soul united (ch. 21. 4-6; 22. 1-6). washed...robes...white in the blood of...Lamb—(ch. 1. 6; Isaiah, 1. 18; Hebrews, 9. 14; 1 John, 1. 7; cf. Isaiah, 61. 10; Zechariah, 3. 3-5.) Faith applies to the heart the purifying blood: once for all for justification, continually throughout the life for sanctification. 15. Therefore—Because they are so washed white; for without it they could never have entered God's holy heaven: ch. 22. 14, "Blessed are those who wash their robes (the oldest MSS. reading) that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city," 15; 21. 27; Ephesians, 5. 26, 27, before—Greek, "in the presence of." Matthew, 5. 8; 1 Corinthians, 13. 12, "face to face." throne...temple—These are connected because we can approach the heavenly King only through priestly mediation; therefore, Christ is at once King and Priest on His throne. day and night—i. e., perpetually: as those approved of as priests by the Sanhedrim were clothed in white, and kept by turns a perpetual watch in the temple at Jerusalem: cf. as to the singers, 1 Chronicles, 9. 33, "day and night;" Psalm 134. 1. Strictly "there is no night" in the heavenly sanctuary (ch. 22. 5), in his temple—in what is the heavenly analogue to His temple on earth, for strictly there is "no temple therein" (ch. 21. 22), "God and the Lamb are the temple" filling the whole, so that there is no distinction of sacred and secular places, the city is the temple, and the temple the city. Cf. ch. 4. 8, "the four living creatures rest not day and night, saying, Holy," &c. shall dwell among them—rather (Greek acrossed et autous), "shall be the tabernacle over them" (cf. ch. 31. 3; Leviticus, 26. 11; especially Isaiah, 4. 5, 6; 54. 12; Ezekiel, 37. 37). His dwelling among them is to be understood as a secondary truth, besides what is expressed, viz., His being their covert. When once He tabernacled among us as the Word made flesh, He was in great lowliness; then He shall be in great glory. 16. (Isaiah, 49. 10.) hunger no more—as they did here, thirst any more—(John, 4. 13.) the sun—literally, scorching in the East. Also, symbolically, the sun of persecution, neither...light—Greek, "by no means at all...light" (fall), i. e., heat—as the sirocco. 17. in the midst of the throne—i. e., in the middle point in front of the throne (ch. 5. 6). feed—Greek, "tend as a shepherd." living fountains of water—A, B, Vulgate, and CYPRIAN read, (eternal) "life's fountains of waters." "Living" is not supported by the old authorities.

CHAPTER VIII.

VER. 1-13. SEVENTH SEAL. PREPARATION FOR THE SEVEN TRUMPETS. THE FOUR FIRST, AND THE CONSEQUENT PLAGUES. 1. was—Greek, "came to pass;" "began to be." silence in heaven about...half an hour—The last seal having been broken open, the book of God's eternal plan of redemption is opened for the Lamb to read to the blessed ones of heaven. The half-hour's silence contrasts with the previous jubilant songs of the great multitude, taken up by the angels (ch. 7. 9-11). It is the solemn introduction to the employments and enjoyments of the eternal Sabbath-rest of the people of God, commencing with the Lamb's reading the book heretofore sealed up, and which we cannot know till then. In ch. 10. 4, similarly at the eve of the sounding of the seventh trumpet, when the seven thunders uttered their voices, John is forbidden to write them. The seventh trumpet (ch. 11. 16-19) winds up God's vast plan of providence and grace in redemption, just as the seventh seal brings it to the same consummation. So also the seventh vial, ch. 16. 17. Not that the seven seals, the seven trumpets, and the seven vials, though parallel, are repetitions. They each trace the course of divine action up to the grand consummation in which they all meet, under a different aspect. Thunders, lightnings, an earthquake, and voices, close the seven thunders and the seven seals alike (cf. ch. 8. 5, with ch. 11. 19). Cf. at the seventh vial, the voices, thunders, lightnings, and earthquake, ch. 16. 18. The half-hour silence is the brief pause given TO JOHN between the preceding vision and the following one, implying, on the one hand, the solemn introduction to the eternal sabbatism which is to follow the seventh seal; and, on the other, the silence which continued during the incense accompanied prayers which usher in the first of the seven trumpets (ch. 8, 3-5). In the Jewish temple, musical instruments and singing resounded during the whole time of the offering of the sacrifices, which formed the first part of the service. But at the offering of incense, solemn silence was kept (Psalm 62, 1. "My soul waiteth upon God." Margin, "is silent;" 65, 1, Margin, the people praying secretly all the time. The half-hour stillness implies, too, the earnest adoring expectation with which the blessed spirits and the angels await the succeeding unfolding of God's judgments. A short space is implied; for even an hour is so used (ch. 17, 12; 18, 10, 19). 2. the seven angels—Cf. the apocryphal Tobit, 12, 15, "I am Raphael, one of the seven holy angels which present the prayers of the saints, and which go in and out before the glory of the Holy one." Cf. Luke, 1, 19, "I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God," stood—Greek, "stand." seven trumpets—These come in during the time whilst the martyrs rest until their fellow-servants also, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled; for it is the inhabitants of the earth on whom the judgments fall, on whom also the martyrs prayed that they should fall (ch. 6, 10). All the ungodly, and not merely some one portion of them, are meant, all the opponents and obstacles in the way of the kingdom of Christ and His saints, as is proved by ch. 11, 15, 18, end, at the close of the seven trumpets. The Revelation becomes more special only as it advances further (ch. 13, 16, 17; 18, 1). By the seven trumpets the world-kingsdoms are overturned to make way for Christ's universal kingdom. The first four are connected together; and the last three, which alone have Woe, woe, woe (c. 7-12). 3. another angel—not Christ, as many think; for He, in Revelation, is always designated by one of His proper titles; though, doubtless, He is the only true High Priest, the Angel of the covenant, standing before the golden altar of incense, and there, as Mediator, offering up His people's prayers, rendered acceptable before God through the incense of His merit. Here the angel acts merely as a ministering spirit, just as the twenty-four elders have vials full of odours, or incense, which are the prayers of saints, and which they present before the Lamb. How precisely their ministry, in perfuming the prayers of the saints and offering them on the altar of incense, is exercised, we know not, but we do know they are not to be prayed to. If we send an offering of tribute to the king, the king's messenger is not allowed to appropriate what is due to the king alone. There was given unto him—The angel does not provide the incense; it is given to him by Christ, whose meritorious obedience and death are the incense, rendering the saints' prayers well-pleasing to God. It is not the saints who give the angel the incense; nor are their prayers identified with the incense; nor do they offer their prayers to him. Christ alone is the Mediator through whom, and to whom, prayer is to be offered. Offer it with the prayers—rather as Greek, "give it to the prayers," so rendering them efficacious as a successful sacrifice to God. Christ's merits alone can thus incense our prayers, though the angelic ministry be employed to attach this incense to the prayers. The saint's praying on earth, and the angel's incensing in heaven, are simultaneous, all saints—The prayers both of the saints in the heavenly rest, and of those militant on earth. The martyrs' cry is the foremost, and brings down the ensuing judgments. golden altar—Antitype to the earthly. 4. the smoke...which came with the prayers...ascended up—rather, "the smoke of the incense FOR (or given to: 'given' being understood from v. 3) the prayers of the saints ascended up, out of the angel's hand, in the presence of God." The angel merely burns the incense given him by Christ the High Priest, so that its smoke blends with the ascending prayers of the saints. The saints themselves are priests; and the angels in this priestly ministrations are but their fellow-servants (ch. 19, 10). 5. cast it into the earth—Cf. unto the earth: the hot coals off the altar cast on the earth, symbolize God's fiery judgments about to descend on the church's foes in answer to the saints' incense-perfumed prayers which have just ascended before God, and those of the martyr. How marvellous the power of the saints' prayers! there were—"there took place," or "ensued," was...thunderings, &c.—5 places the "voices" after "thunderings." A place (after "lightnings," 6. sound—the trumpets). 7. The common feature of the first four trumpets is, the judgments under them affect unholy objects, the accessories of life, the earth, trees, grass, the sea, rivers, fountains, the light of the sun, moon, and stars. The last three, the woe-trumpets (12, 18), affect men's life with pain, death, and hell. The language is evidently drawn from the plagues of Egypt, five or six out of the ten exactly corresponding: the hail, the fire (Exodus, 9, 24), the WATER turned to Blood (Exodus, 7, 19), the darkness (Exodus, 10, 21), the locusts (Exodus, 10, 12), and perhaps the death (ch. 8, 9). Judicial retribution in kind characterizes the afflictions of the four first, those elements which had been abused punishing their abusers, mingled with—A. B. and Fulgite, read, Greek, "...IN blood." So in the case of the second and third vials (ch. 16, 3, 4), upon the earth—Greek, "unto the earth." A. B. Fulgite, and Syriac add, "And the third of the earth was burnt up." So under the third trumpet, the third of the rivers is affected; also, under the sixth trumpet, the third part of men are killed. In Zechariah, 13, 8, 9, this tripartite division appears, but the proportions reversed, two parts killed, only a third preserved. Here, versus, two-thirds escape, one-third is smitten. The fire was the predominant element, all green grass—no longer a third, but all is burnt up. 8. as it were—not literally a mountain: a mountain like burning mass. There is a plain allusion to Jeremiah, 51, 25; Amos, 1, 4. third part of the sea became blood—In the parallel second vial, the whole sea (not merely a third) becomes blood. The overthrow of Jericho, the type of the anti-Christian Babylon, after which Israel, under Joshua (the same name as Jesus), victoriously took possession of Canaan, the type of Christ's and His people's kingdom, is perhaps alluded to in the seven trumpets, which end in the overthrow of all Christ's foes, and the setting up of His kingdom. On the seventh day, at the seventh time, when the sevent priests blew the seven rams' horn trumpets, the people shouted, and the wall fell flat: and then ensued the blood shedding of the foe. A mountain-like fiery mass would not naturally change water into blood; nor would the third part of ships be thereby destroyed. The symbolical interpreters take the ships here to be churches. For the Greek here for ships is not the common one, but that used in the gospels of the apostolic vessel in which Christ taught and the first churches were in the shape of an inverted ship; and the Greek for destroyed is also used of heretical corruptings (1 Timothy, 6, 5). 10. a lamp—a fork. 11. The symbolizers interpret the star fallen from heaven as a chief minister (ARISTUS, according to BULLINGER, BENGEL, &c.; or some future false teacher, if, as is more likely, the event be still (future) falling from his high place in the church, and instead of shining with heavenly light as a star, becoming a torch lit with earthy fire and smouldering with smoke. And wormwood, though medicinal in some cases, if used as ordinary water, would not only be disagreeable to the taste, but also fatal to life: so "heretical wormwood changes the sweet Silos of Scripture into deadly Marahs." [WORDSWORTH.] Contrast the converse change of bitter Marah water into sweet, Exodus, 15, &c. ALFORD gives as an illustration in a physical point of view, the conversion of water into fire-water or ardent spirits, which may yet go on to destroy even as many as a third of the ungodly in the latter days. 12. third part—Not a total obscuration as in the sixth seal (ch. 6. 12, 13). This partial obscuration, therefore, comes between the prayers of the martyrs under the fifth seal, and the last overwhelming judgments on the ungodly under the sixth seal, at the eve of Christ's coming, the night likewise—withdraw a third part of the light which the bright Eastern moon and stars ordinarily afford. 13. an angel—A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic, read for "angel," which is supported by none of the oldest MSS., "an eagle;" the symbol of judgment descending fatally from on high; the king of birds pouncing on the prey. Cf. this fourth trumpet and the flying eagle with the fourth seal introduced by the fourth living creature, "like a flying eagle," ch. 4. 7; 6. 7, 8: the aspect of Jesus as presented by the fourth evangelist. John is compared in the cherubim (according to the primitive interpretation) to a flying eagle: Christ's divine majesty in this similitude is set forth in the Gospel according to John. His judicial visitations in the Revelation of John. Contrast "another angel," or messenger, with "the everlasting gospel," ch. 14. 6. through the midst of heaven—Greek, "in the mid-heaven," i.e., in the part of the sky where the sun reaches the meridian. In such a position as that the eagle is an object conspicuous to all, the inhabitants of the earth—the ungodly, the "men of the world," whose "portion is in this life," upon whom the martyrs had prayed that their blood might be avenged (ch. 6. 10). Not that they sought personal revenge, but their seal was for the honour of God against the foes of God and His church, the other—Greek, "the remaining voices."

CHAPTER IX.

VER. 1-21. THE FIFTH TRUMPET: THE FALLEN STAR OPENS THE ABYSS WHENCE ISSUE LOCUSTS. THE SIXTH TRUMPET. FOUR ANGELS AT THE EUPHRATES LOOSED. 1. The last three trumpets of the seven are called, from ch. 8. 13, the voe-trumpets, fall—rather as Greek, "fallen." When John saw it, it was not in the act of falling, but had fallen already. This is a connecting link of this fifth trumpet with ch. 12. 8, 9, 12, "voe to the inhabitants of the earth, for the devil is come down," &c. Cf. Isaiah, 14. 12, "How art thou fallen from heaven, Lucifer, Son of the Morning!" the bottomless pit—Greek, "the pit of the abyss;" the orifice of the hell where Satan and his demons dwell. 2. upon—Greek, "unto," or "into," as the scorpions of the earth—As contrasted with the "locusts" which come up from hell, and are not "of the earth." have power—viz., to sting. 3. do not hurt the grass...neither...green thing...neither...tree—the food on which they ordinarily prey. Therefore, not natural and ordinary locusts. Their natural instinct is supernaturally restrained to mark the judgment as altogether Divine, those men which—Greek, "the men whosever," in—Greek, "upon their forehead." Thus this fifth trumpet is proved to follow the scaling in ch. 7., under the sixth seal. None of the saints are hurt by these locusts, which is not true of the saints in Mahomet's attack, who is supposed by many to be meant by the locusts; for many true believers fell in the Mahometian invasions of Christendom. 5. they...they—The subject changes; the first "they" is the locusts; the second is the unsealed, five months—the ordinary time in the year during which locusts continue their ravages, their torment—the torment of the sufferers. This fifth verse and v. 6 cannot refer to an invading army. For an army would kill, and not merely torment. 6. shall desire—Greek, "eagerly desire:" set their mind on. shall see—So B, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic read. But A, & read, "Fleeth," viz., continually. In ch. 6. 16, which is at a later stage of God's judgments, the ungodly seek annihilation, not from the torment of their suffering, but from fear of the face of the Lamb before whom they have to stand. 7, prepared unto battle—Greek, "made ready unto war." Cf. Note, Joel, 2. 4, where the resemblance of locusts to horses is traced: the plates of a horse armed for battle are an image on a larger scale of the outer shell of the locust, crowns—(Naham, 3. 17.) ELLIOTT explains this of the turbans of Mahomedans. But how could turbans be "like gold?" ALFORD understands it of the head of the locusts actually ending in a crown shaped fillet which resembled gold in its material, as the faces of men—The "as" seems to imply the locusts here do not mean men. At the same time they are not natural locusts, for these do not sting men (v. 5). They must be supernatural. 8. hair of women—long and flowing. An Arabic proverb compares the antlers of locusts to the hair of girls. KHALD in ALFORD understands the allusion to be to the hair on the legs or bodies of the locusts: cf. "rough caterpillars," Jeremiah, 51. 27, as the teeth of lions—(Joel, 1. 6, as to locusts.) 9. as it were breastplates of iron—not such as forms the thorax of the natural locust, as...chariots—(Joel, 2. 6-7.) battle—Greek, "war." 10. tails like unto scorpions—like unto the tails of scorpions, and there were stings—There is no oldest MS. for this reading. A, B, & Syriac, and Coptic read, "and (they have) stings; and in their tails (is) their power (i.e., authority): authorized power, to hurt," &c. 11. And—So Syriac. But A, B, & omit "and." had—Greek, "have," a king...which is the angel—English Version, agreeing with A, & reads the (Greek) article before "angel," in which reading we must translate, "They have as king over them the angel," &c. Satan (cf. v. 1). Omitting the article with B, we must translate, "They have as king an angel," &c.: one of the chief demons under Satan: I prefer from v. 1, the former, bottomless pit—Greek, "abyss." Abaddon—i.e., perdition or destruction (Job, 16. 6; Proverbs, 27. 20). The locusts are supernatural instruments in the hands of Satan to torment, and yet not kill, the ungodly, under this fifth trumpet. Just as in the case of godly Job, Satan was allowed to torment with elephantiasis, but not to touch his life. In v. 20, these two wo-trumpets are expressly called "plagues." ANDREAS of Caesarea, A.D. 500, held, in his Commentary on Revelation, that the locusts mean evil spirits again permitted to come forth on earth and afflict men with various plagues. 12. Greek, "The one who," hereafter—Greek, "after these things." I agree with ALFORD, DE BURGH, &c., that these locusts from the abyss refer to judgments about to fall on the ungodly immediately before Christ's second advent. None of the interpretations which regard them as past, are satisfactory. Joel, 1. 2; 2. 1-11, is strictly parallel, and expressly refers (2. 11) to the DAY OF THE LORD GREAT AND VERY TERRIBLE: v. 10. gives the portents accompanying the day of the Lord's coming, the earth quaking, the heavens trembling, the sun, moon, and stars, withdrawing their shining: v. 18, 31, 32, also point to the immediately succeeding deliverance of Jerusalem: cf. also, the previous last conflict in the valley of Jehoshaphat, and the dwelling of God thenceforth in Zion, blessing Judah. DE BURGH confines the locust-judgment to the Israelite land, even as the sealed in ch. 7. are Israelites: not that there are not others sealed as elect in the earth; but that the judgment being confined to Palestine, the sealed of Israel alone needed to be expressly excepted from the visitation. Therefore, he translates throughout, "THE LAND" (i.e., of Israel and Judah), instead of "the earth." I incline to agree with him, 13. a voice—i.e., "one voice." from—Greek, "out of." the four horses—A, Vulgate (Amanianus MSS.), Coptic, and Syriac, omit "four." B and CYPRIAN support it. The four horns together gave forth their voice, not diverse, but one. God's revelation, i.e., the gospel,

God's purposes, not to be fully read till the final consummation. This other, a less book, contained only a portion which John was now to make his own (v. 9, 11), and then to use in prophesying to others. The New Testament begins with the word "book" (Greek biblos), of which "the little book" (Greek biblaridion) is the diminutive, "the little bible," the Bible in miniature. upon the sea...earth—Though the beast with seven heads is about to arise out of the sea (ch. 13, 1), and the beast with two horns like a lamb (ch. 13, 11) out of the earth, yet it is but for a time, and that time shall no longer be (v. 6, 7) when once the seventh trumpet is about to sound: the angel with his right foot on the sea, and his left on the earth, claims both as God's, and as about soon to be cleared of the usurper and his followers. 2. As...lion—Christ, whom the angel represents, is often so symbolised (ch. 6, 4, "the Lion of the tribe of Juda"), seven thunders—Greek, "the seven thunders." They form parts of the apocalyptic symbolism; and so are marked by the artists as well known. Thus thunders marked the opening of the seventh seal (ch. 8, 1, 6); so also at the seventh vial (ch. 16, 17, 18). WORDSWORTH calls this the prophetic use of the article: "the thunders, of which more hereafter." Their full meaning shall be only known at the grand consummation marked by the seventh seal, the seventh trumpet (ch. 11, 19), and the seventh vial, uttered their—Greek, "spake their own voices," i.e., voices peculiarly their own, and not now revealed to men. 4. When...reads, " whatsoever things." But most MSS. support English Version, uttered their voices—A, B, C, omit "their voices." Then translate, "Had spoken," into me—Omitted by A, B, C, g, Syriac, seal up—The opposite command to ch. 22, 10. Even though at the time of the end the things sealed in Daniel's time were to be revealed, yet not so the voices of these thunders. Though heard by John, they were not to be imparted by him to others in this book of Revelation: so terrible are they that God in mercy withholds them, since "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." The godly are thus kept from morbid ponderings over the evil to come; and the ungodly are not driven by despair into utter wrecklessness of life. ALFORD adds another aim in concealing them, viz., "godly fear, seeing that the arrows of God's quiver are not exhausted." Besides the terrors foretold, there are others unutterable and more horrifying lying in the background. 5. lifted up his hand—So A and Vulgate read. But B, C, g, Syriac, Coptic, "...his right hand." It was customary to lift up the hand towards heaven, appealing to the God of truth, in taking a solemn oath. There is in this part of the vision an allusion to Daniel, 12. Cf. v. 4, with Daniel, 12, 4, 9; and this v. 6, 8, end, with Daniel, 12, 7. But there the angel clothed in linen, and standing upon the waters, swars "a time, times, and a half," were to interpose before the consummation: here, on the contrary, the angel standing with his left foot on the earth, and his right upon the sea, swears there shall be time no longer. There he lifted up both hands to heaven; here he has the little book now open (whereas in Daniel the book is sealed) in his left hand (v. 8), and he lifts up only his right hand to Heaven. 6. liveth for ever and ever—Greek, "liveth unto the ages of the ages" (cf. Daniel, 12, 7), created heaven...earth...sea, &c.—This detailed designation of God as the Creator, is appropriate to the subject of the angel's oath, viz., the consummating of the mystery of God (v. 7), which can surely be brought to pass by the same Almighty power that created all things, and by none else. that there should be time no longer—Greek, "that time (i.e., an interval of time) no longer shall be." The martyrs shall have no longer a time to wait for the accomplishment of their prayers for the purification of the earth by the judgments which shall remove their and God's foes from it (ch. 6, 11). The appointed season or time of delay is at an end (the same Greek is here as in ch. 6, 11, chronos). Not as English Version implies. Time shall end and eternity begin. 7. But—Connected with v. 6. "There shall be no longer time (i.e., delay), but in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he is about to (so the Greek) sound his trumpet (so the Greek, then (lit., also; which conjunction often introduces the consequent member of a sentence) the mystery of God is finished." lit., has been finished: the prophet regarding the future as certain as if it were past. A, C, g, and Coptic, read the past tense (Greek elesthe). B reads, as English Version, the future (Greek elesthee), "should be finished" (cf. ch. 11, 15-18). Sweet consolation to the waiting saints! The seventh trumpet shall be sounded without further delay. the mystery of God—the theme of the "little book," and so of the remainder of the Apocalypse. What a grand contrast to the "mystery of iniquity—Babylon." The mystery of God's scheme of redemption, once hidden in God's secret counsels, and dimly shadowed forth in types and prophecies, but now more and more clearly revealed according as the gospel-kingdom develops itself, up to its fullest consummation at the end. Then finally His servants shall praise Him most fully, for the glorious consummation of the mystery in having taken to Himself and His saints the kingdom so long usurped by Satan and the ungodly. Thus this verse is an anticipation of ch. 11, 15-18, declared to—Greek, "declared the glad tidings to." "The mystery of God" is the gospel glad tidings. The office of the prophets is to receive the glad tidings from God, in order to declare them to others. The final consummation is the great theme of the gospel announced to, and by the prophets (cf. Galatians, 3, 8). 8. spake...and said—So Syriac and Coptic read. But A, B, C, "I heard again speaking with me, and saying" (Greek taloustan... legoustan), little book—So g and B read. But A, C, "the book." 9. Greek, "I went away." John here leaves heaven, his standing-point of observation heretofore, to be near the angel standing on the earth and sea. Give—A, B, C, and Vulgate read the infinitive, "Telling him to give," eat it up—appropriate its contents so entirely as to be assimilated with (as food), and become part of itself, so as to impart them the more vividly to others. His finding the roll sweet to the taste at first, is because it was the Lord's will he was doing, and because, divesting himself of carnal feeling, he regarded God's will as always agreeable, however bitter might be the message of judgment to be announced. Cf. Psalm 40, 8, Martin, as to Christ's inner complete appropriation of God's word. They bally bitter—Parallel to Ezekiel, 2, 10, "There was written therein lamentations, and mourning, and woe," as honey—(Psalm 19, 10; 119, 103.) Honey sweet to the mouth, sometimes turns into bile in the stomach. The thought that God would be glorified (ch. 11, 3-5, 11-18) gave him the sweetest pleasure. Yet, afterwards the belly, or carnal natural feeling, was embittered with grief at the prophecy of the coming bitter persecutions of the church (ch. 11, 7-10), cf. John, 16, 1, 2. The revelation of the secrets of futurity is sweet to one at first, but bitter and distasteful to our natural man, when we learn the cross which is to be borne before the crown shall be won. John was grieved at the coming apostasy and the sufferings of the church at the hands of Antichrist. 10. the little book—So A, C. But B, g, and Vulgate, "the book," was bitter—Greek, "was embittered." 11. he said—A, B, and Vulgate read, "they say unto me": an indefinite expression for "it was said unto me." Thou must—The obligation lies upon thee, as the servant of God, to prophesy at His command, again—as thou didst already in the previous part of this book of Revelation, before—rather as Greek (epi laois), "concerning many peoples," &c., viz., in their

...tailed mountains, ch. 13, 1, 11, 17, 2; also ch. 8, "the great city," with ch. 18, 17, 1, 5; 19, 1, and the angel's reed—Oratio I in A. Leviticus and Leptis. Supported by B and Syriac. If it be omitted, the reed will, in construction, agree with "saying." So Wordsworth takes it. The reed, the canon of Scripture, the measuring reed of the church, our rule of faith, speaks. So in ch. 18, 7, the altar is personified as speaking (cf. Note there). The Spirit speaks in the canon of Scripture (the word canon is derived from Hebrew kanah, "a reed," the word here used; and John it was who completed the canon). So VICTORINUS, AQUINAS, and VITRINOVA. "Like a reed, viz., straight; like a rod of iron (ch. 2, 27), unbending, destroying all error, and that "cannot be broken." (Ch. 2, 27; Hebrews, 1, 8, Greek, "a rod of straightness," English Version), "a sceptre of righteousness;" this is added to guard against its being thought that the reed was one "shaken by the wind." In the abrupt style of the Apocalypse, "saying" is possibly indefinite, put for "one said." Still WORDSWORTH'S view agrees best with the Greek. So the ancient commentator, ANDREAS of Caesarea, in the end of the fifth century (cf. Note, v. 3, 4), the temple—Greek naos (as distinguished from the Greek hieron, or temple in general), the holy place, "the sanctuary," the altar—of incense; for it alone was in the sanctuary (Greek naos). The measurement of the holy place seems to me to stand parallel to the sealing of the elect of Israel under the sixth seal. God's elect are symbolized by the sanctuary at Jerusalem (1 Corinthians, 3, 16, 17, where the same Greek word naos occurs for "temple," as here). Literal Israel in Jerusalem, and with the temple restored (Ezekiel, 40, 3, 4, where also the temple is measured with the measuring reed, 41., 42., 43., 44.), shall stand at the head of the elect church. The measuring implies at once the exactness of the proportions of the temple to be restored, and the definite completeness (not one being wanting) of the numbers of the Israelite, and of the Gentile elections. The literal temple at Jerusalem shall be the

...the Gentiles.—In the wider sense, there "the times of the Gentiles," where "troubled down of the Gentiles," as the 21, 21, proves: for the same word is in Job 41, "I tread under foot." Cf. also Isaiah, 63, 15, forty...two months—ch. 1, period as Daniel's "time, times, and a and a, and ch. 12, 6, the woman a wilderness "a thousand two hundred days." In the wider sense, we may year-day theory of 1260 years (on which rule of 1260 years, see my Notes, Daniel 11), or rather, regard the 1260 days (12 days (Daniel, 12, 11, 12), 1260 days, as symbolical of the long period of the whether dating from the subversion theocracy at the Babylonian captivity having been never since restored to the last destruction of Jerusalem intending to the restoration of the theocracy of Him "whose right it is;" the fully cleared up till the grand consummation, meanwhile, our duty and privilege was gate them. Some one of the epochs as may be right, but as yet it is uncertain the Gentile monarchies during Israel's punishment, will probably, in the near be succeeded by the much more real the personal Antichrist's tyranny in the long years of papal misrule may the short time of the man of sin, who sit in himself all the apostasy, persecution various forerunning antichrists, Antioch Popery, just before Christ's advent. If THE RECAPITULATION and open consummation "mystery of iniquity" so long leave Witnessing churches may be followed individuals, the former occupying the longer the shorter period. The three and a half years of the forty-two sojournings (Numbers, 33. 1-50) in the wilderness, as contrasted with the Sabbath rest in Canaan: reminding the church that here, in the world-wilderness, she cannot look for her Sabbath rest. Also, three and a half years was the period of the heaven being shut up, and of consequent famine in Elias' time. Thus, three and a half represented to the church the idea of toil, pilgrimage, and persecution. 3. I will give power—There is no "power" in the Greek, so that "give" must mean "give commission," or some such word. my two witnesses—Greek, "the two witnesses of me." The article implies that the two were well known at least to John. prophesy—preach under the inspiration of the Spirit, denouncing judgments against the apostate. They are described by symbol as "the two olive trees" and "the two candlesticks," or lamp-stands, "standing before the God of the earth." The reference is to Zechariah, 4. 3, 12, where two individuals are meant, Joshua and Zerubbabel, who ministered to the Jewish church, just as the two olive trees emptied the oil out of themselves into the bowl of the candlestick. So in the final apostasy God will raise up two inspired witnesses to minister encouragement to the afflicted, though sealed, remnant. As two candlesticks are mentioned v. 4, but only one in Zechariah, 4. 1, I think the twofold church, Jewish and Gentile, may be meant by the two candlesticks represented by the two witnesses: just as in ch. 7, there are described first the sealed of Israel, then those of all nations. But see Note, v. 4. The actions of the two witnesses are just those of Moses when witnessing for God against Pharaoh (the type of Antichrist, the last and greatest foe of Israel, turning the waters into blood, and smiting with plagues; and of Elijah (the witness for God in an almost universal apostasy of Israel, a remnant of 7000, however, being left, as the 144,000 sealed, ch. 7.) causing fire by his word to devour the enemy, and shutting heaven, so that it rained not for three years and six months, the very time (1200 days) during which the two witnesses prophesy. Moreover, the words "witness" and "prophesy" are usually applied to individuals, not to abstractions (cf. Psalm 62. 8). DE BURGH thinks Elijah and Moses will again appear, as Malachi, 4. 5, 6 seems to imply (cf. Matthew, 17. 11; Acts, 3. 21). Moses and Elijah appeared with Christ at the transfiguration, which foreshadowed His coming millennial kingdom. As to Moses, cf. Deuteronomy, 34. 5, 6; Jude, 9. Elias' genius and mode of procedure bears the same relation to the second coming of Christ, that John the Baptist's did to the first coming. [BEN-GUR.] Many of the early church thought the two witnesses to be Enoch and Elijah. This would avoid the difficulty of the dying a second time, for these have never yet died; but, perhaps, shall be the witnesses slain. Still, the turning the water to blood, and the plagues (v. 6), apply best to Moses (cf. ch. 15. 3, "the song of Moses"). The transfiguration-story of Moses and Elias was not their permanent resurrection-state, which shall not be till Christ shall come to glorify His saints, for He has precedence before all in rising. An objection to this interpretation is, that those blessed departed servants of God would have to submit to death (v. 7. 8), and this in Moses' case a second time, which Hebrews, 9. 27 denies. See my Note, Zechariah, 4. 11, 12, on the two witnesses as answering to "the two olive trees." The two olive trees are channels of the oil feeding the church, and symbols of peace. The Holy Spirit is the oil in them. Christ's witnesses, in remarkable times of the church's history, have generally appeared in pairs: as Moses and Aaron, the inspired civil and religious authorities; Caleb and Joshua; Ezekiel the priest, and Daniel the prophet; Zerubbabel and Joshua. in sackcloth—The garment of prophets, especially when calling people to mortification of their sins, and to repentance. Their very exterior aspect accorded with their teachings: so Elijah, and John who came in his spirit and power. The sackcloth of the witnesses is a catchword linking this episode under the sixth trumpet, with the sun black as sackcloth (in righteous retribution on the apostates who rejected God's witnesses) under the sixth seal (ch. 6. 12). 4. standing before the God of the earth—A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS read "Lord" for "God;" so Zechariah, 4. 14. Ministering to (Luke, 1. 16, and as in the sight of, Him who, though now so widely disowned on earth, is its rightful King, and shall at last be openly recognised as such (v. 16). The phrase alludes to Zechariah, 4. 10, 14, "the two anointed ones that stand by the Lord of the whole earth." The article "the" marks this allusion. They are "the two candlesticks," not that they are the church, the one candlestick, but as its representative light-bearers (Greek, Philippians, 2. 15, phoetores), and ministering for its encouragement in a time of apostasy. WORDSWORTH'S view is worth consideration, whether it may not constitute a secondary sense: the two witnesses, the olive trees, are THE TWO TESTAMENTS ministering their testimony to the church of the old dispensation, as well as to that of the new, which explains the two witnesses being called also the two candlesticks (the Old and New Testament churches: the candlestick in Zechariah, 4. 1 is but one, as there was then but one testament, and one church, the Jewish). The church in both dispensations has no light in herself, but derives it from the Spirit through the witness of the twofold word, the two olive trees: cf. (NOTE) v. 1, which is connected with this, the Scripture canon, being the measure of the church: so PRIMASTIUS X., p. 314: "the two witnesses preach in sackcloth, marking the ignominious treatment which the word, like Christ Himself, receives from the world. So the twenty-four elders represent the ministers of the two dispensations by the double twelve. But v. 7 proves that primarily the two testaments cannot be meant: for these shall never be "killed," and never "shall have finished their testimony" till the world is finished. 5. will hurt—Greek, "wishes," or "desires to hurt them." θεοειδωρον—(Cf. Jeremiah, 5. 14; 23. 29.) out of their mouth—Not literally: but God makes their inspired denunciations of judgment to come to pass and devour their enemies, if any man will hurt them—Twice repeated, to mark the immediate certainty of the accomplishment. In this manner—so in like manner as he tries to hurt them (cf. ch. 13. 10). Retribution in kind. 6. These...power—Greek, "authorized power." It rain not—Greek huetos brechee, "rain shower not," lit., "moisten not" (the earth), smite...with all plagues—Greek, "with lit., in every plague." 7. finished their testimony—The same verb is used of Paul's ending his ministry by a violent death, the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit—Greek, "the wild beast...the abyss." This beast was not mentioned before, yet he is introduced as "the beast," because he had already been described by Daniel (7. 3, 11), and he is fully so in the subsequent part of the Apocalypse, viz. ch. 13. 1; 17. 8. Thus, John at once appropriates the Old Testament prophecies; and, also, viewing his whole subject at a glance, mentions as familiar things (though not yet so to the reader) objects to be described hereafter by himself. It is a proof of the unity that pervades all Scripture. make war against them—alluding to Daniel, 7. 21, where the same is said of the little horn that sprang up among the ten horns on the fourth beast. 8. dead bodies—So Vulgate, Syriac and ANDREAS. But A, B, C, the oldest MSS, and Coptic read the singular, "dead body." The two fallen in one cause are considered as one. the great city—Eight times in the Revelation elsewhere. the use of BABYLON (ch. 14. 8; 16. 19; 17. 18; 18. 16, 18, 19, 21). In ch. 21. 10 (English Version as to the new Jerusalem), the oldest MSS. omit "the great" before

The difficulty is, how can Jerusalem be called "the great city," i.e., Babylon? By her being the world's capital of idolatry-apostasy, such as Babylon originally was, and then Rome has been; just as she is here called also "Sodom and Egypt," also our—A. B. C. ORIGEN, ANDREAS, &c., read, "also there." Where their Lord also, as well as they, was slain. In the wider sense, in the Church-historical period, the church being the sanctuary, all outside of it is the world, the great city, wherein all the martyrdoms of saints have taken place. Babylon marks its idolatry, Egypt its tyranny, Sodom its desperate corruption, Jerusalem its pretensions to sanctity on the ground of spiritual privileges, whilst all the while it is the murderer of Christ in the person of His members. place. Cf. 666 in ch. 13, 18, "the number of the beast" tenth part of the city fell—i.e., of "the great city" (ch. 18, 19; Zechariah, 14, 2). Ten is the number of the world-kingsdoms (ch. 17, 10-12), and the beast's horns (ch. 13, 1), and the dragon's (ch. 12, 3). Thus, in the Church-historical view, it is hereby implied, that one of the ten apostate world-kingsdoms fall. But in the narrower view a tenth of Jerusalem under Antichrist falls. The nine-tenths remain, and become when purified the centre of Christ's earthly kingsdom, of men—Greek, "names of men." The men are as accurately enumerated as if their names were given, seven thousand—ELLIOTT interprets seven chiliads or provinces, i.e., the seven Dutch united provinces lost to the papacy; and "names of men," titles of dignity, duchies, lordships, &c. Rather, seven thousand combines the two mystical perfect and comprehensive numbers seven and thousand, implying the full and complete destruction of the impenitent, the remnant—consisting of the Israelite inhabitants not slain. Their conversion forms a blessed contrast to ch. 16, 9; and above, ch. 9, 20, 31. Those repenting (Zechariah, 13, 10-14; 13, 1) become in the flesh the loyal subjects of Christ reigning over the earth with His transfigured saints, gave glory to the God of heaven—which whilst apostates, and worshipping the beast's image, they had not done. God of heaven—The apostates of the last days, in pretended scientific enlightenment, recognise no heavenly power, but only the natural forces in the earth which come under their observation. His receiving up into heaven the two witnesses who had power during their time on earth to shut heaven from raining (v. 6), constrained His and their enemies who witnessed it, to acknowledge the God of heaven to be God of the earth (v. 4). As in v. 4 He declared Himself to be God of the earth by His two witnesses, so now He proves Himself to be God of heaven also. 14. The second woe—That under the sixth trumpet (ch. 9, 12-21); including also the prophecy ch. 11, 1-13: Woe to the world, joy to the faithful, as their redemption draweth nigh, the third woe cometh quickly—It is not mentioned in detail for the present, until first there is given a sketch of the history of the origination, suffering, and faithfulness of the church in a time of apostasy and persecution. Instead of the third woe being detailed, the grand consummation is summarily noticed, the thanksgiving of the twenty-four elders in heaven for the establishment of Christ's kingsdom on earth, attended with the destruction of the destroyers of the earth. 15. Sounded—with his trumpet. Evidently "the LAMT trumpet." Six is close to seven, but does not reach it. The world-judgments are complete in six, but by the fulfilment of seven, the world-kingsdoms become Christ's. Six is the number of the world given over to judgment. It is half of twelve, the church's number, as three and a half is half of seven, the Divine number for completeness. BERGEL thinks the angel here to have been Gabriel, which name is compounded of El GOD, and Geber MIGHTY MAN (ch. 10, 1). Gabriel therefore appropriately announced to Mary the advent of the mighty God-man; of the account of the man-child's birth which follows (ch. 12, 1-6), to which this forms the transition, though the seventh trumpet in time is subsequent, being the consummation of the historical episode chs. 12, and 13. The seventh trumpet, like the seventh seal and seventh vial, being the consummation, is accompanied differently from the preceding six: not the consequences which follow on earth, but those in HEAVEN, are set before us, the great voices and thanksgiving of the twenty-four elders in heaven, as the half-hour's silence in heaven at the seventh seal, and the coign out of the temple in heaven. "It is done," at the seventh vial. This is parallel to Daniel, 2, 44, "The God of heaven shall set up a kingsdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingsdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break to pieces all these kingsdoms, and it shall stand for ever." It is the setting up of heaven's sovereignty over the earth visibly, which, when invisibly exercised, was rejected by the earthly rulers heretofore. The distinction of worldly and spiritual shall then cease. There will be no beast in opposition to the woman. Poetry, art, science, and social life will be at once worldly and Christian. kingsdoms—A, B, C, Vulgates read the singular. "The kingsdom (sovereignty) of (over) the world is our Lord's, and His Christ's." There is no good authority for English Version reading. The kingsdoms of the world give way to the kingsdom of (over) the world exercised by Christ. The earth-kingsdoms are many: His shall be one. The appellation "Christ," the Anointed, is here, where His kingsdom is mentioned, appropriately for the first time used in Revelation. For it is equivalent to KING. Though priests and prophets also were anointed, yet this term is peculiarly applied to Him as King, inasmuch that "the Lord's anointed" is His title as KING, in places where He is distinguished from the priests. The glorified Son of man shall rule mankind by His transfigured church in heaven, and by His people Israel on earth: Israel shall be the priestly mediator of blessings to the whole world, realizing them first, he—Not emphatical in the Greek, shall reign for ever and ever—Greek, "unto the ages of the ages." Here begins the millennial reign, the consummation of "the mystery of God" (ch. 10, 7), 16, before God—B and SYRIAC read, "before the throne of God." But A, C, Vulgate, and Coptic read as English Version, seats—Greek, "thrones," 17, thanks—for the answer to our prayers (ch. 6, 10, 11) in destroying them which destroy the earth (v. 18), thereby preparing the way for setting up the kingsdom of thyself and thy saints, and art to come—Omitted in A, B, C, Vulgate, SYRIAC, CYPRIAN, and ANDREAS. The consummation having actually come, they do not address Him as they did when it was still future, "Thou that art to come." Cf. v. 18, "is come." From the sounding of the seventh trumpet He is to His people JAH, the ever-present Lord WHO IS, more peculiarly than JEHOVAH "who is, was, and is to come," taken to the thy great power—"to thee" is not in the Greek. Christ takes to Him the kingsdom as His own of right, 18, the nations were angry—Alluding to Psalm 96, 1, LXX, "The Lord is become King: let the peoples become angry." Their anger is combined with alarm (Exodus, 15, 14; 2 Kings, 19, 25, 28, "thy rage against me is come up into mine ears, I will put my hook in thy nose," &c.). Translate, as the Greek is the same, "The nations were angered, and thy anger is come." How petty man's impotent anger, standing here side by side with that of the omnipotent God! dead...be judged—Proving that this seventh trumpet is at the end of all things, when the judgment on Christ's foes, and the reward of His servants, long prayed for by His saints, shall take place, the prophets—as, for instance, the two prophesying witnesses (v. 3), and those who have showed them kindness for Christ's sake, Jesus shall come to effect by His presence that which we have looked for long, but vainly, in His absence, and by other means, destroy them which destroy the earth—Retribution in kind (cf. ch. 16, 6; Luke, 19, 27). Daniel, 7, 14-18, my Notes, 19. A similar solemn conclusion to that of the seventh seal, ch. 8, 6, and to that of the seventh vial, ch. 16, 18. Thus, it appears, the seven seals, the seven trumpets, and the seven vials, are not consecutive, but parallel, and ending in the same consummation. They present the unfolding of God's plans for bringing about the grand end under three different aspects, mutually complementing each other, the temple—the sanctuary or Holy place (Greek name), not the whole temple (Greek hieron), opened in heaven—A, C read the article, "the temple of God which is in heaven, was opened," the ark of his testament—or "... His covenant." As in the first verse the earthly sanctuary was measured, so here its heavenly antitype is laid open, and the antitype above to the ark of the covenant in the holiest place below is seen, the pledge of God's faithfulness to His covenant in saving His people, and punishing their and His enemies. Thus this forms a fit close to the series of trumpet-judgments, and an introduction to the episode (ch. 12. and 13.) as to His faithfulness to His church. Here first His secret place, the heavenly sanctuary, is opened for the assurance of His people; and thence proceed His judgments in their behalf (ch. 14. 15, 17; 16. 2; 16. 17, which the great company in heaven laud as "true and righteous." This then is parallel to the scene at the heavenly altar, at the close of the seals and opening of the trumpets (ch. 8. 3, and at the close of the episode (chs. 12-15.) and opening of the vials (ch. 16. 7, 8). See Note at the opening of next chapter.

CHAPTER XII.

VER. 1-17. VISION OF THE WOMAN, HER CHILD, AND THE PERSECUTING DRAGON. 1. This episode (chs. 12, 13, 14, and 15.) describes in detail the persecution of Israel and the elect church by the beast, which had been summarily noticed, ch. 11. 7-10, and the triumph of the faithful, and torment of the unfaithful. So also chs. 16-20. are the description in detail of the judgments on the beast, &c., summarily noticed in ch. 11. 13, 15. The beast in v. 3, &c., is shown not to be alone, but to be the instrument in the hand of a greater power of darkness, Satan. That this is so, appears from the time of ch. 11. being the period also in which the events of chs. 12. and 13. take place, viz., 1260 days (v. 6, 14; ch. 13. 5; cf. ch. 11. 2, 3). great—in size and significance, wonder—Greek, "sign;" significant of momentous truths, in heaven—not merely the sky, but the heaven beyond just mentioned, ch. 11. 19; cf. v. 7-9. woman clothed with the sun, moon under her feet—The church, Israel first, and then the Gentile church: clothed with Christ, "the Sun of righteousness." "Fair as the moon, clear as the sun." Clothed with the Sun, the church is the bearer of Divine supernatural light in the world. So the seven churches (i.e., the church universal, the woman) are represented as light bearing candlesticks (ch. 1.). On the other hand, the moon, though standing above the sea and earth, is altogether connected with them, and is an earthly light; sea, earth, and moon represent the worldly element, in opposition to the kingdom of God—heaven, the sun. The moon cannot disperse the darkness and change it into day: thus she represents the world-religion (heathenism) in relation to the supernatural world. The church has the moon, therefore, under her feet; but the stars, as heavenly lights, on her head. The Devil directs his efforts against the stars, the angels of the churches, about hereafter to shine forever. The twelve stars, the crown around her head, are the twelve tribes of Israel. [AUBRELL.] The allusions to Israel before accord with this: cf. ch. 11. 19, "the temple of God;" "the ark of His testament." The ark, lost at the Babylonian captivity, and never since found, is seen in the "temple of God opened in heaven," signifying that God now enters again into covenant with His ancient people. The woman cannot mean, literally, the virgin mother of Jesus, for she did not flee into the wilderness and stay there for 1260 days, whilst the dragon persecuted the remnant of her seed (v. 13-17). [DE BURON.] The sun, moon, and twelve stars, are emblematic of Jacob, Leah, or else Rachel, and the twelve patriarchs, i.e., the Jewish church; secondarily, the church universal, having under her feet, in due subordination, the ever changing moon, which shines with a borrowed light, emblem of the Jewish dispensation, which is now in a position of inferiority, though supporting the woman, and also of the changeful things of this world; and having on her head the crown of twelve stars, the twelve apostles, who, however, are related closely to Israel's twelve tribes. The church, in passing over into the Gentile world, is (1.) persecuted, (2.) then seduced, as heathenism begins to react on her. This is the key to the meaning of the symbolic woman, beast, harlot, and false prophet. Woman and beast form the same contrast as the Son of man and the beasts in Daniel. As the Son of man comes from heaven, so the woman is seen in heaven (v. 1). The two beasts arise respectively out of the sea (cf. Daniel, 7. 3) and the earth (ch. 13. 1, 11): their origin is not of heaven, but of earth earthly. Daniel beholds the heavenly Bridegroom coming visibly to reign. John sees the woman, the Bride, whose calling is heavenly, in the world, before the Lord's coming again. The characteristic of woman, in contradistinction to man, is her being subject; the surrendering of herself, her being receptive. This similarly is man's relation to God, to be subject to, and receive from, God. All antonomy of the hum an spirit reverses man's relation to God. Woman-like receptivity towards God constitutes faith. By it the individual becomes a child of God: the children collectively are viewed as "the woman." Humanity, in so far as it belongs to God, is the woman. Christ, the Son of the woman, is in v. 5 emphatically called "the male-child" Greek huios arthen, "male-child". Though born of a woman, and under the law for man's sake. He is also the Son of God, and so the HUSBAND of the church. As Son of the woman, He is "Son of man," as male-child, He is Son of God, and husband of the church. All who imagine to have life in themselves are severed from Him, the source of life, and, standing in their own strength, sink to the level of senseless beasts. Thus, the woman designates universally the kingdom of God; the beast, the kingdom of the world. The woman of whom Jesus was born, represents the Old Testament congregation of God. The woman's travail-pains (v. 2) represent the Old Testament believer's ardent longings for the promised Redeemer. Cf. the joy at His birth Isaiah, 9. 6. As new Jerusalem (called also "the woman," or "wife," ch. 21. 2, 9-12) with its twelve gates is the exalted and transfused church, so the woman with the twelve stars is the church militant. 2. pained—Greek, "tormented" (basanizomena). DE BURON explains this of the bringing in of the first-begotten into the world AGAIN, when Israel shall at last welcome Him, and when "the man-child shall rule all nations with the rod of iron." But there is a plain contrast between the painful travailing of the woman here, and Christ's second coming to the Jewish church, the believing remnant of Israel. "Before she travails she brought forth...A MAN-CHILD", i.e., almost without travail-pains, she receives (at His second advent, as if born to her, Messiah, and a numerous seed, 3. appeared—"was seen." wonder—Greek, "sign" (semeion). red—So A and Vulgate read. But B, C, and Coptic read, "of fire." In either case, the colour of the dragon implies his fiery rage as a murderer from the beginning. His representative, the beast, corresponds, having seven heads and ten horns (the number of horns on the fourth beast of Daniel, 7.), ch. 13. 1. But there, ten crowns are on the ten horns (for, before the end, the fourth empire is divided into ten kingdoms); here, seven crowns (rather, "diadems," Greek diademata, not stephanos, "wreaths") are upon his seven heads. In Daniel, 7., the anti-Christian powers up to Christ's second coming are represented by four beasts, which have among them seven heads, i.e., the first, second, and fourth beasts having one head each, the third, four heads. His universal dominion as prince of this fallen world, is implied by the seven diadems (contrast the "many diadems on Christ's head," ch. 19. 12, when coming to destroy him and his), the caricature of the seven spirits of God. His worldly-instruments of power are marked by the ten horns, ten being the number of the world. It marks his self-contradictions that he and the beast bear both the number seven (the Divine number) and ten (the world number): 4. drew—Greek present, "draweth," "draws down." His dragging down the stars with his tail lashed back and forward in his fury, implies his persuading to apostatize, like himself, and to become earthy, those angels and also once eminent human teachers who had formerly been heavenly (cf. v. 1; ch. 1. 20; Isaiah, 14. 12). stood—"stands" [ALFORD]: perfect, Greek hēsteken. ready to be delivered—"about to bring forth" for to devour, &c.—"that when she brought forth he might devour her child." So the dragon, represented by his agent Pharaoh (a name common to all the Egyptian kings, and meaning, according to some, crocodile, a reptile like the dragon, and made an Egyptian idol), was ready to devour Israel's males at the birth of the nation. Antitypically, the true Israel, Jesus, when born, was sought for destruction by Herod, who slew all the males in and round Bethlehem. 5. man-child—Greek, "a son, a male." On the deep significance of this term, cf. Notes, v. 1, 2. rule—Greek (poimainōn). "tend as a shepherd" (see Note, ch. 2. 27). rod of iron—A rod is for long-continued obstinacy, until they submit themselves to obedience [BENGEL]: ch. 2. 27; Psalm 2. 9, which passages prove the Lord Jesus to be meant. Any interpretation which ignores this must be wrong. The male-son's birth cannot be the origin of the Christian state (Christianity triumphing over heathenism under Constantine), which was not a Divine child of the woman, but had many impure worldly elements. In a secondary sense, the ascending of the witnesses up to heaven answers to Christ's own ascension, "caught up unto God, and unto His throne:" as also His ruling the nations with a rod of iron is to be shared in by believers (ch. 2. 27). What took place primarily in the case of the Divine Son of the woman, shall take place also in the case of those who are one with Him, the sealed of Israel (ch. 7.), and the elect of all nations, about to be translated and to reign with Him over the earth at His appearing. 6. woman fed—Mary's flight with Jesus into Egypt is a type of this, where she hath—So C reads. But A, B add "there," a place—that portion of the heathen world which has received Christianity professedly, viz., mainly the fourth kingdom, having its seat in the modern Babylon, Rome, implying that all the heathen world would not be Christianized in the present order of things. prepared of God—Lit., "from God." Not by human caprice or fear, but by the determined counsel and foreknowledge of God, the woman, the church, fled into the wilderness. they should feed her—Greek, "nourish her." Indefinite for "she should be fed." The heathen world, the wilderness, could not nourish the church, but only afford her an outward shelter. Here, as in Daniel, 4. 26, and elsewhere, the third person plural refers to the heavenly powers who minister from God nourishment to the church. As Israel had its time of first bridal love, on its first going out of Egypt into the wilderness, so the Christian church's wilderness-time of first love was the apostolic age, when it was separate from the Egypt of this world, having no city here, but seeking one to come; having only a place in the wilderness prepared of God (v. 6, 14). The harlot takes the world city as her own, even as Cain was the first builder of a city, whereas the believing patriarchs lived in tents. Then apostate Israel was the harlot, and the young Christian church the woman; but soon spiritual fornication crept in, and the church in ch. 17. is no longer the woman, but the harlot, the great Babylon, which, however, has in it hidden the true people of God (ch. 18. 4). The deeper the church penetrated into heathendom, the more she herself became heathenish. Instead of overcoming, she was overcome by the world. [AUFREGEN.] Thus, the woman is "the one inseparable church of the Old and New Testament" (HENGSTENBERG), the stock of the Christian church being Israel (Christ and His apostles being Jews), on which the Gentile believers have been grafted, and into which Israel, on her conversion, shall be grafted, as into her own olive tree. During the whole Church-historic period, or "times of the Gentiles," wherein "Jerusalem is trodden down of the Gentiles," there is no believing Jewish church, and therefore, only the Christian church can be "the woman." At the same time there is meant, secondarily, the preservation of the Jews during this Church-historic period, in order that Israel, who was once "the woman," and of whom the man-child was born, may become so again at the close of the Gentile times, and stand at the head of the two elections, literal Israel, and spiritual Israel, the church elected from Jews and Gentiles without distinction. Ezekiel, 30. 35, 36, "I will bring you into the wilderness of the people (Hebrew, peoples), and there will I plead with you...like as I pleaded with your fathers in the wilderness of Egypt" (cf. my Note there): not a wilderness literally and locally, but spiritually a state of discipline and trial among the Gentile "peoples," during the long Gentile times, and one finally consummated in the last time of unparalleled trouble under Antichrist, in which the sealed remnant (ch. 7.) who constitute "the woman," are nevertheless preserved "from the face of the serpent" (v. 14). thousand two hundred and threescore days—Anticipatory of v. 14, where the persecution which caused her to flee is mentioned in its place: ch. 13. gives the details of the persecution. It is most unlikely that the transition should be made from the birth of Christ to the last Antichrist, without notice of the long intervening Church-historic period. Probably the 1200 days, or periods, representing this long interval, are RECAPITULATED on a shorter scale analogically during the last Antichrist's short reign. They are equivalent to three and a half years, which, as half of the Divine number seven, symbolize the seeming victory of the world over the church. As they include the whole Gentile times of Jerusalem's being trodden of the Gentiles, they must be much longer than 1200 years; for, above five and a half centuries more than 1200 years have elapsed since Jerusalem fell. 7. In Job. 1. and 2., Satan appears among the sons of God, presenting himself before God in heaven, as the accuser of the saints: again in Zechariah, 3. 1, 2. But at Christ's coming as our Redeemer, he fell from heaven, especially when Christ suffered, rose again, and ascended to heaven. When Christ appeared before God as our Advocate, Satan, the accusing adversary, could no longer appear before God against us, but was cast out judicially (Romans, 5. 33, 34). He and his angels henceforth range through the air and the earth, after a time (viz., the interval between the ascension and the second advent) about to be cast hence also, and bound in hell. That "heaven" here does not mean merely the air, but the abode of angels, appears from v. 9, 10, 12; 1 Kings, 22. 19-22. there was—Greek, "there came to pass," or "arose," war in heaven—What a seeming contradiction in terms, yet true! Contrast the blessed result of Christ's triumph, Luke, 19. 38, "peace in heaven." Colossians, 1. 20, "made peace through the blood of His cross, by Him to reconcile all things unto Himself; whether...things in earth, or things in heaven," Michael and his angels... the dragon... and his angels—It was fittingly ordered that, as the rebellion arose from unfaithful angels and their leader, so they should be encountered and overcome by faithful angels and their archangel, in heaven. On earth they are fittingly encountered, and shall be overcome, as represented by the beast and false prophet, by the Son of man and His armies of human saints (ch. 19. 14-21). The conflict on earth, as in Daniel, 10. has its correspondent conflict of angels in heaven. Michael is peculiarly the prince or preceding angst, of the Jewish nation. The conflict in heaven, though judicially decided already against Satan from the time of Christ's resurrection and ascension, receives its actual completion in the execution of judgment by the angels who cast out Satan from heaven. From Christ's ascension he has no standing-ground judicially against the believing elect. Luke, 10, 18, "I beheld in the earnest of the future full fulfillment given in the subjection of the demons to the disciples Satan as lightning fall from heaven." As Michael fought before with Satan about the body of the Mediator of the old covenant (Jude, 9), so now the Mediator of the new covenant, by offering His sinless body in sacrifice, arms Michael with power to renew and finish the conflict by a complete victory. That Satan is not yet actually and finally cast out of heaven, though the judicial sentence to that effect received its ratification at Christ's ascension, appears from Ephesians, 6, 12, "spiritual wickedness in high (Greek, heavenly) places." This is the primary Church-historical sense here. But, through Israel's unbelief, Satan has had ground against that, the elect nation, appearing before God as its accuser. At the eve of its restoration, in the ulterior sense, his standing-ground in heaven against Israel, too, shall be taken from him. "The Lord that hath chosen Jerusalem rebuking him, and casting him out from heaven actually and for ever by Michael, the prince, or presiding angel of the Jews. Thus Zechariah, 3, 1-9 is strictly parallel, Joshua, the high priest, being representative of his nation Israel, and Satan standing at God's right hand as adversary to resist Israel's justification. Then, and not till then, fully (v. 10, "NOW," &c.) shall ALL things be reconciled unto Christ IN HEAVEN (Colossians, 1, 20), and there shall be peace in heaven (Luke, 19, 38), against—A, B, C read, "with." 8, prevailed not—A and Coptic read, "He prevailed not." But B, C read as English Version, neither—A, B, C read, "not even" (Greek oude): a climax. Not only did they not prevail, but not even their place was found any more in heaven. There are four gradations in the ever deeper downfall of Satan: (1) He is deprived of his heavenly excellency, though having still access to heaven as man's accuser, up to Christ's first coming. As heaven was not fully yet opened to man (John, 3, 13), so it was not yet shut against Satan and his demons. The Old Testament dispensation could not overcome him. (2) From Christ, down to the millennium, he is judicially cast out of heaven as the accuser of the elect, and shortly before the millennium loses his power against Israel, and has sentence of expulsion fully executed on him and his by Michael. His rage on earth is consequently the greater, his power being concentrated on it, especially towards the end, when "he knoweth that he hath but a short time" (v. 12). Primarily fulfilled in part at Jesus' resurrection and ascension, when He said (Matthew, 28, 18), "All power (Greek exousia, 'authority,' as here; see below) is given unto me in heaven and in earth; connected with v. 5, "Her child was caught up unto God and to His throne." In the ulterior sense, it refers to the eve of Christ's second coming, when Israel is about to be restored as mother-church of Christendom, Satan, who had resisted her restoration on the ground of her unworthiness, having been cast out by the instrumentality of Michael, Israel's angelic prince (Note, v. 7).

Thus this is parallel, and the necessary preliminary to the glorious event similarly expressed, ch. 11, 18, "The kingdom of this world is become (the very word here, Greek epoiesen, 'is come,' 'hath come to pass') our Lord's and His Christ's," the result of Israel's resuming her place, salvation, &c.—Greek, "the salvation (em., fully, usually, and victoriously accomplished, Hebrews, 2, 2; cf. Had that blood not been shed, Satan's accusations would have been unanswerable: as it is, that blood meets every charge. SCORRONS mentions the Rabbinical tradition that Satan accuses men all days of the year, except the day of atonement. TITMANN takes the Greek idia, as it often means, id of regard to the blood of the Lamb; this was the compelling cause which induced them to undertake the contest for the sake of it; but the view given above is good Greek, and more in accordance with the general sense of Scripture, by the word of their testimony—Greek, "on account of the word of their testimony." On the ground of their faithful testimony, even unto death, they are constituted victors. Their testimony evinced their victory over him by virtue of the blood of the Lamb. Hereby they confess themselves worshippers of the slain Lamb, and overcome the beast, Satan's representative: an anticipation of ch. 15, 2, "them that had gotten the victory over the beast" (cf. ch. 13, 16, 16). unto—Greek achri, "even as far as" They carried their not-love of life as far as even unto death. 12, Therefore—because Satan is cast out of heaven (v. 9), dwell—id., "tabernacle." "Tabernacle" for dwell is used to mark that, though still on the earth, they in spirit are hidden "in the secret of God's tabernacle." Furious at his expulsion from heaven, and knowing that his time on earth is short until he shall be cast down lower, when Christ shall come to set up His kingdom (ch. 20, 1, 2), Satan concentrates all his power to destroy as many souls as he can. In Daniel, 7, 25; 12, 7, the subject, as perhaps here, is the time of Israel's calamity. That seven times do not necessarily mean seven years, in which each day is a year, i. e., 2520 years, appears from Nebuchadnezzar's seven times (Daniel, 4, 23, answering to Antichrist, the beast's duration, 15, 16, seed—Greek, "river" (cf. But the earth helped the woman, by swallowing up the flood. The earth, as contradicting and from water, is the world consolidated and civilized. The German masses were brought under the influence of Roman civilization and Christianity. [AUBREY LAW.] Perhaps it includes also, generally, the help given by earthly powers (those least likely, yet led by God's overruling providence to give help) to the church against persecutions and also heresies, by which she has been at various times assailed. 17. wrota with—Greek, "ut." west—Greek, "went away." the remnant of her seed—distinct in some sense from the woman herself. Satan's first effort was to root out the Christian church, so that there should be no visible profession of Christianity. Foiled in this, he wars (ch. 11, 7; 12, 7) against the invisible church, viz., "those who keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus" (A, B, C omit "Christ"). These are "the remnant," or rest of her seed, as distinguished from her seed, "the man-child" (v. 6), on one hand, and from mere professors on the other. The church, in her beauty and unity (Israel at the head of Christendom, the whole forming one perfect church), is now not manifested, but awaiting the manifestation of the sons of God at Christ's coming. Unable to destroy Christianity and the church as a whole, Satan directs his enmity against true Christians, the elect remnant: the others he leaves unmolested.

CHAPTER XIII.

VER. 1-18. VISION OF THE BEAST THAT CAME OUT OF THE SEA: THE SECOND BEAST, OUT OF THE EARTH, EXERCISING THE POWER OF THE FIRST BEAST, AND CAUSING THE EARTH TO WORSHIP HIM. 1. I stood—So B, K, and Coptic read. But A, C, Vulgate, and Syriac, "He stood." Standing on the sand of the sea, he gave his power to the beast that rose out of the sea, upon the sand of the sea—where the four winds were to be seen striking upon the great sea (Daniel, 7, 2). beast—Greek, "wild beast." Man becomes "brutish" when he severs himself from God, the archetype and true ideal, in whose image he was first made, which ideal is realized by the man Christ Jesus. Hence the world-powers seeking their own glory, and not God's, are represented as beasts; and Nebuchadnezzar, when in self-dedication he forgot that "the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men," was driven among the beasts. In Daniel, 7, there are four beasts; here the one beast expresses the sum total of the God-opposed world-power viewed in its universal development, not restricted to one manifestation alone, as Rome. This first beast expresses the world-power attacking the church more from without; the second, which is a revival of, and minister to, the first, is the world-power as the false prophet corrupting and destroying the church from within, out of the sea—(Daniel, 7, 3; cf. my Note, ch. 8, 8)—out of the troubled waves of peoples, multitudes, nations, and tongues. The earth (v. 11), on the other hand, means the consolidated, ordered world of nations, with its culture and learning, seven heads and ten horns—A, B, C transpose, "ten horns and seven heads." The ten horns are now put first (contrast the order, ch. 12, 3) because they are crowned. They shall not be so till the last stage of the fourth kingdom (the Roman), which shall continue until the fifth kingdom.

Christ's, shall supplant it and destroy it utterly: this last stage is marked by the ten toes of the two feet of the image in Daniel, 2. The seven implies the world-power setting up itself as God, and caricaturing the seven spirits of God; yet its true character as God-opposed is detected by the number ten accompanying the seven. Dragon and beast both bear crowns, but the former on the heads, the latter on the horns (ch. 12, 3; 13, 1). Therefore, both heads and horns refer to kingdoms: cf. ch. 17, 7, 10, 12, "kings" representing the kingdoms whose heads they are. The seven kings, as peculiarly powerful—the great powers of the world—are distinguished from the ten, represented by the horns (simply called "kings," ch. 17, 12). In Daniel, the ten mean the last phase of the world-power, the fourth kingdom divided into ten parts. They are connected with the seventh head (ch. 17, 12), and are as yet future. [AUBERLES.] The mistake of those who interpret the beast to be Rome exclusively, and the ten horns to mean kingdoms which have taken the place of Rome in Europe already, is, the fourth kingdom in the image has two legs, representing the eastern as well as the western empire: the ten toes are not upon the one foot (the West), as these interpretations require, but on the two (East and West) together, so that any theory which makes the ten kingdoms belong to the West alone must err. If the ten kingdoms meant were those which sprung up on the overthrow of Rome, the ten would be accurately known, whereas twenty-eight different lists are given in so many interpreters, making in all sixty-five kingdoms! (Tyso in DE BURGH.) The seven heads are the seven world-monarchies, Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Greece, Rome, the Germanic empire, under the last of which we live [AUBERLES], and which devolved for a time on Napoleon, after Francis, Emperor of Germany and King of Rome, had resigned the title in 1806. FABER explains the healing of the deadly wound to be the revival of the Napoleonic dynasty after its overthrow at Waterloo. That secular dynasty, in alliance with the ecclesiastical power, the Papacy (p. 11, &c.), being "the eighth head," and yet "of the seven" (ch. 17, 11), will temporarily triumph over the saints, until destroyed in Armageddon (ch. 19). A Napoleon, in this view, will be the Antichrist, restoring the Jews to Palestine, and accepted as their Messiah at first, and afterwards fearfully oppressing them. Antichrist, the summing up and concentration of all the world evil that preceded, is the eighth, but yet one of the seven (ch. 17, 11). crowns—Greek, "diadems," name of blasphemy—So C, Coptic, and ANDREAS, A, B, and Fulgate read, "names," &c., etc., a name on each of the heads; blasphemously arrogating attributes belonging to God alone (cf. Note, ch. 17, 3). A characteristic of the little horn in Daniel, 7, 8, 20, 21; 2 Thessalonians, 2, 4, 2, leopard...lion.—This beast unites in itself the God-opposed characteristics of the three preceding kingdoms, resembling respectively the leopard, bear, and lion. It rises up out of the sea, as Daniel's four beasts, and has ten horns, as Daniel's fourth beast, and seven heads, as Daniel's four beasts had in all, etc., one on the first, one on the second, four on the third, and one on the fourth. Thus it represents comprehensively in one figure the world power (which in Daniel is represented by four) of all times and places, not merely of one period and one locality, viewed as opposed to God: just as the woman is the church of all ages. This view is favoured also by the fact, that the beast is the vicarious representative of Satan, who similarly has seven heads and ten horns: a general description of his universal power in all ages and places of the world. Satan appears as a serpent, as being the archetype of the beast nature (ch. 12, 9). "If the seven heads meant merely seven Roman emperors, one cannot understand why they alone should be mentioned in the original image of Satan, whereas it is perfectly intelligible if we suppose them to represent Satan's power on earth viewed collectively." [AUBERLES.] 3. one of—lit., "from among." wounded...healed—Twice again repeated emphatically (v. 12, 14): cf. ch. 17, 8, 11, "the beast that was, and is not, and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit" (cf. v. 11 below); the Germanic empire, the seventh head, (revived in the eighth), stayed future in John's time (ch. 17, 10). Contrast the change whereby Nebuchadnezzar, being humbled from his self-deifying pride, was converted from his beast-like form and character to MAN'S form and true position towards God: symbolized by his eagle-wings being plucked, and himself made stand upon his feet as a man (Daniel, 7, 4). Here, on the contrary, the beast's head is not changed into a human head, but receives a deadly wound, i. e., the world-kingdom which this head represents, does not truly turn to God, but for a time its God-opposed character remains paralysed ("as it were slain": the very words, marking the beast's onward resemblance to the Lamb "as it were slain," Note, ch. 4, 6. Cf. also the second beast's resemblance to the Lamb, v. 11). Though seemingly slain (Greek for "wounded") it remains the beast still, to rise again in another form (v. 11). The six first heads were heathenish, Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Greece, Rome: the new seventh world-power (the Pagan German hordes pouring down on Christianized Rome), whereby Satan had hoped to stifle Christianity (ch. 11, 15, 16, became itself Christianized (answering to the beast's, as it were, deadly wound: it was slain, and it is not, ch. 17, 11). Its ascent out of the bottomless pit answers to the healing of its deadly wound (ch. 17, 8). No essential change is noticed in Daniel as effected by Christianity upon the fourth kingdom: it remains essentially God-opposed to the last. The beast, healed of its temporary and external wound, now returns, not only from the sea, but from the bottomless pit, whence it draws new anti-Christian strength of hell (v. 2, 11, 12, 14; ch. 11, 7; 17, 8). Cf. the seven evil spirits taken into the temporarily dispossessed, and the last state worse than the first, Matthew, 12, 43-45. A new and worse heathenism breaks in upon the Christianized world, more devilish than the old one of the first heads of the beast. The latter was an apostasy only from the general revelation of God in nature and conscience; but this new one is from God's revelation of love in His Son. It culminates in Antichrist, the man of sin, the son of perdition (cf. ch. 17, 11); 2 Thessalonians, 2, 3; cf. 2 Timothy, 3, 1-4, the very characteristics of old heathenism (Romans, 1, 29-31). [AUBERLES.] More than one wound seems to me to be meant, e. g., that under Constantine (when the Pagan worship of the emperor's image gave way to Christianity), followed by the healing, when image-worship and the other Pagan errors were introduced into the church; again, that at the Reformation, followed by the lethargic form of godliness without the power, and about to end in the last great apostasy, which I identify with the second beast (v. 11). Antichrist, the same seventh world-power in another form, wavered after—followed with wondering gaze. 4. which gave—A, B, C, Fulgate, Syriac, and ANDREAS read, "because he gave," power—Greek, "the authority" which it had: its authority. Who is like unto the beast?—The very language appropriated to God, Exodus, 15, 11 (whence, in the Hebrew, the Maccabees took their name; the opponents of the Old Testament Antichrist, Antiochus; Psalm 33, 10; 71, 19; 111, 5; Micah, 7, 18; blasphemously (v. 1, 5) assigned to the beast. It is a parody of the name "Michael" (cf. ch. 12, 7, meaning, "Who is like unto God?") 5. blasphemies.—So ANDREAS reads, Breads "blasphemy." A, "blasphemous things" (cf. Daniel, 7, 8, 11, 23), power—"authority," legitimate power (Greek exousia, to exousa—Greek, "to act;" or "work" (potestas)). B reads, "to make war" (cf. v. 4). Text A, C, Fulgate, Syriac, and ANDREAS omit "war." forty...two months—(Notes, ch. 11, 2, 3; 12, 6.) 6. opened...mouth—The usual formula in the case of a set speech, or series of speeches. Ver. 6, 7 expand v. 6. blasphemy—So B and ANDREAS. A, C read, "blasphemies," and them—So Vulgate, Coptic, ANDREAS, and PRIMARIUS read. A, C omit "and": "them that dwell (lit., tabernacle) in heaven," mean not only angels, and the departed souls of the righteous, but believers on earth who have their citizenship in heaven, and whose true life is hidden from the anti-Christian persecutor in the secret of God's tabernacle. Note, ch. 12, 12; JOHN, 3, 7. 7. power—Greek, "authority," all kindreds...tongues...nations—Greek, "every tribe...tongue...nation." A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, ANDREAS, and PRIMARIUS add "and people," after "tribe" or "kindred." 8. all that dwell upon the earth—being of earth earthy: in contrast to "them that dwell in heaven," whose names are not written—A, B, C, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS read singular, "every one" whose (Greek how: but B, Greek hon, plural; name is not written." Lamb slain from the foundation of the world—The Greek order of words favours this translation. He was slain in the Father's eternal counsels: cf. 1 Peter, 1, 19-20, virtually parallel. The other way of connecting the words is, "Written from the foundation of the world in the book of life of the Lamb slain." So in ch. 17, 8. The elect. The former is in the Greek more obvious and simple. "Whatever virtue was in the sacrifices, did operate through Messiah's death alone. As He was 'the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world,' so all atonements ever made were only effectual by His blood." (BISHOP PARSONS, Creed, § 9. A general exhortation. Christ's own words of monition calling solemn attention. 10. He that leadeth into captivity—A, B, C, and Vulgate read, "if any one (be) for captivity," shall go into captivity—Greek present, "goeth into captivity." Cf. Jeremiah, 15, 2. which is alluded to here. B, C, B read simply, "he goeth away," and omit "into captivity." But A and Vulgate support the words. he that killeth with the sword, must be killed with the sword—So B, C read. But A reads, "if any (is for) being (lit., to be) killed," &c. As of old, so now, those to be persecuted by the beast in various ways, have their trials severally appointed them by God's fixed counsel. English Version is quite a different sense, viz., a warning to the persecutors that they shall be punished with retribution in kind. Here—Herein: in bearing their appointed sufferings: lies the patient endurance...of the saints. This is to be the motto and watchword of the elect during the period of the world-kingdom. As the first beast is to be met by patience and faith (v. 10), the second beast must be opposed by true wisdom (v. 18). 11. another beast—"the false prophet," out of the earth—out of society civilized, consolidated, and ordered, but still, with all its culture, of earth earthy: as distinguished from "the sea," the troubled agitations of various peoples out of which the world-power and its several kingdoms have emerged. "The sacerdotal persecuting power, Pagan and Christian; the pagan priesthood making an image of the emperors which they compelled Christians to worship, and working wonders by magic and omens; the Romish priesthood, the inheritor of pagan rites, images, and superstitions, lamb-like in Christian professions, dragon-like in word and act" (ALFORD, and so the Spanish Jesuit LACUNZA, writing under the name Ben Ezra). As the first beast was like the Lamb in being, as it were, wounded to death, so the second is like the Lamb in having two lamb-like horns (its essential difference from the Lamb is marked by its having two, but the Lamb SEVEN horns, ch. 5, 6). The former paganism of the world-power, seeming to be wounded to death by Christianity, revives. In its second beast form it is Christianized heathenism ministering to the former, and having earthly culture and learning to recommend it. The second beast's, or false prophet's rise, coincides in time with the healing of the beast's deadly wound and its revival (ch. 13, 13-14). Its manifold character is marked by the Lord, Matthew, 24, 11, 24, "Many false prophets shall rise," where He is speaking of the last days. As the former beast corresponds to the first four beasts of Daniel, so the second beast, or the false prophet, to the little horn starting up among the ten horns of the fourth beast. This anti-Christian horn has not only the mouth of blasphemy (v. 6), but also "the eyes of man" (Daniel, 7, 8): the former is also in the first beast (v. 1, 6), but the latter not so. "The eyes of man" symbolize cunning and intellectual culture, the very characteristic of "the false prophet" (v. 13-15; ch. 16, 14). The first beast is physical and political; the second a spiritual power, the power of knowledge, ideas (the favourite term in the French school of politics), and scientific cultivation. Both alike are beasts, from below, not from above; faithful allies, worldly anti-Christian wisdom standing in the service of the worldly anti-Christian power: the dragon is both lion and serpent; might and cunning are his armoury. The dragon gives his external power to the first beast (v. 2), his spirit to the second, so that it speaks as a dragon (v. 11). The second, arising out of the earth, is in ch. 11, 7, and 17, 8, said to ascend out of the bottomless pit: its very culture and world-wisdom only intensify its infernal character, the pretence to superior knowledge and rationalistic philosophy (as in the primeval temptation, Genesis, 3, 6, 7, "their eyes [as here] were opened") veiling the defilement of nature, self, and man. Hence spring Idealism, Materialism, Deism, Pantheism, Atheism. Antichrist shall be the culmination. The papacy's claim to the double power, secular and spiritual, is a sample and type of the twofold beast, that out of the sea, and that out of the earth, or bottomless pit. Antichrist will be the climax, and final form. PRIMARIUS of Adrumetum, in the sixth century, says, "He feigns to be a lamb that he may assail the Lamb—the body of Christ," 12, power—Greek, "authority," before him—"in his presence," as ministering to, and upholding him. "The non-existence of the beast embraces the whole Germanic Christian period. The healing of the wound, and return of the beast, is represented (in regard to its final anti-Christian manifestation, though including also, meanwhile, its healing and return under Popery, which is baptized heathenism) in that principle which, since 1789, has manifested itself in beast-like outbreaks." (AUBERLEN.) which dwell therein—the earthly-minded. The church becomes the harlot; the world's political power, the anti-Christian beast; the world's wisdom and civilization, the false prophet. Christ's three offices are thus perverted: the first beast is the false kingship; the harlot, the false priesthood; the second beast, the false prophet. The beast is the bodily, the false prophet the intellectual, the harlot the spiritual power of anti-Christianity. (AUBERLEN.) The Old Testament church stood under the power of the beast, the heathen world-power: the middle-age church under that of the harlot; in modern times the false prophet predominates. But in the last days all these God-opposed powers which have succeeded each other shall co-operate, and raise each other to the most terrible and intense power of their nature: the false prophet causes men to worship the beast, and the beast carries the harlot. These three forms of apostasy are reducible to two: the apostate church and the apostate world, pseudo-Christianity and anti-Christianity, the harlot and the beast; for the false prophet is also a beast; and the two beasts, as different manifestations of the same beast-like principle, stand in contradiction to the harlot, and are finally joined together, whereas separate judgment falls on the harlot. (AUBERLEN.) deadly wound—Greek, "wound of death." 13 wonders—Greek, "signs," so that—so great that, maketh fire—Greek, "maketh even fire." This is the very miracle which the two witnesses perform, and which Elijah long ago had performed: this the beast from the bottomless pit, or the false prophet, mimicks. Not merely tricks, but miracles of a demoniacal kind, and by demon aid, like those of the Egyptian magicians, shall be wrought, most calculated to deceive: wrought "after the working (Greek, energy) of Satan," i.e. deceiveth them that dwell on the earth—the earthly-minded, but not the elect. Even a miracle is not enough to warrant belief in a professed revelation, unless that revelation be in harmony with God's already revealed will, by the means of those miracles—rather as Greek, "on account of because of; in consequence of those miracles," which he had power to do—Greek, "which were given him to do," in the sign of the beast—"before him" (v. 12) which—A, B, C read, "who" marking, perhaps, a personal Antichrist. had—So B and ANDREAS read. But A, C, and Vulgate read, "hath." 15, he had power—Greek, "it was given to him," to give life—Greek, "breath," or "spirit" image—Nebuchadnezzar set up in Dura a golden image to be worshipped, probably of himself; for his dream had been interpreted, "Thou art this head of gold?" the three Hebrews who refused to worship the image were cast into a burning furnace. All this typifies the last apostasy. PLINY, in his letter to TRAJAN, states that he consigned to punishment those Christians who would not worship the emperor's image with incense and wine. So Julian, the apostate, set up his own image with the idols of the heathen gods in the Forum, that the Christians in doing reverence to it, might seem to worship the idols. So Charlemagne's image was set up for homage; and the Pope adored the new emperor (Dupin, vol. 6, p. 126). Napoleon, the successor of Charlemagne designed after he had first lowered the Pope by removing him to Fontainebleau, then to "make an idol of him" (Memoir de Sainte Helene): keeping the Pope near him, he would, through the Pope's influence, have directed the religious, as well as the political world. The revived Napoleonic dynasty may, in some one representative, realize the project, becoming the beast supported by the false prophet (perhaps some openly infidel supplanter of the papacy, under a spiritual guise, after the heretic, or apostate church, who is distinct from the second beast, has been stripped and judged by the beast, ch. 17. 16); he then might have an image set up in his honour as a test of secular and spiritual allegiance. speak—False doctrine will give a spiritual, philosophical appearance to the foolish apotheosis of the creature personified by Antichrist. [AUBERLEN.] JEROME, on Daniel, 7., says, Antichrist shall be "one of the human race in whom the whole of Satan shall dwell bodily." Rome's speaking images, and winking pictures of the Virgin Mary and the saints, are an earnest of the future demoniacal miracles of the false prophet in making the beast's or Antichrist's image to speak. 16 to receive a mark—Id., "that they should give them a mark;" such a brand as masters stamp on their slaves, and monarchs on their subjects. Soldiers voluntarily punctured their arms with marks of the general under whom they served. Votaries of idols brand themselves with the idol's cypher or symbol. Thus Antiochus Epiphanes branded the Jews with the ivy leaf, the symbol of Bacchus (2 Maccabees, 6. 7; 3 Maccabees, 2. 29). Contrast God's seal and name in the forehead of His servants, ch. 7. 3; 14. 1; 22. 4; and Galatians, 6. 17, "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus," i.e., "I am His soldier and servant. The mark in the right hand and forehead implies the prostration of bodily and intellectual powers to the beast's domination. "In the forehead by way of profession; in the hand with respect to work and service."

C, IRENEUS, 218. Coptic, and Syriac omit it, might buy—Greek, "may be able to buy," the mark, or its name—Greek, the mark (viz.), the name of the beast." The mark may be, as in the case of the sealing of the saints in the forehead, not a visible mark, but symbolical of allegiance. So the sign of the cross in Popery, The Pope's interdict has often shut out the excommunicate from social and commercial intercourse. Under the final Antichrist this shall come to pass in its most violent form. number of his name—Implying that the name has some numerical meaning. 18, wisdom—the armoury against the second beast, as patience and faith against the first. Spiritual wisdom is needed to solve the mystery of iniquity, so as not to be beguiled by it. cont.—let—The "for" implies the possibility of our calculating or counting the beast's number. the number of a man—4.e. counted as men generally count. So the phrase is used in ch. 21. 17. The number is the number of a man, not of God; he shall exult himself above the power of the Godhead, as the MAN of SIN. [AQUINAS.] Though it is an imitation of the Divine name, it is only human. six hundred threescore and six—A and Vulgate write the numbers in full in the Greek. But B writes merely the three Greek letters standing for numbers, Ch, X, St. C reads 616, but IRENEUS, 228, opposes this and maintains 666. IRENEUS, in the second century, disciple of Polycarp, John's disciple, explained this number as contained in the Greek letters of Lateinos (L being 30; A, 1; T, 300; E, 6; I, 10; N, 50; O, 70; S, 200). The Latin is peculiarly the language of the church of Rome in all her official acts; the forced unity of language in ritual being the counterfeit of the true unity; the premature and spurious anticipation of the real unity, only to be realized at Christ's coming, when all the earth shall speak "one language" (Zephaniah, 3. 9). The last Antichrist may have a close connexion with Rome, and so the name Lateinos (666) may apply to him. The Hebrew letters of Beitainos amount to 666 (EUSEBIUS): a type of the false prophet, whose characteristic, like Isaiah's, will be high spiritual knowledge perverted to Satanic ends. The number six is the world-number: in 666 it occurs in units, tens, and hundreds. It is next neighbour to the sacred seven, but is severed from it by an impassable gulf. It is the number of the world given over to judgment; hence there is a pause between the sixth and seventh seals, and the sixth and seventh trumpets. The judgments on the world are complete in six; by the fulfilment of seven, the kingdoms of the world become Christ's. As twelve is the number of the church, so six, its half, symbolizes the world-kingdom broken. The raising of the six to tens and hundreds (higher powers) indicates that the beast, notwithstanding his progression to higher powers, can only rise to greater ripeness for judgment. Thus 666, the judged world-power contrasts with the 144,000 sealed and refigured ones the church number, twelve, squared and multiplied by 1000, the number symbolizing the world pervaded by God; ten, the world-number, raised to the power of three, the number of God. [AUBERLEN.] The mark (Greek charagma) and name are one and the same. The first two radical letters of Choid (Greek Christos), Ch and R, are the same as the first two of charagma, and were the imperial monogram of Christian Rome. Antichrist, personating Christ, adopts a symbol like, but not agreeing with, Christ's monogram, Ch, X, St; whereas the radicals in "Christ" are Ch, R, St. Papal Rome has similarly substituted the standard of the Keys for the standard of the Cross. So on the Papal coinage (the image of power, Matthew, 22. 20). The two first letters of "Christ," Ch R, represent seven hundred, the perfect number. The Ch, X, St represent an imperfect number, a triple falling away apostasy, from visionary perfection. (WOLFE-WORTH.)

CHAPTER XIV.

Ver. 1-20. THE LAMB SEEN ON ZION WITH THE 144,000. THREE SONG. THE GOSPEL PROCLAIMED BEFORE THE END BY ONE ANGEL; THE FALL OF BABYLON, BY ANOTHER; THE DOOM OF THE BEAST-WORSHIPPERS, BY A THIRD. THE BLESSINGS OF THE DEAD IN THE LORD. THE HARVEST. THE VINTAGE. In contrast to the beast, false prophet, and apostate church (ch. 13.), and introductory to the announcement of judgments about to descend on them and the world (v. 8-11, anticipatory of ch. 18. 2-6), stand here the redeemed, "the divine kernel of humanity, the positive fruits of the history of the world and the church." [AUBRELEN.] Chs. 14-16, describe the preparations for the Messianic judgment. As ch. 14. begins with the 144,000 of Israel (cf. ch. 7. 4-8, no longer exposed to trial as then, but now triumphant), so ch. 15. begins with those who have overcome from among the Gentiles (cf. ch. 14. 1-5, with ch. 7. 9-17): the two classes of elect forming together the whole company of transfigured saints who shall reign with Christ. 1. A. B. C. COPTIC, and ORIGEN read, "the Lamb" Lamb... etc. Sing—having left His position "in the midst of the throne," and now taking His stand on Zion, his Father's name—A. B. C. read, "His name and His Father's name" in—Greek, "upon." God's and Christ's name here answers to the seal "upon their foreheads" in ch. 7. 3. As the 144,000 of Israel are "the first fruits" (v. 4), so "the harvest" (v. 15) is the general assembly of Gentile saints to be translated by Christ as His first act in assuming His kingdom, prior to His judgment (ch. 18., the seven last vials) on the anti-Christian world, in executing which His saints shall share. As Noah and Lot were taken seasonably out of the judgment, but exposed to the trial to the last moment (DE BURGH), so those who shall reign with Christ shall first suffer with Him, being delivered out of the judgments, but not out of the trials. The Jews are meant by "the saints of the most High" against them. Anti-Christ makes war, changing their times and laws; for true Israelites cannot join in the idolatry of the beast, any more than true Christians. The common affliction will draw closely together, in opposing the beast's worship, the Old Testament and New Testament people of God. Thus the way is paved for Israel's conversion. This last utter scattering of the holy people's power leads them, under the Spirit, to seek Messiah, and to cry at His approach, "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." 2. from—Greek, "out of." voice of many waters—as is the voice of Himself, such also is the voice of His people. I heard the voice of harpers—A. B. C. and ORIGEN read, "the voice which I heard (was) as of harpers." 3. sung—Greek, "sing." as it were—So A. C. and Vulgate read. It is as if it were a new song; for it is, in truth, as old as God's eternal purpose. It: B. SYRIAC, COPTIC, ORIGEN and ANDREAS omit these words. new song—(ch. 5. 9, 10.) The song is that of victory after conflict with the dragon, beast, and false prophet: never sung before, for such a conflict had never been fought before; therefore new: till now the kingdom of Christ on earth had been usurped; they sing the new song in anticipation of His taking possession of His blood-bought kingdom with His saints, four beasts—rather as Greek, "four living creatures." The harpers and singers evidently include the 144,000: so the parallel proves (ch. 14. 2, 3), where the same act is attributed to the general company of saints, the harvest (v. 15) from all nations. Not as ALFORD, "the harpers and song are in heaven, but the 144,000 are on earth." redeemed—i.e., "purchased." Not even the angels can learn that song, for they know not experimentally what it is to have "come out of the great tribulation, and washed their robes white in the blood of the Lamb" (ch. 7. 14), 4. virgins—spiritually [Matthew, 25. 1]: in contrast to the apostate church,

Babylon (v. 8), spiritually "a harlot" (ch. 17. 1-6; Isaiah, 1. 21; contrast 2 Corinthians, 11. 2; Ephesians, 6. 25-27). Their not being defiled with women, means they were not led astray from Christian faithfulness by the tempters who jointly constitute the spiritual "harlot," follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth—in glory, being especially near His person; the fitting reward of their following Him so fully on earth, redeemed—"purchased." being the—rather, "as a first fruit." Not merely a "first fruit" in the sense in which all believers are so, but Israel's 144,000 elect are the first fruit, the Jewish and Gentile elect church is the harvest; in a further sense, the whole of the transfigured and translated church which reigns with Christ at His coming, is the first fruit, and the consequent general ingathering of Israel and the nations, ending in the last judgment, is the full and final harvest. 5. gulls—So ANDREAS in one copy. But A. B. C. ORIGEN, and ANDREAS in other copies read, "falsehood." Cf. with English Version reading Psalm 32. 2; Isaiah, 63. 9; John, 1. 47. for—So B. SYRIAC, COPTIC, ORIGEN, and ANDREAS read. But A. C. omit, without fault—Greek, "blameless;" in respect to the sincerity of their fidelity to Him. Not absolutely, and in themselves blameless; but regarded as such on the ground of His righteousness in whom alone they trusted, and whom they faithfully served by His Spirit in them. The allusion seems to be to Psalm 15. 1, 2. Cf. v. 1, "stood on mount Zion," before the throne of God—A. B. C. SYRIAC, COPTIC, ORIGEN, and ANDREAS omit these words. The oldest Vulgate MS. supports them. 6. Here begins the portion relating to the Gentile world, as the former portion related to Israel. Before the end the gospel is to be preached for a witness unto all nations: not that all nations shall be converted, but all nations shall have had the opportunity given them of deciding whether they will be for, or against, Christ. Those thus preached to are "they that dwell (so A. Coptic, and Syriac read. But B. C. ORIGEN, Vulgate, CYPRIAN, 312, read, "sitt." cf. Matthew, 4. 16; Luke, 1. 79, having their settled home) on the earth," being of earth earthy: this last season of grace is given them, if yet they may repent, before "judgment" (v. 7) descends: if not, they will be left without excuse, as the world which resisted the preaching of Noah in the 120 years " whilst the long-suffering of God waited." "So also the prophets gave the people a last opportunity of repentance before the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem, and our Lord and His apostles before the Roman destruction of the holy city." [AUBRELEN.] The Greek for "unto" (v. 1, in A. C) means to, "upon," or "over," or "in respect to" (Mark, 9. 12; Hebrews, 7. 13). So also "to every nation" (Greek epi, in A. B. C. Vulgate, SYRIAC, ORIGEN, ANDREAS, CYPRIAN, and PRIMARIUS. This, perhaps, implies that the gospel, though diffused over the globe, shall not come savingly unto any save the elect. The world is not to be evangelized till Christ shall come: meanwhile, God's purpose is "to take out of the Gentiles a people for His name," to be witnesses of the effectual working of His Spirit during the counter-working of "the mystery of iniquity," everlasting gospel—the gospel which announces the glad tidings of the everlasting kingdom of Christ, about to ensue immediately after the "judgment" on Antichrist, announced as imminent in v. 7. As the former angel "flying through the midst of heaven" (ch. 8. 13) announced "woe," so this angel "flying in the midst of heaven" announced joy. The three angels making this last proclamation of the gospel, the fall of Babylon (v. 8), the harlot, and the judgment on the beast-worshippers (v. 9-11), the voice from heaven respecting the blessed dead (v. 13), the vision of the Son of man on the cloud (v. 14), the harvest (v. 15), and the vintage (v. 16), form the comprehensible summary, amplified in detail in the rest of the book.

7. Fear God—the forerunner to embracing the love of furlongs off." [W. KELLY] Sixteen hundred is a square number; 4 by 4 by 100. The four quarters, North, South, East, and West, of the Holy land, or else of the world (the completeness and universality of the world wide destruction being hereby indicated). It does not exactly answer to the length of Palestine as given by JEROME, 160 Roman miles. BENONI thinks the valley of Kedron, between Jerusalem and the mount of Olivea, is meant, the torrent in that valley being about to be discoloured with blood to the extent of 1600 furlongs. This view accords with Joel's prophecy that the valley of Jehoshaphat is to be the scene of the overthrow of the anti-Christian foes.

CHAPTER XV.

VER. 1-3. THE SEVEN LAST VIALS OF PLAGUES: SONG OF THE VICTORS OVER THE BEAST. 1. the seven last plagues—Greek, "seven plagues which are the last," is filed up—i.e., "was finished," or "consummated;" the prophetic part for the future, the future being to God as though it were past, so sure of accomplishment is His word. This verse is the summary of the vision that follows: the angels do not actually receive the vials till v. 7; but here, in v. 1, by anticipation they are spoken of as having them. There are no more plagues after these until the Lord's coming in judgment. The destruction of Babylon (ch. 18.) is the last; then in ch. 19. He appears. 2. sea of glass—Answering to the molten sea or great brazen laver before the mercy-seat of the earthly temple, for the purification of the priests; typifying the baptism of water and the Spirit of all who are made kings and priests unto God. mingled with fire—Answering to the baptism on earth with fire, i.e., a fiery trial, as well as with the Holy Ghost, which Christ's people undergo to purify them, as gold is purified of its dross in the furnace, them that had gotten the victory over—Greek, "those (coming) off from (the conflict with) the beast conquerors," over the number of his name—A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic omit the words in English Version, "over his mark." The mark in fact, is the number of his name which the faithful refused to receive, and so were victorious over it, stand on the sea of glass—ALFORD and DE BURGH explain "on (the shore of) the sea;" at the sea. So the preposition (Greek) epi, with the accusative, is used for at, ch. 19. It has a pregnant sense: "standing" implies rest, Greek epi with the accusative implies motion towards. Thus the meaning is, leaving come to the sea, and now standing at it. In Matthew, 11. 23, where Christ walks on the sea, the Greek oldest MSS. have the genitive, not the accusative as here. Allusion is made to the Israelites standing on the shore at the Red sea, after having passed victoriously through it, and after the Lord had destroyed the Egyptian foe (type of antichrist) in it. Moses and the Israelites' song of triumph (Exodus, 15. 1) has its antitype in the saints' "song of Moses and the Lamb" (v. 3). Still English Version is consistent with good Greek, and the sense will then be, As the sea typifies the troubled state out of which the beast arose, and which is to be no more in the blessed world to come (ch. 21. 1), so the victorious saints stand on it, having it under their feet (as the woman had the moon, ch. 12. 1, see Note); but it is now no longer treacherous wherein the feet sink, but solid like glass, as it was under the feet of Christ, whose triumph and power the saints now share. Firmness of footing amidst apparent instability is thus represented. They can stand, not merely as victorious Israel at the Red sea, and as John upon the sand of the shore, but upon the sea itself now firm, and reflecting their glory as glass: their past conflict shedding the brighter lustre on their present triumph. Their happiness is heightened by the retrospect of the dangers through which they have passed. Thus this corresponds to ch. 7. 14. 16. harps of God—in the hands of these heavenly virgins, infinitely surpassing the timbrels of Miriam and the Israelitesses. 3. song of Moses...and...the Lamb—The New Testament song of the Lamb (i.e., the song which the Lamb shall lead, as being "the Captain of our salvation," just as Moses was leader of the Israelites, the song in which those who conquer through Him [Romans, 8. 37] shall join, ch. 12. 11) is the antitype to the triumphant Old Testament song of Moses and the Israelites at the Red sea (Exodus, 15.). The churches of the Old and New Testament are essentially one in their conflicts and triumphs. The two appear joined in this phrase, as they are in the twenty-four elders. Similarly, Isaiah, 12., foretells the song of the redeemed (Israel foremost) after the second antitypical exodus and deliverance at the Egyptian sea. The passage through the Red sea under the pillar of cloud was Israel's baptism, to which the believer's baptism in trials corresponds. The elect after their trials (especially those arising from the beast) shall be taken up before the vials of wrath be poured on the beast and his kingdom. So Noah and his family were taken out of the doomed world before the deluge; Lot was taken out of Sodom before its destruction; the Christians escaped by a special interposition of Providence to Pella, before the destruction of Jerusalem. As the pillar of cloud and fire interposed between Israel and the Egyptian foe, so that Israel was safely landed on the opposite shore before the Egyptians were destroyed; so the Lord, coming with clouds and in flaming fire, shall first catch up His elect people "in the clouds to meet Him in the air," and then shall with fire destroy the enemy. The Lamb leads the song in honour of the Father amidst the great congregation. This is the "new song" mentioned ch. 14. 3. The singing victors are the 144,000 of Israel, "the first fruits," and the general "harvest" of the Gentiles, servant of God—(Exodus, 14. 31; Numbers, 12. 7; Joshua, 22. 5.) The Lamb is more: He is the Sox, Great and marvelous are thy works, &c.—Part of Moses' last song. The vindication of the justice of God that so He may be glorified, is the grand end of God's dealings. Hence His servants again and again dwell upon this in their praises (ch. 16. 7; 19. 2; Proverbs, 16. 4; Jeremiah, 10. 10; Daniel, 4. 37). Especially at the judgment (Psalm, 60. 1-6; 146. 17). saints—There is no MS. authority for this. A. B, Coptic and CYPRIAN read, "of the NATIONS." C reads "of the ages," and so Vulgate and Syriac. The point at issue in the Lord's controversy with the earth is, whether He, or Satan's minion, the beast, is "the King of the nations;" here at the eve of the judgments descending on the kingdom of the beast, the transfigured saints hail Him as "the King of the nations" (Ezekiel, 21. 27). 4. Who shall not—Greek, "Who is there but must fear thee?" Cf. Moses' song, Exodus, 15. 14-16, on the fear which God's judgments strike into the foe. —So Syriac. But A, B, C, Vulgate and CYPRIAN reject "thee," all nations shall come—Alluding to Psalm 22. 27-31; cf. Isaiah, 66. 23; Jeremiah, 16. 19. The conversion of all nations, therefore, shall be when Christ shall come, and not till then; and the first moving cause will be Christ's manifested judgments preparing all hearts for receiving Christ's mercy. He shall effect by His presence what we have in vain tried to effect in His absence. The present preaching of the gospel is gathering out the elect remnant; meanwhile "the mystery of iniquity" is at work, and will at last come to its crisis, then shall judgment descend on the apostates at the harvest—end of this age (Greek Matthew, 13. 30, 40) when the tares shall be cleared out of the earth, which thenceforward becomes Messiah's kingdom. The confederacy of the apostates against Christ becomes, when overthrow with fearful judgments, the very means, in God's overruling providence, of preparing the nations not joined in the anti-Christian league to submit themselves to Him. —i.e., "were" the prophetic part for the immediate future. —

CHAPTER XVI.

Ver. 1-21. THE SEVEN VIALS AND THE CONSEQUENT PLAGUES. The trumpets shook the world-kingdoms in a longer process; the vials destroy with a swift and sudden overthrow the kingdom of the beast in particular who had invested himself with the world-kingdom. The Hebrews thought the Egyptian plagues to have been inflicted with but an interval of a month between them severally. [BENJAMIN referring to Seder Olam.] As Moses took ashes from an earthly common furnace, so angels, as priestly-ministers in the heavenly temple, take holy fire in sacred vials or bowls, from the heavenly altar to pour down (cf. ch. 8. 6). The same heavenly altar which would have kindled the sweet incense of prayer bringing down blessing upon earth, by man's sin kindles the fiery descending curse. Just as the river Nile, which ordinarily is the source of Egypt's fertility, because blood and a curse through Egypt's sin. 1. a great voice—cf. God's. to be taken figuratively, as Babylon itself, which is situated on it, is undoubtedly so, ch. 17. 5. The waters of the Euphrates (cf. Isaiah, 5. 7, 8) are spiritual Babylon's, i.e., the apostate church's (of which Rome is the chief, though not exclusive representative), spiritual and temporal powers. The drying up of the waters of Babylon expresses the same thing as the ten kings stripping, eating, and burning the whore. The phrase "way may be prepared for" is that applied to the Lord's coming (Isaiah, 40. 3; Matthew, 3. 3; Luke, 1. 76). He shall come from the East (Matthew, 24. 27; Ezekiel, 43. 2, "the glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the East"); not alone, for His elect transfigured saints of Israel and the Gentiles shall accompany Him, who are "kings and priests unto God" (ch. 1. 6). As the anti-Christian ten kings accompany the beast, so the saints accompany as kings the King of kings to the last decisive conflict. DR BURGH, &c., take it of the Jews, who also were designed to be a kingdom of priests to God on earth. They shall, doubtless, become priest-kings in the flesh to the nations in the flesh at His coming. Abraham from the East (cf. Isaiah, 41. 2, 5, 9, refers to him, and not Cyrus) conquering the Chaldean kings is a type of Israel's victorious restoration to the priest-kingdom. Israel's exodus after the last Egyptian plague typifies Israel's restoration after the spiritual Babylon, the apostate church, has been smitten. Israel's promotion to the priest-kingdom after Pharaoh's downfall, and at the Lord's descent at Sinai to establish the theocracy, typifies the restored kingdom of Israel at the Lord's more glorious descent, when antichrist shall be destroyed utterly. Thus besides the transfigured saints, Israel secondarily may be meant by "the kings from the East" who shall accompany the "King of kings" returning "from the way of the East" to reign over His ancient people. As to the drying up again of the waters opposing His people's assuming the kingdom, cf. Isaiah, 10. 26; 11. 11, 15; Zechariah, 10. 9-11. The name Israel (Genesis, 32. 28) implies a prince with God. Cf. Micah, 4. 8, as to the return of the kingdom to Jerusalem. DURHAM, 300 years ago, interpreted the drying up of the Euphrates to mean the wasting away of the Turkish power, which has heretofore held Palestine, and so the way being prepared for Israel's restoration. But as Babylon refers to the apostate church, not to Mahometanism, the drying up of the Euphrates (answering to Cyrus' overthrow of literal Babylon by marching into it through the dry channel of the Euphrates, must answer to the draining off of the apostate church's resources, the Roman and Greek corrupt church having been heretofore one of the greatest barriers by its idolatries and persecutions in the way of Israel's restoration and conversion. The kings of the earth who are earthly (v. 14), stand in contrast to the kings from the East who are heavenly. 13. the dragon—Satan, who gives his power and throne (ch. 13. 2) to the beast, false prophet—distinct from the harlot, the apostate church of which Rome is the chief, though not sole, representative), ch. 17. 1-3, 16; and identical with the second beast, ch. 13. 11-15, as appears by comparing ch. 19. 20 with ch. 13. 13; ultimately consigned to the lake of fire with the first beast; as is also the dragon a little later (ch. 20. 10). The dragon, the beast, and the false prophet, "the mystery of iniquity," form a blasphemous anti-Trinity, the counterfeit of "the mystery of godliness" God manifest in Christ, witnessed to by the Spirit. The dragon acts the part of God the Father, assigning his authority to his representative the beast, as the Father assigns His to the Son. They are accordingly jointly worshipped; cf. as to the Father and Son, John, 6. 23: as the ten-horned beast has its ten horns crowned with diadems (Greek, ch. 13. 1), so Christ has on His head many diadems. Whilst the false prophet, like the Holy Ghost, speaks not of himself, but tells all men to worship the beast, and confirms his testimony to the beast by miracles, as the Holy Ghost attested similarly Christ's divine mission, unclean spirits like frogs—the antitype to the plague of frogs sent on Egypt. The presence of the "unclean spirit" in the land (Palestine) is foretold, Zechariah, 13. 2, in connexion with idolatrous prophets. Beginning with infidelity as to Jesus Christ's coming in the flesh, men shall end in the grossest idolatry of the beast, the incarnation of all that is self-deifying and God-opposed in the world-powers of all ages; having rejected Him that came in the Father's name, they shall worship one that comes in his own, though really the devil's representative; as frogs croak by night in marshes and quagmires, so these unclean spirits in the darkness of error teach lies amidst the mire of filthy lusts. They talk of liberty, but it is not gospel liberty, but license for lust. Their being three, as also seven, in the description of the last and worst state of the Jewish nation, implies a parody of the two divine numbers, three of the Trinity, and seven of the Holy Spirit (ch. 1. 4). Some observe that three frogs were the original arms of France, a country which has been the centre of infidelity, socialism, and false spiritualism. A. B. read, "as it were frogs," instead of "like frogs," which is not supported by MSS. The unclean spirit out of the mouth of the dragon symbolizes the proud infidelity which opposes God and Christ. That out of the beast's mouth is the spirit of the world, which in the politics of men, whether lawless democracy or despotism, sets man above God. That out of the mouth of the false prophet is lying spiritualism and religious delusion, which shall take the place of the harlot when she shall have been destroyed. 14. devils—Greek, "demons," working miracles—Greek, "signs," go forth unto—or "for," i.e., to tempt them to the battle with Christ, the kings of the earth and—A. B. Syriac, and ANDREAS omit "of the earth and," which clause is not in any MS. Translate, "Kings of the whole habitable world," who are "of this world," in contrast to "the kings of from the East" (the suriains); v. 12. viz., the saints to whom Christ has appointed a kingdom, and who are "children of light." God in permitting Satan's miracles, as in the case of the Egyptian magicians who were His instruments in hardening Pharaoh's heart, gives the reprobate up to judicial delusion preparatory to their destruction. As Aaron's rod was changed into a serpent, so were those of the Egyptian magicians. Aaron turned the water into blood; so did the magicians. Aaron brought up frogs; so did the magicians. With the frogs their power ceased. So this, or whatever is antitypical to it, will be the last effort of the dragon, beast, and false prophet, battle—Greek, of war: the final conflict for the kingship of the world described ch. 19. 17-21. 15. The gathering of the world-kings with the beast against the Lamb is the signal for Christ's coming; therefore He here gives the charge to be watching for His coming and clothed in the garments of justification and sanctification, so as to be accepted, thence—(Matthew, 24. 43; 2 Peter, 3. 10.) they—saints and angels, shame—lit., "unseemliness" (Greek aschēmosyne; Greek, 1 Corinthians, 13. 5: a different word from the Greek, ch. 3. 18 (Greek aschēmosyne). 16. he—rather, "they (the three unclean spirits) gathered them together." If English Version be retained, "He" will refer to God who gives them over to the delusion of the three unclean spirits; or else the sixth angel (v. 12). Armageddon—Hebrew Har, a mountain, and Megiddo in Manasseh of Galilee, the scene of the overthrow of the Canaanite kings by God's miraculous interposition under Deborah and Barak; the same as the great plain of Esdraelon. Josiah, too, as the ally of Babylon, was defeated and slain at Megiddo; and the mourning of the Jews at the time just before God shall interpose for them against all the nations confederate against Jerusalem, is compared to the mourning for Josiah &c.

Meziddo. Meziddo comes from a root, padad, "cut off," and means slaughter. Cf. Joel, 3, 2, 12, 14, where "the valley of Jehoshaphat" meaning in Hebrew, "Judgment of God" is mentioned as the scene of God's final vengeance on the God-opposing foe. Probably some great plain, antitypical to the valleys of Meziddo and Jehoshaphat, will be the scene. 17. angel—So ANDREAS. But A, B, Vulgate and Syriac omit it. iste—So ANDREAS (Greek etc.). But A, B, "upon" (Greek etc.). great—So B, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic and ANDREAS. But A omits, of heaven—So B and ANDREAS. But A, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic omit. It is deus—"It is come to pass." God's voice as to the final consummation, as Jesus' voice on the cross when the work of expiation was completed. "It is finished." 18. voices—thunders—lightnings—A has the order, "lightnings...voices...thunders." This is the same close as that of the seven seals and the seven thunders; but with the difference that they do not merely form the conclusion, but introduce the consequence, of the last vial, viz. the utter destruction of Babylon and then of the anti-Christian armies. earthquakes—which is often preceded by a lurid state of air, such as would result from the vial poured upon it. men were—So B, Vulgate, Syriac, and ANDREAS. But A and Coptic read, "A man was," so mighty—Greek, "such." 19. the great city—the capital and seat of the apostate church, spiritual Babylon of which Rome is the representative, if one literal city be meant. The city in ch. 11, 8 (see Note), is probably distinct, viz. Jerusalem under anti-christ (the beast, who is distinct from the harlot or apostate church). In ch. 11, 13, only a tenth falls of Jerusalem, whereas here the city (Babylon) "became (Greek) into three parts" by the earthquake. cities of the nations—other great cities in league with spiritual Babylon. great, came in remembrance—Greek, "Babylon the great was remembered" ch. 18, 5. It is now that the last call to escape from Babylon is given to God's people in her ch. 18, 4. fieryness—the boiling over of His wrath (Greek thumou orges); cf. Note, ch. 14, 10. 20. Plainly parallel to ch. 6, 16-17, and by anticipation descriptive of the last judgment. the mountains—rather as Greek, "there were found no mountains." 21. fell—Greek, "descends." upon men—Greek, "the men," was—Greek, "is," men—not those struck who died, but the rest. Unlike the result in the case of Jerusalem (ch. 11, 13), where "the remnant...affrighted...gave glory to the God of heaven."

CHAPTER XVII.

Ver. 1-19. THE HARLOT BABYLON'S GAUD: THE BEAST ON WHICH SHE RIDES, HAVING SEVEN HEADS AND TEN HORNS, SHALL BE THE INSTRUMENT OF JUDGMENT ON HER. As ch. 16, 12 stated generally the vial judgment about to be poured on the harlot, Babylon's power, so chs. 17, and 18 give the same in detail. so ch. 19, gives in detail the judgment on the beast and the false prophet, summarily alluded to in ch. 16, 13-15, in connexion with the Lord's coming. 1. unto me—A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic omit. many—So A. But B, "the many waters" Jeremiah, 51, 13: v. 15, below, explain the sense. The whore is the apostate church, just as the woman (ch. 12) is the church whilst faithful. Satan having failed by violence, tries too successfully to seduce her by the allurements of the world; unlike her Lord, she was overcome by this temptation: hence she is seen sitting on the scarlet-coloured beast, no longer the wife, but the harlot; no longer Jerusalem, but spiritually Sodom (ch. 11, 8). 2. drunk with—Greek, "owing to." It cannot be Pagan Rome, but Papal Rome, if a particular seat of error be meant. but I incline to think that the judgment (ch. 18, 2) and the spiritual fornication (ch. 18, 3), though finding their culmination in Rome, are not restricted to it, but comprise the whole apostate church, Roman, Greek, and even Protestant, in so far as it has been

seduced from its "first love" (ch. 2, 4) to Christ, the heavenly Bridegroom, and given its affections to worldly pomp and idols. The woman (ch. 12, 1) is the congregation of God in its purity under the Old and New Testament, and appears again as the bride of the Lamb, the transfigured church prepared for the marriage feast. The woman, the invisible church, is latent in the apostate church, and is the church militant; the bride is the church triumphant. 3. the wilderness—Contrast her in ch. 12, 6, 14, having a place in the wilderness-world, but not a home; a sojourner here, looking for the city to come. Now, on the contrary, she is contented to have her portion in this moral wilderness. upon a scarlet...beast—The same as in ch. 12, 1, who there is described as here, "having seven heads and ten horns (therein betraying that he is representative of the dragon, ch. 12, 3) and upon his heads names (so the oldest MSS. read) of blasphemy" (cf. also v. 13-14, below, with ch. 16, 19, 20, and ch. 17, 13, 14, 16. Rome, resting on the world-power, and ruling it by the claim of supremacy, is the chief, though not the exclusive, representative of this symbol. As the dragon is hyrol, so the beast is blood-red in colour: implying its blood-guiltiness, and also deep-dyed sin. The scarlet is also the symbol of kingly authority. full—all over: not merely "on his heads," as in ch. 12, 1, for its opposition to God is now about to develop itself in all its intensity. Under the harlot's superintendence, the world-power puts forth blasphemous pretensions worse than in Pagan days. So the pope is placed by the cardinal in God's temple on the altar to sit there, and the cardinals kiss the feet of the pope. This ceremony is called in Romish writers the adoration. Histoire de Clergé Amsterd. 1716; and Lettenburg's Notitia Curie Romanae, 1683, p. 125; Heidegger Myst. Bab. 1, 511, 514, 517: a Papal coin Numismata pontificum, Paris, 1679, p. 5) has the blasphemous legend, "Quo crast. adorant." Kneeling and kissing are the worship meant by St. John's word nine times used in respect to the rival of God (Greek proskunein). Absomination, too, is the scriptural term for an idol, or any creature worshipped with the homage due to the Creator. Still there is some check on the God opposed world-power whilst ridden by the harlot: the consummated anti-christ will be when, having destroyed her, the last shall be revealed as the concentration and incarnation of all the self-deifying God-opposed principles which have appeared in various forms and degrees heretofore. "The church has gained outward recognition by leaning on the world-power, which in its turn uses the church for its own objects; such is the picture here of Christendom ripe for judgment." [AUBERLEN.] The seven heads in the view of many are the seven successive forms of government of Rome: kings, consuls, dictators, demovirs, military tribunes, emperors, the German emperors (WOLFS WORTH), of whom Napoleon is the successor (v. 11). But see the view given, Note, v. 9, 10, which I prefer. The crowns formerly on the ten horns (ch. 13, 1) have now disappeared, perhaps an indication that the ten kingdoms into which the Germanic-Slavonic world (the old Roman empire, including the East as well as the West, the two legs of the image with five toes on each, i.e., ten in all) is to be divided, will lose their monarchical form in the end [AUBERLEN]: but see v. 12, which seems to imply crowned kings. 4. The colour scarlet, it is remarkable, is that reserved for popes and cardinals. Paul II. made it penal for any one but cardinals to wear hats of scarlet: cf. Ceremoniale Rom., 3. sect. 5, c. 5. This book was compiled more than 340 years ago by Marcelus, a Romish archbishop, and dedicated to Leo X. In it are enumerated five different articles of dress of scarlet colour. A vest is mentioned studded with pearls. The pope's mitre is of gold and precious stones. These are the very characteristics outwardly which

Revelation thrice assigns to the harlot or Babylon. So Joachim, an abbot from Calabria, about A. D. 1190, when asked by Richard of England, who had summoned him to Palestine, concerning antichrist, replied that "he was born long ago at Rome, and is now exalting himself above all that is called God." Roger Hoveden Angl. Chron., l. 2, and elsewhere, wrote, "The harlot arrayed in gold is the church of Rome." Whenever, and wherever (not in Rome alone) the church, instead of being "clothed (as at first, ch. 12. 1) with the sun" of heaven, is arrayed in earthly meretricious gauds, compromising the truth of God through fear, or flattery, of the world's-power, science, or wealth, she becomes the harlot seated on the beast, and doomed in righteous retribution to be judged by the beast (v. 16). Soon, like Rome, and like the Jews of Christ's and the apostles' time leagued with the heathen Rome, she will then become the persecutor of the saints (v. 6). Instead of drinking her Lord's "cup" of suffering, she has "a cup full of abominations and filthinesses." Rome, in her medals, represents herself holding a cup with the self-condemning inscription, "Sedet super universum." Meanwhile the world-power gives up its hostility and accepts Christianity externally; the beast gives up its God-opposed character, the woman gives up her divine one. They meet half way by mutual concessions: Christianity becomes worldly, the world becomes Christianized. The gainer is the world, the loser is the church. The beast for a time receives a deadly wound (ch. 13. 3), but is not really transfused: he will return worse than ever (v. 11-14). The Lord alone by His coming can make the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and His Christ. The "purple" is the badge of empire: even as in mockery it was put on our Lord, decked—lit., "gilded" stones—Greek, "stone." Sithness—A. B. and ANDREAS read, "the filthy (impure) things." 5. upon...forehead...name—as harlots usually had. What a contrast to "HOLINESS TO THE LORD," inscribed on the mitre on the high priest's forehead. mystery—Implying a spiritual fact heretofore hidden, and incapable of discovery by mere reason, but now revealed. As the union of Christ and the church is a "great mystery" a spiritual truth of momentous interest, once hidden, now revealed, Ephesians, 5. 31, 32: so the church conforming to the world and thereby becoming a harlot is a counter "mystery" (or spiritual truth, symbolically now revealed). As iniquity in the harlot is a leaven working in "mystery," and therefore called "the mystery of iniquity," so when she is destroyed, the iniquity heretofore working (comparatively) latently in her, shall be revealed in the mass of iniquity, the open embodiment of all previous evil. Contrast the "mystery of God" and "godliness," ch. 10. 7; 1 Timothy, 3. 16. It was Rome that crucified Christ; that destroyed Jerusalem and scattered the Jews; that persecuted the early Christians in Pagan times, and Protestant Christians in Papal times; and probably shall be again restored to its pristine grandeur, such as it had under the Cæsars, just before the burning of the harlot and of itself with her. So HIPPOLYTUS, de Antichristo: who lived in the second century, thought. Popery cannot be at one and the same time the "mystery of iniquity," and the manifested or revealed antichrist. Probably it will compromise for political power (v. 3) the portion of Christianity still in its creed, and thus shall prepare the way for antichrist's manifestation. The name Babylon, which in the image, Daniel, 2, is given to the head, is here given to the harlot, which marks her as being connected with the fourth kingdom, Rome, the last part of the image. Benedict XIII., in his indictment for a jubilee, A. D. 1725, called Rome "the mother of all believers, and the mistress of all churches" (harlots like herself). The correspondence of syllables and accents in Greek is striking: He porne kat to therion; He asmphe kai to arnion. The whore and the beast: is the Bride and the Lamb, of harlots—Greek, "of the harlots and of the abominations." Not merely Rome, but Christendom as a whole, even as formerly Israel as a whole, has become a harlot. The invisible church of true believers is hidden and dispersed in the visible church. The boundary lines which separate harlot and woman are not denominational nor drawn externally, but can only be spiritually discerned. If Rome were the only seat of Babylon, much of the spiritual profit of Revelation would be lost to us: but the harlot "sitteth upon many waters" (v. 1), and "ALL nations have drunk of the wine of her fornication" (v. 2; ch. 18. 3; "the earth," ch. 19. 2). External extensiveness over the whole world, and internal conformity to the world—worldliness in extent and contents—is symbolized by the name of the world city, "Babylon." As the sun shines on all the earth, thus the woman clothed with the sun is to let her light penetrate to the uttermost parts of the earth. But she in externally Christianizing the world, permits herself to be seduced by the world: thus her universality or catholicity is not that of the Jerusalem which we look for ("the morning of us all," ch. 21. 2; Isaiah, 2. 2-4; Galatians, 4. 20, but that of Babylon, the world-wide but harlot city! [As Babylon was destroyed and the Jews restored to Jerusalem by Cyrus, so our Cyrus—a Persian name, meaning the sun—the sun of righteousness, shall bring Israel, literal and spiritual, to the holy Jerusalem at His coming. Babylon and Jerusalem are the two opposite poles of the spiritual world.] Still the Romish church is not only accidentally, and as a matter-of-fact, but in virtue of its very PRINCIPLE, a harlot, the metropolis of whoredom, "the mother of harlots" whereas the Evangelical Protestant Church is, according to her principle and fundamental creed, a chaste woman: the Reformation was a protest of the woman against the harlot. The spirit of the heathen world-kingdom Rome had, before the Reformation, changed the Church in the West into a Church-State, Rome: and in the East, into a State-Church, fettered by the world-power, having its centre in Byzantium; the Roman and Greek Churches have thus fallen from the invisible spiritual essence of the gospel into the elements of the world. [AUBRELEN.] Cf. with the "woman" called "Babylon" here, the woman named "wickedness" or "lawlessness," "iniquity" (Zechariah, 5. 7, 8, 11), carried to Babylon: cf. "the mystery of iniquity" and "the man of sin," "that wicked one," lit., "the lawless one" (3 Thessalonians, 2. 7, 8; also Matthew, 24. 12). 6. martyrs—witnesses. I wondered with great admiration.—As the Greek is the same in the verb and the noun, translate the latter "wonder." John certainly did not admire her in the modern English sense. Elsewhere (v. 8; ch. 13. 3), all the earthly-minded ("they that dwell on the earth"), wonder in admiration of the beast. Here only is John's wonder called forth: not the beast, but the woman sunken into the harlot, the church become a world loving ajestate, moves his sorrowful astonishment at so awful a change. That the world should be beastly is natural, but that the faithful bride should become the whore is monstrous, and excites the same amazement in him, as the same awful change in Israel excited in Isaiah and Jeremiah. "Floodlike thing" in them answers to "abominations" here. "Corruptio optimi pessima": when the church falls, she sinks lower than the godless world, in proportion as her right place is higher than the world. It is striking that in v. 3, "woman" has not the article, "the woman," as if she had been before mentioned: for though identical in one sense with the woman, ch. 12., in another sense she is not. The elect are never perverted into apostates, and still remain as the true woman invisibly contained in the harlot; yet Christendom regarded as the woman has apostatized from its first faith. 8. beast—was, and is not—(cf. v. 11.) The time when the beast "is not" is the time during which it has "the deadly wound;" the time of the seventh head becoming Christian externally, when its beast-like character was put into suspension temporarily. The healing of its wound answers to its ascending out of the bottomless pit. The beast, or anti-Christian world-power, returns worse than ever, with Satanic powers from hell (ch. 11.7), not merely from the sea of convulsed nations (ch. 13. 1.). Christian civilisation gives the beast only a temporary wound, whence the deadly wound is always mentioned in connexion with its being healed up, the non-existence of the beast in connexion with its reappearance; and Daniel does not even notice any change in the world-power effected by Christianity. We are endangered on one side by the spurious Christianity of the harlot, on the other by the open anti-Christianity of the beast; the third class is Christ's "little flock." go—So B. Vulgate, and ANDREAS read the future tense. But A and IRENEUS, "goeth," into perdition—The continuance of this revived seventh (i.e., the eighth) head is short; it is therefore called "the son of perdition," who is essentially doomed to it almost immediately after his appearance. names were—So Vulgate and ANDREAS. BOI A. B. Syriac, and Coptic read the singular, "name is." written in—Greek, "upon," which—rather, "when they beheld the beast that it was," &c. So Vulgate, was, and is not, and yet is—A. B. and ANDREAS read, "... and shall come" (ist., "be present," viz., again; Greek kois poretai). The Hebrew tetragrammaton, or sacred four letters in Jehovah "who is, who was, and who is to come," the believer's object of worship, has its contrasted counterpart in the beast "who was, and is not, and shall be present," the object of the earth's worship. [BENGL.] They exult with wonder in seeing that the beast which had seemed to have received its death blow from Christianity, is on the eve of reviving with greater power than ever on the ruins of that religion which tormented them (ch. 11. 10). 9. Cf. ch. 13. 18; Daniel, 12. 10, where similarly spiritual discernments is put forward as needed in order to understand the symbolical prophecy. seven heads are seven mountains—The connexion between mountains and kings must be deeper than the mere outward fact to which incidental allusion is made, that Rome (the then world-city) is on seven hills (whence heathen Rome had a national festival called Septimontium, the feast of the seven-hilled city [FLORIANI]); and on the imperial coins, just as here, she is represented as a woman seated on seven hills. Coin of Vespasian, described by Captain Smyth, Roman coins, p. 310; Ackerman, 1., p. 87. The seven heads can hardly be at once seven kings or kingdoms (v. 10), and seven geographical mountains. The true connexion is, as the head is the prominent part of the body, so the mountain is prominent in the land. Like "sea," and "earth" and "waters...peoples" (v. 16), so "mountains" have a symbolical meaning, viz., prominent seats of power. Especially such as are prominent hindrances to the cause of God (Psalm 68. 16, 17; Isaiah, 40. 4; 41. 16; 49. 11; Ezekiel, 35. 2); especially Babylon (which geographically was in a plain, but apocryphally is called a destroying mountain, Jeremiah, 51. 25) in majestic contrast to which stands mount Zion, "the mountain of the Lord's house" (Isaiah, 2. 2), and the heavenly mount; ch. 21. 10 "agreat and high mountain...and that great city, the holy Jerusalem." So in Daniel, 2. 35, the stone becomes a mountain—Messiah's universal kingdom supplanting the previous world kingdoms. As nature shadows forth the great realities of the spiritual world, so seven-hilled Rome is a representative of the seven-headed world-power of which the dragon has been, and is the prince. The "seven kings" are hereby distinguished from the "ten kings" (p. 12); the former are what the latter are not.

"mountains," great seats of the world-power. The seven universal God-opposed monarchies, are Egypt (the first world-power which came into collision with God's people), Assyria, Babylon, Greece, Medo-Persia, Rome, the Germanic-Slavonic empire (the clay of the fourth kingdom mixed with its iron in Nebuchadnezzar's image, a fifth material, Daniel, 2. 33, 34, 42, 43, symbolising this last head). These seven might seem not to accord with the seven heads in Daniel, 7. 47, one head on the first beast (Babylon), one on the second (Medo-Persia), four on the third (Greece; etc., Egypt, Syria, Thrace with Bithynia, and Greece with Macedonia); but Egypt and Greece are in both lists. Syria answers to Assyria from which the name Syria is abbreviated, and Thrace with Bithynia answers to the Gothic-Germanic-Slavonic hordes which, pouring down on Rome from the North, founded the Germanic-Slavonic empire. The woman sitting on the seven implies the Old and New Testament church conforming to, and resting on, the world-power, i.e., on all the seven world-kingdoms. Abraham and Isaac dissembling as to their wives through fear of the kings of Egypt foreshadowed this. Cf. Ezekiel, 16. and 23., on Israel's whoredoms with Egypt, Assyria, Babylon; and Matthew, 7. 24; 24. 10-12, 23-26, on the characteristics of the New Testament church's harlotry, viz., distrust, suspicion, hatred, treachery, divisions into parties, false doctrine. 10. there are—translate, "they (the seven heads) are seven kings." five...one—Greek, "the five...the one" the first five of the seven are fallen (a word applicable not to forms of government passing away, but to the fall of once powerful empires: Egypt, Ezekiel, 29, and 30.; Assyria and Nineveh, Nahum, 3. 1-6; Babylon, ch. 18. 2; Jeremiah, 50. and 51.; Medo-Persia, Daniel, 8. 3-7, 20-22; 10. 13; 11. 2; Greece, Daniel, 11. 4). Rome was "the one" existing in St. John's day. "Kings" is the Scripture phrase for kingdoms, because these kingdoms are generally represented in character by some one prominent head, as Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, Medo-Persia by Cyrus, Greece by Alexander, &c. the other is not yet come—Not as ALFORD, inaccurately representing AMBERLEN, the Christian empire beginning with Constantine; but, the Germanic-Slavonic empire beginning and continuing in its beast-like, i.e., BEASTLY anti-Christian character for only "a short space." The time when it is said of it "it is not" (v. 11), is the time during which it is "wounded to death," and has the "deadly wound" (ch. 13. 3). The external Christianization of the migrating hordes from the North which descended on Rome, is the wound to the beast answering to the earth swallowing up the flood (heathen tribes) sent by the dragon, Satan, to drown the woman, the church. The emphasis palpably is on "a short space," which therefore comes first in the Greek, not on "he must continue," as if his continuance for some (considerable) time were implied, as ALFORD wrongly thinks. The time of external Christianization (whilst the beast's wound continues) has lasted for upwards of fourteen centuries, ever since Constantine. Rome and the Greek churches have partially healed the wound by restoring image-worship. 11. beast that...is not—his beastly character being kept down by outward Christianization of the state until he starts up to-life again as "the eighth" king, his "wound being healed" (ch. 13. 3), antichrist manifested in fullest and most intense opposition to God. The Hk is emphatical in the Greek. He, peculiarly and pre-eminently: answering to "the little horn" with eyes like the eyes of a man, and a mouth speaking great things, before whom three of the ten horns were plucked up by the roots, and to whom the whole ten "give their power and strength" (v. 12, 13, 17). That a personal antichrist will stand at the head of the anti-Christian kingdom, is likely from the analogy of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Old Testament antichrist.

le hope" in Daniel, 2. 9-12; also, "the man of perdition" (2 Thessalonians, 2. 3-8), answers goeth into perdition," and is applied to an invader, Judas, in the only other passage where it occurs (John. 17. 12). He is essentially a destruction, and hence he has but a little time out of the bottomless pit, when he "goes down" (v. 8. 11). "Whilst the church passes death of the flesh to glory of the Spirit, the sea through the glory of the flesh to death." (v. 8.) The eighth is not merely one of the seven but a new power or person proceeding out of them, and at the same time embodying all the chief features of the previous seven condensed and commingled; for which reason there are not eight, but only seven heads, for the eighth embodies all the seven. In the birth which prepares the "regeneration" there are wars, pestilences, and disturbances [AUBRELL], wherein the eighth takes his rise ("sea," ch. 13. 1; Mark, 13. 8; 9-11). He does not fall like the other seven but is destroyed, going to his own perdition, by his person. 12. ten kings... received no kingdom to receive power as kings... with the beast — and from v. 14, 16, it seems that these ten kings are to be contemporaries with the beast in eighth form, viz., antichrist. Cf. Daniel, "the stone smote the image upon his feet," the ten toes, which are in v. 41-44, interpreted as "kings." The ten kingdoms are not ten which arose in the overthrow of Rome, but are to rise out of the last state of the kingdom under the eighth head. I agree with that the phrase "as kings" implies that they bear kingly rights in their alliance with the beast in "they give their power and strength" (v. 13). They have the name of kings, but undivided kingly power. [WORDSWORTH.] AUBRELL'S not so probable view. Note, v. 2. one definite time of short duration, during which the judgment is come down to the inhabitants of the earth and sea, having great wrath, because he knoweth both but a short time." Probably the three years (ch. 11. 2, 3; 13. 5). Antichrist is in existence before the fall of Babylon; but it is only at that time that he obtains the vassalage of the ten kings. He at once imposes on the Jews as the Messiah in his own name; then persecutes those who refuse his blasphemous pretensions. Not sixteenth vial, in the latter part of his reign, does he slay the ten kings with him in war with the living working them over by the aid of the spirits of the dead. His connexion with the Jews from his sitting "in the temple of God" (2 Thessalonians, 2. 4), and as the antitype of "abomination standing in the Holy place" (1. 10; 2. 27; 12. 11; Matthew, 24. 15), and "in the city which shall be destroyed" (ch. 11. 8). It is reported that IRENEUS, Her., 5. 26, and St. Cyril of Alexandria (Ruffinus Hist., 10. 37), prophesied that Antichrist should have his seat at Jerusalem, and should be king of the Jews. Julian the apostate, after, took part with the Jews, and aided in their temple, herein being antichrist's foretype. So one mind—one sentiment, shall give—So But A. R. and Syriac, "give," strength—Greek, "they." They become his dependent allies (v. 14). Antichrist sets up to be king of kings; but scarcely yet forth his claim when the true King appears and dashes him down in a moment to the ground. 14. These shall... war with the Lamb—in the eighth form. This is a summary anticipation of the eighth form. This shall not be till after they have first judgment on the harlot (v. 14, 16). Lord of lords, &c.—anticipating ch. 13. 16. one—not in the Greek. Therefore translate, "And they that are with Him, called, chosen, and faithful (shall overcome them, viz., the beast and his allied kings)." These have been with Christ in heaven unseen, but now appear with Him. 15. (Ver. 1; Isaiah, 8. 7.) In impious parody of Jehovah who "sitteth upon the flood." [ALFORD.] Also, contrast the "many waters," ch. 19. 6, "Alleluia." The "peoples," &c., here mark the universality of the spiritual fornication of the church. The "tongues" remind us of the original Babel, the confusion of languages, the beginning of Babylon, and the first commencement of idolatrous apostasy after the flood, as the tower was doubtless dedicated to the deified heavens. Thus, Babylon is the appropriate name of the harlot. The pope, as the chief representative of the harlot, claims a double supremacy over all peoples, typified by the "two swords" according to the interpretation of Boniface VIII. in the Bull, "Unam Sanctam," and represented by the two keys, viz., spiritual as the universal bishop, whence he is crowned with the mitre; and temporal, whence he is also crowned with the tiara in token of his imperial supremacy. Contrast with the pope's diadems the "many diadems" of Him who alone has claim to, and shall exercise when He shall come, the twofold dominion (ch. 19. 12). 16. upon the beast—But A. R. Vulgate, and Syriac read, "And the beast," shall make her desolate—having first dismounted her from her seat on the beast (v. 3). naked—stripped of all her grand (v. 4). As Jerusalem used the world-power to crucify her Saviour, and then was destroyed by that very power, Rome; so the church, having apostatised to the world, shall have judgment executed on her first by the world-power, the beast and his allies; and these afterwards shall have judgment executed on them by Christ Himself in person. So Israel leaning on Egypt, a broken reed, is pierced by it, and then Egypt itself is punished. So Israel's whoredom with Assyria and Babylon was punished by the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities. So the church when it goes a whoring after the world as if it were the reality, instead of witnessing against its apostasy from God, is false to its profession; being no longer a reality itself, but a sham, the church is rightly judged by that world which for a time had used the church to further its own ends, whilst all the while "hating" Christ's unworldly religion, but which now no longer wants the church's aid, as her flesh—Greek plural, "masses of flesh," &c., "carnal possessions," implying the fulness of carnality into which the church is sunk. The judgment on the harlot is again and again described (ch. 18. 1; 19. 5): first by an "angel having great power" (ch. 18. 1), then by "another voice from heaven" (ch. 18. 4-20), then by "a mighty angel" (ch. 18. 21-24). Cf. Ezekiel, 16. 37-44, originally said of Israel, but further applicable to the New Testament church when fallen into spiritual fornication. On the phrase, "eat... flesh" for prey upon one's property, and injure the character and person, cf. Psalm 14. 4; 37. 3; Jeremiah, 10. 25; Micah, 3. 3. The first Napoleon's edict published at Rome in 1806, confiscating the Papal dominions and joining them to France, and lately the severance of large portions of the pope's territory from his sway, and the union of them to the dominions of the king of Italy, virtually through Louis Napoleon, are a first instalment of the full realization of this prophecy of the whore's destruction. "Her flesh" seems to point to her temporal dignities and resources, as distinguished from "herself" (Greek). How striking a retribution, that having obtained her first temporal dominions, the exarchate of Ravenna, the kingdom of the Lombards, and the state of Rome, by recognizing the usurper Pepin as lawful king of France, she should be stripped of her dominions by another usurper of France, the Napoleonic dynasty! ~~...with the...~~ legal punishment of an abominable fornication. 17. hath put—the prophetic past tense for the future. fulfilled—Greek, "do," or "accomplish." The Greek poiesai, is distinct from that which is translated "fulfilled," Greek teleotheontai, below. his will—Greek, his mind, or purpose; whilst they think only of doing their own purpose, to agree—lit., "to do (or accomplish) one mind" or "purpose." A and Vulgate omit this clause, but B supports it. the words of God—foretelling the rise and downfall of the beast: Greek hoi logoi in A, B, and ANDREAS. English Version reading is Greek ta rhemata, which is not well supported. Not mere articulate utterances, but the efficient words of Him who is the Word, Greek logos, fulfilled—(ch. 10. 7.) 18. strength—lit., "hath kingship over the kings." The harlot cannot be a mere city literally, but is called so in a spiritual sense (ch. 11. 8). Also the beast cannot represent a spiritual power, but a world-power. In this verse the harlot is presented before us ripe for judgment. The 18th chapter details that judgment.

CHAPTER. XVIII.

VER. 1-24. BABYLON'S FALL: GOD'S PEOPLE CALLED OUT OF HER: THE KING AND MERCHANTS OF THE EARTH MOURN, WHILEST THE SAINTS REJOICE AT HER FALL. 1. And—So Vulgate and ANDREAS. But A, B, Syriac, and Coptic omit "and," power—Greek "authority," lightened—"illuminated," with—Greek, "owing to." 2. mightily...strong—Not supported by MSS. But A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic read, "with lit., in) a mighty voice," is fallen, is fallen—So A, Vulgate, Syriac, and ANDREAS. But B and Coptic omit the second "is fallen" (Isaiah, 21. 9; Jeremiah, 51. 8). This phrase is here prophetic of her fall, still future, as v. 4 proves. devils—Greek, "demons," the hold—a keep or prison. 3. the wine—So B, Syriac, and Coptic, but A, C, and Vulgate omit. drink—ch. 14. 8, from which perhaps "the wine" may have been interpolated. They have drunk of her fornication, the consequence of which will be wrath to themselves. But A, B, and C read, "owing to the wrath of her fornication all nations have fallen." Vulgate and most versions read as English Version, which may be the right reading, though not supported by the oldest MSS. Babylon, the whore, is destroyed, before the beast slays the two witnesses (ch. 11.), and then the beast is destroyed himself. abundance—lit., "power," delicacies—Greek, "luxury." See Note, 1 Timothy, 5. 11, where the Greek verb "wax wanton" is akin to the noun here. Translate, "wanton luxury." The reference is not to earthly merchandise, but to spiritual wares, indulgences, idolatries, superstitions, worldly compromises, where-with the harlot, i.e., the apostate church, has made merchandise of men. This applies especially to Rome; but the Greek, and even in a less degree Protestant churches, are not guiltless. However, the principle of Evangelical Protestantism is pure, but the principle of Rome and the Greek churches is not so. 4. Come out of her, my people—Quoted from Jeremiah, 50. 8; 51. 6, 45. Even in the Romish church God has a people; but they are in great danger: their only safety is in coming out of her at once. So also in every apostate or world-conforming church there are some of God's invisible and true church, who, if they would be safe, must come out. Especially at the eve of God's judgment on apostate Christendom: as Lot was warned to come out of Sodom, just before its destruction, and Israel, to come from about the tents of Dathan and Abiram. So the first Christians came out of Jerusalem, when the apostate Jewish church was judged. "State and Church are precious gifts of God. But the State being desecrated to a different end from what God designed it, viz., to govern for, and as under, God, becomes beast-like; the Church apostatizing becomes the harlot. The true woman is the kernel: beast and harlot are the shell; whenever the kernel is mature, the shell is thrown away." (AUBRELEN.) "The harlot is not Rome alone though she is preeminently so; but every church that has not Christ's mind and spirit. False Christendom, divided into very many sects, is truly Babylon, i.e., confusion. However, in all Christendom the true Jesus-congregation, the woman clothed with the sun, lives and is hidden. Corrupt, lifeless Christendom is the harlot, whose great aim is the pleasure of the flesh, and which is governed by the spirit of nature and the world." (HAIN in AUBRELEN.) The first justification of the woman is in her being called out of Babylon, the harlot, at the culminating stage of the latter's sin, when judgment is about to fall: for apostate Christendom, Babylon, is not to be converted, but to be destroyed. Secondly, she has to pass through an ordeal of persecution from the beast, which purifies and prepares her for the transfiguration-glory at Christ's coming (ch. 19. 4; Luke, 21. 25). be sat partakers—Greek, "have no fellowship with her sins" that ye receive not of her plagues—as Lot's wife, by lingering too near the polluted and doomed city, & her sins—as a great heap, reached—Greek, "reached so far as to come into close contact with, and to clasp unto." 6. Addressed to the executors of God's wrath, reward—Greek, "repay," she rewarded—English Version reading adds "you" with none of the oldest MSS. But A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic omit it. She had not rewarded or repaid the world-power for some injury which the world-power had inflicted on her; but she had given the world-power that which was its due, viz., spiritual delusions, because it did not like to retain God in its knowledge; the unfaithful church's principle was, Papulas non decipi, et desipiatur, "The people like to be deceived, and let them be deceived," double—of sorrow. Contrast with this the double joy which Jerusalem shall receive for her past suffering (Isaiah, 61. 7; Zechariah, 9. 12): even as she has received double punishment for her sins (Isaiah, 40. 2). unto her—So Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS. A, B, and C omit it. in the cup—v. 5; ch. 14. 8; 17. 4), filled—lit., mixed. Fill to her double of the Lord's cup of wrath. 7. How much—i.e., in proportion as. lived deliciously—luxuriously: Note, v. 1, where the Greek is akin. sorrow—Greek, "mourning," as for a dead husband. I sit—So Vulgate. But A, B, and C prefix "that." I am no widow—for the world-power is my husband and my supporter. I shall see sorrow—Greek, "mourning." "I am seated (this low time)...I am no widow...I shall see no sorrow," marks her complete unconcerned security as to the past present, and future. (BENGLI.) I shall never have mourn as one bereft of her husband. As Babylon was queen of the East, so Rome has been queen of the West, and is called on imperial coins "the eternal city." So Papal Rome is called by Ammian Marcellus, 15. 7. "Babylon is a former Rome, and Rome a latter Babylon. Rome is a daughter of Babylon, and by her, as by her mother, God has been pleased to subdue the world under one sway." (ST. AUGUSTINE.) As the Jews' restoration did not take place till Babylon's fall, so R. Kimchi, on Obadiah, writes, "When Rome (Edom) shall be devastated, there shall be redemption to Israel." Romish idolatries have been the great stumbling-blocks to the Jews' acceptance of Christianity. 8. death—on herself, though she thought herself secure even from the death of her husband, mourning—instead of her feasting, famine—instead of her luxurious delicacies (v. 3, 7). fire—(Note, ch. 17. 16.) Literal fire may burn the literal city of Rome, which is situated in the midst of volcanic agencies. As the ground was cursed for Adam's sin, and the earth under Noah was sunk beneath the flood, and Sodom was burnt with fire, so may Rome be. But as the harlot is mystical (the whole faithless church), the burning may be mainly mystical, symbolizing other destructions and removal. BABYLON is probably right in thinking Rome will once more rise to power. The carnal, faithless, and worldly elements in all churches, Roman, Greek, and Protestant, tend towards one common centre, and prepare the way for the last form of the beast, viz., antichrist. The Pharisees were in the main sound in creed, yet judgment fell on them as on the unsonnd Sadducees and half heathenish Samaritans. So faithless and adulterous, carnal, worldly Protestant churches, will not escape for their soundness of creed, the Lord—So B, C, Syriac, and ANDREAS. But A and Vulgate omit. "Strong" is the meaning of God's Hebrew name, El. Judgeth—But A, B, and C read the past tense (Greek krinas), "who hath judged her:" the prophetic past for the future: the charge in v. 4. to God's people to come out of her, implies, that the judgment was not yet actually executed. 9. Lived deliciously—Greek, luxuriated. The faithless church, instead of reproving, connived at the self-indulgent luxury of the great men of this world, and sanctioned it by her own practice. Contrast the world's rejoicing over the dead bodies of the two witnesses (ch. 11. 10) who had tormented it by their faithfulness, with its lamentations over the harlot who had made the way to heaven smooth, and had been found a useful tool in keeping subjects in abject tyranny. Men's carnal mind relishes a religion, like that of the apostate church, which gives an opiate to conscience, whilst leaving the sinner licence to indulge his lusts. bewail her—A, B, C, Syriac, Coptic, and CYPRIAN omit "her." 10. God's judgments inspire fear even in the worldly, but it is of short duration, for the kings and great men soon attach themselves to the beast in its last and worst shape, as open antichrist, claiming all that the harlot had claimed in blasphemous pretensions and more, and so making up to them for the loss of the harlot. mighty—Rome in Greek means strength; though that derivation is doubtful. 11. shall—So B. But A and C read the present, "weep and mourn" merchandise—Greek, "cargo;" wares carried in ship: ship-lading (cf. v. 17). Rome was not a commercial city, and is not likely from her position to be so. The merchandise must therefore be spiritual, even as the harlot is not literal, but spiritual. She did not witness against carnal luxury and pleasure-seeking, the source of the merchants' gains, but conformed to them (v. 7). She cared not for the sheep, but for the wool. Professing-Christian merchants in her lived as if this world were the reality, not heaven, and were unscrupulous as to the means of getting gain. Cf. Zechariah, 5. 4-11 (Notes), on the same subject, the judgment on mystical Babylon's merchants for unjust gain. All the merchandise here mentioned occurs repeatedly in the "Roman Ceremonial." 12. (Note, ch. 17. 4.) stones...pearls—Greek, "stone...pearl." fine linen—A, B, and C read (Greek) bussinow for bussow, i.e., "fine linen manufacture." [ALFORD.] The manufacture for which Egypt (the type of the apostate church, ch. 11. 8) was famed. Contrast "the fine linen" (Ezekiel, 16. 10) put on Israel, and on the New Testament church (ch. 19. 8), the Bride, by God (Psalm 132. 9), thine wood—the citrus of the Romans: probably the cyprus thuyoides, or the thwa articulata. "Citron wood." [ALFORD.] A sweet smelling tree of Cyrene in Libya, used for incense, all manner vessels—Greek, "every vessel," or "furniture." 13. cinnamon—designed by God for better purposes: being an ingredient in the holy anointing oil, and a plant in the garden of the Beloved (Song of Solomon, 4. 14); but desecrated to vile uses by the adulteress (Proverbs, 7. 17). odours—of incense. A, C, Vulgate, and Syriac prefix "and ammonium" (a precious hair ointment made from an Asiatic shrub). English Version reading is supported by Coptic and ANDREAS, but not oldest MSS. ointments—Greek, "ointment." frankincense—Contrast the true "incense" which God loves (Psalm 141. 2; Malachi, 1. 11), fine flour—The similitudo of the Latins. [ALFORD.] beasts—of burden: cattle, slaves—Greek, "bodies." souls of men—(Ezekiel, 27. 13.) Said of slaves. Appropriate to the spiritual harlot, apostate Christendom, especially Rome, which has so often enslaved both bodies and souls of men. Though the New Testament does not directly forbid slavery, which would, in the then state of the world, have incited a slave-revolt, it virtually condemns it, as here. Popery has derived its greatest gains from the sale of masses for the souls of men after death, and of indulgences purchased from the Papal chancery by rich merchants in various countries, to be retailed at a profit. [MOSHEM III., 96, 98.] 14. Direct address to Babylon, the fruits that thy soul lusted after—Greek, "thy autumn-ripe-fruits of the lust (eager desire) of the soul," dainty—Greek, "fat;" "sumptuous" in food, goodly—"splendid," "bright," in dress and equipage, departed—supported by none of our MSS. But A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic read, "perished," thou shalt—A, C, Vulgate, and Syriac read, "They (men) shall no more find them at all." 15. of these things—of the things mentioned, v. 12, 13, which—"soho," made rich by—Greek, "derived riches from her," stand afar off for the fear—(cf. v. 10.) wailing—Greek, "mourning." 16. And—So Vulgate and ANDREAS. But A, B, and C omit. deeked—it, "gilded" stones...pearls—Greek, "stone...pearl." B and ANDREAS read "pearls." But A and C, "pearl." 17. is come to nought—Greek, "is desolated." shipmaster—Greek, "steersman," or "pilot," all the company in ships—A, C, Vulgate, and Syriac read, "Every one who saileth to a place" (B has "...to the place"); every voyager. Vessels were freighted with pilgrims to various shrines, so that in one month (A.D. 1300) 300,000 pilgrims were counted in Rome [D'AUBIGNÉ, Reformation]: a source of gain, not only to the Papal see, but to shipmasters, merchants, pilots, &c. These latter, however, are not restricted to those literally "shipmasters," &c., but mainly refer, in the mystical sense, to all who share in the spiritual traffic of apostate Christendom. 18. when they saw—Greek horantes. But A, B, C, and ANDREAS read, Greek blepentes, "looking at." Greek blepo is to see the eye, to look; the act of seeing without thought of the object seen. Greek horao refer to the thing seen or presented to the eye. [TITTMANN.] smoke—So B, C. But A reads, "place." What city is like—cf. the similar boast as to the beast, ch. 13. 4; so closely do the harlot and beast approximate one another. Contrast the attribution of this praise to God, to whom alone it is due, by His servants (Exodus, 16. 11). MARTIAL says of Rome, "Nothing is equal to her; and ATHENEUS, "She is the epitome of the world." 19. wailing—"mourning," ostliness—her costly treasures: abstract for concrete, that had ships—A, B, and C read, "that had their ships." lit., "the ships." 20. holy apostles—So C reads. But A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS read, "Ye saints and ye apostles." avenged you on her—Greek, "judged your judgment on (lit., exacting it from) her." "There is more joy in heaven at the harlot's downfall, than at that of the two beasts. For the most heinous of all sins is the sin of those who know God's word of grace, and keep it not. The worldliness of the church is the most worldly of all worldliness. Hence, Babylon, in Revelation, has not only Israel's sins, but also the sins of the heathen; and John dwells longer on the abominations and judgments of the harlot, than on those of the beast. The term 'harlot' describes the false church's essential character. She retains her human shape as the woman, does not become a beast: she has the form of godliness, but denies its power. Her rightful lord and husband, Jehovah-Christ, and the joys and goods of His house, are no longer her all in all, but she runs after the vain and vain things of the world, in its manifold forms. The fullest form of her whoredom is, where the church wishes to be itself a worldly power, uses politics and diplomacy, makes flesh her arm, uses unholy means for holy ends, spreads her dominion by sword or money, fascinates men by sensual ritualism, becomes 'mistress of ceremonies' to the dignitaries of the world, flatters prince or people, and like Israel, seeks the help of one world-power against the danger threatening from another." [AUBRELEN.] Judgment, therefore, begins with the harlot, as in privileges the house of God. 21. a—Greek, "one," milstone—Of the judgment on the Egyptian hosts at the Red sea, Exodus, 15. 8, 10; Nehemiah, 9. 11, and the foretold doom of Babylon, the world-power, Jeremiah, 51. 63, 64. with violence—Greek, "with impetus." This verse shows that this prophecy is regarded as still to be fulfilled. 22. pipers—flute-players, "Musicians," painters, and sculptors, have desecrated their art to lend fascination to the sensuous worship of corrupt Christendom, craftsman—artisan. 23. What a blessed contrast is ch. 21. 5, respecting the city of God: "They need no candle (just as Babylon shall no more have the light of a candle, but for a widely different reason) for the Lord God giveth them light." For "candle," translate as Greek, "lamp," bridegroom...bride...as more...in thee—Contrast the heavenly city, with its Bridegroom, Bride, and blessed marriage supper (ch. 19. 7, 9; 21. 2, 9; Isaiah, 62. 4, 5). thy merchants were—So most of the best authorities read. But A omits the Greek article before "merchants," and then translates, "The great men of, &c., were thy merchants." sorceries—Greek, "sorcery." 24. Applied by Christ (Matthew, 23. 35) to apostate Jerusalem, which proves that not merely the literal city Rome, and the church of Rome (though the chief representative of the apostasy), but the whole of the faithless church of both the Old and New Testament is meant by Babylon the harlot; just as the whole church (Old and New Testament) is meant by "the woman" (ch. 12. 1). As to the literal city, ARINGBUS in BENGEI says, Pagan Rome was the general shambles for slaying the sheep of Jesus. FIED, SKYLEI in BENGEI calculates that Papal Rome, between A.D. 1540 and 1650, slew more than 900,000 Protestants. Three reasons for the harlot's downfall are given: (1.) The worldly greatness of her merchants, which was due to unholy traffic in spiritual things. (2.) Her sorceries, or juggling tricks, in which the false prophet that ministers to the beast in its last form, shall exceed her; cf. "sorcerers" (ch. 21. 8; 22. 15), specially mentioned among those doomed to the lake of fire. (3.) Her persecution of (Old Testament) "propets" and (New Testament) "saints."

CHAPTER XIX.

VER. 1-21. THE CHURCH'S THANKSGIVING IN HEAVEN FOR THE JUDGMENT ON THE HARLOT. THE MARRIAGE OF THE LAMB: THE SUPPER: THE BRIDE'S PREPARATION: JOHN IS FORBIDDEN TO WORSHIP THE ANGEL: THE LORD AND HIS HOSTS COME FORTH FOR WAR: THE BEAST AND THE FALSE PROPHET CAST INTO THE LAKE OF FIRE: THE KINGS AND THEIR FOLLOWERS SLAIN BY THE SWORD OUT OF CHRIST'S MOUTH. 1. As in the case of the opening of the prophecy, ch. 4. 8; 5. 9, &c.: so now, at one of the great closing events seen in vision, the judgment on the harlot (described in ch. 18.), there is a song of praise in heaven to God: cf. ch. 7. 10, &c., towards the close of the seals, and ch. 11. 15-18, at the close of the trumpet; ch. 15. 3, at the saints' victory over the beast. And—So ANDREAS. But A, B, C, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic omit. a great voice—A, B, C, Vulgate, Coptic, and ANDREAS read, "as it were a great voice." What a contrast to the lamentations, ch. 18! Cf. Jeremiah, 51. 48. The great manifestation of God's power in destroying Babylon calls forth a great voice of praise in heaven.

people—Greek, "multitude." Alleluia—Hebrew, "Praise ye JAH," or JEHOVAH: here first used in Revelation, whence ELLIOTT infers the Jews bear a prominent part in this thanksgiving. JAH is not a contraction of JEHOVAH, as it sometimes occurs jointly with the latter. It means "He who is;" whereas Jehovah is "He who will be, is, and was." It implies God experienced as a PRESENT help; so that "Hallelujah," say KIMCHI in BENGEI, is found first in the Psalms on the destruction of the ungodly. "Hallelu-Jah" occurs four times in this passage. Cf. Psalm 149. 4-8, which is plainly parallel, and indeed identical in many of the phrases, as well as the general idea. Israel, especially, will join in the Halleluia, when "her warfare is accomplished" and her foe destroyed. salvation—Greek, "The salvation...the glory...the power," and heast—So Coptic. But A, B, C, and Syriac omit, unto the Lord our God—So ANDREAS. But A, B, C, and Coptic read, "(Is) of our God," &c., belongs to Him. 2. which did corrupt the earth—Greek, "used to corrupt" continually. "Instead of opposing and lessening, she promoted the sinful life and decay of the world by her own earthliness, allowing the salt to lose its savour." [AUBRELEN.] avenged—Greek, "exactd in retribution." A particular application of the principle (Genesis, 9. 2). blood of his servants—literally shed by the Old Testament adulterous church, and by the New Testament apostate church; also virtually, though not literally, by all who, though called Christians, hate their brother, or love not the brethren of Christ, but shrink from the reproach of the cross, and show unkindness towards those who bear it. 3. again—Greek, "a second time." rose up—Greek, "goeth up" for ever and ever—Greek, "to the ages of the ages." 4. beasts—rather, "living creatures." sat—Greek, "sitteth." 5. out of—Greek, "out from the throne" is A, B, C. Praise our God—Of the solemn act of praise performed by the Levites 1 Chronicles, 16. 26; 23. 5, especially when the house of God was filled with the Divine glory (2 Chronicles, 5. 13). both—Omitted in A, B, C, Vulgate, Coptic, and Syriac. Translate as Greek, "the small and the great." 6. many waters—Contrast the "many waters" on which the whore sitteth (ch. 17. 1). This verse is the hearty response to the stirring call "Halleluia! Praise our God," &c. (v. 4.). the Lord God omnipotent—Greek, "The Omnipotent" reigneth—lit., reigned; hence reigneth once for all. His reign is a fact already established. Babylon, the harlot, was one great hindrance to His reign being recognised. Her overthrow now clears the way for His advent to reign; therefore, not merely Rome, but the whole of Christendom in so far as it is carnal and compromised Christ for the world is comprehended in the term "harlot." The beast hardly arises when he at once "goeth into perdition;" so that Christ is prophetically considered as already reigning, so soon does His advent follow the judgment on the harlot. 7. glad...rejoice—Greek, "rejoice...exult." give—So B and ANDREAS. But A reads, "we will give" glory—Greek, "the glory." the marriage of the Lamb is com—The full and final consummation is at ch. 21. 2-4. Previously there must be the overthrow of the beast, &c., at the Lord's coming, the binding of Satan, the millennial reign, the loosing of Satan, and his last overthrow, and the general judgment. The elect—church, the heavenly Bride, soon after the destruction of the harlot, is transfigured at the Lord's coming, and joins with Him in His triumph over the beast. (On the emblem of the heavenly Bridegroom and Bride, cf. Matthew, 22. 2; 25. 6, 10; 2 Corinthians, 11. 2. Perfect union with Him personally, and participation in His holiness, joy, glory, and kingdom, are included in this symbol of "marriage;" cf. Song of Solomon everywhere. Besides the heavenly bride, the transfigured, translated, and risen church, reigning over the earth with Christ, there is also the earthly bride, Israel, in her flesh, never yet divorced, though for a time separated, from her Divine husband, who shall then be reunited to the Lord, and be the mother-church of the millennial earth, Christianized through her. Note, we ought, as Scripture does, restrict the language drawn from marriage-love to the Bride, the church as a whole, or use it as individuals in our relation to Christ, which Rome does in the case of her nuns. Individually believers are effectually-called guests; collectively, they constitute the bride. The harlot divides her affections among many lovers: the bride gives hers exclusively to Christ. 8. granted—Though in one sense she "made herself ready," having by the Spirit's work as her put on "the wedding garment," yet in the fullest sense it is not she, but her Lord, who makes her ready by "granting to her that she be arrayed in fine linen." It is He who by giving Himself for her, presents her to Himself a glorious church not having spot, but holy and without blemish. It is He also who sanctifies her, naturally vile and without beauty, with the washing of water by the word, and puts His own comeliness on her, which thus becomes hers, clean and white—So ANDREAS. But A. B transpose. Translate, "Bright and pure": at once brilliantly splendid and spotless as the bride herself. righteousness—Greek, "righteousnesses" distributively used. Each saint must have his righteousness: not merely be justified, as if the righteousness belonged to the church in the aggregate; be saints together have righteousnesses, viz., He is accounted as "the Lord our righteousness" to each saint in his believing, their robes being made white in the blood of the Lamb. The righteousness of the saint is not, as ALFORD erroneously states, inherent, but is imputed: if it were otherwise, Christ would be merely enabling the sinner to justify himself. Romans, 5, 18, is decisive on this. Cf. Article XL, Church of England. The justification already given to the saints in title and unseen possession, is now GIVEN them in manifestation: they openly walk with Christ in white. To his rather than to their primary justification on earth, he reference is here. Their justification before the postate world which had persecuted them, contrasts with the judgment and condemnation of the harlot. Now that the harlot has fallen, the woman triumphs. AUBERLEN.] Contrast with the pure fine linen (indicating the simplicity and purity) of the bride, the sordid ornamentation of the harlot. Babylon, the postate church, is the antithesis to new Jerusalem, the transfigured church of God. The woman (ch. 12.), the harlot (ch. 17.), the bride (ch. 19.), are the three leading aspects of the church. 9. He—God by His angel saith unto me, called—effectually, not merely externally. The "unto," or "into," seems to express his: not merely invited to (Greek epi), but called INTO, as to be partakers of (Greek eti), cf. 1 Corinthians, 10, 9. marriage supper—Greek, "the supper of the marriage." Typified by the Lord's supper. true—Greek, "genuine"; veritable sayings which shall surely be fulfilled, viz., all the previous revelations. 10. at—Greek, "before." John's intending to worship the angel here, as in ch. 22, 8, on having revealed to him the glory of the new Jerusalem, is the involuntary impulse of adoring joy at so blessed a prospect. It forms a marked contrast to the sorrowful wonder with which he had looked on the church in her apostasy as the harlot (ch. 17, 6). It exemplifies the corrupt tendencies of our fallen nature that even John, an apostle, should have all but fallen into "voluntary humility and worshipping of angels," which Paul warns us against, and of thy brethren—i.e., a fellow-servant of thy brethren, have the testimony of Jesus—(Note, ch. 2, 17). the testimony of—i.e., respecting Jesus, is the spirit of prophecy—is the result of the same spirit of prophecy in you as in myself. We angels, and you apostles, all alike have the testimony of (bear testimony concerning) Jesus by the operation of one and the same Spirit, who enables me to show you these revelations, and enables you to record them: wherefore we are fellow-servants, not I your lord to be worshipped by you. Cf. ch. 23, 9. "I am fellow-servant of thee and of thy brethren the prophets;" whence the "for the testimony," &c., here may be explained as giving the reason for his adding "and (fellow-servant) of thy brethren that have the testimony of Jesus," I mean, of the prophets: "for it is of Jesus that thy brethren, the prophets, testify by the Spirit in them." A clear condemnation of Romish invocation of saints, as if they were our superiors to be adored. 11. behold a white horse: and he that sat upon him—Identical with ch. 6, 2. Here as there he comes forth "conquering and to conquer." Compare the ass-colt on which He rode into Jerusalem. The horse was used for war; and here He is going forth to war with the beast. The ass is for peace. His riding on it into Jerusalem is an earnest of His reign in Jerusalem over the earth, as the Prince of peace, after all hostile powers have been overthrown. When the security of the world-power, and the distress of the people of God, have reached the highest point, the Lord Jesus shall appear visibly from heaven to put an end to the whole course of the world, and establish His kingdom of glory. He comes to judge with vengeance the world-power, and to bring to the church redemption, transfiguration, and power over the world. Distinguish between this coming (Matthew, 24, 27, 29, 37, 39: Greek parousia) and the end, or final judgment (Matthew, 26, 51; 1 Corinthians, 15, 23). Powerful natural phenomena shall accompany His advent. (AUBERLEN.) 12. Identifying Him with the Son of man similarly described, ch. 1, 14. many crowns—Greek, "diadems," not merely (Greek stephanoi) garlands of victory, but royal crowns, as KING or KINGS. Christ's diadem comprises all the diadems of the earth and of heavenly powers too. Contrast the Papal tiara composed of three diadems. Cf. also the little horn (antichrist) that overcomes the three horns or kingdoms, Daniel, 7, 8, 24 (Quare, the Papacy) or some three kingdoms that succeed the Papacy, which itself, as a temporal kingdom, was made up at first of three kingdoms, the exarchate of Ravenna, the kingdom of the Lombards, and the state of Rome, obtained by Pope Zachary and Stephen II, from Pepin, the usurper of the French dominion. Also, the seven crowns (diadems) on the seven heads of the dragon (ch. 12, 3), and ten diadems on the ten heads of the beast. These usurpers claim the diadems which belong to Christ alone. he had a name written—B and Syriac insert, "He had names written, and a name written," &c., meaning that the names of the dominion which each diadem indicated, were written on them severally. But A, Vulgate, ORIGEN, and CYPRIAN omit the words, as English Version, name...that no man knew but... himself—(Judges, 13, 18; 1 Corinthians, 2, 9, 11; 1 John, 3, 2). The same is said of the "new name" of believers. In this, as in all other respects, the disciple is made like his Lord. The Lord's own "new name" is to be theirs, and to be "in their foreheads;" whence we may infer that His as yet unknown name also is written on His forehead: as the high priest had "Holiness to the Lord" inscribed on the mitre on his brow. John saw it as "written" but knew not its meaning. It is, therefore, a name which in all its glorious significance can be only understood when the union of His saints with Him, and His and their joint triumph and reign, shall be perfectly manifested at the final consummation. 13. vesture dipped in blood—Isaiah, 63, 2, is alluded to here, and in v. 16, end. There the blood is not His own, but that of His foes. So here the blood on His "vesture," reminding us of His own blood shed for even the ungodly who triumph on it.

is a premonition of the shedding of their blood in righteous retribution. He sheds the blood, not of the godly, as the harlot and beast did, but of the blood-stained ungodly, including them both. The Word of God—who made the world, is He also who under the same character and attributes shall make it anew. His title, Son of God, is applicable, in a lower sense, also to His people; but "The Word of God" indicates His incommunicable Godhead, joined to His manhood, which He shall then manifest in glory. "The bride does not fear the Bridegroom: her love casteth out fear. She welcomes Him: she cannot be happy but at His side. The Lamb [v. 9, the aspect of Christ to His people at His coming] is the symbol of Christ in His gentleness. Who would be afraid of a lamb? Even a little child, instead of being scared, desires to caress it. There is nothing to make us afraid of God but sin, and Jesus is the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. What a fearful contrast is the aspect which He will wear towards His enemies! Not as the Bridegroom and the Lamb, but as the (avenging) Judge and warrior stained in the blood of His enemies." 14. the armies... in heaven—Cf. "the horse-bridles," ch. 14. 20. The glorified saints whom God "will bring with" Christ at His advent; cf. ch. 17. 14, "they that are with Him called, chosen, faithful," as also "His mighty angels," white and clean—Greek—"pure." A. B. Vulgate, Syriac, and CYPRIAN omit "and," which ORIGEN and ANDREAS retain, as English Version. 15. out of his mouth... sword—leb. 1. 16; 2. 12, 16. Here in its avenging power, 2 Thessalonians, 2. 8, "consume with the Spirit of His mouth" (Isaiah, 11. 4, to which there is allusion here; not in its convicting and converting efficacy (Ephesians, 6. 17; Hebrews, 4. 12, 13, where also the judicial keenness of the sword-like word is included). The Father commits the judgment to the Son. he shall rule—The He is emphatical, He and none other, in contrast to the usurpers who have intruded on earth. "Rule," He., "tend as a shepherd," but here in a punitive sense. He who would have shepherded them with pastoral rod and with the golden sceptre of His love, shall dash them in pieces, as refractory rebels, with "a rod of iron." treadeth... wine-press—(Isaiah, 63. 3.) of the fierce and wrath—So ANDREAS reads, But A. B. Vulgate, Coptic, and ORIGEN read, "of the fierceness (or boiling indignation) of the wrath," omitting "and." Almighty—The fierceness of Christ's wrath against His foes will be executed with the resources of omnipotence. 16. "His name written on His vesture and on His thigh," was written partly on the vesture, partly on the thigh itself, at the part where in an equestrian figure the robe drops from the thigh. The thigh symbolizes Christ's humanity as having come, after the flesh, from the loins of David, and now appearing as the glorified "Son of man." On the other hand His incommunicable Divine name, "which no man knew," is on His head v. 12. [MEMORICUS.] KING OF KINGS: cf. ch. 17. 14, in contrast with v. 17, the beast being in attempted usurpation a king of kings, the ten kings delivering their kingdom to him. 17. as—Greek, "one," in the sun—so as to be conspicuous in sight of the whole world, to all the fowls—(Ezekiel, 39. 17-30.) and gather yourselves—A. B. Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS read, "be gathered," omitting "and," of the great G. A. B. Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS read, "The great supper (i.e., banquet) of God." 18. Contrast with this "supper," v. 17. 18, the marriage-supper of the Lamb, v. 9, captains—Greek, "captains of thousands," i.e., chief captains. The "kings" are "the ten" who "give their power unto the beast." free and bond—specified in ch. 13. 19, as "receiving the mark of the beast." The repetition of flesh in the Greek it is plural: masses of flesh five times in this verse, marks the gross carnality of the followers of the beast. Again, the giving of their flesh to the fowls to eat, is a righteous retribution for their not suffering the dead bodies of Christ's witnesses to be put in graves. 19. gathered together—at Armageddon, under the sixth vial. For "their armies" in B and ANDREAS, there is found "His armies" in A. war—So ANDREAS. But A. B. read, "the war," viz., that foretold, ch. 16. 14; 17. 4. 20. and with him, &c.—A reads, "and those with him." B reads, "and he who was with him, the false prophet." miracles—Greek, "the miracles" (lit., "signs") recorded already (ch. 13. 14) as wrought by the second beast before (lit., in sight of) the first beast. Hence it follows the second beast is identical with the false prophet. Many expositors represent the first beast to be the secular, the second beast to be the ecclesiastical power of Rome; and account for the change of title for the latter from the "other beast" to the "false prophet," is because by the judgment on the harlot, the ecclesiastical power will then retain nothing of its former character save the power to deceive. I think it not unlikely that the false prophet will be the successor of the spiritual pretensions of the Papacy; whilst the beast in its last form as the fully-revealed antichrist will be the secular representative and embodiment of the fourth world-kingdom, Rome, in its last form of intensified opposition to God. Cf. with this prophecy, Ezekiel, 38. 27; Daniel, 2. 34, 35, 44; 11. 44, 45; 12. 1; Joel, 3. 9-17; Zechariah, 12; 13; 14. Daniel (7. 8) makes no mention of the second beast, or false prophet, but mentions that "the little horn" has "the eyes of a man," i.e., cunning and intellectual culture: this is not a feature of the first beast in ch. 13., but is expressed by the Apocalyptic "false prophet," the embodiment of man's un sanctified knowledge, and the subtlety of the old serpent. The first beast is a political power; the second is a spiritual power—the power of ideas. Both are beasts, the worldly anti-Christian wisdom serving the worldly anti-Christian power. The dragon is both lion and serpent. As the first law in God's moral government is that "judgment should begin at the house of God," and be executed on the harlot, the faithless church, by the world-power with which she had committed spiritual adultery, so it is a second law that the world-power, after having served as God's instrument of punishment, is itself punished. As the harlot is judged by the beast and the ten kings, so these are destroyed by the Lord Himself coming in person. So Zephaniah, ch. 1 compared with ch. 2. And Jeremiah, after denouncing Jerusalem's judgment by Babylon, ends with denouncing Babylon's own doom. Between the judgment on the harlot, and the Lord's destruction of the beast, &c., will intervene that season in which earthly-mindedness will reach its culmination, and anti-Christianity triumph for its short three and a half days during which the two witnesses lie dead. Then shall the church be ripe for her glorification, the anti-Christian world for destruction. The world at the highest development of its material and spiritual power, is but a decorated carcass round which the eagles gather. It is characteristic, that antichrist and his kings, in their blindness, imagine that they can wage war against the King of heaven with earthly hosts: herein is shown the extreme folly of Babylonian confusion. The Lord's mere appearance, without any actual encounter, shows antichrist his nothingness: cf. the effect of Jesus' appearance even in His humiliation, John, 18. 6. [AUBERLEN.] had received—rather as Greek, "received," once for all. them that worshipped—lit., "them worshipping;" not an act once for all done, as the "received" implies, but those in the habit of "worshipping." These both were cast... into a lake—Greek, "... the lake of fire," Gehenna. Satan is subsequently cast into it, at the close of the outbreak which succeeds the millennium (ch. 20. 10).

Then Death and Hell, as well those not found at the general judgment "written in the book of life:" this constitutes "the second death," alive—a living death; not mere annihilation. "Their worm dieth not, their fire is not quenched." 21. the remnant—Greek, "the rest," i.e., "the kings and their armies" (v.19) classed together in one indiscriminate mass. A solemn confirmation of the warning in Psalm 2. 10.

CHAPTER XX.

VER. 1-15. SATAN BOUND, AND THE FIRST-RISEN SAINTS' REIGN WITH CHRIST, A THOUSAND YEARS: SATAN LOOSED GATHERS THE NATIONS, GOG AND MAGOG, BOUND THE CAMP OF THE SAINTS, AND IS FINALLY CONSIDERED TO THE LAKE OF FIRE: THE GENERAL RESURRECTION AND LAST JUDGMENT. 1. The destruction of his representatives, the beast and the false prophet, to whom he had given his power, throne, and authority, is followed by the binding of Satan himself for a thousand years. the key of the bottomless pit—now transferred from Satan's hands, who had heretofore been permitted by God to use it in letting loose plagues on the earth: he is now to be made to feel himself the torment which he had inflicted on men: but his full torment is not until he is cast into "the lake of fire" (v. 10). 2. the old—ancient serpent (ch. 12. 9). thousand years—As seven mystically implies universality, so a thousand implies perfection, whether in good or evil. [AQUINAS on ch. 11.] Thousand symbolizes that the world is perfectly leavened and pervaded by the Divine: since thousand is ten, the number of the world, raised to the third power, three being the number of God. [AUBERLEN.] It may denote literally also a thousand years. 3. shut him—A. B. Vulgate, Syriac, and ANDREAS omit "him." set a seal upon him—Greek, "over him," i.e., sealed up the door of the abyss over his head. A surer seal to keep him from getting out than his seal over Jesus in the tomb of Joseph, which was burst on the resurrection morn. Satan's binding at this juncture is not arbitrary, but is the necessary consequence of the events (ch. 19. 20): just as Satan's being cast out of heaven, where he had previously been the accuser of the brethren, was the legitimate judgment which passed on him through the death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ (ch. 12. 7-10). Satan imagined that he had overcome Christ on Golgotha, and that his power was secure for ever, but the Lord in death overcame him, and by His ascension as our righteous Advocate cast out Satan the accuser from heaven. Time was given him on earth to make the beast and harlot powerful, and then to concentrate all his power in antichrist. The anti-Christian kingdom, his last effort, being utterly destroyed by Christ's mere appearing, his power on earth is at an end. He had thought to destroy God's people on earth by anti-Christian persecutions (just as he had thought previously to destroy Christ); but the church is not destroyed from the earth, but is raised to rule over it, and Satan himself is shut up for a thousand years in the "abyss" (Greek for "bottomless pit"), the preparatory prison to the "lake of fire," his final doom. As before he ceased by Christ's ascension to be an accuser in heaven, so during the millennium he ceases to be the seducer and the persecutor on earth. As long as the devil rules in the darkness of the world, we live in an atmosphere impregnated with deadly elements. A mighty purification of the air will be effected by Christ's coming. Though sin will not be absolutely abolished—for men will still be in the flesh [Isaiah, 65. 20]—sin will no longer be a universal power, for the flesh is not any longer seduced by Satan. He will not be, as now, "the god and prince of the world"—nor will the world "lie in the wicked one"—the flesh will become ever more isolated and be overcome. Christ will reign with His transfused saints over men in the flesh. [AUBERLEN.] This will be the manifestation of "the world to come," which has been already set up invisibly in the saints, amidst "this world" (2 Corinthians, 4. 4; Hebrews, 2. 5; 5. 6). The Jewish Rabbis thought, as the world was created in six days and on the seventh God rested, so there would be six millenary periods, followed by a Sabbatical millennium. Out of seven years every seventh is the year of remission, so out of the seven thousand years of the world the seventh millenary shall be the millenary of remission. A tradition in the house of ELIAS A.D. 900, states that the world is to endure 6000 years: 2000 before the law, 2000 under the law, and 2000 under Messiah. Cf. Note and Margin, Hebrews, 4. 9; ch. 14. 13. PAFIAR, JUSTIN MARTYR, IRENÆUS, and CYPRIAN, among the earliest fathers, all held the doctrine of a millennial kingdom on earth: not till millennial views degenerated into gross carnalism was this doctrine abandoned, that he should deceive—So A. But B reads, "that he deceive" (Greek plana, for planesee). and—So COPTIC and ANDREAS. But A, B, and Vulgate omit "and." 4, 5. they sat—the twelve apostles, and the saints in general, judgment was given unto them—(Note, Daniel, 7. 22.) The office of judging was given to them. Though in one sense having to stand before the judgment seat of Christ, yet in another sense they "do not come into judgment" (Greek), but have already passed from death unto life." souls—This term is made a plea for denying the literality of the first resurrection, as if the resurrection were the spiritual one of the souls of believers in this life: the life and reign being that of the soul raised in this life from the death of sin by vivifying faith. But "souls" expresses their disembodied state (of ch. 6. 9) as JOHN saw them at first; "and they lived" implies their coming to life in the body again, so as to be visible, as the phrase, v. 5, "this is the first resurrection," proves: for as surely as "the rest of the dead lived not (again) until, &c.," refers to the bodily general resurrection, so accords the first resurrection refer to the body. This also concurs with 1 Corinthians, 15. 23, "That they are Christ's at His coming." Cf. Psalm, 49. 11-15. From ch. 6. 9. I infer that "souls" is here used in the strict sense of spirits disembodied when first seen by John: though doubtless "souls" is often used in general for persons, and even for dead bodies, beheaded—lit., "smitten with an axe:" a Roman punishment, though crucifixion, casting to beasts, and burning, were the more common modes of execution. The guillotine in revolutionary France, still continued in imperial France, is a revival of the mode of capital punishment of pagan imperial Rome. Paul was beheaded, and no doubt shall share the first resurrection, in accordance with his prayer that he "might attain unto the resurrection from out of the rest of the dead" (Greek cazantasis). The above facts may account for the specification of this particular kind of punishment. for...for—Greek, "for the sake of;" "on account of," "because of," and which—Greek, "and the which." And prominent among this class (the beheaded), such as did not worship the beast, &c. So ch. 1. 7. Greek, "and the which," or "and such as," particularizes prominently among the general class those that follow in the description. [TRICKLES.] The extent of the first resurrection is not spoken of here. In 1 Corinthians, 15. 23, 51; 1 Thessalonians, 4. 14, we find that all "in Christ" shall share in it. JOHN himself was not "beheaded," yet who doubts but that he shall share in the first resurrection? The martyrs are put first, because most like Jesus in their suffering and death, therefore nearest Him in their life and reign; for Christ indirectly affirms there are relative degrees and places of honour in His kingdom, the highest being for those who drink His cup of suffering. Next shall be those who have not bowed to the world-power, but have looked to the things unseen and eternal, neither—"not yet," reigned with Christ—Greek, "not yet," earth, foreheads, hands—Greek, "forehead, hand." 5. But—B, Coptic, and ANDREAS read, "and." A and Vulgates omit it, again—A, B, Vulgata, Coptic, and ANDREAS omit it. Lives is used for lived again, as in ch. 2. 8. John saw them not only when restored to life, but when in the act of reviving. (BENJEL.) first resurrection—"the resurrection of the just." Earth is not yet transfigured, and cannot therefore be the meet locality for the transfigured church; but from heaven the transfigured saints with Christ rule the earth, there being a much freer communion of the heavenly and earthly churches (a type of which state may be seen in the forty days of the risen Saviour during which He appeared to His disciples, and they know no higher joy than to lead their brethren on earth to the same salvation and glory as they share themselves. The millennial reign on earth does not rest on an isolated passage of the Apocalypse, but all Old Testament prophecy goes on the same view (cf. Isaiah, 4. 3; 11. 9; 35. 8). Jesus, whilst opposing the carnal views of the kingdom of God prevalent among the Jews in His day, does not contradict, but confirms, the Old Testament view of a coming earthly, Jewish kingdom of glory; beginning from within, and spreading itself now spiritually, the kingdom of God shall manifest itself outwardly at Christ's coming again. The Papacy is a false anticipation of the kingdom during the Church-historical period. "When Christianity became a worldly power under Constantine, the hope of the future was weakened by the joy over present success." (BENJEL.) Becoming a harlot, the church ceased to be a bride going to meet her Bridegroom: thus millennial hopes disappeared. The rights which Rome as a harlot usurped, shall be exercised in holiness by the Bride. They are "kings" because they are "priests" (v. 6; ch. 1. 6; 5. 10); their priesthood unto God and Christ (ch. 7. 15) is the ground of their kingship in relation to man. Men will be willing subjects of the transfigured priest-kings, in the day of the Lord's power. Their power is that of attraction, winning the heart, and not counteracted by devil or beast. Church and State shall then be co-extensive. Man created "to have dominion over earth" is to rejoice over his world with unmixt, holy joy. St. John tells us that, instead of the devil, the transfigured Church of Christ; Daniel, that instead of the heathen beast, the holy Israel, shall rule the world. (AUBERLEN.) 6. Blessed—(cf. ch. 14. 13; 19. 9.) on such the second death hath no power—even as it has none on Christ now that He is risen. priests of God—Apostate Christendom being destroyed, and the believing church translated at Christ's coming, there will remain Israel and the heathen world, constituting the majority of men then alive, which, from not having come into close contact with the gospel, have not incurred the guilt of rejecting it. These will be the subjects of a general conversion (ch. 11. 16). "The veil" shall be taken off Israel first, then from off "all people." The glorious events attending Christ's appearing, the destruction of antichrist, the transfiguration of the church, and the binding of Satan, will prepare the nations for embracing the gospel. As individual-regeneration goes on now, so there shall be a "regeneration of nations" then. Israel, as a nation, shall be "born at once—in one day." As the church began at Christ's ascension, so the kingdom shall begin at His second advent. This is the humiliation of the modern civilized nations, that nations which they despise, most Jews and uncivilized barbarians, the negro descendants of Ham who from the curse of Noah have been so backward, Kush and Sheba, shall supplant and surpass them as centres of the world's history (cf. Deuteronomy, 32. 21; Romans, 10. 19; 11. 20, &c.). The Jews are our teachers even in New Testament times. Since their rejection revelation has been silent. The whole Bible, even the New Testament, is written by Jews.

If revelation is to recommence in the millennial kingdom, converted Israel must stand at the head of humanity. In a religious point of view, Jews and Gentiles stand on an equal footing as both alike needing mercy; but as regards God's instrumentalities for bringing about His kingdom on earth, Israel is His chosen people for executing His plans. The Israelite priest-kings on earth are what the transfigured priest-kings are in heaven. There shall be a blessed chain of giving and receiving—God, Christ, the transfigured Bride the church, Israel, the world of nations. A new time of revelation will begin by the out-pouring of the fulness of the Spirit. Ezekiel (chs. 40-48), himself son of a priest, sets forth the priestly character of Israel; Daniel the statesman, its kingly character; Jeremiah (33. 17-21), both its priestly and kingly character. In the Old Testament the whole Jewish national life was religious only in an external legal manner. The New Testament church insists on inward renewal, but leaves its outward manifestations free. But in the millennial kingdom, all spheres of life shall be truly Christianized from within outwardly. The Mosaic ceremonial law corresponds to Israel's priestly office; the civil law to its kingly office; the Gentile church adopts the moral law, and exercises the prophetic office by the word working inwardly. But when the royal and the priestly office shall be revived, then—the principles of the epistle to the Hebrews remaining the same—also the ceremonial and civil law of Moses will develop its spiritual depths in the Divine worship (cf. Matthew, 5. 17-19). At present is the time of preaching; but then the time of the Liturgy of converted souls forming "the great congregation" shall come. Then shall our present defective governments give place to perfect governments in both Church and State. Whereas under the Old Testament the Jews exclusively, and in the New Testament the Gentiles exclusively, enjoy the revelation of salvation (in both cases humanity being divided and separated), in the millennium both Jews and Gentiles are united, and the whole organism of mankind under the first-born brother, Israel, walks in the light of God, and the full life of humanity is at last realized. Scripture does not view the human race as an aggregate of individuals and nationalities, but as an organic whole, laid down once for all in the first pages of revelation (Genesis, 9. 25-27; 10. 1, 5, 18, 26, 32; Deuteronomy, 32. 8, recognizes the fact that from the first the division of the nations was made with a relation to Israel). Hence arises the importance of the Old Testament to the church now as ever. Three grand groups of nations, Hamites, Japhetites, and Shemites, correspond respectively to the three fundamental elements in man—body, soul, and spirit. The flower of Shem, the representative of spiritual life, is Israel, even as the flower of Israel is He in whom all mankind is summed up, the second Adam (Genesis, 12. 1-3). Thus Israel is the mediator of Divine revelations for all times. Even nature and the animal-world will share in the millennial blessedness. As sin loses its power, decay and death will decrease. (AUBERLEN.) Earthly and heavenly glories shall be united in the two-fold election. Elect Israel in the flesh shall stand at the head of the earthly, the elect spiritual church, the Bride, in the heavenly. These two-fold elections are not merely for the good of the elect themselves, but for the good of those to whom they minister. The heavenly church is elected not merely to salvation, but to rule in love, and minister blessings over the whole earth, as king-priests. The glory of the transfigured saints shall be felt by men in the flesh with the same consciousness of blessing as on the mount of transfiguration the three disciples experienced in witnessing the glory of Jesus, and of Moses and Elias, when Peter exclaimed, "It is good for us to be here." In 2 Peter, 1. 11-18, the transfiguration is regarded as the career of Christ's coming in glory. The privilege of "our high calling in Christ" is limited to the present time of Satan's reign; when he is bound, there will be no scope for suffering for, and so afterwards reigning with Him (ch. 3. 21; cf. Note, 1 Corinthians, 6. 2). Moreover, none can be saved in the present age and in the pale of the Christian church, who does not also reign with Christ hereafter, the necessary preliminary to which is suffering with Christ now. If we fall to lay hold of the crown, we lose all, "the gift of grace as well as the reward of service." [DURUBURGH.] 7. expired—Greek, "finished." 8. Gog and Magog—(Notes, Ezekiel, 38, and 39.) Magog is a general name for northern nations of Japheth's posterity, whose ideal head is Gog (Genesis, 10. 2). A has but one Greek article to "Gog and Magog," whereby the two, viz. the prince and the people, are marked as having the closest connexion. B reads the second article before Magog wrongly. HULUSUM (Onomasticon) explains both words as signifying lofty, elevated. For "quarters" the Greek is "corners," to battle—Greek, "to the war," in A, B. But ANDREAS omits "the." 9. on the breadth of the earth—so as completely to overspread it. Perhaps we ought to translate, "... of the [holy] land." the camp of the saints . . . and the beloved city—the camp of the saints encircling the beloved city, Jerusalem (Ecclesiasticus, 24. 11). Contrast "hateful" in Babylon (ch. 18. 2; Deuteronomy, 32. 16, LXX.). Ezekiel's prophecy of Gog and Magog (38, and 39) refers to the attack made by antichrist on Israel before the millennium: but this attack is made after the millennium, so that "Gog and Magog" are mystical names representing the final adversaries led by Satan in person. Ezekiel's Gog and Magog come from the N., but those here come "from the four corners of the earth." Gog is by some connected with a Hebrew root, "covered," from God—So B, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS. But A omits the words. Even during the millennium there is a separation between heaven and earth, transfigured humanity and humanity in the flesh. Hence it is possible that an apostasy should take place at its close. In the judgment on this apostasy the world of nature is destroyed and renewed, as the world of history was before the millennial kingdom; it is only then that the new heaven and new earth are realized in final perfection. The millennial new heaven and earth are but a foretaste of this everlasting state when the upper and lower congregations shall be no longer separate, though connected as in the millennium, and when new Jerusalem shall descend from God out of heaven. The inherited sinfulness of our nature shall be the only influence during the millennium to prevent the power of the transfigured church saving all souls. When this time of grace shall end, no other shall succeed. For what can move him in whom the visible glory of the church, whilst the influence of evil is restrained, evokes no longing for communion with the church's King? As the history of the world of nations ended with the manifestation of the church in visible glory, so that of mankind in general shall end with the great separation of the just from the wicked (v. 12). [AUBURULUS.] 10. that deceived—Greek, "that deceiveth," etc. lake of fire—his final doom: as "the bottomless pit" (v. 1) was his temporary prison. where—So Coptic. But A, B, Vulgate, and Syriac read, "where also." the beast and the false prophet are—(ch. 19. 20.) for ever and ever—Greek, "to the ages of the ages." day and night—figurative for without intermission (ch. 22. 6), such as now is caused by night interposing between day and day. The same phrase is used of the eternal state of the blessed (ch. 4. 8). As the bliss of these is eternal, so the woe of Satan and the lost must be. As the beast and the false prophet led the former conspiracy against Christ and His people, so Satan in person heads the last conspiracy. Satan shall be permitted, to enter this

Paradise regained, to show the perfect security of believers, unlike the first Adam whom Satan succeeded in robbing of Paradise; and shall, like Pharaoh at the Red sea, receive in this last attempt his final doom. 11. great—in contrast to the "thrones," v. 4. white—the emblem of purity and justice. him that sat on it—The Father. [ALFORD.] Rather, the Son, to whom "the Father hath committed all judgment." God in Christ, i. e., the Father represented by the Son, is He before whose judgment-seat we must all stand. The Son's Mediatorial reign is with a view to prepare the kingdom for the Father's acceptance, which having done He shall give it up to the Father, "that God may be all in all," coming into direct communion with His creatures, without intervention of a Mediator, for the first time since the fall. Heretofore Christ's Prophetic mediation had been prominent in His earthly ministry, His Priestly mediation is prominent now in heaven between His first and second advents, and His Kingly shall be so during the millennium and at the general judgment. earth and heaven fled away—The final conflagration, therefore, precedes the general judgment. This is followed by the new heaven and earth (ch. 21). 12. the dead—"the rest of the dead" who did not share the first resurrection, and those who died during the millennium. small and great—B has "the small and the great." A, Vulgate, Syriac, and ANDREAS have "the great and the small." The wicked who had died from the time of Adam to Christ's second advent, and all the righteous and wicked who had died during and after the millennium, shall then have their eternal portion assigned to them. The godly who were transfigured and reigned with Christ during it, shall also be present, not indeed to have their portion assigned as if for the first time (for that shall have been fixed long before, John, 6. 24), but to have it confirmed for ever, and that God's righteousness may be vindicated in the case of both the saved and the lost, in the presence of an assembled universe. Cf. "We must all appear," etc., Romans, 14. 10; 2 Corinthians, 5. 10. The saints having been first pronounced just themselves by Christ out of "the book of life," shall sit as assessors of the Judge. Cf. Matthew, 25. 31, 32, 40, "these my brethren." God's omniscience will not allow the most insignificant to escape unobserved, and His omnipotence will cause the mightiest to obey the summons. The living are not specially mentioned: as these all shall probably first (before the destruction of the ungodly, v. 9) be transfigured, and caught up with the saints long previously transfigured; and though present for the confirmation of their justification by the Judge, shall not then first have their eternal state assigned to them, but shall sit as assessors with the Judge. the books... opened—(Daniel, 7. 10.) The books of God's remembrance, alike of the evil and the good (Psalm 66. 8; 139. 4; Malachi, 3. 16); Conscience (Romans, 2. 15, 16), the Word of Christ (John, 12. 48), the Law (Galatians, 3. 10), God's eternal counsel (Psalm 159. 16), book of life—(ch. 3. 6; 13. 8; 21. 27; Exodus, 32. 32, 33; Psalm 69. 28; Daniel, 12. 1; Philippians, 4. 3.) Besides the general book recording the works of all, there is a special book for believers in which their names are written, not for their works, but for the work of Christ for, and in, them. Therefore it is called "the Lamb's book of life." Electing grace has singled them out from the general mass, according to their works—We are justified by faith, but judged according to (not by) our works. For the general judgment is primarily designed for the final vindication of God's righteousness before the whole world, which in this chequered dispensation of good and evil, though really ruling the world, has been for the time less manifest. Faith is appreciable by God and the believer alone (ch. 2. 17). But works are appreciable by all. These, then, are made the evidential test to decide men's eternal state.

regeneration and transfiguration of nature is given already in the regenerate soul, unto me—So Coptic and ANDREAS. But A, B, Vulgate, and Syriac omit, true and faithful—So ANDREAS. But A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic transpose, "faithful and true" (lit., genuine). 6. It is done—The same Greek as in ch. 10, 17. "It is come to pass." So Vulgate reads with English Version. But A reads, "They (these words, v. 6) are come to pass." All is as sure as if it actually had been fulfilled. For it rests on the word of the unchanging God. When the consummation shall be, God shall rejoice over the work of His own hands, as at the completion of the first creation God saw everything that He had made, and beheld it was very good. Alpha...Omega—Greek in A, B, "the Alpha...the Omega" (ch. 1, 8), give unto...thirst...water of life—(ch. 22, 17; Isaiah, 12, 3; 45, 1; John, 4, 13, 14; 7, 37, 38.) This is added lest any should despair of attaining to this exceeding weight of glory. In our present state we may drink of the stream, then we shall drink at the Fountain, freely—Greek, "gratuitously": the same Greek as is translated, "They hated me) without a cause," John, 15, 25. As gratuitous as was man's hatred of God, so gratuitous is God's love to man: there was every cause in Christ why man should love Him, yet man hated Him; there was every cause in man why (humanly speaking) God should have hated man, yet God loved man: the very reverse of what might be expected took place in both cases. Even in heaven our drinking at the Fountain shall be God's gratuitous gift. 7. He that overcometh—Another aspect of the believer's life: a conflict with sin, Satan, and the world is needed. Thirsting for salvation is the first beginning of, and continues for ever (in the sense of an appetite and relish for divine joys) a characteristic of the believer. In a different sense, the believer "shall never thirst." Inherit all things—A, B, Vulgate, and CYPRIAN read, "these things," viz. the blessings described in this whole passage. With "all things," cf. 1 Corinthians, 3, 21-23. I will be his God—Greek, "...to him a God," i.e., all that is implied of blessing in the name "God," he shall be my son—"He" is emphatical: He in particular and in a peculiar sense, above others: Greek, "shall be to me a son." In fullest realization of the promise made in type to Solomon, son of David, and antitypically to the Divine Son of David, 8. the fearful—Greek, "the cowardly," who do not quit themselves like men so as to "overcome" in the good fight: who have the spirit of slavish "fear," not love, towards God; and who through fear of man are not bold for God or "draw back." Cf. v. 27; ch. 22, 15. unbelieving—Greek, "faithless," abominable—who have drunk of the harlot's "cup of abominations," sorcerers—one of the characteristics of antichrist's time, all liars—Greek, "all the liars;" or else "all who are liars;" cf. 1 Timothy, 4, 1, 2, where similarly lying, and dealings with spirits and demons, are joined together as features of "the latter times." second death—ch. 20, 14: "everlasting destruction." 2 Thessalonians, 1, 9; Mark, 9, 44, 46, 48. "Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." 8. The same angel who had shown John Babylon, the harlot, is appropriately employed to show him in contrast new Jerusalem, the Bride (ch. 17, 1-6). The angel so employed is the one that had the seven last plagues, to show that the ultimate blessedness of the church is one end of the Divine judgments on her foes, unto me—A, B, and Vulgate omit, the Lamb's wife—in contrast to her who sat on many waters (ch. 17, 1), i.e., intruded with many peoples and nations of the world, instead of giving her undivided affections, as the Bride doth, to the Lamb. 10. The words correspond to ch. 17, 3, to heighten the contrast of the bride and the harlot, mountain—Cf. Ezekiel, 40, 2, where a similar vision is given from a high mountain, that great—Omitted in A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and CYPRIAN. Translate then, "the holy city Jerusalem," descending—Even in the millennium the earth will not be a suitable abode for transfigured saints, who therefore shall then reign in heaven over the earth. But after the renewal of the earth at the close of the millennium and judgment, they shall descend from heaven to dwell on an earth assimilated to heaven itself. "From God" implies that "we (the city) are God's workmanship." 11. Having the glory of God—not merely the Shechinah cloud, but God Himself as her glory dwelling in the midst of her. Cf. the type, the earthly Jerusalem in the millennium (Zechariah, 2, 6; cf. v. 23, below), her light—Greek, "light-giver;" properly applied to the heavenly luminaries which diffuse light. Cf. Note, Philippiana, 2, 15, the only other passage where it occurs. The "and" before "her light" is omitted in A, B, and Vulgate, even like—Greek, "as it were," Jasper—representing valery crystalline brightness. 12. And—A, B omit. Ezekiel, 45, 50-55, has a similar description, which implies that the millennial Jerusalem shall have its exact antitype in the heavenly Jerusalem which shall descend on the finally-regenerated earth, wall great and high—setting forth the security of the church. Also, the exclusion of the ungodly, twelve angels—guards of the twelve gates: an additional emblem of perfect security; whilst the gates being never shut (v. 25) imply perfect liberty and peace. Also, angels shall be the brethren of the heavenly citizens, names of...twelve tribes—The inscription of the names on the gates implies that none but the spiritual Israel, God's elect, shall enter the heavenly city. As the millennium wherein lit. Israel in the flesh shall be the mother-church, is the antitype to the Old Testament earthly theocracy in the Holy land, so the heavenly new Jerusalem is the consummation antitypical to the spiritual Israel, the elect church of Jews and Gentiles being now gathered out: as the spiritual Israel now is an advance upon the previous literal and carnal Israel, so the heavenly Jerusalem shall be much in advance of the millennial Jerusalem. 13. On the north...on the south—A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic read, "And on the North and on the South." In Ezekiel, 48, 32, Joseph, Benjamin, Dan (for which Manasseh is substituted in ch. 7, 6), are on the East. Reuben, Judah, Levi, are on the North. Simeon, Issachar, Zebulun, on the South. Gad, Asher, Naphtali, on the West. In Numbers, 2, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, are on the East. Reuben, Simeon, Gad, on the South. Ephraim, Manasseh, Benjamin, on the West. Dan, Asher, Naphtali, on the North. 14. twelve foundations—Joshua, the type of Jesus, chose twelve men out of the people, to carry twelve stones over the Jordan with them, as Jesus chose twelve apostles to be the twelve foundations of the heavenly city, of which He is Himself the chief corner stone. Peter is not the only apostolic rock on whose preaching Christ builds His church. Christ Himself is the true foundation: the twelve are foundations only in regard to their apostolic testimony concerning Him. Though Paul was an apostle, besides the twelve, yet the mystical number is retained, 12 representing the church, viz., 3 the divine number, multiplied by 4 the world-number, in them the names, &c.—as architects often have their names inscribed on their great works. So the names of the apostles shall be held in everlasting remembrance. Vulgate reads, "in them." But A, B, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS read, "upon them." These authorities also insert "twelve" before "names," 15, had a golden reed—So Coptic. But A, B, Vulgate, and Syriac read, "Had (as) a measure, a golden reed." In ch. 11, 2, the non-measuring of the outer courts of the temple implied its being given up to secular and heathen desecration. So here, on the contrary, the city being measured implies the entire consecration of every part, all things being brought up to the most exact.

standard of God's holy requirements, and also God's accurate guardianship henceforth of even the most minute parts of His Holy city from all evil. twelve thousand furlongs—lit., "to 12,000 stadia;" one thousand furlongs being the space between the several twelve gates. BENGEI makes the length of each side of the city to be 12,000 stadia. The stupendous height, length, and breadth being exactly alike, imply its faultless symmetry, transcending in glory all our most glowing conceptions. 17, hundred...forty...four cubits—Twelve times twelve; the church-number squared. The wall is far beneath the height of the city. measure of a man, that is, of the angel!—The ordinary measure used by men is the measure here used by the angel, distinct from "the measure of the sanctuary." Men shall then be equal to the angels. 18, the building—"the structure" [TROBELLUS, Greek endomeseis, gold, like, clear glass—ideal gold, transparent as no gold here is. [ALFORD.] Excellencies will be combined in the heavenly city which now seem incompatible. 19, And—So Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS. But A, B, and Vulgate omit. Cf. v. 14 with this verse; also Isaiah, 54, 11, all manner of precious stones—Contrast ch. 18, 12 to the harlot, Babylon. These precious stones constituted the "foundations," chalcedony—Agate from Chalcedon; semi-opaque, sky-blue, with stripes of other colours. [ALFORD.] 20, sardonyx—A gem having the redness of the cornelian, and the whiteness of the onyx. sardius—(Note, ch. 4, 3.) chrysolite—Described by PLINY as transparent, and of a golden brightness, like our topaz; different from our pale green crystallized chrysolite, beryl—of a sea-green colour. topaz—PLINY, 37, 32, makes it green and transparent, like our chrysolite, chrysoprasus—some what pale, and having the purple colour of the amethyst. [PLINY, 37, 51.] jasinath—The flashing violet brightness in the amethyst is diluted in the jasinath. [PLINY, 37, 41.] 21, every several—Greek, "each one severally." 22, no temple—God, the temple—As God now dwells in the spiritual church, His "temple" (Greek naos, shrine; 1 Corinthians, 3, 17; 8, 19), so the church when perfected shall dwell in Him as her "temple" (naos; the same Greek). As the church was "His sanctuary" so He is to be their sanctuary. Means of grace shall cease when the end of grace is come. Church ordinances shall give place to the God of ordinances. Uninterrupted, immediate, direct, communion with Him and the Lamb (cf. John, 4, 23), shall supersede intervening ordinances. 23, in it—So Vulgate. But A, B, and ANDREAS read, "shine" on it, or lit., "for her." the light—Greek, "the lamp" [Isaiah, 60, 19, 20]. The direct light of God and the Lamb shall make the saints independent of God's creatures, the sun and moon, for light. 24, of them which are saved...in—A, B, Vulgate, Coptic, and ANDREAS read, "the nations shall walk 'by means of her light' omitting "of them which are saved." Her brightness shall supply them with light, the kings of the earth—who once had regard only to their own glory, having been converted, now in the new Jerusalem do bring their glory into it, to lay it down at the feet of their God and Lord, and honour—So B, Vulgate, and Syriac. But A omits the clause. 25, not be shut...by day—therefore shall never be shut: for it shall always be day. Gates are usually shut by night; but in it shall be no night. There shall be continual free ingress into it, so as that all which is blessed and glorious may continually be brought into it. So in the millennial type, 26, All that was truly glorious and excellent in the earth and its converted nations shall be gathered into it; and whilst all shall form one Bride, there shall be various orders among the redeemed, analogous to the divisions of nations on earth constituting the one great human family, and to the various orders of angels. 27, any thing that defileth—Greek koinoun. A, B, read [Joison], "anything unclean." in the Lamb's book of life—(Note, ch. 20, 12, 15.) As all the filth of the old Jerusalem was carried outside of the walls and burnt there, so nothing defiled shall enter the heavenly city but be burnt outside (cf. ch. 22, 15). It is striking that the apostle of love who shows us the glories of the heavenly city, is he also who speaks most plainly of the terrors of hell. On v. 26, 27, ALFORD writes a Note, rash in speculation, about the heathen nations, above what is written, and not at all required by the sacred text: cf. my Note, v. 26.

CHAPTER XXII.

VER. 1-21. THE RIVER OF LIFE: THE TREE OF LIFE: THE OTHER BLESSEDNESSES OF THE REDEEMED. JOHN FORBIDDEN TO WORKHIT THE ANGEL. NEARNESS OF CHRIST'S COMING TO FIX MEN'S ETERNAL STATE. TESTIMONY OF JESUS, HIS SPIRIT, AND THE BRIDE, ANY ADDITION TO WHICH, OR SUBTRACTION FROM WHICH, SHALL BE ETERNALLY PUNISHED. CLOSING BENEDICTION. 1. SUB—A, B, Vulgate, and HILARY, 22, omit. water of life—infinitely superior to the typical waters in the first Paradise (Genesis, 2, 10-14); and even superior to those figurative ones in the millennial Jerusalem (Ezekiel, 47, 1, &c., 12; Zechariah, 14, 8), as the matured fruit is superior to the flower. The millennial waters represent full gospel grace; these waters of new Jerusalem represent gospel-glory perfected. Their continuous flow from God, the Fountain of life, symbolizes the uninterrupted continuance of life derived by the saints, ever fresh, from Him: life in fulness of joy, as well as perpetual vitality. Like pure crystal, it is free from every taint: cf. ch. 4, 6, "before the throne a sea of glass, like crystal." clear—Greek, "bright." 2, The harmonious unity of Scripture is herein exhibited. The Fathers compared it to a ring, an unbroken circle, returning into itself. Between the events of Genesis and those at the close of the Apocalypse, at least 659 or 7000 years intervene; and between Moses the first writer, and John the last, about 1500 years. How striking it is that, as in the beginning we found Adam and Eve, his bride, in innocence in Paradise, then tempted by the serpent, and driven from the Tree of life, and from the pleasant waters of Eden, yet not without a promise of a Redeemer who should crush the serpent: so at the close, the old serpent cast out for ever by the second Adam, the Lord from heaven, who appears with His Bride, the church, in a better Paradise, and amidst better waters (v. 1); the tree of life also is there with all its healing properties, not guarded with a flaming sword, but open to all who overcome (ch. 2, 7), and there is no more curse. street of it—i.e., of the city, on either side of the river—ALFORD translates, "In the midst of the street of it (the city) and of the river, on one side and on the other" (for the second Greek entrouthen, A, B, and Syriac read, ekenthen: the sense is the same; cf. Greek, John, 19, 18); thus the trees were on each side in the middle of the space between the street and the river. But from Ezekiel, 47, 1, I prefer English Version. The antitype exceeds the type: in the first Paradise was only one tree of life; now there are "very many trees at the bank of the river, on the one side and on the other." To make good sense, supposing there to be but one tree, we should either, as Mede, suppose that the Greek for street is a plain washed on both sides by the river as the first Paradise was washed on one side by the Tigris, on the other by the Euphrates, and that in the midst of the plain, which itself is in the midst of the river's branches, stood the tree; in which case we may translate, "In the midst of the street (plain) itself, and of the river (having two branches flowing on this and on that side, was there the tree of life." Or else with DURHAM suppose, the tree was in the midst of the river, and extending its branches to both banks. But cf. Ezekiel, 47, 12, the millennial type of the first

which shows that there are several trees of kind, all termed "the tree of life." Death because of sin: even in the millennial earth therefore death, though much limited, shall rather cease. But in the final and heavenly with, sin and death shall utterly cease, yielded every month—Greek, "according to each each month had its own proper fruit, just as seasons are now marked by their own produce: only that then, unlike now, there shall be without its fruit, and there shall be an endless answering to twelve, the number symbolical world-wide church (cf. Notes, ch. 12, 1; 21, 14). SHOP WHATLEY thinks that the tree of life the trees of which Adam freely ate (Genesis, 17), and that his continuance in immortality dependent on his continuing to eat of this tree: forfeited it, he became liable to death; but still its of having eaten of it for a time showed us in the longevity of the patriarchs. God doubtfully endure a tree with special medicinal But Genesis, 3, 22, seems to imply, man had eaten of the tree, and that if he had, he would die for ever, which in his then fallen state would be the greatest curse. leaves...for...healing—47, 9, 12.) The leaves shall be the health-giving tree securing the redeemed against, not healing sicknesses. Whilst "the fruit shall be for in the millennium described by Ezekiel, 47, 0., the church shall give the gospel-tree to us outside Israel and the church, and so shall spiritual malady: but in the final and perfect salem here described, the state of all is eternal, and no saving process goes on any longer. ALFORD utterly mistakes in speaking of outside," and "dwelling on the renewed organized under kings, and saved by the influence heavenly city." (1) Cf. v. 2, 10-17: the mentioned (ch. 21, 94) are those which have re, viz., in the millennium (ch. 11, 16), become s and His Christ's. 3, no more curse—of which st shall be given in the millennium (Zech—11). God can only dwell where the curse cause, the cursed thing sin, (Joshua, 7, 12), yved. So there follows rightly, "But the God and of the Lamb (who redeemed us curse, Galatians, 3, 10, 13) shall be in it." Cf. millennium, Ezekiel, 48, 36, serve him—with ch. 7, 16). 4. see his face—revealed in divine Christ Jesus. They shall see and know Him itive knowledge of Him, even as they are Him (1 Corinthians, 13, 9-12), and face to face. othy, 6, 16, with John, 14, 9. But A reads, "upon them," th a glory probably transcending that of their heaven with Christ over the millennial nations is described in ch. 20, 4, 6: that reign was but ted time, "a thousand years;" this final reign the ages of the ages." 6. These sayings are ice repeated (ch. 19, 9; 21, 3).

They are no dreams of a visionary, but the realities of God's sure word. holy—So ANDREAS. But A. B. Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic read, "(the Lord God of the spirits of the prophets)." The Lord God who with His Spirit inspired their spirits so as to be able to prophesy. There is but One Spirit, but individual prophets, according to the measure given them (1 Corinthians, 12, 4-11), had their own spirits (BENGLI) (1 Peter, 1, 11; 2 Peter, 1, 21). be done—Greek, "come to pass." 7. "And" is omitted in Coptic and ANDREAS with English Version, but is inserted by A. B. Vulgate and Syriac, blessed—(ch. 1, 3.) 8. Both here and in ch. 19, 9, 10, the apostle's falling at the feet of the angel is preceded by the assurance, that "These are the true sayings of God," and that those are "blessed" who keep them. Rapturous emotion, gratitude, and adoration, at the prospect of the church's future glory transport him out of himself, so as all but to fall into an unjustifiable act: contrast his opposite feeling at the prospect of the church's deep fall (AUBRELEN), ch. 17, 6, where cf. the Note, and on ch. 19, 9, 10. saw and heard—A. B. Vulgate, and Syriac transpose these verbs. Translate lit., "I John (was he) who heard and saw these things." It is observable that in ch. 10, 10, the language is, "I fell before his feet to worship him;" but here, "I fell down to worship (God) before the feet of the angel." It seems unlikely that John, when once reproved, would fall into the very same error again. BENGLI'S view, therefore, is probable: John had first intended to worship the angel (ch. 19, 10), but now only at his feet intends to worship (God). The angel does not even permit this. 9. Lit., "See not:" the abruptness of the phrase marking the angel's abhorrence of the thought of his being worshipped however indirectly. Contrast the fallen angel's temptation to Jesus, "Fall down and worship me" (Matthew, 4, 9). for—A. B. Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, ANDREAS, and CYPRIAN omit "for;" which accords with the abrupt earnestness of the angel's prohibition of an act derogatory to God, and of—"and (the fellow-servant) of thy brethren." 10. Seal not—But in Daniel, 12, 4, 9 (cf. 8, 26), the command is, "Seal the book;" for the vision shall be "for many days." The fulfilment of Daniel's prophecy was distant, that of John's prophecy is near. The New Testament is the time of the end and fulfilment. The Gentile church, for which John wrote his Revelation, needs more to be impressed with the shortness of the period, as it is inclined, owing to its Gentile origin, to conform to the world and forget the coming of the Lord. The Revelation points, on the one hand, to Christ's coming as distant, for it shows the succession of the seven seals, trumpets, and vials; on the other hand, it proclaims, "Behold I come quickly." So Christ marked many events as about to intervene before His coming, and yet also saith, Behold I come quickly, because our right attitude is that of continual prayerful-watching for His coming (Matthew, 25, 6, 12, 19; Mark, 13, 32-37 [AUBRELEN]; cf. ch. 1, 3). 11. unjust—"unrighteous" in relation to one's fellowmen: opposed to "righteous," or "just" (as the Greek may be translated) below. More literally, "he that doeth unjustly, let him do unjustly still." filthy—in relation to one's own soul as unclean before God: opposed to "holy," consecrated to God as pure. A omits the clause "He which is filthy let him be filthy still." But B supports it. In the letter of the Vienne and Lyons Martyrs (in ECCEBROS) in the second century, the reading is, "He that is lawless (Greek anomos), let him be lawless; and he that is righteous let him be righteous (lit., "be justified") still." No MS. is so old. A. B. Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, ANDREAS, and CYPRIAN read,

"let him do righteousness" (John, 2: 29; 3: 7). The punishment of sin is sin, the reward of holiness is holiness. Eternal punishment is not so much an arbitrary law, as a result necessarily following in the very nature of things, as the fruit results from the bud. No worse punishment can God lay on ungodly men than to give them up to themselves. The solemn lesson derivable from this verse is, Be converted now in the short time left (6: 10, end) before "I come" (7: 12), or else you must remain unconverted for ever: sin in the eternal world will be left to its own natural consequences: holiness in earth will there develop itself into perfect holiness, which is happiness. 12. And—In none of our MSS. But A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and Cyprian omit it. Behold, I come quickly—(cf. v. 7.) my reward is with me—(Isaiah, 40: 10; 62: 11.) to give—Greek, "to render," every man—Greek, "to each," shall be—So B in Mat. But B in TUCHENPOND, and A, Syriac read "is." 13. I am Alpha—Greek, "...the Alpha and the Omega." A, B, Vulgate, Syriac, ORIGEN, and CYPRIAN transpose thus, "the First and the Last, the Beginning and the End." ANDREAS supports English Version. Cf. with these divine titles assumed here by the Lord Jesus, ch. 1: 8, 17; 21: 6. At the winding up of the whole scheme of revelation He announces Himself as the One before whom and after whom there is no God. 14. do his commandments—So B, Syriac, Coptic, and CYPRIAN. But A, N, and Vulgate read, (Blessed are they that) "wash their robes," viz., in the blood of the Lamb (cf. ch. 7: 14). This reading takes away the pretext for the notion of salvation by works. But even English Version reading is quite compatible with salvation by grace: for God's first and grand gospel "commandment" is to believe on Jesus. Thus our "right" to Greek, privilege or lawful authority over the tree of life is due not to our doings, but to what He has done for us. The right, or privilege, is founded, not on our merits, but on God's grace. through—Greek, "by the gates." 15. But—So Coptic. But A, B, HIPPOLYTUS, ANDREAS, and CYPRIAN omit. dogs—Greek, "the dogs"; the impure, filthy (v. 11; cf. Philipians, 3: 2), maketh—including also "whoever practise a lie" (W. KELLY.) 16. wise angels—for Jesus is Lord of the angels. unto you—ministers and people in the seven representative churches, and, through you, to testify to Christians of all times and places. seat—offspring of David—Appropriate title here where assuring His church of "the sure mercies of David," secured to Israel first, and through Israel to the Gentiles. Root of David, as being Jehovah: the offspring of David as man. David's Lord, yet David's son (Matthew, 22: 42-45). the morning star—that ushered in the day of grace in the beginning of this dispensation, and that shall usher in the everlasting day of glory at its close. 17. Reply of the spiritual church and St. John to Christ's words (7: 12, 16). the Spirit—in the churches, and in the prophets, the bride—Not here called "wife," as that title applies to her only when the full number constituting the church shall have been completed. The invitation "Come" only holds good whilst the church is still but an affianced Bride, and not the actually wedded wife. However, "Come" may rather be the prayer of the Spirit in the church and in believers in reply to Christ's "I come quickly," crying, Even so, "Come" (7: 12); v. 20 confirms this view. The whole question of your salvation hinges on this, that you be able to hear with joy Christ's announcement, "I come," and to reply, "Come." (Βεβαίη) Come to fully glorify thy Bride, let him that heareth—i.e., let him that heareth the Spirit and Bride saying to the Lord Jesus, "Come," join the Bride as a true believer, become part of her, and so say with her to Jesus, "Come." Or "heareth" means

"obeyeth;" for until one has obeyed the gospel call, he cannot pray to Jesus "Come," so "hear" is used, ch. 1: 2; John, 10: 15. Let him that hears and obeys Jesus' voice (7: 16; ch. 1: 3) join in praying "Come." Cf. ch. 6: 1, Note, 16. In the other view, which makes "Come" an invitation to sinners, this clause urges those who hear savingly the invitation themselves, to address the same to others, as did Andrew and Philip after they had heard and obeyed Jesus' invitation, "Come," themselves. let him that is athirst come—as the Bride, the church, prays to Jesus "Come," so she urges all whosever thirst for participation in the full manifestation of redemption glory at His coming to us, to come to Him in the meantime and drink of the living waters, which are the earnest of "the water of life pure as crystal...out of the throne of God and of the Lamb" (v. 1) in the regenerated heaven and earth. And—So Syriac. But A, B, Vulgate, and Coptic omit "and," whosever will—i.e., is willing and desirous. There is a descending climax: Let him that heareth effectually and savingly Christ's voice, pray individually, as the Bride, the church, does collectively, "Come, Lord Jesus" (v. 20). Let him who, though not yet having actually heard unto salvation, and so not yet able to join in the prayer, "Lord Jesus, come," still thirsts for it, come to Christ. Whosoever is even willing, though his desires do not yet amount to positive thirsting, let him take the water of life freely, i.e., gratuitously. 18. For—None of our MSS. has this. A, B, Vulgate, and ANDREAS read, "I," emphatical in the Greek. "I testify," unto these things—A, B, and ANDREAS read, "unto them," add—Just retribution in kind. 19. book—None of our MSS. read this. A, B, N, Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic read, "take away his part, i.e., portion from the tree of life," i.e., shall deprive him of participation in the tree of life, and from the things—So Vulgate. But A, B, N, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS omit "and," then "which are written in this book" will refer to "the holy city and the tree of life." As in the beginning of this book (ch. 1: 3) a blessing was promised to the devout, obedient student of it, so now at its close a curse is denounced against those who add to, or take from, it. 20. Amen. Even so, come—The Song of Solomon (5: 14) closes with the same yearning prayer for Christ's coming. A, B, and N omit "Even so," Greek has: then translate for Amen, "So be it, come, Lord Jesus," joining the "Amen," or "So be it," not with Christ's saying for He calls Himself the "Amen" at the beginning of sentences, rather than puts it as a confirmation at the end, but with St. John's reply. Christ's "I come," and St. John's "Come," are almost coincident in time: so truly does the believer reflect the mind of his Lord. 21. Our—So Vulgate, Syriac, and Coptic. But A, B, and N omit. Christ—So B, Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and ANDREAS. But A, N omit. with you all—So none of our MSS. B has "with all the saints." A and Vulgate has "with all," N has "with the saints." This closing benediction, Paul's mark in his epistles, was after Paul's death taken up by St. John. The Old Testament ended with "a curse" in connexion with the law; the New Testament ends with a blessing in union with the Lord Jesus. Amen—So B, N, and ANDREAS. A and Vulgate Vuldenis omit it.

May the Blessed Lord who has caused all holy Scriptures to be written for our learning, bless this humble effort to make Scripture expound itself, and make it an instrument towards the conversion of sinners and the edification of saints, to the glory of His great name and the hastening of His kingdom. Amen.
